TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY MONARCH

our deare and dread Soueraigne Lord,

IAMES,

By the good prouidence of God, King of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, the moſt worthy and moſt able Defender of the Faith, and moſt gracious Patron of the Church;
All Peace and Happineſſe.

Moſt gracious Soueraigne:

I Cannot ſo ouer-loue this iſſue of my owne braine, as to hold it worthy of your Maieſties iudicious eyes; much leſſe of the higheſt Patronage vnder Heauen: Yet now, my very duty hath bidden mee looke ſo high; & tels me it would be no leſſe then iniurious, if I ſhould not lay down my work where I owe my ſeruice; and that I ſhould offend, if I preſumed not. Beſides, whither ſhould the riuers runne, but into the Sea? It is to your Maieſtie (vnder the Higheſt) that wee owe both theſe ſweet opportunities of good, and all the good fruits of theſe happy opportunities: If wee ſhould not therefore freely offer to your Maieſtie ſome præmetiall handfulls of that crop, whereof you may challenge the whole harueſt, how could wee be but ſhameleſly vnthankefull? I cannot praiſe my Preſent otherwiſe, than by the truth of that heart from which it proceedeth: Onely this I may ſay; that ſeldome any man hath offered to your Royall hands a greater bundle of his owne thoughts (Some whereof, as it muſt needs fall out amongſt ſo many, haue beene confeſſed profitable) nor perhaps more varietie of diſcourſe: for here ſhall your Maieſtie finde Moralitie, like a good handmaid, waiting on Diuinitie; and Diuinitie, like ſome great Lady, euery day in ſeuerall dreſſes; Speculation interchanged with experience; Poſitiue Theologie with Polemicall; Textuall with diſcurſorie; Popular with Scholaſticall.

I cannot diſſemble my ioy to haue done this little good: And if it be the comfort, and honour of your vnworthy ſeruant, that the God of heauen hath vouchſafed to vſe his hand in the leaſt ſeruice of his Church; How can it be but your Crowne and reioycing, that the ſame God hath ſet apart your Maieſty, as a glorious inſtrument of ſuch an vniuerſall good to the whole Chriſtian World? It was a mad conceit of that old Hereſiarch, which might iuſtly take his name from madnes; That an huge Giant beares vp the earth with his ſhoulder; which he changes euery thirtieth yeere, for eaſe; and with the remouall cauſes an Earthquake. If by the deuice he had meant onely an Embleme of Kings (as our ancient Mythologiſts vnder their Saint George, and Chriſtopher, haue deſcribed the Chriſtian Souldier, and good Paſtor) he had not done amiſſe; for ſurely, the burthen of the whole world lies on the ſhoulders of Soueraigne authoritie; and it is no maruell if the Earth quake in the change. As Kings are to the World, ſo are good Kings to the Church: None can be ſo blinde, or enuious, as not to grant, that the whole Church of God vpon earth, reſts her ſelfe principally (next to her ſtay aboue) vpon your Maieſties Royall ſupportation; You may truly ſay with Dauid, Ego ſuſtineo columnas eius. What wonder is it then, if our tongues and pens bleſſe you; if wee be ambitious of all occaſions, that may teſtifie our cheerefull gratulations of this happines to your Highneſſe, & ours in you? Which, our humble praiers vnto him, by whom Kings reigne, ſhall labour to continue, till both the Earth and Heauens be truly changed.

The vnworthieſt of your Maieſties ſeruants,

IOS: HALL.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVLL SIR ROBERT DRVRY, KNIGHT,

ALL INCREASE OF TRVE HONOVR AND VERTVE.

SIR, that I haue made theſe my homely Aphoriſmes publike, needs no other reaſon, but that though the world is furniſhed with other writings, euen to ſatietie and ſurfet, yet of thoſe which reduce Chriſtianity to practiſe, there is (at leaſt) ſcarce enough: wherein (yet) I muſt needs confeſſe, I had ſome eye to my ſelfe: For, hauing after a ſort vowed this auſtere courſe of iudgment and practice to my ſelfe, I thought it beſt to acquaint the world with it, that it may either witneſſe my anſwerable proceeding, or checke mee in my ſtraying there-from. By which meanes, ſo many men as I liue amongſt, ſo many monitors I ſhall haue, which ſhall point mee to my owne rules, and vpbraid mee with my aberrations. Why I haue dedicated them to your name, cannot be ſtrange to any that knowes you my Patron, and mee your Paſtor. The regard of which bond, eaſily drew mee on to conſider, that whereas my body, which was euer weake, began of late to languiſh more, it would not be inexpedient (at the worſt) to leaue behinde me this little monument of that great reſpect which I deſeruedly beare you. And if it ſhall pleaſe God to reprieue me, vntill a longer day; yet it ſhall not repent me, to haue ſent this vnworthy ſcrowle, to wait vpon you in your neceſſary abſence; neither ſhall it be, I hope, bootleſſe for you, to adioyne theſe my meane ſpeculations vnto thoſe grounds of vertue you haue ſo happily laid: to which if they ſhall adde but one ſcruple, it ſhall be to me ſufficient ioy, contentment, recompence. From your Hal-ſted. Decemb. 4.

Your Worſhips humbly deuoted,

Ios. Hall.

THE FIRST CENTVRIE OF MEDITATIONS AND VOWES,

DIVINE and MORALL.

1

IN Meditation, thoſe, which beginne heauenly thoughts, and proſecute them not, are like thoſe which kindle a fire vnder greene wood, and leaue it, ſo ſoone as it but begins to flame; leeſing the hope of a good beginning, for want of ſeconding it with a ſutable proceeding: when I ſet my ſelfe to meditate, I will not giue ouer, till I come to an iſſue. It hath beene ſaid by ſome, that the beginning is as much as the middeſt; yea, more than all: but I ſay, the ending is more than the beginning.

2

There is nothing (but Man) that reſpecteth greatneſſe: Not God; not death; not iudgement. Not God: he is no accepter of perſons. Not nature: we ſee the ſonnes of Princes borne as naked as the pooreſt: and the poore childe as faire, well-fauoured, ſtrong, wittie, as the heire of Nobles. Not diſeaſe, death, iudgement: they ſicken alike, die alike, fare alike after death. There is nothing (beſides naturall men) of whom goodneſſe is not reſpected. I will honour greatneſſe in others: but for my ſelfe, I will eſteeme a dram of goodneſſe, worth a whole world of greatneſſe.

3

As there is a fooliſh wiſdome, ſo there is a wiſe ignorance; in not prying into Gods Arke; not enquiring into things not reuealed. I would faine know all that I need, and all that I may: I leaue Gods ſecrets to himſelfe. It is happie for me, that God makes me of his Court, though not of his Counſell.

4

As there is no vacuitie in nature, no more is there ſpiritually. Euery veſſell is full; if not of liquor, yet of aire: ſo is the heart of man; though (by nature) it is emptie of grace, yet it is full of hypocriſie, and iniquity. Now, as it is filled with grace, ſo it is emptie of his euill qualities; as in a veſſell, ſo much water as goes in, ſo much aire goes out: but mans heart is a narrow-mouthed veſſell, and receiues grace but by drops; and therefore takes a long time to emptie and fill. Now, as there be differences in degrees, and one heart is neerer to fulneſſe than another: ſo the beſt veſſell is not quite full, while it is in the body; becauſe there are ſtill remainders of corruption. I will neither be content with that meaſure of grace I haue, nor impatient of Gods delay; but euery day I will endeuour to haue one drop added to the reſt: ſo my laſt day ſhall fill vp my veſſell to the brim.

5

Satan would ſeeme to be mannerly and reaſonable; making, as if he would be content with one halfe of the heart, whereas God challengeth all or none: as (indeed) he hath moſt reaſon to claime all, that made all. But this is nothing but a craftie fetch of Satan; for he knowes, that if he haue any part, God will haue none: ſo, the whole falleth to his ſhare alone. My heart (when it is both whole, and at the beſt) is but a ſtrait and vnworthy lodging for God: if it were bigger and better, I would reſerue it all for him. Satan may looke in at my doores by a tentation: but he ſhall not haue ſo much as one chamber-roome ſet apart for him to ſoiourne in.

6

I ſee that in naturall motions, the neerer any thing comes to his end, the ſwifter it moueth. I haue ſeene great riuers, which at their firſt riſing out of ſome hills ſide, might be couered with a buſhell; which, after many miles, fill a very broad channell; and drawing neere to the Sea, do euen make a little Sea in their owne bankes: So the wind at the firſt riſing, as a little vapour from the crannies of the earth, and paſſing forward about the earth, the further it goes, the more bluſtering and violent it waxeth. A Chriſtians motion (after he is regenerate) is made naturall to God-ward: and therefore, the neerer he comes to heauen, the more zealous he is. A good man muſt not be like Ezekias Sunne, that went backward; nor like Ioſhuahs Sunne, that ſtood ſtill; but Dauids Sunne, that (like a Bridegroome) comes out of his chamber, and as a Champion reioyceth to runne his race: only herein is the difference, that when he comes to his high noone, he declineth not. How euer therefore, the minde (in her naturall faculties) followes the temperature of the body, yet in theſe ſupernaturall things ſhee quite croſſes it. For with the coldeſt complexion of age, is ioyned in thoſe that are truly religious, the ferventeſt zeale and affection to good things: which is therefore the more reuerenced, and better acknowledged, becauſe it cannot be aſcribed to the hot ſpirits of youth. The Deuill himſelfe deuiſed that old ſlander of early holineſſe; A young Saint, an old Deuill. Sometimes young Deuils haue proued old Saints; neuer the contrary: but true Saints in youth, doe alwayes proue Angels in their age. I will ſtriue to be euer good; but if I ſhould not finde my ſelfe beſt at laſt, I ſhould feare I was neuer good at all.

7

Conſent harteneth ſinne; which a little diſlike would haue daunted at firſt. As we ſay, There would be no theeues, if no receiuers: ſo would there not be ſo many open mouths to detract and ſlander, if there were not ſo many open eares to entertaine them. If I cannot ſtop another mans mouth from ſpeaking ill, I will either open my mouth to reproue it, or elſe I will ſtop mine eares from hearing it; and let him ſee in my face, that he hath no roome in my heart.

8

I haue oft wondered how fiſhes can retaine their freſh taſte, and yet liue in ſalt waters; ſince I ſee that euery other thing participates of the nature of the place wherein it abides. So, the waters paſſing thorow the chanels of the earth, vary their ſauour with the veines of ſoile, thorow which they ſlide. So, brute creatures, tranſported from one region to another, alter their former qualitie, and degenerate by little and little. The like danger I haue ſeene in the manners of men, conuerſing with euill companions in corrupt places: For, beſides that, it blemiſheth our reputation, and makes vs thought ill, though wee be good; it breeds in vs an inſenſible declination to ill; and workes in flowers to adorne it, ſuch varietie of creatures, for the commodious vſe of it: What muſt heauen needs bee, that is prouided for God himſelfe, and his friends? How can it bee leſſe in worth, than God is aboue his creatures, & Gods friends better than his enemies? I will not onely be content, but deſirous to be diſſolued.

22

It is commonly ſeene, that boldneſſe puts men forth before their time, before their abilitie. Wherein we haue ſeene many, that (like Lapwings, and Partridges) haue runne away with ſome part of their ſhell on their heads: whence it followes, that as they began boldly, ſo they proceed vnprofitably, and conclude not without ſhame. I would rather be haled by force of others to great duties, than ruſh vpon them vnbidden. It were better a man ſhould want worke, than that great workes ſhould want a man anſwerable to their weight.

23

I will vſe my friend as Moſes did his rod: While it was a rod, he held it familiarly in his hand: when once a Serpent, he ran away from it.

24

I haue ſeldome ſeene much oſtentation, and much learning met together. The Sunne, riſing, and declining, makes long ſhadowes; at mid-day when hee is at higheſt, none at all. Beſides that, ſkill when it is too much ſhowne, loſeth the grace: as freſh-coloured wares, if they be often opened, loſe their brightneſſe, and are ſoiled with much handling. I had rather applaud my ſelfe for hauing much, that I ſhew not; than that others ſhould applaud me for ſhewing more than I haue.

25

An ambitious man is the greateſt enemie to himſelfe, of any in the world beſides: for he ſtill torments himſelfe with hopes, and deſires, and cares: which he might auoid, if he would remit of the height of his thoughts, and liue quietly. My onely ambition ſhall be, to reſt in Gods fauour on earth, and to be a Saint in heauen.

26

There was neuer good thing eaſily come by. The Heathen man could ſay, God ſels knowledge for ſweat; and ſo he doth honour for ieopardy. Neuer any man hath got either wealth or learning with eaſe. Therefore the greateſt good muſt needs bee moſt difficult. How ſhall I hope to get Chriſt, if I take no paines for him? And if in all other things the difficultie of obtaining, whets the minde ſo much the more to ſeeke; why ſhould it in this alone daunt mee? I will not care what I doe, what I ſuffer, ſo I may winne Chriſt. If men can endure ſuch cutting, ſuch lancing, and ſearing of their bodies, to protract a miſerable life yet a while longer; what paine ſhould I refuſe for eternitie?

27

If I die, the world ſhall miſſe me but a little; I ſhall miſſe it leſſe. Not it mee, becauſe it hath ſuch ſtore of better men: Not I it, becauſe it hath ſo much ill, and I ſhall haue ſo much happineſſe.

28

Two things make a man ſet by; Dignitie, and Deſert. Amongſt fooles, the firſt without the ſecond is ſufficient: amongſt wiſe men, the ſecond without the firſt. Let me deſerue well, though I bee not aduanced. The conſcience of my worth ſhall cheere me more in others contempt, than the approbation of others can comfort me, againſt the ſecret checke of my owne vnworthineſſe.

29

The beſt qualities doe ſo cleaue to their ſubiects, that they cannot be communicated to others. For whereas patrimony and vulgar account of honor follow the bloud, in many generations; Vertue is not traduced by propagation, nor learning bequeathed by our Will to our heires; leſt the giuers ſhould wax proud, and the receiuers negligent. I will account nothing my owne, but what I haue gotten; nor that mine owne, becauſe it is more of gift, than deſert.

30

Then onely is the Church moſt happy, when Truth and Peace kiſſe each other; and then miſerable, when either of them balke the way, or when they meet and kiſſe not. For truth, without peace, is turbulent: and peace, without truth, is ſecure iniuſtice. Though I loue peace well, yet I loue maine truths better. And though I loue all truths well, yet I had rather conceale a ſmall truth, than diſturbe a common peace.

31

An indiſcreet good action, is little better than a diſcreet miſchiefe. For in this the doer wrongs onely the Patient: but in that other, the wrong is done to the good action: for both it makes a good thing odious (as many good tales are marr'd in telling) and beſides, it preiudices a future opportunitie. I will rather let paſſe a good gale of wind, and ſtay on the ſhore; than lanch forth, when I know the wind will be the contrary.

32

The World teacheth me, that it is madneſſe to leaue behinde me thoſe goods that I may carry with me: Chriſtianitie teacheth me, that what I charitably giue aliue, I carrie with me dead: and experience teacheth me, that what I leaue behinde, I loſe. I will carrie that treaſure with me by giuing it, which the worldling loſeth by keeping it: ſo, while his corps ſhall carrie nothing but a winding cloth to his graue, I ſhall be richer vnder the earth, than I was aboue it.

33

Euery worldling is an hypocrite: for while his face naturally lookes vpward to heauen, his heart grouels beneath on the earth: yet if I would admit of any diſcord in the inward and outward parts; I would haue an heart that ſhould looke vp to heauen in an holy contemplation of the things aboue, and a countenance caſt downe to the earth, in humiliation. This onely diſſimilitude is pleaſing to God.

34

The heart of man is a ſhort word, a ſmall ſubſtance; ſcarce enough to giue a Kite one meale, yet great in capacitie; yea, ſo infinite in deſire, that the round Globe of the world cannot fill the three corners of it. When it deſires more, and cries, Giue, giue; I will ſet it ouer to that infinite Good, where the more it hath, it may deſire more, and ſee more to be deſired: when it deſires but what it needeth, my hands ſhall ſoone ſatisfie it. For, if either of them may containe it, when it is without the body; much more may both of them fill it, while it is within.

35

With men it is a good rule; To try firſt, and then to truſt: with God it is contrary; I will firſt truſt him (as moſt wiſe, omnipotent, mercifull) and try him afterwards. I know it is as impoſſible for him to deceiue me, as not to be.

36

As Chriſt was both a Lambe, and a Lion: ſo is euery Chriſtian; A Lambe, for patience in ſuffering, and innocencie of life : A Lion, for boldneſſe in his innocencie. I would ſo order my courage and mildneſſe, that I may bee neither Lion-like in my conuerſation, nor ſheepiſh in the defence of a good cauſe.

37

The godly ſowe in teares, and reape in ioy. The ſeed-time is commonly wateriſh, and lowring. I will be content with a wet Spring, ſo I may be ſure of a cleere and ioyfull Harueſt.

38

Euery man hath an Heauen and an Hell. Earth is the wicked mans Heauen ; his Hell is to come : on the contrary, the godly haue their Hell vpon earth ; where they are vexed with tentations, and afflictions, by Satan and his complices : their Heauen is aboue in endleſſe happineſſe. If it be ill with me on earth, it is well my torment is ſo ſhort, and ſo eaſie : I will not be ſo couetous to hope for two heauens.

39

Man, on his death-bed hath a double proſpect : which in his life-time the interpoſition of pleaſure and miſeries debarred him from. The good man lookes vpward, and ſees heauen open, with Steuen, and the glorious Angels ready to carrie vp his ſoule: The wicked man lookes downeward, and ſees three terrible ſpectacles ; Death, Iudgment, Hell, one beyond another, and all to be paſſed thorow by his ſoule. I maruell not that the godly haue beene ſo cheerefull in death, that thoſe torments, whoſe very ſight hath ouercome the beholders, haue ſeemed eaſie to them. I maruell not that a wicked man is ſo loth to heare of death ; ſo deiected when hee feeleth ſickneſſe, and ſo deſperate when he feeleth the pangs of death ; nor that euery Balaam would faine die the death of the righteous. Henceforth I will enuie none, but a good man : I will pittie nothing ſo much as the proſperitie of the wicked.

40

Not to be afflicted, is a ſigne of weakneſſe. For, therefore God impoſeth no more on mee, becauſe he ſees I can beare no more. God will not make choice of a weake Champion. When I am ſtronger, I will looke for more : and when I ſuſtaine more, it ſhall more comfort me, that God findes me ſtrong, than it ſhall grieue me to be preſſed with an heauie affliction.

41

That the wicked haue peace in themſelues, Is no wonder : they are as ſure as Tentation can make them. No Prince makes warre with his owne ſubiects. The godly are ſtill enemies ; therefore they muſt looke to bee aſſaulted both by ſtratagems and violence. Nothing ſhall more ioy me, than my inward quietneſſe. A iuſt warre is a thouſand times more happy, than an ill-conditioned peace.

42

Goodneſſe is ſo powerfull, that it can make things ſimply euill (namely, our ſinnes) good to vs : not good in nature, but good in the euent ; good, when they are done, not good to be done. Sinne is ſo powerfull, that it can turne the holieſt ordinances of God into it ſelfe : but herein our ſinne goes beyond our goodneſſe ; That ſinne defiles a man or action otherwiſe good ; but all the goodneſſe of the world cannot iuſtifie one ſinne ; as the holy fleſh in the skirt, makes not the bread holy that toucheth it ; but the vncleane touching an holy thing, defileth it. I will loath euery euill for it owne ſake : I will doe good, but not truſt to it.

Fooles meaſure good actions by the euent after they are done ; Wiſe men beforehand, hand, by iudgement vpon the rules of reaſon and faith. Let mee doe well; let God take charge of the ſucceſſe. If it be well accepted, it is well; if not, my thanke is with God.

He was neuer good man that amends not. For, if hee were good, he muſt needs deſire to be better. Grace is ſo ſweet, that who-euer taſts of it, muſt needs long after more: and if he deſire it, he will endeuour it; and if he doe but endeuour, God will crowne it with ſucceſſe. Gods familie admitteth of no Dwarfes (which are vnthriuing, and ſtand at a ſtay) but men of meaſures. What euer become of my bodie, or my eſtate, I will euer labour to finde ſomewhat added to the ſtature of my ſoule.

45

Pride is the moſt dangerous of all ſinnes. For, both it is moſt inſinuatiue (hauing crept into Heauen and Paradiſe) and moſt dangerous where it is. For, where all other Tentations are about euill, this alone is conuerſant onely about good things; and one dram of it poiſons many meaſures of grace. I will not bee more afraid of doing good things amiſſe, than of being proud when I haue well performed them.

46

Not onely commiſſion makes a ſinne. A man is guiltie of all thoſe ſinnes he hateth not. If I cannot auoid all, yet I will hate all.

47

Preiudice is ſo great an enemie to truth, that it makes the minde vncapable of it. In matters of faith, I will firſt lay a ſure ground, and then beleeue, though I cannot argue; holding the concluſion in ſpight of the premiſſes: but in other leſſe matters, I will not ſo foreſtall my minde with reſolution, as that I will not bee willing to bee better informed. Neither will I ſay in my ſelfe, I will hold it, therefore it ſhall bee truth: but this is truth, therefore I will hold it. I will not ſtriue for victorie, but for truth.

48

Drunkenneſſe and Couetouſneſſe doe much reſemble one another. For the more a man drinkes, the more hee thirſteth: and the more he hath, ſtill the more he coueteth. And for their effects, beſides other, both of them haue the power of transforming a man into a beaſt; and of all other beaſts, into a Swine. The former is euident to ſenſe: the other, though more obſcure, is no more queſtionable. The couetous man in two things plainly reſembleth a Swine; That hee euer roots in the earth, not ſo much as looking towards heauen: That hee neuer doth good till his death. In deſiring, my rule ſhall bee neceſſitie of nature, or eſtate. In hauing, I will account that my good, which doth me good.

49

I acknowledge no maſter of Requeſts in Heauen, but one; Chriſt my Mediator. I know I cannot be ſo happie as not to need him; nor ſo miſerable, that he ſhould contemne me. I will alwaies aske, and that of none but where I am ſure to ſpeed; but where there is ſo much ſtore, that when I haue had the moſt, I ſhall leaue no leſſe behinde. Though numberleſſe drops be in the Sea; yet if one be taken out of it, it hath ſo much the leſſe, though inſenſible: but God, becauſe he is infinite, can admit of no diminution. Therefore are men niggardly, becauſe the more they giue, the leſſe they haue: but thou, Lord, maieſt giue what thou wilt, without abatement of thy ſtore. Good praiers neuer came weeping home: I am ſure I ſhall receiue either what I aske, or what I ſhould aske.

50

I ſee that a fit bootie many times makes a theefe: and many would bee proud, if they had but the common cauſes of their neighbours. I account this none of the leaſt fauours of God, That the world goes no better forward with me: For, I feare, if my eſtate were better to the world, it might be worſe to God. As it is an happy neceſſity that inforceth to good; ſo is that next happy that hinders from euill.

51

It is the baſeſt loue of all others, that is for a benefit; for herein wee loue not another ſo much as our ſelues. Though there were no HEAVEN, O Lord, I would loue thee: Now there is one, I will eſteeme it, I will deſire it; yet ſtill I will loue thee for thy goodneſſe ſake. Thy ſelfe is reward enough, though thou broughteſt no more.

52

I ſee men point the field, and deſperatly ieopard their liues (as prodigall of their bloud) in the reuenge of a diſgracefull word againſt themſelues; while they can bee content to heare God pulled out of Heauen with blaſphemy, and not feele ſo much as a riſing of their bloud. Which argues our cold loue to God, and our ouer-feruent affection to our ſelues. In mine owne wrongs, I will hold patience laudable; but in Gods iniuries, impious.

53

It is an hard thing to ſpeake well; but it is harder to be well ſilent, ſo as it may be free from ſuſpition of affection, or ſullenneſſe, or ignorance: elſe loquacity, and not ſilence, would be a note of wiſdome. Herein I will not care how little, but how well. He ſaid well for this; Not that which is much, is well; but that which is well, is much.

54

There is nothing more odious than fruitleſſe old age. Now (for that no tree beares fruit in Autumne, vnleſſe it bloſſome in the ſpring) to the end that my age may be profitable, and laden with ripe fruit; I will endeuour that my youth may be ſtudious, and flowred with the bloſſomes of learning and obſeruation.

55

Reuenge commonly hurts both the offerer, and ſufferer: as we ſee in the fooliſh Bee (though in all other things commendable, yet herein the patterne of fond ſpightfulneſſe) which in her anger inuenometh the fleſh, and loſeth her ſting, and ſo liues a Drone euer after. I account it the onely valour, To remit a wrong; and will applaud it to my ſelfe as right Noble and Chriſtian, that I Might hurt, and Will not.

56

He that liues well, cannot chuſe but die well. For, if he die ſuddenly, yet he dies not vnpreparedly: if by leiſure, the conſcience of his well-lead life makes his death more comfortable: But it is ſeldome ſeene, that he which liueth ill, dieth well. For the conſcience of his former euils, his preſent paine, and the expectation and feare of greater, ſo take vp his heart, that he cannot ſeeke God. And now it is iuſt with God, not to be ſought, or not to be found, becauſe he ſought to him in his life time, and was repulſed. Whereas therefore there are vſually two maine cares of good men, to Liue well, and Die well: I will haue but this one; to Liue well.

57

With God there is no free man, but his ſeruant, though in the Gallies: no ſlaue, but the ſinner, though in a Palace: none noble but the vertuous, if neuer ſo baſely deſcended: none rich, but he that poſſeſſeth God, euen in rags: none wiſe, but hee that is a foole to himſelfe and the world: none happy, but he whom the world pities: Let me be free, noble, rich, wiſe, happy to God; I paſſe not what I am to the world.

Hall, J.

When the mouth praieth, man heareth; when the heart, God heareth. Euery good praier knocketh at heauen for a bleſſing: but an importunate praier pierceth it, (though as hard as braſſe) and makes way for it ſelfe into the eares of the Almightie. And as it aſcends lightly vp, carried with the wings of faith; ſo it comes euer laden downe againe vpon our heads. In my praiers my thoughts ſhall not be guided by my words, but my words ſhall follow my thoughts.

59

If that ſeruant were condemned of euill, that gaue God no more than his owne, which he had receiued; what ſhall become of them that rob God of his owne? If God gaine a little glorie by me, I ſhall gaine more by him. I will labour ſo to husband the ſtocke that God hath left in my hands, that I may returne my ſoule better than I receiued it; and that he may take it better than I returne it.

60

Heauen is compared to an hill; and therefore is figured by Olympus, among the Heathen; by mount Sion, in Gods Booke: Hell, contrariwiſe, to a pit. The aſcent to the one is hard therefore, and the deſcent to the other eaſie and headlong: and ſo as if we once beginne to fall, the recouerie is moſt difficult: and not one (of many) ſtaies till hee comes to the bottome. I will bee content to pant, and blow, and ſweat in climbing vp to heauen: as, contrarily, I will bee warie of ſetting the firſt ſtep downward towards the pit. For, as there is a Iacobs Ladder into heauen, ſo there are blinde ſtaires that goe winding downe into death, whereof each makes way for other. From the obiect is raiſed an ill ſuggeſtion: ſuggeſtion drawes on delight, delight conſent, conſent endeuour, endeuour practice, practice cuſtome, cuſtome excuſe, excuſe defence, defence obſtinacie, obſtinacie boaſting of ſinne, boaſting, a reprobate ſenſe. I will watch ouer my waies: and doe thou Lord watch ouer me, that I may auoid the firſt degrees of ſinne. And if thoſe ouertake my frailtie, yet keepe me that preſumptuous ſinnes preuaile not ouer me. Beginnings, are with more eaſe and ſafetie declined, when we are free; than proceedings when we haue begunne.

61

It is fitter for youth to learne, than teach; and for age to teach, than learne: and yet fitter for an old man to learne than to be ignorant. I know I ſhall neuer know ſo much, that I cannot learne more; and I hope I ſhall neuer liue ſo long, as till I be too old to learne.

62

I neuer loued thoſe Salamanders, that are neuer well but when they are in the fire of contention. I will rather ſuffer a thouſand wrongs, than offer one: I will ſuffer an hundred, rather than returne one: I will ſuffer many ere I will complaine of one, and endeuour to right it by contending. I haue euer found, that to ſtriue with my ſuperiour, is furious; with my equall, doubtfull; with my inferiour, ſordid and baſe; with any, full of vnquietneſſe.

63

The praiſe of a good ſpeech ſtandeth in words and matter: Matter, which is as a faire and well-featur'd body; Elegance of words, which is as a neat and well-faſhioned garment. Good matter, ſlubbered vp in rude and careleſſe words, is made lothſome to the hearer; as a good body miſ-ſhapen with vnhandſome clothes. Elegancie without ſoundneſſe, is no better than a nice vanitie. Although therefore the moſt hearers are like Bees, that goe all to the flowers, neuer regarding the good herbs (that are of as wholeſome vſe, as the other of faire ſhew:) yet let my ſpeech ſtriue to be profitable; plauſible, as it happens: better the coat be miſ-ſhapen, than the body.

64

I ſee, that as black and white colours to the eyes, ſo is the Vice and Vertue of others to the iudgement of men. Vice gathers the beames of the ſight in one; that the eye may ſee it, and be intent vpon it: Vertue ſcatters them abroad; and therefore hardly admits of a perfect apprehenſion. Whence it comes to paſſe, that (as iudgement is according to ſenſe) we do ſo ſoone eſpy, and ſo earneſtly cenſure a man for one vice; letting paſſe many laudable qualities vndiſcerned, or at leaſt vnacknowledged. Yea, whereas euery man is once a foole, and doth that (perhaps) in one fit of his folly, which he ſhall at leiſure repent of (as Noah, in one houres drunkenneſſe, vncouered thoſe ſecrets, which were hid ſix hundred yeeres before) the world is hereupon ready to call in queſtion all his former integritie; and to exclude him from the hope of any future amendment. Since God hath giuen me two eyes; the one ſhall be buſied about the preſent fault that I ſee, with a deteſting commiſeration; the other about the commendable qualities of the offender; not without an vnpartiall approbation of them. So ſhall I doe God no wrong, in robbing him of the glory of his gifts, mixed with infirmities: nor yet, in the meane time, encourage Vice; while I doe diſtinctly reſerue for it a due proportion of hatred.

65

God is aboue man; the brute creatures vnder him; he ſet in the midſt. Leſt he ſhould be proud that he hath infinite creatures vnder him, that One is infinite degrees aboue him. I doe therefore owe awe vnto God; mercy to the inferiour creatures: knowing, that they are my fellowes, in reſpect of creation; whereas there is no proportion betwixt me, and my Maker.

66

One ſaid, It is good to inure thy youth to ſpeake well; for good ſpeech is many times drawne into the affection: But, I would feare, that ſpeaking well without feeling, were the next way to procure an habituall hypocriſie. Let my good words follow good affections; not goe before them. I will therefore ſpeake as I thinke: but withall, I will labour to thinke well; and then I know, I cannot but ſpeake well.

67

When I conſider my ſoule, I could be proud, to thinke of how diuine a nature & qualitie it is: but when I caſt downe mine eyes to my body (as the Swan to her black legs) and ſee what loathſome matter iſſues from the mouth, noſtrils, eares, pores, and other paſſages, and how moſt carrion-like of all other creatures it is after death; I am iuſtly aſhamed to thinke, that ſo excellent a gueſt dwels but in a meere cleanly dunghill.

68

Euery worldling is a mad man. For, beſides that he preferreth profit and pleaſure to Vertue, the World to God, Earth to Heauen, Time to Eternity; he pampers the body, and ſtarues the ſoule. He feedes one Fowle an hundred times, that it may feed him but once; and ſeekes all Lands and Seas for dainties, not caring whether any, or what repaſt he prouideth for his ſoule. He cloathes the body with all rich ornaments, that it may be as faire without, as it is filthy within; whileſt his ſoule goes bare and naked, hauing not a rag of knowledge to couer it. Yea, hee cares not to deſtroy his ſoule, to pleaſe the body, when for the ſaluation of the ſoule, he will not ſo much as hold the body ſhort of the leaſt pleaſure. What is, if this be not, a reaſonable kinde of madneſſe? Let me enioy my ſoule no longer, than I preferre it to my body. Let me haue a deformed, leane, crooked, vnhealthfull, neglected body; ſo that I may finde my ſoule ſound, ſtrong, well furniſhed, well diſpoſed both for earth and heauen.

69

Aſa was ſicke but of his feet, farre from the heart: yet becauſe he ſought to the Phyſitians, not to God, he eſcaped not. Ezechiah was ſicke to die: yet becauſe he truſted to God, not to Phyſitians, he was reſtored. Meanes, without God, cannot helpe; God, without meanes, can, and often doth. I will vſe good meanes, not reſt in them.

70

A mans beſt monument is his vertuous actions. Fooliſh is the hope of immortality, and future praiſe, by the coſt of ſenſeleſſe ſtone; when the Paſſenger ſhall onely ſay, Here lies a faire ſtone, and a filthy carkaſſe. That only can report thee rich: but for other praiſes, thy ſelfe muſt build thy monument aliue; and write thy owne Epitaph in honeſt and honourable actions. Which are ſo much more noble than the other, as liuing men are better than dead ſtones: Nay, I know not if the other be not the way to worke a perpetuall ſucceſſion of infamy, whiles the cenſorious Reader, vpon occaſion thereof, ſhall comment vpon thy bad life: whereas in this, euery mans heart is a Tombe, and euery mans tongue writeth an Epitaph vpon the well-behaued. Either I will procure me ſuch a monument, to be remembred by; or elſe it is better to be inglorious, than infamous.

71

The baſeſt things are euer moſt plentifull. Hiſtory and experience tell vs, that ſome kinde of Mouſe breedeth 120. young ones in one neſt: whereas the Lion, or Elephant, beareth but one at once. I haue euer found, The leaſt wit, yeeldeth the moſt words. It is both the ſureſt and wiſeſt way, to Speake little, and Thinke more.

72

An euill man is clay to God, wax to the Deuill. God may ſtampe him into powder, or temper him anew; but none of his meanes can melt him. Contrariwiſe, a good man is Gods wax, and Satans clay: he relents at euery looke of God, but is not ſtirred at any tentation. I had rather bow than breake, to God: but, for Satan, or the world, I had rather be broken in peeces with their violence, than ſuffer my ſelfe to be bowed vnto their obedience.

73

It is an eaſie matter for a man to be careleſſe of himſelfe; and yet much eaſier to be enamoured of himſelfe. For, if he be a Chriſtian, whiles he contemneth the world perfectly, it is hard for him to reſerue a competent meaſure of loue to himſelfe: if a worldling, it is not poſſible but he muſt ouer-loue himſelfe. I will ſtriue for the meane of both; and ſo hate the world, that I may care for my ſelfe: and ſo care for my ſelfe that I bee not in loue with the world.

74

I will hate popularity and oſtentation (as euer dangerous; but moſt of all in Gods buſineſſe) which who ſo affect, doe as ill ſpokeſmen; who when they are ſent to wooe for God, ſpeake for themſelues. I know how dangerous it is to haue God my Riuall.

75

Earth affords no ſound contentment. For, what is there vnder Heauen not troubleſome, beſides that which is called pleaſure? and, that, in the end, I finde moſt irkſome of all other. My ſoule ſhall euer looke vpward for ioy, and downeward for penitence.

76

God is euer with me, euer before me. I know, he cannot but ouer-ſee me alwaies; though my eyes be held that I ſee him not: yea, he is ſtill within me, though I feele him not: neither is there any moment, that I can liue without God. Why doe I not, therefore, alwaies liue with him? Why doe I not account all houres loſt, wherein I enioy him not?

77

There is no man ſo happy as the Chriſtian. When he lookes vp vnto Heauen, hee thinkes, That is my home: the God that made it, and owes it, is my Father: the Angels, more glorious in nature than my ſelfe, are my attendants: mine enemies are my vaſſals. Yea, thoſe things which are the terribleſt of all to the wicked, are moſt pleaſant to him. When he heares God thunder aboue his head, he thinkes, This is the voice of my Father. When he remembreth the Tribunall of the laſt iudgement, he thinkes, It is my Sauiour that ſits in it: when death, he eſteemes it but as the Angell ſet before Paradiſe; which with one blow admits him to eternall ioy. And (which is moſt of all) nothing in earth or hell can make him miſerable. There is nothing in the world worth enuying, but a Chriſtian.

78

As Man is a little world: ſo euery Chriſtian is a little Church within himſelfe. As the Church, therefore, is ſometimes in the wane, through perſecution; other times in her full glory and brightneſſe: ſo let me expect my ſelfe ſometimes drouping vnder Tentations, and ſadly hanging downe the head for the want of the feeling of Gods preſence; at other times caried with the full ſaile of a reſolute aſſurance, to Heauen: knowing, that as it is a Church at the weakeſt ſtay, ſo ſhall I, in my greateſt deiection, hold the Childe of God.

79

Tentations on the right hand, are more perillous than thoſe on the left; and deſtroy a thouſand, to the others ten: as the Sunne, more vſually, cauſeth the traueller to caſt off his cloke, than the wind. For, thoſe on the left hand miſcarry men but two waies: to diſtruſt, and deniall of God; more rare ſinnes: but the other to all the reſt, wherewith mens liues are ſo commonly defiled. The ſpirit of Chriſtians is like the Engliſh Ieat; whereof we reade, that it is fired with water, quenched with oile. And theſe two, proſperity and aduerſity, are like heat and cold: the one gathers the powers of the ſoule together, and makes them abler to reſiſt, by vniting them: the other diffuſes them; and, by ſuch ſeparation, makes them eaſier to conquer. I hold it therefore as praiſe-worthy with God, for a man to contemne a proffered honour, or pleaſure, for conſcience ſake; as, on the racke not to deny his profeſſion. When theſe are offered, I will not nibble at the bait; that I be not taken with the hooke.

80

God is Lord of my body alſo: and therefore challengeth as well reuerent geſture, as inward deuotion. I will euer, in my prayers, either ſtand, as a ſeruant, before my maſter; or kneele, as a ſubiect, to my Prince.

81

I haue not beene in others breaſts: but, for my owne part, I neuer taſted of ought, that might deſerue the name of pleaſure. And, if I could, yet a thouſand pleaſures cannot counteruaile one torment: because the one may be exquiſite; the other, not without compoſition. And, if not one torment, much leſſe a thouſand. And if not for a moment, much leſſe for eternity. And, if not the torment of a part, much leſſe of the whole. For if the paine but of a tooth be ſo intolerable, what ſhall the racking of the whole body be? And if of the body, what ſhall that be, which is primarily of the ſoule? If there be pleaſures that I heare not of, I will be wary of buying them ſo ouer-deare.

82

As Hypocriſie is a common counterfeit of all vertues: ſo there is no ſpeciall vertue, which is not (to the very life of it) ſeemingly reſembled, by ſome ſpeciall vice. So, deuotion is counterfeited by ſuperſtition: good thrift, by niggardlineſſe; charitie, with vaine-glorious pride. For, as charity is bounteous to the poore, ſo is vaine-glory to the wealthy: as charity ſuſtaines all, for truth; ſo pride, for a vaine praiſe: both of them make a man courteous and affable. So the ſubſtance of euery vertue is in the heart: which, ſince it hath not a window made into it, by the Creator of it, (but is reſerued vnder locke and key for his owne view) I will iudge only by appearance. I had rather wrong my ſelfe, by credulitie; than others, by vniuſt cenſures and ſuſpitions.

83

Euery man hath a kingdome within himſelfe: Reaſon, as the Princeſſe, dwels in the higheſt and inwardeſt roome: the ſenſes are the Guard and attendants on the Court; without whoſe aid, nothing is admitted into the Preſence: The ſupreme faculties (as will, memory, &c.) are the Peeres: The outward parts, and inward affections, are the Commons: Violent Paſſions are as Rebels, to diſturbe the common peace. I would not be a Stoicke, to haue no paſſions: for that were to ouerthrow this inward gouernment God hath erected in me; but a Chriſtian, to order thoſe I haue. And for that I ſee, that as (in commotions) one mutinous perſon drawes on more; ſo in paſſions, that one makes way for the extremitie of another, (as exceſſe of loue cauſeth exceſſe of griefe, vpon the loſſe of what we loued:) I will doe as wiſe Princes vſe, to thoſe they miſdoubt for faction; ſo hold them downe, and keepe them bare, that their very impotencie and remiſneſſe ſhall afford me ſecuritie.

84

I looke vpon the things of this life, as an owner; as a ſtranger. As an owner, in their right; as a ſtranger, in their vſe. I ſee, that owning, is but a conceit, beſides vſing: I can vſe (as I lawfully may) other mens commodities as my owne; walke in their woods, looke on their faire houſes, with as much pleaſure as my owne; yet againe, I will vſe my owne, as if it were anothers; knowing, that though I hold them by right, yet it is only by Tenure at will.

85

There is none like to Luthers three maſters; Prayer, Tentation, Meditation. Tentation ſtirs vp holy Meditation: Meditation prepares to Prayer: and Prayer makes profit of Tentation; and fetcheth all diuine knowledge from Heauen. Of others, I may learne the Theorie of Diuinity; of theſe only, the Practiſe. Other maſters teach me by rote, to ſpeake Parrot-like of heauenly things: theſe alone, with feeling and vnderſtanding.

86

Affectation is the greateſt enemy both of doing well, and good acceptance of what is done. I hold it the part of a wiſe man, to endeuour rather that fame may follow him, than goe before him.

87

I ſee a number, which, with Shimei, whiles they ſeeke their ſeruant, which is riches, loſe their ſoules. No worldly thing ſhall draw me without the gates, within which God hath confined me.

88

It is an hard thing for a man to finde wearineſſe in pleaſure, while it laſteth; or contentment in paine, while he is vnder it. After both (indeed) it is eaſie: yet both of theſe muſt be found in both; or elſe we ſhall be drunken with pleaſures, and ouerwhelmed with ſorrow. As thoſe, therefore, which ſhould eat ſome diſh ouer-deliciouſly ſweet doe allay it with tart ſawce, that they may not be cloyed: and thoſe that are to receiue bitter pills (that they may not be annoyed with their vnpleaſing taſte) rowle them in Sugar: So in all pleaſures it is beſt to labour, not how to make them moſt delightfull; but how to moderate them from exceſſe: and in all ſorrowes, ſo to ſettle our hearts in true grounds of comfort, that we may not care ſo much for being bemoned of others, as how to be moſt contented in our ſelues.

89

In wayes, we ſee Trauellers chuſe not the faireſt, and greeneſt, if it be either croſſe or contrary; but the neereſt, though miry and vneuen: ſo, in opinions, let me follow not the plauſibleſt, but the trueſt, though more perplexed.

90

Chriſtian ſociety is like a bundle of ſtickes laid together, whereof one kindles another. Solitary men haue feweſt prouocations to euill; but againe feweſt incitations to good. So much, as doing good, is better than not doing euill, will I account Chriſtian good fellowſhip better than an Eremitiſh and melancholike ſolitarineſſe.

91

I had rather confeſſe my ignorance, than falſly profeſſe knowledge. It is no ſhame, not to know all things; but it is a iuſt ſhame to ouer-reach in any thing.

92

Sudden extremity is a notable triall of faith, or any other diſpoſition of the ſoule. For as in a ſudden feare, the bloud gathers to the heart, for guarding of that part which is principall: ſo the powers of the ſoule combine themſelues in an hard exigent, that they may be eaſily iudged of. The faithfull (more ſuddenly than any caſualtie) can lift vp his heart to his ſtay in Heauen: Whereas the worldling ſtands amazed, and diſtraught with the euill; becauſe hee hath no refuge to flie vnto. For, not being acquainted with God in his peace, how ſhould he but haue him to ſeeke in his extremitie? When therefore ſome ſudden ſtitch girds me in the ſide, like to be the meſſenger of death; or when the ſword of my enemie, in an vnexpected aſſault, threatens my bodie; I will ſeriouſly note how I am affected: ſo the ſuddeneſt euill, as it ſhall not come vnlooked for, ſhall not goe away vnthought of. If I finde my ſelfe couragious, and heauenly-minded, I will reioyce in the truth of Gods grace in me; knowing that one dram of tried faith, is worth a whole pound of ſpeculatiue; and that, which once ſtood by me, will neuer faile me: If deiected, and heartleſſe, herein I will acknowledge cauſe of humiliation; and, with all care and earneſtneſſe, ſeeke to ſtore my ſelfe againſt the dangers following.

93

The Rules of ciuill policie may well be applied to the minde. As therefore for a Prince, that he may haue good ſucceſſe againſt either Rebels, or forraine enemies, it is a ſure axiome, Diuide and Rule: but when he is once ſeated in the Throne ouer loyall ſubiects, Vnite and Rule: ſo, in the regiment of the ſoule, there muſt be variance ſet in the iudgement, and the conſcience and affections; that that which is amiſſe may be ſubdued: but, when all parts are brought to order, it is the only courſe to maintaine their peace; that, all ſeeking to eſtabliſh and helpe each other, the whole may proſper. Alwayes to be at warre, is deſperate: alwaies at peace, ſecure, and ouer-Epicure-like. I doe account a ſecure peace, a iuſt occaſion of this ciuill diſſention in my ſelfe; and a true Chriſtian peace, the end of all my ſecret warres: which when I haue atchieued, I ſhall reigne with comfort; and neuer will be quiet, till I haue atchieued it.

94

I brought ſinne enough with me into the world to repent of all my life, though I ſhould neuer actually ſinne: and ſinne enough actually euery day, to ſorrow for, though I had brought none with me into the world: but, laying both together, my time is rather too ſhort for my repentance. It were madneſſe in me to ſpend my whole life in iollity and pleaſure, whereof I haue ſo ſmall occaſion: and neglect the opportunitie of my ſo iuſt ſorrow: eſpecially, ſince before I came into the World, I ſinned; after I am gone out of the World, the contagion of my ſinne paſt, ſhall adde to the guilt of it: yet, in both theſe eſtates, I am vncapable of repentance. I will doe that while I may, which, when I haue neglected, is vnrecouerable.

95

Ambition is torment enough for an enemie. For, it affoords as much diſcontentment in enioying, as in want; making men like poyſoned Rats: which when they haue taſted of their bane, cannot reſt, till they drinke; and then can much leſſe reſt, till their death. It is better for me to liue in the wiſe mens ſtockes, in a contented want; than in a fooles Paradiſe, to vex my ſelfe with wilfull vnquietneſſe.

96

It is not poſſible but a conceited man muſt be a foole. For, that ouer-weening opinion he hath of himſelfe, excludes all opportunity of purchaſing knowledge. Let a veſſell be once full of neuer ſo baſe liquor, it will not giue roome to the coſtlieſt; but ſpills beſide, whatſoeuer is infuſed. The proud man, though he be empty of good ſubſtance, yet is full of conceit. Many men had proued wiſe, if they had not ſo thought themſelues. I am empty enough to receiue knowledge enough; Let me thinke my ſelfe but ſo bare as I am, and more I need not. O Lord, doe thou teach me how little, how nothing I haue; and giue me no more, than I know I want.

97

Euery man hath his turne of ſorrow: whereby (ſome more, ſome leſſe) all men are in their times miſerable. I neuer yet could meet with the man that complained not of ſomewhat. Before ſorrow come, I will prepare for it: when it is come, I will welcome it: when it goes, I will take but halfe a farewell of it; as ſtill expecting his returne.

98

There be three things that follow an iniury ſo farre as it concerneth our ſelues; (for, as the offence toucheth God, it is aboue our reach) Reuenge, Cenſure, Satisfaction; which muſt be remitted of the mercifull man. Yet not all at all times: but reuenge alwayes, leauing it to him that can, and will doe it: Cenſure oft-times; Satisfaction ſometimes. He that deceiues me oft, though I muſt forgiue him; yet charitie bindes me not, not to cenſure him for vntruſty; and he, that hath endammaged me much, cannot plead breach of charitie, in my ſeeking his reſtitution. I will ſo remit wrongs, as I may not encourage others to offer them; and ſo retaine them, as I may not induce God to retaine mine to him.

99

Garments that haue once one rent in them, are ſubiect to be torne on euery naile, and euery bryer; and glaſſes, that are once crackt, are ſoone broken: ſuch is mans good name once tainted with iuſt reproach. Next to the approbation of God, and the teſtimony of mine owne conſcience, I will ſeeke for a good reputation amongſt men: not by cloſe cariage, concealing faults, that they may not be knowne to my ſhame: but auoiding all vices, that I may not deſerue it. The efficacie of the agent, is in the patient well diſpoſed. It is hard for me euer to doe good, vnleſſe I be reputed good.

Many vegetable, and many brute creatures exceed man in length of age. Which hath opened the mouthes of Heathen Philoſophers to accuſe Nature, as a ſtep-mother to Man; who hath giuen him the leaſt time to liue, that onely could make vſe of his time, in getting knowledge. But herein Religion doth moſt magnifie GOD, in his wiſdome and iuſtice; teaching vs, that other creatures liue long, and periſh to nothing, onely Man recompences the ſhortneſſe of his life, with eternitie after it; that the ſooner he dies well, the ſooner he comes to perfection of knowledge, which hee might in vaine ſeeke below: the ſooner hee dies ill, the leſſe hurt hee doth with his knowledge. There is great reaſon then, why man ſhould liue long; greater, why he ſhould die early. I will neuer blame God, for making mee too ſoone happy; for changing my ignorance, for knowledge; my corruption, for immortalitie; my infirmities, for perfection. Come Lord Ieſus, come quickly.

Many vegetable, and many brute creatures exceed man in length of age. Which hath opened the mouthes of Heathen Philoſophers [illegible] to Man, who hath given him the leaſt time to live, that [illegible] time, in getting knowledge. But Chriſtian Religion doth most magnifie God, in his wiſdome and juſtice; teaching us, that other creatures [illegible] long [illegible] periſh to nothing, onely Man recompences the ſhortneſſe of his life, with [illegible] that the ſooner he dies well, the ſooner he comes to perfection of knowledge, which he might in vaine ſeeke below: the ſooner hee dies ill, the leſſe hee [illegible] with his knowledge. There is great reaſon therefore why man ſhould live long, [illegible] he ſhould die early. I will rather thank God, for making me [illegible] ſhort happy; for changing my ignorance, for knowledge; thy corruption, [illegible] immortalitie [illegible] for perfection. Come Lord Jeſus, come quickly.

MEDITATIONS
AND

DIVINE
AND MORALL.

THE SECOND CENTVRY.

By Ios. Hall.

Imprinted at London, 1627.

Hall, J.

TO THE RIGHT VERTVOVS AND WORSHIPFVLL LADIE, THE Ladie DRVRY, all increaſe of Grace.

MADAME, I know your Chriſtian ingenuitie ſuch, that you will not grudge others the communication of this your priuate right: which yet I durſt not haue preſumed to aduenture, if I feared that either the benefit of it would be leſſe, or the acceptation. Now it ſhall be no leſſe yours: only it ſhall be more knowne to be yours. Vouchſafe therefore to take part with your worthy Husband, of theſe my ſimple Meditations. And if your long and gracious experience haue written you a larger volume of wholeſome lawes, and better informed you by precepts fetcht from your owne feeling, than I can hope for, by my bare ſpeculation: yet where theſe my not vnlikely rules ſhall accord with yours, let your redoubled aſſent allow them, and they confirme it. I made them not for the eye, but for the heart: neither doe I commend them to your reading, but your practice: wherein alſo it ſhall not be enough that you are a meere and ordinary agent, but that you be a patterne propounded vnto others imitation. So ſhall your vertuous and holy progreſſe, beſides your owne peace and happineſſe, be my Crowne and reioycing, in the Day of our common appearance. Halſted. Decemb. 4.

Your L. humbly deuoted,

IOS. HALL.

MEDITATIONS AND VOVVES.

1

A Man vnder Gods affliction, is like a bird in a net; the more he ſtriueth, the more he is intangled. Gods Decree cannot be eluded with impatience. What I cannot auoid, I will learne to beare.

2

I finde, that all worldly things require a long time in getting; and affoord a ſhort pleaſure in enioying them. I will not care much, for what I haue; nothing, for what I haue not.

3

I ſee naturall bodies forſake their owne place and condition, for the preſeruation of the whole; but of all other creatures, Man; and of all other Men, Chriſtians haue the leaſt intereſt in themſelues. I will liue, as giuen to others, lent only to my ſelfe.

4

That which is ſaid of the Elephant, that being guiltie of his deformitie, he cannot abide to looke on his owne face in the water (but ſeekes for troubled and muddy channels) we ſee well morallized, in men of euill conſcience, who know their ſoules are ſo filthy, that they dare not ſo much as view them; but ſhift off all checkes of their former iniquitie, with vaine excuſes of good-fellowſhip. Whence it is, that euery ſmall reprehenſion ſo galls them; becauſe it calls the eye of the ſoule home to it ſelfe, and makes them ſee a glimpſe of what they would not. So haue I ſeene a fooliſh and timorous Patient, which knowing his wound very deepe, would not endure the Chirurgion to ſearch it: whereon what can enſue, but a feſtering of the part, and a danger of the whole body? So I haue ſeene many prodigall waſters runne ſo farre in bookes, that they cannot abide to heare of reckoning. It hath beene an old and true Prouerbe, Oft and euen reckonings make long friends: I will oft ſumme my eſtate with God, that I may know what I haue to expect, and anſwer for. Neither ſhall my ſcore runne on ſo long with God, that I ſhall not know my debts, or feare an Audit, or deſpaire of pardon.

5

I account this body, nothing, but a cloſe priſon to my ſoule; and the earth a larger priſon to my body. I may not breake priſon, till I be looſed by death: but I will leaue it, not vnwillingly, when I am looſed.

6

The common feares of the World are cauſeleſſe, and ill placed. No man feares to doe ill; euery man to ſuffer ill: wherein, if we conſider it well, we ſhall finde that we feare our beſt friends. For my part, I haue learned more of God and of my ſelfe, in one weekes extremitie, than all my whole lifes proſperitie had taught me afore. And, in reaſon and common experience, proſperitie vſually makes vs forget our death: aduerſitie on the other ſide, makes vs neglect our life. Now (if we meaſure both of theſe, by their effects) forgetfulneſſe of death makes vs ſecure: neglect of this life makes vs carefull of a better. So much therefore as neglect of life is better than forgetfulneſſe of death; and watchfulneſſe better than ſecuritie: ſo much more beneficiall will I eſteeme aduerſitie, than proſperitie.

7

Euen griefe it ſelfe is pleaſant to the remembrance, when it is once paſt: as ioy is, whiles it is preſent. I will not therefore in my conceit, make any ſo great difference betwixt ioy and griefe: ſith griefe paſt, is ioyfull; and long expectation of ioy, is grieuous.

8

Euery ſickneſſe is a little death. I will be content to die oft, that I may die once well.

9

Oft-times thoſe things which haue beene ſweet in opinion, haue proued bitter in experience. I will therefore euer ſuſpend my reſolute iudgement, vntill the triall and euent: in the meane while I will feare the worſt, and hope the beſt.

10

In all diuine and morall good things, I would faine keepe that I haue, and get that I want. I doe not more loath all other couetouſneſſe, than I affect this. In all theſe things alone, I profeſſe neuer to haue enough. If I may increaſe them, therefore, either by labouring, or begging, or vſury, I ſhall leaue no meanes vnattempted.

11

Some children are of that nature, that they are neuer well, but while the rod is ouer them: ſuch am I to God; Let him beat me, ſo he amend me: let him take all away from me, ſo he giue me himſelfe.

12

There muſt not be one vniforme proceeding with all men, in reprehenſion: but that muſt vary according to the diſpoſition of the reproued. I haue ſeene ſome men as thornes, which eaſily touched, hurt not; but if hard and vnwarily, fetch bloud of the hand: others, as nettles, which if they be nicely handled, ſting and pricke; but if hard and roughly preſſed, are pulled vp without harme. Before I take any man in hand, I will know whether he be a thorne, or a nettle.

13

I will account no ſinne little; ſince there is not the leaſt, but workes out the death of the ſoule. It is all one, whether I be drowned in the ebber ſhore, or in the midſt of the deepe Sea.

14

It is a baſe thing to get goods, to keepe them. I ſee that God (which only is infinitely rich) holdeth nothing in his owne hands, but giues all to his creatures. But, if we will needs lay vp, where ſhould wee rather repoſe it, than in Chriſts treaſury? The poore mans hand is the treaſury of Chriſt. All my ſuperfluity ſhall be there hoorded vp, where I know it ſhall be ſafely kept, and ſurely returned me.

15

The Schoole of God, and Nature, require two contrary manners of proceeding. In the Schoole of Nature, we muſt conceiue, and then beleeue: in the Schoole of God, we muſt firſt beleeue, and then we ſhall conceiue. He that beleeues no more than he conceiues, can neuer be a Chriſtian; nor he a Philoſopher, that aſſents without reaſon. In Natures Schoole, we are taught to bolt out the truth, by Logicall diſcourſe: God cannot endure a Logician. In his Schoole he is the beſt Scholler, that reaſons leaſt, and aſſents moſt. In diuine things, what I may I will conceiue: the reſt I will beleeue and admire. Not a curious head, but a credulous and plaine heart, is accepted with God.

16

No worldly pleaſure hath any abſolute delight in it: but as a Bee, hauing honey in the mouth, hath a ſting in the taile. Why am I ſo fooliſh, to reſt my heart vpon any of them? and not rather labour to aſpire to that one abſolute Good, in whom is nothing ſauouring of griefe, nothing wanting to perfect happineſſe?

17

A ſharpe reproofe I account better than a ſmooth deceit. Therefore when my friend checkes me, I will reſpect it with thankfulneſſe: when others flatter me, I will ſuſpect it, and reſt in mine owne cenſure of my ſelfe; who ſhould be more priuy (and leſſe partiall) to my owne deſeruings.

18

Extremity diſtinguiſheth friends: Worldly pleaſures, like Phyſicians, giue vs ouer when once we lie a dying; and yet the death-bed had moſt need of comforts: Chriſt Ieſus ſtandeth by his, in the pangs of death; and after death at the barre of iudgement; not leauing them either in their bed, or graue. I will vſe them therefore to my beſt aduantage; not truſt them. But for thee, O my Lord, which in mercy and truth canſt not faile me, (whom I haue found euer faithfull and preſent in all extremities) Kill me, yet will I truſt in thee.

19

We haue heard of ſo many thouſand generations paſſed, and we haue ſeene ſo many hundreds die within our knowledge; that I wonder any man can make account to liue one day. I will die daily. It is not done before the time, which may be done at all times.

20

Deſire oft-times makes vs vnthankfull. For, who ſo hopes for that he hath not, vſually forgets that which he hath. I will not ſuffer my heart to roue after high or impoſſible hopes; leſt I ſhould, in the meane time, contemne preſent benefits.

21

In hoping well, in being ill, and fearing worſe, the life of man is wholly conſumed. When I am ill, I will liue in hope of better: when well, in feare of worſe: neither will I, at any time, hope without feare; leſt I ſhould deceiue my ſelfe with too much confidence (wherein euill ſhall be ſo much more vnwelcome and intolerable, becauſe I looked for good) nor, againe, feare without hope; leſt I ſhould be ouer-much deiected: nor doe either of them, without true contentation.

22

What is man, to the whole earth? What is earth to the heauen? What is heauen, to his Maker? I will admire nothing in it ſelfe; but all things in God, and God in all things.

23

There be three vſuall cauſes of ingratitude, vpon a benefit receiued: Enuie, Pride, Couetouſneſſe: Enuie, looking more at others benefits, than our owne; Pride, looking more at our ſelues, than the benefit; Couetouſneſſe, looking more at what we would haue, than what we haue. In good turnes, I will neither reſpect the giuer, nor my ſelfe, nor the gift, nor others; but only the intent and good will from whence it proceeded. So ſhall I requite others great pleaſures, with equall good will, and accept of ſmall fauours, with great thankfulneſſe.

24

Whereas the cuſtome of the world is, to hate things preſent, to deſire future, and magnifie what is paſt; I will contrarily eſteeme that which is preſent, beſt. For, both what is paſt, was once preſent; and what is future, will be preſent: future things next, becauſe they are preſent in hope; what is paſt, leaſt of all, becauſe it cannot be preſent: yet ſomewhat becauſe it was.

25

We pitie the folly of the Larke, which (while it playeth with the fether, and ſtoopeth to the glaſſe) is caught in the Fowlers net: and yet cannot ſee our ſelues alike made fooles by Satan; who, deluding vs by the vaine fethers and glaſſes of the world, ſuddenly enwrappeth vs in his ſnares. We ſee not the nets indeed; it is too much that we ſhall feele them, and that they are not ſo eaſily eſcaped after, as before auoided. O Lord, keepe thou mine eyes from beholding vanitie. And though mine eyes ſee it, let not my heart ſtoope to it, but loath it afarre off. And, if I ſtoope at any time, and be taken, ſet thou my ſoule at libertie: that I may ſay, My ſoule is eſcaped, euen as a bird out of the ſnare of the Fowler; the ſnare is broken, and I am deliuered.

26

In ſuffering euill, to looke to ſecondary cauſes, without reſpect to the higheſt, maketh impatience. For ſo we bite at the ſtone, and neglect him that threw it. If we take a blow at our equall, we returne it with vſury: if of a Prince, we repine not. What matter is it, if God kill me, whether he doe it by an Ague, or by the hand of a Tyrant? Againe, in expectation of good, to looke to the firſt cauſe, without care of the ſecond, argues idleneſſe, and cauſeth want. As we cannot helpe our ſelues, without God: ſo God will not ordinarily helpe vs, without our ſelues. In both, I will looke vp to God, without repining at the meanes in one, or truſting them in the other.

27

If my money were another mans, I could but keepe it: only the expending ſhewes it my owne. It is greater glory, comfort, and gaine, to lay it out well, than to keepe it ſafely. God hath made me, not his Treaſurer, but his Steward.

28

Auguſtines friend, Nebridius, not vniuſtly hated a ſhort anſwer, to a weighty and difficult queſtion; becauſe the diſquiſition of great truths requires time, and the determining is perillous; I will as much hate a tedious and farre-fetched anſwer to a ſhort and eaſie queſtion. For, as that other wrongs the truth, ſo this the hearer.

29

Performance is a binder. I will requeſt no more fauour of any man than I muſt needs. I will rather chuſe to make an honeſt ſhift, than ouer-much enthrall my ſelfe, by being beholding.

30

The VVorld is a Stage; euery man an actor, and plaies his part, here, either in a Comedie, or Tragedie. The good man is a Comedian; which (how-euer he begins) ends merrily: but the wicked man acts a Tragedie, and therefore euer ends in horrour. Thou ſeeſt a wicked man vaunt himſelfe on this ſtage: ſtay till the laſt act, and looke to his end (as Dauid did) and ſee whether that be peace. Thou wouldeſt make ſtrange Tragedies, if thou wouldeſt haue but one Act! VVho ſees an Oxe, grazing in a fat and ranke paſture, and thinkes not that he is neere to the ſlaughter? whereas the leane beaſt, that toiles vnder the yoke, is farre enough from the Shambles. The beſt wicked man cannot be ſo enuied in his firſt ſhewes, as he is pitiable in the concluſion.

31

Of all obiects of Beneficence, I will chuſe either an old man, or a childe; becauſe theſe are moſt out of hope to requite. The one forgets a good turne: the other liues not to repay it.

32

That, which Pythagoras ſaid of Philoſophers, is more true of Chriſtians: (for, Chriſtianity is nothing but a diuine and better Philoſophy.) Three ſorts of men come to the Market: buyers, ſellers, lookers on. The two firſt are both buſie, and carefully diſtracted about their Market: onely the third liue happily; vſing the world as if they vſed it not.

33

There be three things, which of all other I will neuer ſtriue for: the wall, the way, the beſt ſeat. If I deſerue well, a low place cannot diſparage me ſo much as I ſhall grace it: if not, the height of my place ſhall adde to my ſhame; whiles euery man ſhall condemne me of pride matched with vnworthineſſe.

34

I ſee there is not ſo much difference betwixt a man and a beaſt, as betwixt a Chriſtian, and a naturall man. For, whereas man liues but one life of reaſon, aboue the beaſt; a Chriſtian liues foure lifes, aboue a naturall man: The life of inchoate regeneration, by grace; the perfect life of imputed righteouſneſſe; the life of glory begun, in the ſeparation of the ſoule; the life of perfect glory, in the ſociety of the body, with the ſoule in full happineſſe: The worſt whereof is better by many degrees, than the beſt life of a naturall man. For whereas the dignity of the life is meaſured, by the cauſe of it, (in which regard the life of the plant is baſeſt, becauſe it is but from the iuyce, ariſing from the root, adminiſtred by the earth: the life of the bruit creature better than it, becauſe it is ſenſitiue: of a man better than it, becauſe reaſonable) and the cauſe of this life, is the Spirit of God; ſo farre as the Spirit of God is aboue reaſon, ſo farre doth a Chriſtian exceed a meere naturaliſt. I thanke God much that he hath made me a man, but more, that he hath made me a Chriſtian: without which, I know not whether it had beene better for me to haue beene a beaſt, or not to haue beene.

35

Great mens fauours, friends promiſes, and dead mens ſhooes, I will eſteeme, but not truſt to.

36

It is a fearefull thing to ſinne; more fearefull to delight in ſinne; yet worſe than worſt, to boaſt of it. If therefore I cannot auoid ſinne, becauſe I am a man; yet I will auoid the delight, defence and boaſting of ſinne, becauſe I am a Chriſtian.

Hall, J.

37

Thoſe things which are moſt eagerly deſired, are moſt hardly both gotten and kept; God commonly croſſing our deſires, in what we are ouer-feruent. I will therefore account all things as too good to haue, ſo nothing too deare to loſe.

38

A true friend is not borne euery day. It is beſt to be courteous to all, entire with few. So may we (perhaps) haue leſſe cauſe of ioy: I am ſure, leſſe occaſion of ſorrow.

39

Secrecies, as they are a burthen to the minde, ere they bee vttered: ſo are they no leſſe charge to the receiuer, when they are vttered. I will not long after more inward ſecrets, leſt I ſhould procure doubt to my ſelfe, and iealous feare to the diſcloſer: But as my mouth ſhall be ſhut with fidelity, not to blab them; ſo mine eare ſhall not be too open to receiue them.

40

As good Phyſicians, by one receit, make way for another: ſo is it the ſafeſt courſe in practice: I will reueale a great ſecret to none, but whom I haue found faithfull in leſſe.

41

I will enioy all things in God, and God in all things; nothing in it ſelfe: So ſhall my ioyes neither change, nor periſh. For how euer the things themſelues may alter, or fade: yet he, in whom they are mine, is euer like himſelfe, conſtant, and euerlaſting.

42

If I would prouoke my ſelfe to contentation, I will caſt downe mine eyes to my inferiours; and there ſee better men in worſe condition: if to humility, I will caſt them vp to my betters; and ſo much more deiect my ſelfe to them, by how much more I ſee them thought worthy to be reſpected of others, and deſerue better in themſelues.

43

True vertue reſts in the conſcience of it ſelfe, either for reward, or cenſure. If therefore I know my ſelfe vpright, falſe rumors ſhall not daunt me: if not anſwerable to the good report of my fauourers, I will my ſelfe finde the firſt fault, that I may preuent the ſhame of others.

44

I will account vertue the beſt riches, knowledge the next, riches the worſt; and therefore will labour to be vertuous and learned, without condition: as for riches, if they fall in my way, I refuſe them not; but if not, I deſire them not.

45

An honeſt word I account better, than a careleſſe oath. I will ſay nothing but what I dare ſweare, and will performe. It is a ſhame for a Chriſtian to abide his tongue a falſe ſeruant, or his minde a looſe miſtreſſe.

46

There is a iuſt and eaſie difference to be put betwixt a friend and an enemy; betwixt a familiar, and a friend; and much good vſe to be made of all: but, of all, with diſcretion. I will diſcloſe my ſelfe no whit to my enemy, ſomewhat to my friend, wholly to no man; leſt I ſhould be more others, than mine owne. Friendſhip is brittle ſtuffe. How know I, whether he that loues me, may not hate me hereafter?

47

No man, but is an eaſie Iudge of his owne matters; and lookers on oftentimes ſee the more. I will therefore ſubmit my ſelfe to others, in what I am reproued: but in what I am praiſed, only to my ſelfe.

48

I will not be ſo merry, as to forget God; nor ſo ſorrowfull, to forget my ſelfe.

49

As nothing makes ſo ſtrong and mortall hoſtility, as diſcord in religions: ſo nothing in the world vnites mens hearts ſo firmely, as the bond of faith. For, whereas there are three grounds of friendſhip, Vertue, Pleaſure, Profit; and by all confeſſions, that is the ſureſt, which is vpon Vertue: it muſt needs follow, that what is grounded on the beſt, and moſt heauenly Vertue, muſt be the faſteſt: which, as it vnites man to God ſo inſeparably, that no tentations, no torments, not all the gates of Hell can ſeuer him; ſo it vnites one Chriſtian ſoule to another ſo firmely, that no outward occurrences, no imperfections in the party loued, can diſſolue them. If I loue not the childe of God (for his owne ſake, for his Fathers ſake) more than my friend (for my commodity, or my kinſman for bloud) I neuer receiued any ſparke of true heauenly loue.

50

The good duty, that is deferred vpon a conceit of preſent vnfitneſſe, at laſt growes irkſome; and thereupon altogether neglected. I will not ſuffer my heart to entertaine the leaſt thought of lothneſſe towards the taske of deuotion, wherewith I haue ſtinted my ſelfe: but violently breake thorow any motion of vnwillingneſſe; not without a deepe checke to my ſelfe, for my backwardneſſe.

51

Hearing is a ſenſe of great apprehenſion; yet farre more ſubiect to deceit, than ſeeing: not in the manner of apprehending, but in the vncertainty of the obiect. Words are vocall interpreters of the minde; actions, reall: and therefore how euer both ſhould ſpeake according to the truth of what is in the heart; yet words doe more belie the heart, than actions. I care not what words I heare, when I ſee deeds. I am ſure, what a man doth, he thinketh: not ſo alwayes, what he ſpeaketh. Though I will not be ſo ſeuere a cenſor, that, for ſome few euill acts, I ſhould condemne a man of falſe-heartedneſſe: yet, in common courſe of life I need not be ſo mopiſh, as not to beleeue rather the language of the hand, than of the tongue. He, that ſayes well, and doth well, is without exception commendable: but, if one of theſe muſt be ſeuered from the other, I like him well, that doth well, and ſaith nothing.

52

That, which they ſay of the Pelican, that when the Shepherds, in deſire to catch her, lay fire not farre from her neſt; which ſhe finding, and fearing the danger of her young, ſeekes to blow out with her wings, ſo long till ſhe burne her ſelfe and makes her ſelfe a prey, in an vnwiſe pitie to her young; I ſee morally verified in experience, of thoſe which indiſcreetly medling with the flame of diſſention kindled in the Church, rather increaſe than quench it; rather fire their owne wings than helpe others. I had rather bewaile the fire afarre off, than ſtirre in the coles of it. I would not grudge my aſhes to it, if thoſe might abate the burning: but, ſince I ſee this is daily increaſed with partaking, I will behold it with ſorrow, and meddle no otherwiſe than by prayers to God, and intreaties to men; ſeeking my owne ſafety, and the peace of the Church, in the freedome of my thought, and ſilence of my tongue.

53

That which is ſaid of Lucillaes faction, that anger bred it, pride foſtered it, and co-

Hall, J.

uetouſneſſe confirm'd it, is true of all Schiſmes, though with ſome inuerſion. For, the moſt are bred through pride, (whiles men, vpon an high conceit of themſelues, ſcorne to goe in the common road, and affect ſingularity in opinion) are confirmed through anger, (whiles they ſtomacke and grudge any contradiction) and are nouriſhed through couetouſneſſe, whiles they ſeeke ability to beare out their part. In ſome others againe, couetouſneſſe obtaines the firſt place, anger the ſecond, pride the laſt. Herein therefore I haue beene alwaies wont to commend and admire the humility of thoſe great and profound wits, whom depth of knowledge hath not lead to by-paths in iudgement; but (walking in the beaten path of the Church) haue bent all their forces to the eſtabliſhment of receiued truths: accounting it greater glory to confirme an ancient verity, than to deuiſe a new opinion (though neuer ſo profitable) vnknowne to their predeceſſours. I will not reiect a truth, for meere noueltie: (Old truths may come newly to light; neither is God tied to times, for the gift of his illumination) but I will ſuſpect a nouell opinion, of vntruth; and not entertaine it, vnleſſe it may be deduced from ancient grounds.

54

The eare and the eye are the mindes receiuers; but the tongue is only buſied in expending the treaſure receiued. If therefore the reuenues of the minde be vttered as faſt, or faſter than they are receiued; it cannot be, but that the minde muſt needs be held bare, and can neuer lay vp for purchaſe. But, if the receiuers take in ſtill with no vtterance, the minde may ſoone grow a burthen to it ſelfe, and vnprofitable to others. I will not lay vp too much, and vtter nothing, leſt I be couetous: nor ſpend much, and ſtore vp little, leſt I be prodigall and poore.

55

It is a vaine-glorious flattery for a man to praiſe himſelfe: An enuious wrong to detract from others. I will therefore ſpeake no ill of others, no good of my ſelfe.

56

That which is the miſery of Trauellers, to finde many Oaſts, and few friends, is the eſtate of Chriſtians in their pilgrimage to a better life. Good friends may not, therefore, be eaſily forgone: neither muſt they be vſed as ſuits of apparell; which when we haue worne threed-bare, we caſt off, and call for new. Nothing, but death or villany, ſhall diuorce me from an old friend; but ſtill I will follow him ſo farre, as is either poſſible or honeſt: and then I will leaue him, with ſorrow.

57

True friendſhip neceſſarily requires Patience. For there is no man, in whom I ſhall not miſlike ſomewhat, and who ſhall not, as iuſtly miſlike ſomewhat in me. My friends faults therefore, if little, I will ſwallow and digeſt; if great, I will ſmother them: howeuer, I will winke at them to others; but, louingly notifie them to himſelfe.

58

Iniuries hurt not more in the receiuing, than in the remembrance. A ſmall iniury ſhall goe as it comes: a great iniury may dine or ſup with me; but none at all ſhall lodge with me. Why ſhould I vex my ſelfe, becauſe another hath vexed me?

59

It is good dealing with that, ouer which we haue the moſt power. If my ſtate will not be framed to my minde, I will labour to frame my minde to my eſtate.

60

It is a great miſery to be either alwaies, or neuer alone: ſociety of men hath not ſo much gaine as diſtraction. In greateſt company I will be alone to my ſelfe: in greateſt priuacie, in company with God.

61

Griefe for things paſt that cannot be remedied, and care for things to come that cannot be preuented, may eaſily hurt, can neuer benefit me. I will therefore commit my ſelfe to God in both, and enioy the preſent.

62

Let my eſtate be neuer ſo meane, I will euer keepe my ſelfe rather beneath, than either leuell or aboue it. A man may riſe when he will, with honour: but cannot fall without ſhame.

63

Nothing doth ſo beſoole a man, as extreme paſſion. This doth both make them ſooles, which otherwiſe are not; and ſhew them to be ſooles, that are ſo. Violent paſſions, if I cannot tame them, that they may yeeld to my eaſe; I will at leaſt ſmother them by concealement, that they may not appeare to my ſhame.

64

The minde of man, though infinite in deſire, yet is finite in capacitie. Since I cannot hope to know all things, I will labour firſt to know what I needs muſt, for their vſe: next, what I beſt may, for their conuenience.

65

Though time be precious to me (as all irreuocable good things deſerue to be) and of all other things, I would not be lauiſh of it; yet I will account no time loſt, that is either lent to, or beſtowed vpon my friend.

66

The practiſes of the beſt men are more ſubiect to errour than their ſpeculations. I will honour good examples: but I will liue by good precepts.

67

As charitie requires forgetfulneſſe of euill deeds: ſo patience requires forgetfulneſſe of euill accidents. I will remember euills paſt, to humble me; not to vex me.

68

It is both a miſery and a ſhame for a man to be a Bankrupt in loue: which he may eaſily pay, and bee neuer the more impoueriſhed. I will be in no mans debt, for good will: but will at leaſt returne euery man his owne meaſure, if not with vſury. It is much better to be a Creditor, than a Debtor, in any thing; but eſpecially of this: yet of this I will ſo be content to be a Debtor, that I will alwaies be paying it where I owe it; and yet neuer will haue ſo paid it, that I ſhall not owe it more.

The Spaniſh Prouerbe is too true; Dead men and abſent finde no friends. All mouthes are boldly opened, with a conceit of impunitie. My eare ſhall be no graue to bury my friends good name. But as I will be my preſent friends ſelfe; So will I be my abſent friends deputie; to ſay for him what he would (and cannot) ſpeake for himſelfe.

The loſſe of my friend, as it ſhall moderately grieue me; ſo it ſhall another way much benefit me, in recompence of his want: for it ſhall make me thinke more often, and ſeriouſly of earth, and of heauen. Of earth, for his body which is repoſed in it: Of Heauen, for his ſoule which poſſeſſeth it before me: Of earth, to put me in minde of my like frailty and mortality: Of Heauen, to make me deſire, and (after a ſort) emulate his happineſſe and glory.

and

71

Varietie of obiects is wont to cauſe diſtraction: when againe a little one, laid cloſe to the eye (if but of a peny breadth) wholly takes vp the ſight; which could elſe ſee the whole halfe Heauen at once. I will haue the eyes of my minde euer fore-ſtalled, and filled with theſe two obiects; the ſhortneſſe of my life, eternity after death.

72

I ſee that he is more happy, that hath nothing to loſe, than he that loſeth that which he hath. I will therefore neither hope for riches, nor feare pouertie.

73

I care not ſo much in any thing for multitude, as for choice. Bookes and friends I will not haue many: I had rather ſeriouſly conuerſe with a few, than wander amongſt many.

74

The wicked man is a very coward, and is afraid of euery thing. Of God; becauſe he is his enemie: of Satan, becauſe he is his tormentor: of Gods creatures, becauſe they (ioyning with their Maker) fight againſt him: of himſelfe, becauſe he beares about him his owne accuſer and executioner. The godly man contrarily, is afraid of nothing. Not of God, becauſe he knowes him his beſt friend, and therefore will not hurt him: not of Satan, becauſe he cannot hurt him: not of afflictions, becauſe he knowes they proceed from a louing God, and end to his owne good: not of the creatures, ſince the very ſtones of the field are in league with him: not of himſelfe, ſince his conſcience is at peace. A wicked man may be ſecure, becauſe he knowes not what he hath to feare; or deſperate, through extremitie of feare: but, truly couragious he cannot be. Faithleſneſſe cannot chuſe but be falſe-hearted. I will euer, by my courage, take triall of my faith. By how much more I feare, by ſo much leſſe I beleeue.

75

The godly man liues hardly, and (like the Ant) toiles here, during the Summer of his peace, holding himſelfe ſhort of his pleaſures, as looking to prouide for an hard Winter. Which, when it comes, he is able to weare it out comfortably: whereas the wicked man doth prodigally laſh out all his ioyes, in the time of his proſperitie; and (like the Graſhopper) ſinging merrily all Summer, is ſtarued in Winter. I will ſo enioy the preſent, that I will lay vp more for hereafter.

76

I haue wondred oft, and bluſhed for ſhame, to reade in meere Philoſophers (which had no other Miſtreſſe, but Nature) ſuch ſtrange reſolution in the contempt of both fortunes (as they call them:) ſuch notable precepts for a conſtant ſetledneſſe and tranquillitie of minde; and to compare it with my owne diſpoſition, and practice; whom I haue found too much drouping and deiected vnder ſmall croſſes; and eaſily againe carried away with little proſperitie: To ſee ſuch courage and ſtrength to contemne death, in thoſe which thought they wholly periſhed in death; and to finde ſuch faint-heartedneſſe in my ſelfe, at the firſt conceit of death, who yet am thorowly perſwaded of the future happineſſe of my ſoule. I haue the benefit of nature as well as they; beſides infinite other helpes that they wanted. Oh the dulneſſe and blindneſſe of vs vnworthy Chriſtians! that ſuffer Heathens, by the dim candle-light of Nature, to goe further than we by the cleere Sun of the Goſpell: that an indifferent man could not tell by our practice, whether were the Pagan. Let mee neuer for ſhame account my ſelfe a Chriſtian, vnleſſe my Art of Chriſtianity haue imitated and gone beyond nature, ſo farre, that I can finde the beſt Heathen as farre below mee in true reſolution, as the vulgar ſort were below them. Elſe, I may ſhame Religion; it can neither honeſt nor helpe me.

77

If I would be irreligious and vnconſcionable, I would make no doubt to be rich. For if a man will defraud, diſſemble, forſweare, bribe, oppreſſe, ſerue the time, make vſe of all men for his owne turne, make no ſcruple of any wicked action for his aduantage; I cannot ſee how he can eſcape wealth and preferment. But for an vpright man to riſe, is difficult: while his conſcience ſtraightly curbes him in, from euery vniuſt action; and will not allow him to aduance himſelfe by indirect meanes. So riches come ſeldome eaſily, to a good man; ſeldome hardly, to the conſcienceleſſe. Happy is that man that can be rich with truth, or poore with contentment. I will not enuy the grauell, in the vniuſt mans throat. Of riches let me neuer haue more, than an honeſt man can beare away.

78

God is the God of order, not of confuſion. As therefore, in naturall things, he vſeth to proceed from one extreme to another by degrees, through the meane: ſo doth hee in ſpirituall. The Sun riſeth not at once to his higheſt, from the darkneſſe of midnight; but firſt ſends forth ſome feeble glimmering of light in the dawning; then lookes out with weake and watriſh beames; and ſo by degrees aſcends to the midſt of Heauen. So in the ſeaſons of the yeere, we are not one day ſcorched with a Summer heat; and on the next, frozen with a ſudden extremity of cold. But Winter comes on ſoftly; firſt, by cold dewes, then hoare froſts; vntill at laſt it deſcend to the hardeſt weather of all; ſuch are Gods ſpirituall proceedings: He neuer brings any man from the eſtate of ſin, to the eſtate of glory, but through the eſtate of grace. And as for grace, hee ſeldome brings a man from groſſe wickedneſſe to any eminence of perfection. I will be charitably iealous of thoſe men, which from notorious lewdneſſe leape at once into a ſudden forwardneſſe of profeſſion. Holineſſe doth not, like Ionas gourd, grow vp in a night. I like it better, to goe on, ſoft and ſure, than for an haſtie fit to runne my ſelfe out of winde; and after ſtand ſtill and breathe me.

79

It hath beene ſaid of old; To doe well and heare ill, is princely. Which as it is moſt true, by reaſon of the enuy which followes vpon iuſtice: ſo is the contrary no leſſe iuſtified, by many experiments. To doe ill, and to heare well, is the faſhion of many great men. To doe ill, becauſe they are borne out with the aſſurance of impunity: To heare well, becauſe of abundance of Paraſites; which as Rauens to a carkaſſe, gather about great men. Neither is there any ſo great miſery in greatneſſe as this, that it conceales men from themſelues; and when they will needs haue a ſight of their owne actions, it ſhewes them a falſe glaſſe to looke in. Meanneſſe of ſtate (that I can finde) hath none ſo great inconuenience. I am no whit ſorry, that I am rather ſubiect to contempt, than flattery.

80

There is no earthly bleſſing ſo precious, as health of body: without which, all other worldly good things are but troubleſome. Neither is there any thing more difficult, than to haue a good ſoule, in a ſtrong and vigorous body (for, it is commonly ſeene, that the worſe part drawes away the better:) But to haue an healthfull and ſound ſoule, in a weake ſickly body, is no nouelty; whiles the weakneſſe of the body is an helpe to the ſoule; playing the part of a perpetuall monitor, to incite it to good, and checke it for euill. I will not be ouer-glad of health, nor ouer-fearefull of ſickneſſe. I will more

Hall, J.

feare the ſpirituall hurt, that may follow vpon health, than the bodily paine, that accompanies ſickneſſe.

81

There is nothing more troubleſome to a good minde, than to doe nothing. For, beſides the furtherance of our eſtate, the minde doth both delight, and better it ſelfe with exerciſe. There is but this difference then betwixt labour and idleneſſe; that labour is a profitable and pleaſant trouble: idleneſſe, a trouble both vnprofitable and comfortleſſe. I will be euer doing ſomething; that either God when he commeth, or Satan when he tempteth, may finde me buſied. And yet, ſince (as the old prouerbe is) better it is to be idle than effect nothing; I will not more hate doing nothing, than doing ſomething to no purpoſe. I ſhall doe good, but a while; let me ſtriue to doe it, while I may.

82

A faithfull man hath three eyes: The firſt of ſenſe, common to him with brute creatures: the ſecond of reaſon, common to all men: the third of faith, proper to his profeſſion: whereof each looketh beyond other; and none of them medleth with others obiects. For, neither doth the eye of ſenſe reach to intelligible things and matters of diſcourſe: nor the eye of reaſon to thoſe things which are ſupernaturall and ſpirituall: neither doth faith looke downe, to things that may be ſenſibly ſeene. If thou diſcourſe to a brute beaſt of the depths of Philoſophy, neuer ſo plainly, he vnderſtands not, becauſe they are beyond the view of his eye, which is only of ſenſe. If to a meere carnall man, of diuine things; he perceiueth not the things of God: neither indeed can doe, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned. And therefore no wonder if thoſe things ſeeme vnlikely, incredible, impoſſible to him, which the faithfull man (hauing a proportionable meanes of apprehenſion) doth as plainly ſee, as his eye doth any ſenſible thing. Tell a plaine Country-man, that the Sunne, or ſome higher or leſſer ſtarre is much bigger than his Cart-wheele; or, at leaſt, ſo many ſcores bigger than the whole earth; hee laughes thee to ſcorne, as affecting admiration, with a learned vntruth. Yet the Scholler, by the eye of reaſon, doth as plainly ſee and acknowledge this truth, as that his hand is bigger than his pen. What a thicke miſt, yea what a palpable, and more than Ægyptian darkneſſe, doth the naturall man liue in! what a world is there, that he doth not ſee at all! and how little doth hee ſee in this, which is his proper element! There is no bodily thing, but the brute creatures ſee as well as he; and ſome of them better. As for his eye of reaſon, how dim is it in thoſe things which are beſt fitted to it! what one thing is there in nature, which he doth perfectly know? what herbe, or flower, or worme that he treads on, is there, whoſe true eſſence he knoweth? No, not ſo much, as what is in his owne boſome; what it is, where it is, or whence it is that giues Being to himſelfe. But, for thoſe things which concerne the beſt world, he doth not ſo much as confuſedly ſee them; neither knoweth whether they be. Hee ſees no whit into the great and awfull Maieſtie of God. He diſcernes him not in all his creatures, filling the world with his infinite and glorious preſence. He ſees not his wiſe prouidence, ouerruling all things, diſpoſing all caſuall euents, ordering all ſinfull actions of men to his owne glory. He comprehends nothing of the beautie, maieſtie, power, and mercie of the Sauiour of the world, ſitting in his humanitie at his Fathers right hand. He ſees not the vnſpeakable happineſſe of the glorified ſoules of the Saints. He ſees not the whole heauenly Common-wealth of Angels (aſcending and deſcending to the behoofe of Gods children) waiting vpon him at all times inuiſibly (not excluded with cloſeneſſe of priſons, nor deſolateneſſe of wilderneſſes) and the multitude of euill ſpirits paſſing and ſtanding by him, to tempt him vnto euill: but, like vnto the fooliſh bird when he hath hid his head that he ſees no body, he thinkes himſelfe altogether vnſeene; and then counts himſelfe ſolitary, when his eye can meet with no companion. It was not without cauſe, that we call a meere foole a naturall. For how-euer worldlings haue ſtill thought Chriſtians Gods fooles, we know them the fooles of the world. The deepeſt Philoſopher that euer was (ſauing the reuerence of the Schooles) is but an ignorant ſot, to the ſimpleſt Chriſtian. For the weakeſt Chriſtian may, by plaine information, ſee ſomewhat into the greateſt myſteries of Nature, becauſe he hath the eye of Reaſon common with the beſt: but the beſt Philoſopher, by all the demonſtration in the world, can conceiue nothing of the myſteries of godlineſſe, becauſe he vtterly wants the eye of faith. Though my inſight into matters of the world be ſo ſhallow, that my ſimplicitie moueth pitie, or maketh ſport vnto others; it ſhall be my contentment and happineſſe, that I ſee further into better matters. That which I ſee not, is worthleſſe, and deſerueth little better than contempt: that which I ſee, is vnſpeakable, ineſtimable, for comfort, for glory.

83

It is not poſſible for an inferiour to liue at peace, vnleſſe he haue learned to be contemned. For the pride of his ſuperiours, and the malice of his equals and inferiours, ſhall offer him continuall and ineuitable occaſions of vnquietneſſe. As contentation is the mother of inward peace with our ſelues: ſo is humility the mother of peace with others. For if thou be vile in thine owne eyes firſt, it ſhall the leſſe trouble thee to be accounted vile of others. So that a man of an high heart, in a low place, cannot want diſcontentment: whereas a man of lowly ſtomacke, can ſwallow and digeſt contempt, without any diſtemper. For, wherein can he be the worſe for being contemned, who out of his owne knowledge of his deſerts, did moſt of all contemne himſelſe? I ſhould be very improuident, if in this calling I did not looke for daily contempt: wherein we are made a ſpectacle to the World, to Angels, and Men. When it comes, I will either embrace it, or contemne it: Embrace it, when it is within my meaſure; when aboue, contemne it. So embrace it, that I may more humble my ſelfe vnder it: and ſo contemne it, that I may not giue heart to him that offers it; nor diſgrace him, for whom I am contemned.

84

Chriſt raiſed three dead men to life: One, newly departed; another, on the Bere; a third, ſmelling in the graue: to ſhew vs, that no degree of death is ſo deſperate, that it is paſt helpe. My ſinnes are many, and great: yet if they were more, they are farre below the mercy of him that hath remitted them, and the value of his ranſome that hath payed for them. A man hurts himſelfe moſt by preſumption: but we cannot doe God a greater wrong, than to deſpaire of forgiueneſſe. It is a double iniury to God, firſt, that we offend his iuſtice by ſinning; then, that we wrong his mercy, with deſpairing, &c.

85

For a man to be weary of the world through miſeries that he meets with (and for that cauſe to couet death) is neither difficult, nor commendable; but rather argues a baſe weakneſſe of minde. So it may be a cowardly part, to contemne the vtmoſt of all terrible things, in a feare of lingering miſery: but for a man either liuing happily here on earth, or reſoluing to liue miſerably, yet to deſire his remouall to Heauen, doth well become a true Chriſtian courage; and argues a noble mixture of patience and faith. Of patience, for that he can and dare abide to liue ſorrowfully: of faith, for that he is aſſured of his better Being other-where; and therefore prefers the abſent ioyes he lookes for, to thoſe he feeles in preſent: No ſorrow ſhall make me wiſh my ſelfe dead, that I may not be at all. No contentment ſhall hinder me from wiſhing my ſelfe with Chriſt, that I may be happier.

86

It was not for nothing that the wiſe Creator of all things hath placed gold and ſiluer, and all precious minerals vnder our feet to be trod vpon, and hath hid them low in the bowels of the earth, that they cannot without great labour be either found, or gotten: whereas he hath placed the nobleſt part of his creation aboue our heads: and that ſo open to our view, that we cannot chuſe but euery moment behold them. Wherein what did he elſe intend, but to draw away our mindes from theſe worthleſſe, and yet hidden

hidden treaſures, (to which he fore-ſaw we would be too much addicted) and to call them to the contemplation of thoſe better things, which (beſide their beauty) are more obuious to vs, that in them we may ſee and admire the glory of their Maker, and withall ſeeke our owne? How doe thoſe men wrong themſelues, and miſconſtrue God, who (as if he had hidden theſe things, becauſe he would haue them ſought, and laid the other open for neglect) bend themſelues wholly to the ſeeking of theſe earthly commodities! and doe no more minde Heauen, than if there were none. If we could imagine a beaſt to haue reaſon, how could he be more abſurd in his choice? How eaſie is it to obſerue, that ſtill the higher we goe, the more purity and perfection we finde! (So earth is the very droſſe and dregs of all the elements: water ſomewhat more pure than it; yet alſo more feculent than the aire aboue it: the lower aire leſſe pure than his vppermoſt regions; and yet theſe as farre inferiour to the loweſt heauens: which againe are more exceeded by the glorious and Empyriall ſeat of God, which is the heauen of the iuſt:) Yet theſe brutiſh men take vp their reſt, and place their felicity in the loweſt and worſt of all Gods workmanſhip; not regarding that which with it owne glory can make them happy. Heauen is the proper place of my ſoule: I will ſend it vp thither continually in my thoughts, whiles it ſoiournes with me, before it goe to dwell there for euer.

87

A man need not to care for more knowledge, than to know himſelfe: he needs no more pleaſure, than to content himſelfe: no more victory, than to overcome himſelfe: no more riches, than to enioy himſelfe. What fooles are they that ſeeke to know all other things, and are ſtrangers in themſelues? that ſeeke altogether to ſatisfie other mens humours, with their owne diſpleaſure; that ſeeke to vanquiſh Kingdomes and Countries, when they are not Maſters of themſelues; that haue no hold of their owne hearts, yet ſeeke to be poſſeſſed of all outward commodities. Goe home to thy ſelfe, firſt, vaine heart: and when thou haſt made ſure worke there, (in knowing, contenting, ouercomming, enioying thy ſelfe) ſpend all the ſuperfluity of thy time and labour, vpon others.

88

It was an excellent rule that fell from the Epicure (whoſe name is odious to vs, for the father of looſeneſſe;) That if a man would be rich, honourable, aged, he ſhould not ſtriue ſo much to adde to his wealth, reputation, yeeres, as to detract from his deſires. For certainly, in theſe things which ſtand moſt vpon conceit, he hath the moſt that deſireth leaſt. A poore man that hath little, and deſires no more, is in truth richer than the greateſt Monarch, that thinketh he hath not what he ſhould, or what he might, or that grieues there is no more to haue. It is not neceſſitie, but ambition, that ſets mens hearts on the racke. If I haue meat, drinke, apparell, I will learne therewith to be content. If I had the world full of wealth beſide, I could enioy no more than I vſe: the reſt could pleaſe me no otherwiſe but by looking on. And why can I not thus ſolace my ſelfe, while it is others?

89

An inconſtant and wauering minde, as it makes a man vnfit for ſociety (for that there can be no aſſurance of his words, or purpoſes, neither can we build on them, without deceit:) ſo, beſides that, it makes a man ridiculous, it hinders him from euer attaining any perfection in himſelfe, (for a rolling ſtone gathers no moſſe; and the minde, while it would be euery thing, proues nothing. Oft changes cannot be without loſſe:) Yea, it keepes him from enioying that which he hath attained. For, it keepes him euer in worke; building, pulling downe, ſelling, changing, buying, commanding, forbidding. So, whiles he can be no other mans friend, he is the leaſt his owne. It is the ſafeſt courſe for a mans profit, credit, and eaſe, to deliberate long, to reſolue ſurely; hardly to alter, not to enter vpon that, whoſe end he fore-ſees not anſwerable; and when he is once entered, not to ſurceaſe till he haue attained the end he fore-ſaw. So may he, to good purpoſe, begin a new worke, when he hath well finiſhed the old.

90

The way to Heauen, is like that which Ionathan and his Armour-bearer paſſed, betwixt two rocks; one Bozez, the other Seneh; that is, ſoule and thornie: whereto we muſt make ſhift to climbe on our hands and knees; but when we are come vp, there is victorie and triumph. Gods children haue three ſutes of apparell, whereof two are worne daily, on earth; the third laid vp for them in the Ward-robe of Heauen: They are euer either in blacke, mourning; in red, perſecuted; or in white, glorious, Any way ſhall be pleaſant to me, that leads vnto ſuch an end. It matters not, what rags, or what colours I weare with men; ſo I may walke with my Sauiour in white, and reigne with him in glorie.

91

There is nothing more eaſie, than to ſay Diuinitie by rote; and to diſcourſe of ſpirituall matters from the tongue or pen of others: but to heare God ſpeake it to the ſoule, and to feele the power of Religion in our ſelues, and to expreſſe it out of the truth of experience within, is both rare, and hard. All that we feele not in the matters of God, is but hypocriſie: and therefore the more we profeſſe, the more we ſin. It will neuer be well with me, till in theſe greateſt things I be careleſſe of others cenſures, fearefull onely of Gods, and my owne: till ſound experience haue really catechiſed my heart, and made me know God, and my Sauiour, otherwiſe than by words; I will neuer be quiet till I can ſee, and feele, and taſte God: my hearing I will account as onely ſeruing to effect this, and my ſpeech onely to expreſſe it.

92

There is no enemie can hurt vs, but by our owne hands. Satan could not hurt vs, if our owne corruption betraied vs not: afflictions cannot hurt vs without our owne impatience: tentations cannot hurt vs, without our owne yeeldance: death could not hurt vs, without the ſting of our owne ſins: ſin could not hurt vs, without our owne impenitence: how might I defie all things, if I could obtaine not to be my owne enemie? I loue my ſelfe too much, and yet not enough. O God, teach mee to wiſh my ſelfe but ſo well as thou wiſheſt me, and I am ſafe.

93

It grieues me to ſee all other creatures ſo officious to their Maker in their kinde: that both winds, and ſea, and heauen, and earth, obey him with all readineſſe, that each of theſe heares other, and all of them their Creator, though to the deſtruction of themſelues; and Man onely is rebellious, imitating herein the euill ſpirits, who in the receit of a more excellent kinde of reaſon, are yet more peruerſe: hence it is, that the Prophets are oft times faine to turne their ſpeech to the earth, void of all ſenſe and life, from this liuing earth informed with reaſon: that onely which ſhould make vs more pliable, ſtifneth vs. God could force vs, (if he pleaſed) but he had rather incline vs by gentleneſſe. I muſt ſtoope to his power, why doe I not ſtoope to his will? It is a vaine thing to reſiſt his voice, whoſe hand we cannot reſiſt.

94

As all naturall bodies are mixt; ſo muſt all our morall diſpoſition: no ſimple paſſion doth well. If our ioy be not allayed with ſorrow, it is madneſſe: and if our ſorrow be not tempered with ſome mixture of ioy, it is helliſh and deſperate: if in theſe earthly things, we hope without all doubt, or feare without all hope, we offend on both ſides; if we labour without all recreation, we grow dull and heartleſſe: if we ſport our ſelues without all labour, we grow wilde and vnprofitable: theſe compoſitions are wholſome, as for the bodie, ſo for the minde; which though it be not of a compounded ſubſtance, as the bodie; yet hath much varietie of qualities and affections, and thoſe contrary to each other. I care not how ſimple my heauenly affections are, which the more free they are from compoſition, are the neerer to God: nor how compounded my earthly, which are eaſily ſubiect to extremities: if ioy come alone, I will aske him for his fellow; and euermore in ſpight of him, couple him with his contrary: that ſo while each are enemies to other, both may be friends to me.

Hall, J.

95

Ioy and ſorrow are hard to conceale: as from the countenance, ſo from the tongue: there is ſo much correſpondence betwixt the heart and the tongue, that they will moue at once: euery man therefore ſpeakes of his owne pleaſure and care: the Hunter and Falconer of his games; the Plough-man of his teame; the Souldier of his march, and colours. If the heart were as full of God, the tongue could not refraine to talke of him. The rareneſſe of Chriſtian communication, argues the common pouertie of grace. If Chriſt be not in our hearts, we are Godleſſe: if he be there without our ioy, we are ſenſeleſſe: if we reioyce in him, and ſpeake not of him, we are ſhamefully vnthankfull: euery man taketh, yea raiſeth occaſion to bring in ſpeech of what he liketh. As I will thinke of thee alwaies, O Lord, ſo it ſhall be my ioy to ſpeake of thee often: and if I finde not opportunitie, I will make it.

96

When I ſee my Sauiour hanging in ſo forlorne a faſhion vpon the Croſſe; his head drouping downe, his temples bleeding with thornes, his hands and feet with the nailes, and ſide with the ſpeare; his enemies round about him, mocking at his ſhame, and inſulting ouer his impotence: how ſhould I thinke any otherwiſe of him, than, as himſelfe complaineth, forſaken of his Father? But when againe I turne mine eies, and ſee the Sun darkened, the earth quaking, the rocks rent, the graues opened, the theefe confeſſing, to giue witneſſe to his Deitie; and when I ſee ſo ſtrong a guard of prouidence ouer him, that all his malicious enemies are not able ſo much as to breake one bone of that body, which ſeemed careleſly neglected, I cannot but wonder at his glorie, and ſafetie. God is euer neere, though oft vnſeene; and if he winke at our diſtreſſe, hee ſleepeth not: the ſenſe of others muſt not be iudges of his preſence, and care; but our faith: what care I, if the world giue me vp for miſerable, whiles I am vnder his ſecret protection? O Lord, ſince thou art ſtrong in our weakneſſe, and preſent in our ſenſleſneſſe; giue me but as much comfort in my ſorrow, as thou giueſt me ſecuritie, and at my worſt I ſhall be well.

97

In ſins and afflictions our courſe muſt be contrarie: we muſt beginne to deteſt the greateſt ſin firſt, and deſcend to the hatred of the leaſt; we muſt firſt beginne to ſuffer ſmall afflictions with patience, that we may aſcend to the endurance of the greateſt. Then alone ſhall I be happy, when by this holy method, I haue drawn my ſoule to make conſcience of the leaſt euill of ſinne, and not to ſhrinke at the leaſt euill of affliction.

98

Preſcription is no plea againſt the King: much leſſe can long cuſtome plead for error againſt that our ſupreme Lord, to whom a thouſand yeares are but as yeſterday: yea, Time, which pleads voluntarily for continuance of things lawfull, will take no fee, not to ſpeake againſt an euill vſe. Hath an ill cuſtome laſted long? it is more than time it were abrogated: age is an aggrauation to ſin. Hereſie or abuſe, if it bee gray-headed, deſerues ſharper oppoſition: to ſay, I will doe ill becauſe I haue done ſo, is perillous and impious preſumption: continuance can no more make any wickedneſſe ſafe, than the author of ſin, no Deuill: If I haue once ſinned, it is too much; if oft, woe be to me, if the iteration of my offence cauſe boldneſſe, and not rather more ſorrow, more deteſtation: woe be to me and my ſin, if I be not the better becauſe I haue ſinned.

99

It is ſtrange to ſee the varieties and proportion of ſpirituall and bodily diets: there be ſome creatures that are fatted and delighted with poyſons: others liue by nothing but aire; and ſome (they ſay) by fire: others will taſte no water but muddie: others feed on their fellowes, or (perhaps) on part of themſelues: others, on the excretions of nobler creatures: ſome ſearch into the earth for ſuſtenance, or diue into the waters: others content themſelues with what the vpper earth yeelds them without violence. All theſe and more, are anſwered in the palate of the ſoule: there be ſome (yea the moſt) to whom ſinne (which is of a moſt venomous nature) is both food and dainties; others, that thinke it the onely life, to feed on the popular aire of applauſe; others, that are neuer well out of the fire of contentions; and that wilfully trouble all waters with their priuate humours and opinions; others, whoſe cruelty delights in oppreſſion, and bloud; yea, whoſe enuie gnawes vpon their owne hearts; others, that take pleaſure to reuiue the wicked and foule hereſies of the greater wits of the former times; others, whoſe worldly mindes root altogether in earthly cares; or who not content with the ordinarie prouiſion of doctrine, affect obſcure ſubtilties, vnknowne to wiſer men; others, whoſe too indifferent mindes feed on what-euer opinion comes next to hand, without any carefull diſquiſition of truth; ſo ſome feed foule: others (but few) cleane and wholſome. As there is no beaſt vpon Earth, which hath not his like in the Sea, and which (perhaps) is not in ſome ſort paralelled in the plants of the earth: ſo there is no beaſtiall diſpoſition, which is not anſwerably found in ſome men. Mankinde therefore hath within it ſelfe his Goats, Chameleons, Salamanders, Camels, Wolues, Dogs, Swine, Moles, and what euer ſorts of beaſts: there are but a few men amongſt men: to a wiſe man the ſhape is not ſo much as the qualities: If I be not a man within, in my choices, affections, inclinations; it had beene better for mee to haue beene a beaſt without: A beaſt is but like it ſelfe; but an euill man is halfe a beaſt, and halfe a Deuill.

100

Forced fauours are thankleſſe; and commonly with noble mindes finde no acceptation; for a man to giue his ſoule to God, when he ſees he can no longer hold it; or to beſtow his goods, when he is forced to depart with them; or to forſake his ſinne, when he cannot follow it, are but vnkinde and cold obediences: God ſees our neceſſity, and ſcornes our compelled offers; what man of any generous ſpirit will abide himſelfe made the laſt refuge of a craued, denied, and conſtrained courteſie? While God giues me leaue to keepe my ſoule, yet then to bequeath it to him, and whiles ſtrength and opportunitie ſerue me to ſinne, then to forſake it, is both accepted and crowned: God loues neither grudged, nor neceſſary gifts: I will offer betimes, that he may vouchſafe to take: I will giue him the beſt, that he may take all.

O God, giue me this grace, that I may giue thee my ſelfe, freely, and ſeaſonably: and then I know thou canſt not but accept me, becauſe this gift is thine owne.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVLL, SIR

EDMVND BACON, Knight, increaſe of honour, ſtrength of body, perfection of VERTVE.

SIR, There is no wiſe man would giue his thoughts for all the world: which as they are the moſt pleaſing and noble buſineſſe of man, being the naturall and immediate iſſue of that reaſon, whereby he is ſeuered from brute creatures: ſo they are in their vſe moſt beneficiall to our ſelues, and others. For, by the meanes hereof, we enioy both God and our ſelues; and hereby we make others partners of thoſe rich excellencies, which God hath hid in the minde. And though it be moſt eaſie and ſafe, for a man, with the Pſalmiſt to commune with his owne heart in ſilence; yet is it more behoouefull to the common good, for which (both as men and Chriſtians) we are ordained, that thoſe thoughts which our experience hath found comfortable and fruitfull to our ſelues, ſhould (with neglect of all cenſures) be communicated to others. The concealement whereof (mee thinkes) can proceed from no other ground, but either timorouſneſſe, or enuie. Which conſideration hath induced mee to clothe theſe naked thoughts in plaine and ſimple words, and to aduenture them into the light, after their fellowes: Conſecrating them the rather to your name, for that (beſides all other reſpects of dutie) they are part of thoſe meditations,

Hall, J.

ditations, which in my late peregrination with you, tooke mee vp vnder the ſolitarie hills of Ardenna, wanting as then the opportunitie of other employment. I offer them to you not for that your ſelfe is not ſtored with choice of better; but as poore men vſe to bring preſents to the rich: If they may carrie acceptation from you, and bring profit vnto any ſoule, it ſhall abundantly ſatisfie me, who ſhould thinke it honour enough, if I might bee vouchſafed to bring but one pinne towards the decking of the Spouſe of Chriſt; whiles others, out of their abundance, adorne her with coſtly robes, and rich medals. I commend their ſucceſſe to God, their patronage to you, their vſe to the world. That God multiplie his rare fauours vpon you, and your worthy Ladie; and goe you on to fauour

Your Worſhips humbly deuoted,

MEDITATIONS
AND

1

GOOD men are placed by God, as ſo many ſtarres in the lower firmament of the world. As they muſt imitate thoſe heauenly bodies, in their light and influence; ſo alſo in their motion: and therefore as the Planets haue a courſe proper to themſelues, againſt the ſway of the Heauen that carries them about; ſo muſt each good man haue a motion out of his owne iudgement, contrary to the cuſtomes and opinions of the vulgar; finiſhing his owne courſe with the leaſt ſhew of reſiſtance. I will neuer affect ſingularity, except it be among thoſe that are vicious. It is better to doe, or thinke well alone, than to follow a multitude in euill.

2

What ſtrange variety of actions doth the eye of God ſee at once round about the compaſſe of the earth, and within it! Some building houſes; ſome deluing for metals; ſome marching in troups, or encamping one againſt another; ſome bargaining in the market; ſome trauelling on their way: ſome praying in their cloſets; others quaffing at the Tauerne; ſome rowing in the Gallies; others dallying in their chambers; and in ſhort, as many different actions as perſons: yet all haue one common intention of good to themſelues; true in ſome, but in the moſt, imaginary. The glorified Spirits haue but one vniforme worke, wherein they all ioyne; The praiſe of their Creator. This is one difference betwixt the Saints aboue, and below: They aboue are free both from buſineſſe, and diſtraction; theſe below are free (though not abſolutely) from diſtraction, not at all from buſineſſe. Paul could thinke of the cloke that he left at Troas; and of the ſhaping of his skins for his Tents: yet, thorow theſe he look't ſtill at heauen. This world is made for buſineſſe: my actions muſt vary according to occaſions: my end ſhall be but one, and the ſame now on earth, that it muſt be one day in heauen.

3

To ſee how the Martyrs of God died, and the life of their perſecutors, would make a man out of loue with life, and out of all feare of death. They were fleſh and bloud, as well as wee; life was as ſweet to them as to vs; their bodies were as ſenſible of paine as ours;

Hall, J.

ours; wee goe to the ſame heauen with them. How comes it then, that they were ſo couragious in abiding ſuch torments in their death, as the very mention ſtrikes horror into any Reader, and we are ſo cowardly in encountering a faire and naturall death? if this valour had beene of themſelues, I would neuer haue looked after them in hope of imitation. Now, I know it was he for whom they ſuffered, and that ſuffered in them which ſuſtained them. They were of themſelues as weake as I; and God can be as ſtrong in me as he was in them. O Lord, thou art not more vnable to giue me this grace; but I am more vnworthie to receiue it: and yet thou regardeſt not worthineſſe, but mercie. Giue me their ſtrength, and what end thou wilt.

Our firſt age is all in hope. When wee are in the wombe, who knowes whether we ſhall haue our right ſhape and proportion of body, being neither monſtrous nor deformed? When we are borne, who knowes whether with the due features of a man, wee ſhall haue the faculties of reaſon and vnderſtanding? When yet our progreſſe in yeeres diſcouereth wit or follie; who knowes, whether with the power of reaſon we ſhall haue the grace of faith to be Chriſtians? and when we begin to profeſſe well, whether it be a temporarie, and ſeeming, or a true and ſauing faith? Our middle age is halfe in hope for the future, and halfe in proofe for that is paſt: Our old age is out of hope, and altogether in proofe. In our laſt times therefore we know, both what we haue beene, and what to expect. It is good for youth to looke forward, and ſtill to propound the beſt things vnto it ſelfe; for an old man to looke backward, & to repent him of that wherein he hath failed, and to recollect himſelfe for the preſent: but in my middle age I will looke both backward and forward; comparing my hopes with my proofe; redeeming the time, ere it be all ſpent, that my recouerie may preuent my repentance. It is both a folly and miſerie to ſay, This I might haue done.

5

It is the wonderfull mercie of God, both to forgiue vs our debts to him in our ſins, and to make himſelfe a debtor to vs in his promiſes. So that now both waies the ſoule may be ſure; ſince he neither calleth for thoſe debts which he hath once forgiuen; nor withdraweth thoſe fauours, and that heauen which hee hath promiſed: but as he is a mercifull creditor to forgiue, ſo he is a true debtor to pay whatſoeuer he hath vndertaken: whence it is come to paſſe, that the penitent ſinner owes nothing to God but loue and obedience, and God owes ſtill much and all to him: for he owes as much as he hath promiſed; and what he owes by vertue of his bleſſed promiſe, we may challenge. O infinite mercie! He that lent vs all that wee haue, and in whoſe debt-bookes we run hourely forward till the ſumme be endleſſe; yet owes vs more, and bids vs looke for payment. I cannot deſerue the leaſt fauour he can giue; yet will I as confidently challenge the greateſt, as if I deſerued it. Promiſe indebteth no leſſe than loane or deſert.

6

It is no ſmall commendation to manage a little well. He is a good Waggoner that can turne in a narrow roome. To liue well in abundance, is the praiſe of the eſtate, not of the perſon. I will ſtudie more how to giue a good account of my little, than how to make it more.

7

Many Chriſtians do greatly wrong themſelues with a dull & heauie kinde of ſullenneſſe; who not ſuffering themſelues to delight in any worldly thing, are thereupon oft-times ſo heartleſſe, that they delight in nothing. Theſe men, like to careleſſe gueſts, when they are inuited to an excellent banquet, loſe their dainties for want of a ſtomack; and loſe their ſtomacke for want of exerciſe. A good conſcience keepes alwaies good cheere: hee cannot chuſe but fare well that hath it, vnleſſe hee loſe his appetite with neglect and ſlothfulneſſe. It is a ſhame for vs Chriſtians, not to finde as much ioy in God, as worldlings doe in their forced meriments; and lewd wretches in the practice of their ſinnes.

8

A wiſe Chriſtian hath no enemies. Many hate and wrong him: but he loues all men, and all pleaſure him. Thoſe that profeſſe loue to him, pleaſure him with the comfort of their ſocietie, and the mutuall reflection of friendſhip: thoſe that profeſſe hatred, make him more warie of his waies; ſhew him faults in himſelfe, which his friends would either not haue eſpied, or not cenſured; ſend him the more willingly to ſeeke fauour aboue; and as the worſt doe beſtead him, though againſt their wills; ſo hee againe doth voluntarily good to them. To doe euill for euill, as Ioab to Abner, is a ſinful weakneſſe: To doe good for good, as Ahaſuerus to Mordecai, is but naturall iuſtice: To doe euil for good, as Iudas to Chriſt, is vnthankfulneſſe and villany: Onely to doe good for euill, agrees with Chriſtian profeſſion. And what greater work of friendſhip, than to doe good? If men wil not be my friends in loue, I wil perforce make them my friends in a good vſe of their hatred, I will be their friend, that are mine, and would not be.

9

All temporall things are troubleſome. For if we haue good things, it is a trouble to forgoe them; and when we ſee they muſt be parted from, either we wiſh they had not beene ſo good, or that we neuer had enioyed them. Yea, it is more trouble to loſe them, than it was before ioy to poſſeſſe them. If contrarily, we haue euill things, their very preſence is troubleſome; & ſtill we wiſh that they were good, or that we were diſburdened of them. So good things are troubleſome in euent, euill things in their vſe. They in the future, theſe in preſent: they, becauſe they ſhall come to an end; theſe becauſe they doe continue. Tell me, thy wife, or thy child, lies dying, and now makes vp a louing and dutifull life, with a kinde & louing parture; whether hadſt thou rather for thy owne part, ſhe had beene ſo good, or worſe? would it haue coſt thee ſo many heartie ſighs and teares, if ſhe had beene peruerſe and diſobedient? yet if in her life time I put thee to this choice, thou thinkeſt it no choice at all, in ſuch inequality. It is more torment (ſaiſt thou) to liue one vnquiet moneth, than it is pleaſure to liue an age in loue. Or if thy life be yet dearer: Thou haſt liued to gray haires, not haſtened with care, but bred with late ſucceſſion of yeares. Thy table was euer couered with varietie of diſhes. Thy backe ſoftly and richly clad: Thou neuer gaueſt deniall to either skin or ſtomacke: Thou euer fauouredſt thy ſelfe; and health, thee. Now death is at thy threſhold, and vnpartially knocks at thy doore, doſt thou not wiſh thou hadſt liued with cruſts, & beene clothed with rags? Wouldſt not thou haue giuen a better welcome to death, if he had found thee, lying vpon a pallet of ſtraw, and ſupping of water-gruell; after many painfull nights, and many ſides changed in vaine? Yet this beggerly eſtate thou deteſteſt in health, and pitieſt in others, as truly miſerable. The ſumme is; A begger wiſheth he might be a Monarch while he liues; and the great Potentate wiſheth he had liued a begger when he comes to die: and, if beggerie be to haue nothing, he ſhall be ſo in death, though he wiſhed it not. Nothing therefore but eternitie can make a man truly happy; as nothing can make perfect miſerie but eternitie: for as temporall good things afflict vs in their ending, ſo temporall ſorrowes afford vs ioy in the hope of their end. What folly is this in vs to ſeeke for our trouble, to neglect our happineſſe? I can be but well; and this that I was well, ſhall one day be grieuous. Nothing ſhall pleaſe me, but that once I ſhall be happie for euer.

10

The eldeſt of our fore-fathers liued not ſo much as a day to God, to whom a thouſand yeares is as no more; we liue but as an houre to the day of our fore-fathers, for if nine hundred and ſixty were but their day, our foureſcore is but as the twelfth part of it: and yet

Hall, J.

yet of this our houre we liue ſcarce a minute to God. For, take away all that time that is conſumed in ſleeping, dreſſing, feeding, talking, ſporting; of that little time there can remaine not much more than nothing: yet the moſt ſeeke paſtimes to haſten it. Thoſe which ſeeke to mend the pace of Time, ſpurre a running horſe. I had more need to redeeme it with double care and labour, than to ſeeke how to ſell it for nothing.

11

Each day is a new life, and an abridgement of the whole. I will ſo liue, as if I counted euery day my firſt, and my laſt: as if I began to liue but then, and ſhould liue no more afterwards.

12

It was not in vaine, that the ancient founders of languages vſed the ſame word in many tongues, to ſignifie both Honour and Charge; meaning therein to teach vs the inſeparable connexion of theſe two. For there ſcarce euer was any charge without ſome opinion of honour: neither euer was there honour without a charge; which two as they are not without reaſon ioyned together in name by humane inſtitution, ſo they are moſt wiſely coupled together by God in the diſpoſition of theſe worldly eſtates. Charge without Honour, to make it amends, would be too toileſome, and muſt needs diſcourage and ouer-lay a man. Honour without charge would be too pleaſant, and therefore both would be too much ſought after, and muſt needs carrie away the minde in the enioying it. Now many dare not be ambitious, becauſe of the burden; chuſing rather to liue obſcurely and ſecurely: And yet on the other ſide thoſe that are vnder it, are refreſhed in the Charge with the ſweetneſſe of Honour. Seeing they cannot be ſeparated, it is not the worſt eſtate to want both. They whom thou enuieſt for Honour, perhaps enuie thee more for thy quietneſſe.

13

He that taketh his owne cares vpon himſelſe, loads himſelſe in vaine with an vneaſie burden. The feare of what may come, expectation of what will come, deſire of what will not come, and inabilitie of redreſſing all theſe, muſt needs breed him continuall torment. I will caſt my cares vpon God, he hath bidden me: they cannot hurt him; he can redreſſe them.

14

Our infancie is full of folly; youth, of diſorder and toile; age, of infirmitie. Each time hath his burden, and that which may iuſtly worke our wearineſſe: yet infancie longeth after youth; and youth, after more age: and he that is very old, as he is a childe for ſimplicitie, ſo he would be for yeares. I account old age the beſt of three; partly, for that it hath paſſed thorow the folly and diſorder of the others; partly, for that the inconueniences of this are but bodily, with a bettered eſtate of the minde; and partly, for that it is neereſt to diſſolution. There is nothing more miſerable, than an old man that would be young againe. It was an anſwer worthy the commendations, of Petrarch, and that which argued a minde truly philoſophicall of him, who when his friend bemoned his age appearing in his white temples, telling him hee was ſorrie to ſee him looke ſo old, replied: Nay, be ſorrie rather that euer I was young, to be a foole.

15

There is not the leaſt action or euent, (what-euer the vaine Epicures haue imagined) which is not ouer-ruled, and diſpoſed by a prouidence: which is ſo far from detracting ought from the maieſtie of God for that the things are ſmall, as that there can be no greater honour to him, than to extend his prouidence & decree to them becauſe they are infinite. Neither doth this hold in naturall things only, which are chained one to another by a regular order of ſucceſſion, but euen in thoſe things which fall out by caſualtie and imprudence: whence that worthy Father, when as his ſpeech digreſſed his intention to a confutation of the errors of the Manichees, could preſently gheſſe, that in that vnpurpoſed turning of it, God intended the conuerſion of ſome vnknowne Auditor; as the euent proued his coniecture true ere many daies. When ought falls out contrary to that I purpoſed, it ſhall content me, that God purpoſed it as it is falne out: ſo the thing hath attained his owne end, whiles it miſſed mine. I know what I would, but God knoweth what I ſhould will. It is enough that his will is done, though mine be croſſed.

16

It is the moſt thankleſſe office in the world, to be a mans Pandar vnto ſinne. In other wrongs, one man is a Wolfe to another: but in this, a Deuill. And, though at the firſt this damnable ſeruice carry away reward, yet in concluſion, it is requited with hatred and curſes. For, as the ſicke man extremely diſtaſted with a loathſome potion, hateth the very cruze wherein it was brought him; ſo doth the conſcience, once ſoundly deteſting ſinne, loath the meanes that induced him to commit it. Contrarily, who withſtands a man in his proſecution of a ſinne, while he doteth vpon it, beares away frownes, and heart-burnings for a time: but when the offending party comes to himſelfe, and right reaſon, he recompenceth his former diſlike with ſo much more loue, and ſo many more thankes. The franticke man returned to his wits, thinkes him his beſt friend that bound him, and beat him moſt. I will doe my beſt to croſſe any man in his ſinnes: if I haue not thankes of him, yet of my conſcience I ſhall.

17

God muſt be magnified in his very iudgements. He lookes for praiſe, not only for heauen, but for hell alſo. His iuſtice is himſelfe, as well as his mercy. As heauen then is for the praiſe of his mercy; ſo hell for the glory of his iuſtice. We muſt therefore be ſo affected to iudgements as the Author of them is, who delighteth not in bloud, as it makes his creature miſerable, but as it makes his iuſtice glorious. Euery true Chriſtian then muſt learne to ſing that compound ditty of the Pſalmiſt: Of mercy and iudgement. It ſhall not only ioy me to ſee God gracious and bountifull in his mercies, and deliuerances of his owne; but alſo to ſee him terrible in vengeance to his enemies. It is no cruelty to reioyce in iuſtice. The fooliſh mercy of men is cruelty to God.

18

Rareneſſe cauſeth wonder, and more than that, incredulity, in thoſe things which in themſelues are not more admirable, than the ordinary proceedings of Nature. If a blazing ſtarre be ſeene in the skie, euery man goes forth to gaze; and ſpends, euery euening, ſome time in wondring at the beames of it. That any fowle ſhould be bred of corrupted wood reſolued into wormes: or that the Chameleon ſhould euer change his colours, and liue by aire: that the Oſtrich ſhould digeſt iron: that the Phœnix ſhould burne herſelfe to aſhes, and from thence breed a ſucceſſor; we wonder, and can ſcarce credit. Other things more vſuall, no leſſe miraculous, we know and neglect. That there ſhould be a bird, that knoweth, and noteth the houres of day and night, as certainly as any Aſtronomer by the courſe of Heauen, if we knew not, who would beleeue? Or that the Load-ſtone ſhould by his ſecret vertue ſo draw iron to it ſelfe, as that a whole chaine of needles ſhould all hang by inſenſible points at each other, only by the influence that it ſends downe from the firſt, if it were not ordinary, would ſeeme incredible. Who would beleeue when he ſees a fowle mounted as high as his ſight can deſcrie it, that there were an engine to be framed, which could fetch it downe into his fiſt? Yea, to omit infinite examples, that a little deſpiſed creature ſhould weaue nets out of her owne entrailes, and in her platformes of building ſhould obſerue as iuſt proportions as the beſt Geometrician, we ſhould ſuſpect for an vntruth, if we ſaw it not daily practiſed in our owne windowes. If the Sunne ſhould ariſe but once to the earth, I doubt, euery man would be a Perſian, and fall downe and worſhip it: whereas now it riſeth and declineth without any regard. Extraordinary euents each man can wonder at. The frequence of Gods beſt workes cauſeth neglect: not that they are euer the worſe for commonneſſe; but becauſe we are ſoone cloyed with the ſame conceit, and haue contempt bred in vs through familiarity. I will learne to note Gods power and wiſdome, and to giue him praiſe of both, in his ordinary workes: ſo thoſe things which are but triuiall to the moſt ignorant, ſhall be wonders to me; and that not for nine daies, but for euer.

12637c

19

Thoſe that affect to tell nouelties and wonders, fall into many abſurdities, both in buſie enquiry after matters impertinent, and in a light credulity, to what-euer they heare; and in fictions of their owne, and additions of circumſtances to make their reports the more admired. I haue noted theſe men, not ſo much wondered at for their ſtrange ſtories, while they are telling, as derided afterwards, when the euent hath wrought their diſproofe and ſhame. I will deale with rumours as graue men doe by ſtrange faſhions, take them vp when they are growne into common vſe before: I may beleeue, but I will not relate them but vnder the name of my author; who ſhall either warrant me with defence, if it be true; or if falſe, beare my ſhame.

20

It was a wittie and true ſpeech of that obſcure Heraclitus, That all men awaking are in one common world, but when we ſleepe, each man goes into a ſeuerall world by himſelfe; which though it be but a world of fancies, yet is the true image of that little world which is in euery mans heart. For the imaginations of our ſleepe, ſhew vs what our diſpoſition is awaking. And as many in their dreams reueale thoſe their ſecrets to others, which they would neuer haue done awake: ſo all may and doe diſcloſe to themſelues in their ſleepe thoſe ſecret inclinations, which after much ſearching, they could not haue found out waking. I doubt not therefore, but as God heretofore hath taught future things in dreames (which kinde of reuelation is now ceaſed) ſo ſtill he teacheth the preſent eſtate of the heart this way. Some dreames are from our ſelues, vaine and idle, like our ſelues: Others are diuine, which teach vs good, or moue vs to good: and others deuilliſh, which ſollicite vs to euill. Such anſwer commonly ſhall I giue to any temptation in the day, as I doe by night. I will not lightly paſſe ouer my very dreames. They ſhall teach me ſomewhat; ſo neither night nor day ſhall be ſpent vnprofitably: the night ſhall teach me what I am, the day what I ſhould be.

21

Men make difference betwixt ſeruants, friends, and ſonnes. Seruants, though neere vs in place, yet for their inferiority, are not familiar. Friends, though by reaſon of their equalitie, and our loue, they are familiar; yet ſtill we conceiue of them as others from our ſelues. Bnt children we thinke of, affectionately, as the diuided peeces of our owne bodies. But all theſe are one to God: his ſeruants are his friends, his friends are his ſons, his ſons his ſeruants. Many claime kindred of God, and profeſſe friendſhip to him, becauſe theſe are priuileges without difficulty, and not without honour: all the triall is in ſeruice. The other are moſt in affection, and therefore ſecret, and ſo may be diſſembled, this conſiſting in action, muſt needs ſhew it ſelfe to the eyes of others. Yee are my friends, if ye doe whatſoeuer I command you: friendſhip with God is in ſeruice, and this ſeruice is in action. Many weare Gods cloth, that know not their Maſter, that neuer did good chare in his ſeruice: ſo that God hath many retainers that weare his liuery, for a countenance, neuer wait on him; whom he will neuer owne for ſeruants either by fauour, or wages; few ſeruants, and therefore few ſons. It is great fauour in God, and great honour to me, that he will vouchſafe to make me the loweſt drudge in his family; which place if I had not, and were a Monarch of men, I were accurſed. I deſire no more but to ſerue; yet, Lord, thou giueſt me more, to be thy ſonne. I heare Dauid ſay, Seemeth it a ſmall matter to you, to be the ſonne in law to a King? What is it then, oh what is it, to be the true adopted ſonne of the King of glory? Let me not now ſay as Dauid of Saul, but as Sauls grand-childe to Dauid; Oh, what is thy ſeruant, that thou ſhouldeſt looke vpon ſuch a dead dogge as I am?

22

I am a ſtranger here below, my home is aboue; yet I can thinke too well of theſe forraine vanities, and cannot thinke enough of my home. Surely, that is not ſo farre aboue my head, as my thoughts; neither doth ſo farre paſſe me in diſtance, as in comprehenſion: and yet I would not ſtand ſo much vpon conceiuing, if I could admire it enough: but my ſtraight heart is filled with a little wonder; and hath no roome for the greateſt part of glory that remaineth. O God, what happineſſe haſt thou prepared for thy choſen? What a purchaſe was this, worthy of the bloud of ſuch a Sauiour? As yet I doe but looke towards it afarre off: but it is eaſie to ſee by the outſide, how goodly it is within: Although as thine houſe on earth, ſo that aboue hath more glory within, than can be bewrayed by the outward appearance. The outer part of thy Tabernacle here below, is but an earthly and baſe ſubſtance; but within, it is furniſhed with a liuing, ſpirituall, and heauenly gueſt: ſo the outer heauens, though they be as gold to all other materiall creatures, yet they are but droſſe to thee: yet how are euen the outmoſt walls of that houſe of thine, beautified with glorious lights, whereof euery one is a world for bigneſſe, and as an heauen for goodlineſſe! Oh teach me by this to long after, and wonder at the inner part, before thou letſt me come in to behold it.

23

Riches or beautie, or what euer worldly good that hath beene, doth but grieue vs; that which is, doth not ſatisfie vs; that which ſhall be, is vncertaine. What folly is it to truſt to any of them?

24

Securitie makes worldlings merry: and therefore are they ſecure, becauſe they are ignorant. That is only ſolid ioy, which ariſeth from a reſolution; when the heart hath caſt vp a full account of all cauſes of diſquietneſſe, and findeth the cauſes of his ioy more forcible: thereupon ſetling it ſelfe in a ſtayed courſe of reioycing. For the other, ſo ſoone as ſorrow makes it ſelfe to be ſeene, eſpecially in an vnexpected forme, is ſwallowed vp in deſpaire; whereas this can meet with no occurrence, which it hath not preuented in thought. Securitie and ignorance may ſcatter ſome refuſe morſels of ioy, ſawced with much bitterneſſe; or may be like ſome boaſting houſe-keeper, which keepeth open doores for one day with much cheere, and liues ſtaruedly all the yeere after. There is no good Ordinary but in a good conſcience. I pity that vnſound ioy in others, and will ſeeke for this ſound ioy in my ſelfe. I had rather weepe vpon a iuſt cauſe, than reioyce vniuſtly.

25

As loue keepes the whole Law, ſo loue only is the breaker of it; being the ground, as of all obedience, ſo of all ſinne; for whereas ſinne hath beene commonly accounted to haue two roots, Loue and Feare; it is plaine, that feare hath his originall from loue: for no man feares to loſe ought but what he loues. Here is ſinne and righteouſneſſe brought both into a ſhort ſumme, depending both vpon one poore affection: It ſhall be my only care therefore to beſtow my loue well, both for obiect, and meaſure. All that is good, I may loue, but in ſeuerall degrees; what is ſimply good, abſolutely; what is good by circumſtance, only with limitation. There be theſe three things that I may loue without exception, God, my neighbour, my ſoule; yet ſo as each haue their due place: My body, goods, fame, &c. as ſeruants to the former. All other things I will either not care for, or hate.

26

One would not thinke, that pride and baſe-mindedneſſe ſhould ſo well agree; yea, that they loue ſo together, that they neuer goe aſunder. That enuy euer proceeds from a baſe minde, is granted of all: Now the proud man, as he faine would be enuied of others, ſo he enuieth all men. His betters he enuies, becauſe he is not ſo good as they: he enuies his inferiours, becauſe he feares they ſhould proue as good as he: his equals, becauſe they are as good as he. So vnder big lookes, he beares a baſe minde, reſembling ſome Cardinals Mule, which to make vp the traine, beares a coſtly Port-mantle ſtuffed with traſh. On the contrary, who is more proud than the baſeſt? (the Cynicke tramples on Platoes pride, but with a worſe) eſpecially if he be but a little exalted; wherein we ſee baſe men ſo much more haughty, as they haue had leſſe before what they might be proud of. It is iuſt with God, as the proud man is baſe in himſelfe, ſo to make him baſely eſteemed in the eyes of others; and at laſt to make him baſe without pride, I will contemne a proud man, becauſe he is baſe, and pity him becauſe he is proud.

27

Let me but haue time to my thoughts; but leiſure to thinke of Heauen, and grace to my leiſure; and I can be happy in ſpight of the world. Nothing, but God that giues it, can bereaue me of grace; and he will not; for his gifts are without repentance. Nothing but death can abridge me of time; and when I begin to want time to thinke of heauen, I ſhall haue eternall leiſure to enioy it. I ſhall be both waies happy, not from any vertue of apprehenſion in me, (which haue no peere in vnworthineſſe) but from the glory of that I apprehend; wherein the act and obiect are from the author of happineſſe. He giues me this glory; let me giue him the glory of his gift. His glory is my happineſſe; let my glory be his.

28

God beſtowes fauours vpon ſome in anger, as he ſtrikes otherſome in loue: (The Iſraelites had better haue wanted their Quailes, than to haue eaten them with ſuch ſawce.) And ſometimes at our inſtancie remouing a leſſer puniſhment, leaues a greater, though inſenſible, in the roome of it. I will not ſo much ſtriue againſt affliction, as diſpleaſure. Let me rather be afflicted in loue, than proſper without it.

29

It is ſtrange that we men hauing ſo continuall vſe of God, and being ſo perpetually beholding to him, ſhould be ſo ſtrange to him, and ſo little acquainted with him: ſince we account it a peruerſe nature in any man, that being prouoked with many kinde offices, refuſes the familiarity of a worthy friend, which doth ſtill ſeeke it, and hath deſerued it. Whence it comes, that we are ſo loth to thinke of our diſſolution and going to God: for naturally where we are not acquainted, we liſt not to hazard our welcome; chuſing rather to ſpend our money at a ſimple Inne, than to turne in for a free lodging to an vnknowne Oaſt, whom we haue only heard of, neuer had friendſhip with; whereas to an entire friend, whoſe nature and welcome we know, and whom we haue elſewhere familiarly conuerſed withall, we goe as boldly and willingly as to our home, knowing that no houre can be vnſeaſonable to ſuch a one: whiles on the other ſide we ſcrape acquaintance with the world, that neuer did vs good, euen after many repulſes. I will not liue with God, and in God, without his acquaintance, knowing it my happineſſe to haue ſuch a friend. I will not let one day paſſe without ſome act of renewing my familiarity with him: not giuing ouer till I haue giuen him ſome teſtimony of my loue to him, and ioy in him; and till he hath left behinde him ſome pledge of his continued fauour to me.

30

Men, for the moſt part, would neither die nor be old. When we ſee an aged man that hath ouer-liued all the teeth of his gummes, the haire of his head,the ſight of his eyes, the taſte of his palate; we profeſſe, we would not liue till ſuch a comberſome age wherein we proue burdens to our deareſt friends,and our ſelues: yet if it be put to our choice what yeere we would die,we euer ſhift it off till the next; and want not excuſes for this prorogation, rather than faile, alleaging, we would liue to amend; when yet we doe but adde more to the heape of our ſinnes by continuance.Nature hath nothing to plead for this folly,but that life is ſweet: wherein we giue occaſion of renewing that ancient checke, or one not vnlike to it, whereby that primitiue viſion taxed the timorouſneſſe of the ſhrinking Confeſſors; Yee would neither liue to be old, nor die ere your age: what ſhould I doe with you? The Chriſtian muſt not thinke it enough to endure the thought of death with patience, when it is obtruded vpon him by neceſſitie; but muſt voluntarily call it into his minde with ioy; not only abiding it ſhould come,but wiſhing that it might come. I will not leaue till I can reſolue, if I might die to day, not to liue till to morrow.

31

As a true friend is the ſweeteſt contentment in the world: ſo in his qualities he well reſembleth hony, the ſweeteſt of all liquors. Nothing is more ſweet to the taſte, nothing more ſharpe and cleanſing, when it meets with an exulcerate ſore. For my ſelfe, I know I muſt haue faults; and therefore I care not for that friend, that I ſhall neuer ſmart by. For my friends, I know they cannot be faultleſſe; and therefore as they ſhall finde me ſweet in their praiſes and encouragements, ſo ſharpe alſo in their cenſure. Either let them abide me no friend to their faults, or no friend to themſelues.

32

In all other things we are lead by profit; but in the maine matter of all,we ſhew our ſelues vtterly vnthriftie; and whiles we are wiſe in making good markets in theſe baſe commodities, we ſhew our ſelues fooliſh in the great match of our ſoules. God and the world come both to one ſhop, and make proffers for our ſoules. The world, like a franke Chapman, ſayes, All theſe will I giue thee, ſhewing vs his bagges, and promotions, and thruſting them into our hands. God offers a crowne of glory, which yet he tells vs we muſt giue him day to performe, and haue nothing in preſent, but our hope and ſome ſmall earneſt of the bargaine. Though we know there is no compariſon betwixt theſe two in value, finding theſe earthly things vaine and vnable to giue any contentment, and thoſe other of inualuable worth and benefit: yet wee had rather take theſe in hand, than truſt God on his word for the future; while yet in the ſame kinde we chuſe rather to take ſome rich Lordſhips in reuerſion,after the long expectation of three liues expired,than a preſent ſumme much vnder foot: As contrarily,when God and the world are ſellers,and we come to the Mart,the world offers fine painted wares, but will not part with them vnder the price of our torment: God proclaimes; Come yee that want, buy for nought. Now we thrifty men, that trie all ſhops for the cheapeſt peniworth,refuſe God, proffering his precious commodities for nothing; and pay an hard price for that which is worſe than nothing,painfull.Surely,we are wiſe for any thing but our ſoules: and not ſo wiſe for the body, as fooliſh for them. O Lord, thy payment is ſure, and who knowes how preſent? Take the ſoule that thou haſt both made and bought: and let me rather giue my life for thy fauour, than take the offers of the world for nothing.

33

There was neuer age that more bragged of knowledge, and yet neuer any that had leſſe ſoundneſſe. He that knowes not God, knoweth nothing; and he that loues not God, knowes him not: for he is ſo ſweet, and infinitely full of delight, that who-euer knowes him, cannot chuſe but affect him. The little loue of God then argues the great ignorance euen of thoſe that profeſſe knowledge. I will not ſuffer my affections to run before my knowledge: for then I ſhall loue faſhionably only, becauſe I heare God is worthy of loue; and ſo be ſubiect to relapſes: but I will euer lay knowledge as the ground of my loue. So, as I grow in diuine knowledge, I ſhall ſtill profit in an heauenly zeale.

Hall, J. 12637c

34

Thoſe that trauell in long pilgrimages to the holy Land, what a number of weary paſes they meaſure? what a number of hard lodgings and knowne dangers they paſſe? and at laſt when they are come within view of their iourneyes end, what a large tribute pay they at the Piſan Caſtle to the Turkes? And when they are come thither, what ſee they but the bare Sepulcher wherein their Sauiour lay? and the earth that he trode vpon, to the increaſe of a carnall deuotion? What labour ſhould I willingly vndertake in my iourney to the true Land of promiſe, the celeſtiall Ieruſalem, where I ſhall ſee and enioy my Sauiour himſelfe? What tribute of paine or death ſhould I refuſe to pay for my entrance, not into his Sepulcher, but his Palace of glory? and that not to looke vpon, but to poſſeſſe it?

35

Thoſe that are all in exhortation, no whit in doctrine, are like to them that ſnuffe the candle, but powre not in oile. Againe, thoſe that are all in doctrine, nothing in exhortation, drowne the wike in oile, but light it not; making it fit for vſe, if it had fire put to it; but as it is, rather capable of good, than profitable in preſent. Doctrine, without exhortation, makes men all braine, no heart. Exhortation, without doctrine, makes the heart full, leaues the braine emptie. Both together make a man: One makes a man wiſe; the other good. One ſerues that we may know our dutie; the other, that we may performe it. I will labour in both: but I know not in whether more. Men cannot practiſe vnleſſe they know; and they know in vaine, if they practiſe not.

36

There be two things in euery good worke; honour and profit. The latter God beſtowes vpon vs, the former he keepes to himſelfe. The profit of our workes redoundeth not to God. My well-doing extendeth not to thee. The honour of our worke may not be allowed vs. My glory I will not giue to another. I will not abridge God of his part, that he may not bereaue me of mine.

37

The proud man hath no God; the enuious man hath no neighbour; the angry man hath not himſelfe. What can that man haue that wants himſelfe? What is a man better, if he haue himſelfe, and want all others? What is he the neerer, if he haue himſelfe, and others, and yet want God? What good is it then to be a man, if he be either wrathfull, proud, or enuious?

38

Man that was once the ſoueraigne Lord of all creatures, whom they ſeruiceably attended at all times, is now ſent to the very baſeſt of all creatures to learne good qualities, Goe to the Piſmire, &c. and ſee, the moſt contemptible creatures prefer'd before him: The Aſſe knoweth his owner; wherein we, like the miſerable heire of ſome great Peere, whoſe houſe is decayed through the treaſon of our progenitors, heare and ſee what Honours and Lord-ſhips we ſhould haue had; but now finde our ſelues below many of the vulgar: we haue not ſo much cauſe of exaltation, that we are men, and not beaſts; as we haue of humiliation, in thinking how much we were once better than we are, and that now in many duties we are men inferiour to beaſts: ſo as thoſe whom we contemne, if they had our reaſon, might more iuſtly contemne vs; and as they are, may teach vs by their examples, and doe condemne vs by their practice.

39

The idle man is the Deuils cuſhion, on which he taketh his free eaſe: who as he is vncapable of any good, ſo he is fitly diſpoſed for all euill motions. The ſtanding water ſoone ſtinketh; whereas the current euer keepes cleere and cleanly: conueying downe all noiſome matter that might infect it, by the force of his ſtreame. If I doe but little good to others by my endeuours, yet this is great good to me, that by my labour I keepe my ſelfe from hurt.

40

There can be no neerer coniunction in nature, than is betwixt the body and the ſoule: yet theſe two are of ſo contrary diſpoſition, that as it falls out in an ill-matched man and wife, thoſe ſeruants which the one likes beſt, are moſt diſpraiſed of the other; ſo here, one ſtill takes part againſt the other in their choice: what benefits the one, is the hurt of the other. The glutting of the body pines the ſoule; and the ſoule thriues beſt when the body is pinched. Who can wonder, that there is ſuch faction amongſt others, that ſees ſo much in his very ſelfe? True wiſdome is to take, not with the ſtronger, as the faſhion of the world is, but with the better: following herein, not vſurped power, but iuſtice. It is not hard to diſcerne, whoſe the right is; whether the ſeruant ſhould rule or the miſtreſſe. I will labour to make and keepe the peace, by giuing each part his owne indifferently: but if more be affected with an ambitious contention, I will rather beat Hagar out of doores, than ſhe ſhall ouer-rule her miſtreſſe.

41

I ſee Iron firſt heated red hot in the fire, and after beaten and hardened with cold water. Thus will I deale with an offending friend: firſt heat him with deſerued praiſe of his vertue, and then beat vpon him with reprehenſion: ſo good nurſes, when their children are fallen, firſt take them vp and ſpeake them faire, chide them afterwards: Gentle ſpeech is a good preparatiue for rigor. He ſhall ſee that I loue him, by my approbation; and that I loue not his faults by my reproofe. If he loue himſelfe, he will loue thoſe that miſlike his vices; & if he loue not himſelfe, it matters not whether he loue me.

42

The liker we are to God, which is the beſt and only good, the better and happier we muſt needs be. All ſinnes make vs vnlike him, as being contrary to his perfect holines; but ſome ſhew more direct contrarietie: ſuch is enuy. For whereas God bringeth good out of euill; the enuious man fetcheth euill out of good; wherein alſo his ſinne proues a kinde of puniſhment: for whereas to good men euen euill things worke together to their good, contrarily, to the enuious, good things worke together to their euill. The euill, in any man, though neuer ſo proſperous, I will not enuy, but pitty: The good graces I will not repine at, but holily emulate; reioycing that they are ſo good, but grieuing that I am no better.

43

The couetous man is like a Spider, as in this that he doth nothing but lay his nets to catch euery Flie, gaping only for a booty of gaine; ſo yet more, in that whiles hee makes nets for theſe Flies, he conſumeth his owne bowels: ſo that which is his life is his death. If there be any creature miſerable, it is he; and yet hee is leaſt to be pitied, becauſe he makes himſelfe miſerable; ſuch as he is I will account him; and will therefore ſweepe downe his webs and hate his poyſon.

44

In heauen there is all life, and no dying: in hell is all death, and no life. In earth there is both liuing and dying; which, as it is betwixt both, ſo it prepares for both. So that he which here below dies to ſinne, doth after liue in heauen; and contrarily, hee that liues in ſinne vpon earth, dies in hell afterwards. What if I haue no part of ioy here below, but ſtill ſucceſſion of afflictions? The wicked haue no part in Heauen, and yet they

they enioy the earth with pleaſure: I would not change portions with them. I reioyce, that ſeeing I cannot haue both, yet I haue the better. O Lord, let me paſſe both my deaths here vpon earth. I care not how I liue or die, ſo I may haue nothing but life to looke for in another world.

45

The conceit of propriety hardens a man againſt many inconueniences, and addeth much to our pleaſure. The mother abides many vnquiet nights, many painfull throes, and vnpleaſant ſauours of her childe, vpon this thought, It is my owne. The indulgent father magnifies that in his owne ſonne, which he would ſcarce like in a ſtranger. The want of this to God-ward, makes vs ſo ſubiect to diſcontentment, and cooleth our delight in him, becauſe we thinke of him aloofe, as one in whom we are not intereſſed. If we could thinke, It is my God that cheereth me with his preſence, and bleſſings, while I proſper; that afflicteth me in loue, when I am deiected; my Sauiour is at Gods right hand; my Angels ſtand in his preſence, it could not bee but Gods fauour would bee ſweeter, his chaſtiſements more eaſie, his benefits more effectuall. I am not mine owne, while God is not mine: and while he is mine, ſince I doe poſſeſſe him, I will enioy him.

46

Nature is of her owne inclination froward, importunately longing after that which is denied her; and ſcornfull of what ſhe may haue. If it were appointed that we ſhould liue alwaies vpon earth, how extremely would we exclaime of wearineſſe, and wiſh rather that we were not? Now it is appointed we ſhall liue here but a while, and then giue roome to our ſucceſſors, each one affects a kinde of eternity vpon earth. I will labour to tame this peeuiſh and ſullen humour of nature, and will like that beſt that muſt be.

47

All true earthly pleaſure forſooke man, when he forſooke his Creator; what honeſt and holy delight he tooke before in the dutifull ſeruices of the obſequious creatures; in the contemplation of that admirable variety, and ſtrangeneſſe of their properties; in ſeeing their ſweet accordance with each other, and all with himſelfe? Now moſt of our pleaſure is, to ſet one creature together by the eares with another, ſporting our ſelues onely with that deformity, which was bred through our owne fault: yea, there haue beene, that haue delighted to ſee one man ſpill anothers bloud vpon the ſand, and haue ſhouted for ioy at the ſight of that ſlaughter, which hath fallen out vpon no other quarrell, but the pleaſure of the beholders: I doubt not but as wee ſolace our ſelues in the diſcord of the inferiour creatures, ſo the euill ſpirits ſport themſelues in our diſſentions. There are better qualities of the creature, which we paſſe ouer without pleaſure. In recreations, I will chuſe thoſe which are of beſt example, and beſt vſe; ſeeking thoſe by which I may not onely be the merrier, but the better.

48

There is no want for which a man may not finde a remedy in himſelfe. Doe I want riches? He that deſires but little, cannot want much. Doe I want friends? If I loue God enough, and my ſelfe but enough, it matters not. Doe I want health? If I want it but a little, and recouer, I ſhall eſteeme it the more, becauſe I wanted. If I be long ſicke, and vnrecouerably, I ſhall be the fitter and willinger to die; and my paine is ſo much leſſe ſharpe, by how much more it lingreth. Doe I want maintenance? A little, and courſe, will content nature. Let my minde be no more ambitious, than my backe and belly, I can hardly complaine of too little. Doe I want ſleepe? I am going whither there is no vſe of ſleepe; where all reſt, and ſleepe not. Do I want children? Many that haue them, wiſh they wanted: It is better to be childleſſe, than croſſed with their miſcarriage. Doe I want learning? He hath none, that ſaith he hath enough. The next way to get more, is to finde thou wanteſt. There is remedy for all wants, in our ſelues, ſauing onely for want of grace: and that, a man cannot ſo much as ſee and complaine that he wants, but from aboue.

49

Euery vertuous action (like the Sunne eclipſed) hath a double ſhadow; according to the diuers aſpects of the beholders: one of glory, the other of enuy. Glory followes vpon good deſerts; Enuy vpon glory. He that is enuied, may thinke himſelfe well: for he that enuies him, thinkes him more than well: I know no vice in another, whereof a man may make ſo good and comfortable vſe to himſelfe. There would be no ſhadow, if there were no light.

50

In medling with the faults of friends, I haue obſerued many wrongfull courſes; what for feare, or ſelfe-loue, or indiſcretion. Some I haue ſeene, like vnmercifull and couetous Chirurgians, keepe the wound raw, (which they might haue ſeaſonably remedied) for their owne gaine. Others, that haue laid healing plaiſters to skin it aloft, when there hath beene more need of Corroſiues to eat out the dead fleſh within. Others, that haue galled and drawne, when there hath beene nothing but ſolid fleſh, that hath wanted only filling vp. Others that haue healed the ſore, but left an vnſightly ſcarre of diſcredit behinde them. He that would doe good this way, muſt haue Fidelitie, Courage, Diſcretion, Patience. Fidelitie, not to beare with; Courage, to reproue them; Diſcretion, to reproue them well; Patience, to abide the leiſure of amendment; making much of good beginnings, and putting vp many repulſes, bearing with many weakneſſes; ſtill hoping, ſtill ſolliciting; as knowing that thoſe who haue beene long vſed to fetters, cannot but halt awhile, when they are taken off.

51

God hath made all the World, and yet what a little part of it is his? Diuide the World into foure parts: but one, and the leaſt containeth all that is worthy the name of Chriſtendome: the reſt ouerwhelmed with Turciſme, and Paganiſme: and of this leaſt part, the greater halfe yet holding aright concerning God and their Sauiour in ſome common principles, ouerthrow the truth in their concluſions; and ſo leaue the leſſer part of the leaſt part for God. Yet lower: of thoſe that hold aright concerning Chriſt, how few are there, that doe otherwiſe than faſhionably profeſſe him? And of thoſe that do ſeriouſly profeſſe him, how few are there that in their liues deny him not, liuing vnworthy of ſo glorious a calling? Wherein I doe not pitty God, who will haue glory euen of thoſe that are not his: I pity miſerable men, that doe reiect their Creator and Redeemer, and themſelues in him. And I enuy Satan, that he ruleth ſo large. Since God hath ſo few, I will be more thankfull that he hath vouchſafed me one of his; and be the more zealous of glorifying him, becauſe we haue but a few fellowes.

52

As thoſe that haue taſted of ſome delicate diſh, finde other plaine diſhes but vnpleaſant; ſo it fareth with thoſe which haue once taſted of heauenly things, they cannot but contemne the beſt worldly pleaſures. As therefore ſome dainty gueſt knowing there is ſo pleaſant fare to come, I will reſerue my appetite for it, and not ſuffer my ſelfe cloied with the courſe diet of the world.

53

I finde many places where God hath vſed the hand of good Angels for the puniſhment of the wicked; but neuer could yet finde one, wherein he employed an euill Angell in any direct good to his children. Indirect I find many, if not all, through the power of him that brings light out of darkneſſe, and turnes their euill to our good: In this choice God would and muſt be imitated. From an euill ſpirit I dare not receiue ought,

if

12637c
Hall, J.

is neuer ſo good; I will receiue as little as I may from a wicked man. If he were as perfectly euill as the other, I durſt receiue nothing; I had rather hunger, than wilfully dip my hand in a wicked mans diſh.

54

Wee are ready to condemne others, for that which is as eminently faulty in our ſelues. If one blinde man ruſh vpon another in the way; either complaines of others blindneſſe, neither of his owne. I haue heard thoſe which haue had moſt corrupt lungs, complaine of the vnſauory breath of others. The reaſon is, becauſe the minde caſteth altogether outward, and reflecteth not into it ſelfe. Yet it is more ſhamefull to be either ignorant of, or fauourable to our owne imperfections. I will cenſure others vices fearefully, my owne confidently, becauſe I know them; and thoſe I know not, I will ſuſpect.

55

He is a very humble man, that thinkes not himſelfe better than ſome others; and he is very meane, whom ſome others doe not account better than themſelues: ſo that Veſſell that ſeemed very ſmall vpon the maine, ſeemes a tall ſhip vpon the Thames. As there are many better for eſtate than my ſelfe, ſo there are ſome worſe; and if I were yet worſe, yet would there be ſome lower: and if I were ſo low, that I accounted my ſelfe the worſt of all, yet ſome would account themſelues in worſe caſe. A mans opinion is in others, his being is in himſelfe. Let me know my ſelfe, let others gueſſe at me. Let others either enuy or pity me, I care not, ſo long as I enioy my ſelfe.

56

He can neuer wonder enough at Gods workmanſhip, that knowes not the frame of the world: for he can neuer elſe conceiue of the hugeneſſe, and ſtrange proportion of the creature. And he that knowes this, can neuer wonder more at any thing elſe. I will learne to know, that I may admire; and by that little I know, I will more wonder at that I know not.

57

There is nothing below but toyling, grieuing, wiſhing, hoping, fearing; and wearineſſe in all theſe. What fooles are we to be beſotted with the loue of our owne trouble, and to hate our liberty and reſt? The loue of miſery, is much worſe than miſery it ſelfe. We muſt firſt pray, that God would make vs wiſe, before we can wiſh he would make vs happy.

58

If a man referre all things to himſelfe, nothing ſeemes enough: If all things to God, any meaſure will content him of earthly things; but in grace he is inſatiable. Worldlings ſerue themſelues altogether in God, making Religion but to ſerue their turnes, as a colour of their ambition, and couetouſneſſe. The Chriſtian ſeekes God onely in ſeeking himſelfe, vſing all other things but as ſubordinately to him; not caring whether himſelfe win or loſe, ſo that God may win glory in both. I will not ſuffer mine eyes and minde to be bounded with theſe viſible things; but ſtill looke through theſe matters, at God which is the vtmoſt ſcope of them: accounting them onely as a thorowfare to paſſe by, not as an habitation to reſt in.

59

He is wealthy enough, that wanteth not. He is great enough, that is his owne maſter. Hee is happy enough, that liues to die well. Other things I will not care for; nor too much for theſe, ſaue only for the laſt, which alone can admit of no immoderation.

60

A man of extraordinary parts, makes himſelfe by ſtrange and ſingular behauiour, more admired; which if a man of but common faculty doe imitate, he makes himſelfe ridiculous: for that which is conſtrued as naturall to the one, is deſcried to be affected in the other. And there is nothing forced by affectation can be comely. I will euer ſtriue to goe in the common road: ſo while I am not notable, I ſhall not be notorious.

61

Gold is the beſt metall, and for the purity not ſubiect to ruſt, as all others; and yet the beſt Gold hath ſome droſſe. I eſteeme not that man that hath no faults; I like him well that hath but a few, and thoſe not great.

62

Many a man marres a good eſtate, for want of skill to proportion his carriage anſwerably to his ability. A little ſaile to a large veſſell, rids no way, though the wind be faire. A large ſaile to a little Barke drownes it. A top-ſaile to a ſhip of meane burthen in a rough weather, is dangerous. A low ſaile in an eaſie gale, yeelds little aduantage. This diſproportion cauſeth ſome to liue miſerably in a good eſtate: and ſome to make a good eſtate miſerable. I will firſt know what I may doe for ſafety, and then I will try what I can doe for ſpeed.

63

The rich man hath many friends; although in truth riches haue them, and not the man. As the Aſſe that carried the Ægyptian Goddeſſe, had many bowed knees, yet not to the beaſt, but to the burthen. For, ſeparate the riches from the perſon, and thou ſhalt ſee friendſhip leaue the man, and follow that which was euer her obiect: while he may command, and can either giue, or controll, he hath attendance, & proffer of loue at all hands; but which of theſe dares acknowledge him, when he is going to priſon for debt? Then theſe Waſpes, that made ſuch muſicke about this Gally-pot, ſhew plainly, that they came only for the honey that was in it. This is the miſery of the wealthy, that they cannot know their friends: whereas thoſe that loue the poore man, loue him for himſelfe. He that would chuſe a true friend, muſt ſearch out one that is neither couetous nor ambitious; for ſuch a one loues but himſelfe in thee. And if it be rare to finde any not infected with theſe qualities, the beſt is to entertaine all, and truſt few.

64

That which the French Prouerbe hath of ſickneſſes, is true of all euils: That they come on horſebacke, and goe away on foot. We haue oft ſeene a ſudden fall, or one meales ſurfet hath ſtucke by many to their graues; whereas pleaſures come like Oxen, ſlow and heauily, and goe away like Poſt-horſes, vpon the ſpur. Sorrowes, becauſe they are lingring gueſts, I will entertaine but moderately; knowing, that the more they are made of, the longer they will continue: and for pleaſures, becauſe they ſtay not, and doe but call to drinke at my doore; I will vſe them as paſſengers, with ſlight reſpect. He is his owne beſt friend, that makes leaſt of both of them.

65

It is indeed more commendable to giue good example, than to take it: yet imitation, how-euer in ciuill matters it be condemned of ſeruilitie, in Chriſtian practice hath his due praiſe; and though it be more naturall for beginners at their firſt imitation, that cannot ſwim without bladders; yet the beſt proficient ſhall ſee euer ſome higher ſteps of thoſe that haue gone to heauē before him, worthy of his tracing: wherin much caution muſt be had, that we follow good men, and in good: Good men, for if we propound imperfect patterns to our ſelues, we ſhall be conſtrained firſt to vnlearne thoſe ill habits we haue got by their imitation, before we can be capable of good: ſo beſides the loſſe of labour, we are further off from our end. In good; for that a man ſhould be ſo wedded to any mans perſon, that he can make no ſeparation from his infirmities, is both abſurdly ſeruile, and vnchriſtian. He therefore that would follow well, muſt know to diſtinguiſh well, betwixt good men, and euill; betwixt good men and better; betwixt good qualities and infirmities. Why hath God giuen me education not in a Deſart alone, but in the company of good and vertuous men, but that by the ſight of their good carriage, I ſhould better mine owne? Why ſhould we haue intereſt in the vices of men, and not in their vertues? And although precepts be ſurer, yet a good mans action is according to precept; yea, is a precept it ſelfe. The Pſalmiſt compares the Law of God to a Lanterne; good example beares it. It is ſafe following him that carries the light. If he walke without the light, he ſhall walke without me.

12637c

66

As there is one common end to all good men, ſaluation; and one Author of it, Chriſt: ſo there is but one way to it, doing well, and ſuffering euill. Doing well (me thinks) is like the Zodiacke in the Heauen, the high way of the Sunne, thorow which it daily paſſeth: Suffering euill, is like the Eclipticke line that goes thorow the middeſt of it. The rule of doing well, the Law of God, is vniforme and eternall; and the copies of ſuffering euill in all times agree with the originall. No man can either do well, or ſuffer ill without an example. Are we ſawne in peeces? ſo was Eſay. Are we beheaded? ſo Iohn Baptiſt. Crucified? ſo Peter. Throwne to wilde beaſts? ſo Daniel. Into the furnace? ſo the three children. Stoned? ſo Steuen. Baniſhed? ſo the beloued Diſciple. Burnt? ſo millions of Martyrs. Defamed and ſlandered? what good man euer was not? It were eaſie to be endleſſe both in torments and ſufferers: whereof each hath begun to other, all to vs. I may not hope to ſpeed better than the beſt Chriſtians; I cannot feare to fare worſe. It is no matter which way I goe ſo I come to Heauen.

67

There is nothing beſide life of this nature, that it is diminiſhed by addition. Euery moment we liue longer than other, and each moment that we liue longer, is ſo much taken out of our life. It increaſeth and diminiſheth onely by minutes, and therefore is not perceiued: the ſhorter ſteps it taketh, the more ſlily it paſſeth. Time ſhall not ſo ſteale vpon me, that I ſhall not diſcerne it, and catch it by the fore-locks; nor ſo ſteale from me, that it ſhall carry with it no witneſſe of his paſſage in my proficiency.

68

The prodigall man, while he ſpendeth, is magnified: when he is ſpent, is pittied: and that is all his recompence for his lauiſht Patrimonie. The couetous man is grudged while he liues, and his death is reioyced at: for when he ends, his riches beginne to be goods. He that wiſely keepes the meane betweene both, liueth well, and heares well; neither repined at by the needy; nor pittied by greater men. I would ſo manage theſe worldly commodities, as accounting them mine to diſpoſe, others to partake of.

69

A good name (if any earthly thing) is worth ſeeking, worth ſtriuing for; yet to affect a bare name, when we deſerue either ill or nothing, is but a proud hypocriſie: and to be puffed vp with the wrongfull eſtimation of others miſtaking our worth, is an idle and ridiculous pride. Thou art well ſpoken of vpon no deſert: what then? Thou haſt deceiued thy neighbours, they one another, and all of them haue deceiued thee: for thou madeſt them thinke of thee otherwiſe than thou art; and they haue made thee thinke of thy ſelfe as thou art accounted: the deceit came from thee, the ſhame will end in thee. I will account no wrong greater, than for a man to eſteeme and report me aboue that

I am:not reioycing in that I am wel thought of;but in that I am ſuch as I am eſteemed.

70

It was a ſpeech worthy the commendation, and frequent remembrance of ſo diuine a Biſhop as Auguſtine,which is reported of an aged Father in his time; who when his friends comforted him on his ſicke bed, and told him, they hoped he ſhould recouer, anſwered: If I ſhall not die at all,well; but if euer,why not now? Surely it is folly,what we muſt doe, to doe vnwillingly. I will neuer thinke my ſoule in a good caſe, ſo long as I am loth to thinke of dying; and will make this my comfort: Not, I ſhall yet liue longer, but, I ſhall yet doe more good.

71

Exceſſes are neuer alone. Commonly thoſe that haue excellent parts,haue ſome extremely vicious qualities: great wits haue great errours; and great eſtates haue great cares: whereas mediocrity of gifts or of eſtate hath vſually but eaſie inconueniences: elſe the excellent would not know themſelues, and the meane would be too much deiected. Now thoſe whom we admire for their faculties, we pitie for their infirmities; and thoſe which finde themſelues but of the ordinary pitch, ioy that as their vertues, ſo their vices are not eminent. So the higheſt haue a blemiſhed glory, and the meane are contentedly ſecure. I will magnifie the higheſt, but affect the meane.

72

The body is the caſe,or ſheath of the minde: yet as naturally it hideth it; ſo it doth alſo many times diſcouer it. For although the forehead, eyes, and frame of the countenance doe ſometime belie the diſpoſition of the heart;yet moſt commonly they giue true generall verdicts. An angry mans browes are bent together, and his eyes ſparkle with rage, which when he is well pleaſed, looke ſmooth and cheerefully. Enuy hath one looke; deſire another; ſorrow yet another; contentment, a fourth, different from all the reſt. To ſhew no paſſion,is too Stoicall; to ſhew all,is impotent; to ſhew other than we feele, hypocriticall. The face and geſture doe but write, and make commentaries vpon the heart. I will firſt endeuour ſo to frame and order that, as not to entertaine any paſſion, but what I need not care to haue laid open to the world: and therefore will firſt ſee that the Text be good; then that the gloſſe be true; and laſtly, that it be ſparing. To what end hath God ſo walled-in the heart, if I ſhould let euery mans eyes into it by my countenance?

73

There is no publike action which the world is not readie to ſcan; there is no action ſo priuate, which the euill ſpirits are not witneſſes of; I will endeuour ſo to liue, as knowing that I am euer in the eyes of mine enemies.

74

When we our ſelues,and all other vices are old,then couetouſneſſe alone is young, and at his beſt age.This vice loues to dwell in an old ruinous cottage: yet that age can haue no ſuch honeſt colour for niggardlineſſe and inſatiable deſire. A young man might plead the vncertainty of his eſtate,and doubt of his future need: but an old man ſees his ſet period before him. Since this humour is ſo neceſſarily annexed to this age, I will turne it the right way, and nouriſh it in my ſelfe. The older I grow,the more couetous I will be; but of the riches,not of the world I am leauing,but of the world I am entring into. It is good coueting what I may haue, and cannot leaue behinde me.

75

There is a mutuall hatred betwixt a Chriſtian, and the world: for on the one ſide, the loue of the world is enmity with God;and Gods children cannot but take their Fathers

12637c
Hall, J.

thers part. On the other, The world hates you, becauſe it hated me firſt. But the hatred of the good man to the wicked is not ſo extreme, as that wherewith he is hated. For the Chriſtian hates euer with commiſeration and loue of that good he ſees in the worſt; knowing that the eſſence of the very Deuils is good, and that the lewdeſt man hath ſome excellent parts of nature, or common graces of the Spirit of God, which he warily ſingleth out in his affection. But the wicked man hates him for goodneſſe, and therefore findes nothing in himſelfe to moderate his deteſtation. There can be no better muſick in mine eare than the diſcord of the wicked. If he like me, I am afraid he ſpies ſome quality in me, like to his owne. If he ſaw nothing but goodneſſe, he could not loue me, and be bad himſelfe. It was a iuſt doubt of Phocion, who when the people praiſed him, asked, What euill haue I done? I will ſtriue to deſerue euill of none: but not deſeruing ill, it ſhall not grieue me to heare ill of thoſe that are euill. I know no greater argument of goodneſſe, than the hatred of a wicked man.

76

A man that comes hungry to his meale, feeds heartily on the meat ſet before him, not regarding the metall, or forme of the platter, wherein it is ſerued; who afterwards when his ſtomacke is ſatisfied, begins to play with the diſh, or to reade ſentences on his trencher. Thoſe auditors which can finde nothing to doe, but note elegant words and phraſes, or rhetoricall colours, or perhaps an ill grace of geſture in a pithie and materiall ſpeech, argue themſelues full ere they came to the feaſt: and therefore goe away with a little pleaſure, no profit. In hearing others, my only intention ſhall be to feed my minde with ſolid matter: if my eare can get ought by the way, I will not grudge it, but I will not intend it.

77

The ioy of a Chriſtian in theſe worldly things is limited, and euer awed with feare of exceſſe, but recompenced abundantly with his ſpirituall mirth: whereas the worldling giues the reines to his minde, and powres himſelfe out into pleaſure, fearing only that he ſhall not ioy enough. He that is but halfe a Chriſtian, liues but miſerably; for he neither enioyeth God, nor the world. Not God, becauſe he hath not grace enough to make him his owne: not the world, becauſe he hath ſome taſte of grace, enough to ſhew him the vanity and ſinne of his pleaſures. So the ſound Chriſtian hath his heauen aboue, the worldling here below, the vnſetled Chriſtian no where.

78

Good deeds are very fruitfull; and not ſo much of their nature, as of Gods bleſſing, multipliable. We thinke ten in the hundred extreme and biting vſury; God giues vs more than an hundred for ten; yea, aboue the increaſe of the gaine which we commend moſt for multiplication. For out of one good action of ours, God produceth a thouſand; the harueſt whereof is perpetuall: Euen the faithfull actions of the old Patriarkes, the conſtant ſufferings of ancient Martyrs liue ſtill, and doe good to all ſucceſſions of ages by their example. For publike actions of vertue, beſides that they are preſently comfortable to the doer, are alſo exemplary to others: and as they are more beneficiall to others, ſo are more crowned in vs. If good deeds were vtterly barren and incommodious, I would ſeeke after them for the conſcience of their owne goodneſſe: how much more ſhall I now be incouraged to performe them, for that they are ſo profitable both to my ſelfe, and to others, and to me in others? My principall care ſhall be, that while my ſoule liues in glory in heauen, my good actions may liue vpon earth; and that they may be put into the banke and multiply, while my body lies in the graue and conſumeth.

79

A Chriſtian for the ſweet fruit he beares to God and men, is compared to the nobleſt of all plants, the Vine. Now as the moſt generous Vine, if it be not pruned, runs out into many ſuperfluous ſtemmes, and growes at laſt weake and fruitleſſe: ſo doth the beſt man, if he be cut ſhort of his deſires, and pruned with afflictions. If it be painfull to bleed, it is worſe to wither. Let me be pruned that I may grow, rather than cut vp to burne.

80

Those, that doe but ſuperficially taſte of diuine knowledge, finde little ſweetneſſe in it; and are ready for the vnpleaſant relliſh to abhorre it: whereas if they would diue deepe into the Sea, they ſhould finde freſh water neere to the bottome. That it ſauours not well at the firſt, is the fault not of it, but of the diſtempered palate that taſtes it. Good metalls and mineralls are not found cloſe vnder the skinne of the earth, but below in the bowels of it: No good Miner caſts away his Mattocke, becauſe he findes a veine of tough clay, or a ſhelfe of ſtone; but ſtill delueth lower, and paſſing thorow many changes of ſoile, at laſt comes to his rich treaſure. We are too ſoone diſcouraged in our ſpirituall gaines. I will ſtill perſeuere to ſeeke, hardning my ſelfe againſt all difficulty. There is comfort euen in ſeeking, hope; and there is ioy in hoping, good ſucceſſe: and in that ſucceſſe, is happineſſe.

81

He that hath any experience in ſpirituall matters, knowes that Satan is euer more violent at the laſt; then raging moſt furiouſly, when he knowes he ſhall rage but a while. Hence of the perſecutions of the firſt Church, the tenth and laſt vnder Diocleſian and Maximinian, and thoſe other fiue Tyrants, was the bloudieſt. Hence this age is the moſt diſſolute, becauſe neereſt the concluſion. And as this is his courſe in the vniuerſall aſſaults of the whole Church: ſo it is the ſame in his conflicts with euery Chriſtian ſoule. Like a ſubtill Orator he reſerues his ſtrongeſt force till the ſhutting vp: And therefore miſerable is the folly of thoſe men who defer their repentance till then, when their onſet ſhall be moſt ſharpe, and they through paine of body, and perplexedneſſe of minde, ſhall be leaſt able to reſiſt. Thoſe that haue long furniſht themſelues with ſpirituall munition, finde worke enough in this extreme brunt of temptation: how then ſhould the careleſſe man, that with the helpe of all opportunities could not finde grace to repent, hope to atchieue it at the laſt gaſpe, againſt greater force, with leſſe meanes, more diſtraction, no leiſure? Wiſe Princes vſe to prepare ten yeeres before for a field of one day: I will euery day lay vp ſomewhat for my laſt. If I win that skirmiſh, I haue enough. The firſt and ſecond blow begin the battell, but the laſt only wins it.

82

I obſerue three ſeaſons wherein a wiſe man differs not from a foole; in his infancy, in ſleepe, and in ſilence: for in the two former we are all fooles; and in ſilence all are wiſe. In the two former yet, there may be concealement of folly; but the tongue is a blab: there cannot be any kinde of folly, either ſimple, or wicked, in the heart, but the tongue will bewray it. He cannot be wiſe that ſpeakes much, or without ſenſe, or out of ſeaſon; nor he knowne for a foole that ſayes nothing. It is a great miſery to be a foole: but this is yet greater, that a man cannot be a foole but he muſt ſhew it. It were well for ſuch a one, if he could be taught to keepe cloſe his fooliſhneſſe: but then there ſhould be no fooles. I haue heard ſome (which haue ſcorned the opinion of folly in themſelues) for a ſpeech wherein they haue hoped to ſhew moſt wit, cenſured of folly, by him that hath thought himſelfe wiſer: and another, hearing his ſentence againe, hath condemned him for want of wit in cenſuring. Surely he is not a foole that hath vnwiſe thoughts, but he that vtters them. Euen concealed folly is wiſdome: and ſometimes wiſdome vttered, is folly. While others care how to ſpeake, my care ſhall be how to hold my peace.

83

A worke is then only good and acceptable, when the action, meaning, and manner

Hall, J. 12637c

are all good: For to doe good with an ill meaning, (as Iudas ſaluted Chriſt to betray him) is ſo much more ſinfull, by how much the action is better; which being good in the kinde, is abuſed to an ill purpoſe: To doe ill, in a good meaning, (as Vzza in ſtaying the Arke) is ſo much amiſſe, that the good intention cannot beare out the vnlawfull act: which although it may ſeeme ſome excuſe, why it ſhould not be ſo ill, yet is no warrant to iuſtifie it. To meane well and doe a good action, in an ill manner, (as the Phariſee made a good prayer, but arrogantly) is ſo offenſiue, that the euill manner depraueth both the other. So a thing may be euill vpon one circumſtance, it cannot be good but vpon all. In what euer buſineſſe I goe about, I will enquire, What I doe for the ſubſtance, How for the manner, Why for the intention: For the two firſt, I will conſult with God; for the laſt, with my owne heart.

84

I can doe nothing without a million of VVitneſſes: The conſcience is as a thouſand witneſſes; and God is as a thouſand conſciences: I will therefore ſo deale with men, as knowing that God ſees me; and ſo with God, as if the world ſaw me; ſo with my ſelfe, and both of them, as knowing that my conſcience ſeeth me: and ſo with them all, as knowing I am alwaies ouer-looked by my accuſer, by my Iudge.

85

Earthly inheritances are diuided oft-times with much inequality. The priuilege of primogeniture ſtretcheth larger in many places now, than it did among the ancient Iewes. The younger many times ſerues the elder; and while the eldeſt aboundeth, all the latter iſſue is pinched. In heauen it is not ſo: all the ſonnes of God are heires, none vnderlings; and not heires vnder wardſhip, and hope; but inheritors; and not inheritors of any little pittance of land, but of a Kingdome; nor of an earthly Kingdome, ſubiect to danger of loſſe, or alteration, but one glorious and euerlaſting. It ſhall content me here, that hauing right to all things, yet I haue poſſeſſion of nothing but ſorrow. Since I ſhall haue poſſeſſion aboue, of all that, whereto I haue right below, I will ſerue willingly, that I may reigne; ſerue for a while, that I may reigne for euer.

86

Euen the beſt things ill vſed, become euills; and contrarily, the worſt things vſed well, proue good. A good tongue, vſed to deceit; a good wit, vſed to defend errour; a ſtrong arme, to murther; authority, to oppreſſe; a good profeſſion, to diſſemble; are all euill; yea Gods owne Word is the ſword of the Spirit; which if it kill not our vices, kills our ſoules. Contrariwiſe (as poiſons are vſed to wholeſome medicine) afflictions and ſinnes, by a good vſe proue ſo gainfull, as nothing more. Words are as they are taken: and things are as they are vſed. There are euen curſed bleſſings: O Lord, rather giue me no fauours, than not grace to vſe them. If I want them, thou requireſt not what thou doeſt not giue: but if I haue them, and want their vſe, thy mercy proues my iudgement.

87

Man is the beſt of all theſe inferiour creatures; yet liues in more ſorrow and diſcontentment, than the worſt of them: whiles that Reaſon wherein he excels them, and by which he might make aduantage of his life, he abuſes to a ſuſpitious diſtruſt. How many haſt thou found of the fowles of the aire, lying dead in the way for want of prouiſion? They eat, and reſt, and ſing, and want nothing. Man, which hath farre better meanes to liue comfortably, toileth, and careth, and wanteth; whom yet his reaſon alone might teach, that he which careth for theſe lower creatures made only for man, will much more prouide for man, to whoſe vſe they were made. There is an holy careleſneſſe; free from idleneſſe; free from diſtruſt. In theſe earthly things, I will ſo depend on my Maker, that my truſt in him may not exclude all my labour; and yet ſo labour (vpon my confidence on him) as my endeuour may be void of perplexity.

88

The precepts, and practice of thoſe with whom we liue, auaile much on either part. For a man not to be ill, where he hath no prouocations to euill, is leſſe commendable; but for a man to liue continently in Aſia (as he ſaid) where he ſees nothing but allurements to vncleanneſſe: for Lot to be a good man in the middeſt of Sodom, to be abſtemious in Germany, and in Italy chaſte, this is truly praiſe-worthy. To ſequeſter our ſelues from the company of the world, that we may depart from their vices, proceeds from a baſe and diſtruſting minde: as if we would ſo force goodneſſe vpon our ſelues, that therefore only we would be good, becauſe we cannot be ill. But for a man ſo to be perſonally, and locally in the throng of the world, as to withdraw his affections from it, to vſe it, and yet to contemne it at once, to compell it to his ſeruice without any infection, becomes well the noble courage of a Chriſtian. The world ſhall be mine, I will not be his; and yet ſo mine, that his euill ſhall be ſtill his owne.

89

He that liues in God, cannot be weary of his life, becauſe he euer findes both ſomewhat to doe, and ſomewhat to ſolace himſelſe with; cannot be ouer-loth to part with it, becauſe he ſhall enter into a nearer life and ſociety with that God in whom he delighteth. Whereas he that liues without him, liues many times vncomfortably here, becauſe partly he knowes not any cauſe of ioy in himſelfe; and partly he findes not any worthy emploiment to while himſelfe withall; dies miſerably, becauſe he either knowes not whither he goes, or knowes he goes to torment. There is no true life, but the life of faith. O Lord, let me liue out of the world with thee (if thou wilt) but let me not liue in the world without thee.

90

Sinne is both euill in it ſelfe, and the effect of a former euill, and the cauſe of ſinne following; a cauſe of puniſhment, and laſtly a puniſhment it ſelfe. It is a damnable iniquity in man, to multiply one ſinne vpon another; but to puniſh one ſinne by another, in God is a iudgement both moſt iuſt, and moſt fearefull; ſo as all the ſtore-houſe of God hath not a greater vengeance: with other puniſhments the body ſmarteth, the ſoule with this. I care not how God offends me with puniſhments, ſo he puniſh me not with offending him.

91

I haue ſeene ſome afflict their bodies with wilfull famine, and ſcourges of their owne making; God ſpares me that labour; for he whips me daily with the ſcourge of a weake body; and ſometimes with ill tongues. He holds me ſhort many times of the feeling of his comfortable preſence, which is in truth ſo much more miſerable an hunger than that of the body, by how much the ſoule is more tender, and the food denied, more excellent. He is my Father; infinitely wiſe, to proportion out my correction according to my eſtate; and infinitely louing, in fitting me with a due meaſure. He is a preſumptuous childe, that will make choice of his owne rod. Let me learne to make aright vſe of his corrections, and I ſhall not need to correct my ſelfe. And if it ſhould pleaſe God to remit his hand a litle; I will gouerne my body, as a Maſter, not as a Tyrant.

92

If God had not ſaid, Bleſſed are thoſe that hunger, I know not what could keepe weake Chriſtians from ſinking in deſpaire; Many times all I can doe, is to finde and complaine that I want him, and wiſh to recouer him. Now this is my ſtay, that he in mercy eſteemes vs not only by hauing, but by deſiring alſo; and therefore accounts vs to haue that which we want, and deſire to haue: and my ſoule aſſuming, tels me I doe vn-fainedly wiſh him, and long after that grace I miſſe. Let me deſire ſtill more, and I know I ſhall not deſire alwaies. There was neuer ſoule miſcarried with longing after grace. O bleſſed hunger, that ends alwaies in fulneſſe! I am ſorry that I can but hunger; and yet I would not be full; for the bleſſing is promiſed to the hungry: Giue me more, Lord, but ſo as I may hunger more. Let me hunger more, and I know I ſhall be ſatisfied.

Hall, J.
12637c

93

There is more in the Chriſtian than thou ſeeſt. For he is both an entire body of himſelfe, and he is a limbe of another more excellent; euen that glorious myſticall body of his Sauiour; to whom he is ſo vnited, that the actions of either are reciprocally referred to each other. For, on the one ſide, the Chriſtian liues in Chriſt, dies in Chriſt, in Chriſt fulfils the Law, poſſeſſeth heauen: on the other, Chriſt is perſecuted by Paul in his members, and is perſecuted in Paul afterwards by others: he ſuffers in vs, he liues in vs, he workes in and by vs: ſo thou canſt not doe either good or harme to a Chriſtian, but thou doeſt it to his Redeemer, to whom he is inuiſibly vnited. Thou ſeeſt him as a man, and therefore worthy of fauour for humanities ſake: Thou ſeeſt him not as a Chriſtian, worthy of honour for his ſecret and yet true vnion with our Sauiour. I will loue euery Chriſtian, for that I ſee; honour him, for that I ſhall ſee.

94

Hell it ſelfe is ſcarce a more obſcure dungeon, in compariſon of the earth, than earth is in reſpect of heauen. Here, the moſt ſee nothing, and the beſt ſee little: Here, halfe our life is night; and our very day is darkneſſe, in reſpect of God. The true light of the world, and the Father of lights dwelleth aboue: There is the light of knowledge to informe vs, and the light of ioy to comfort vs; without all change of darkneſſe. There was neuer any captiue loued his dungeon, and complained when he muſt be brought out to light and liberty: whence then is this naturall madneſſe in vs men, that we delight ſo much in this vncleane, noyſome, darke, and comfortleſſe priſon of earth? and thinke not of our releaſe to that lightſome and glorious Paradiſe aboue vs, without griefe and repining? We are ſure that we are not perfectly well here; if we could be as ſure that we ſhould be better aboue, we would not feare changing. Certainly our ſenſe tells vs, we haue ſome pleaſure here; and we haue not faith to aſſure vs of more pleaſure aboue; and hence we ſettle our ſelues to the preſent, with neglect of the future, though infinitely more excellent: The heart followes the eyes; and vnknowne good is vncared for. O Lord, doe thou breake thorow this darkneſſe of ignorance, and faithleſneſſe, wherewith I am compaſſed. Let me but ſee my heauen, and I know I ſhall deſire it.

95

To be caried away with an affectation of fame, is ſo vaine, and abſurd, that I wonder it can be incident to any wiſe man. For what a mole-hill of earth is it, to which his name can extend, when it is furtheſt carried by the wings of report? and how ſhort a while doth it continue where it is once ſpread? Time (the deuourer of his owne brood) conſumes both vs and our memories; nor braſſe, nor marble can beare age. How many flattering Poets haue promiſed immortality of name to their Princes, who now together are buried long ſince in forgetfulneſſe! Thoſe names and actions, that are once on the file of heauen, are paſt the danger of defacing. I will not care whether I be knowne, or remembred, or forgotten amongſt men, if my name and good actions may liue with God in the records of eternity.

96

There is no man, nor no place free from ſpirits; although they teſtifie their preſence by viſible effects but in few. Euery man is not fit to entertaine Angels, though not in viſible ſhapes, as Abraham and Lot. The euill ones doe nothing but prouoke vs to ſinne, and plot miſchiefes againſt vs, by caſting into our way dangerous obiects; by ſuggeſting ſinfull motions to our mindes, ſtirring vp enemies againſt vs amongſt men, by frighting vs with terrors in our ſelues, by accuſing vs to God. On the contrary, The good Angels are euer remouing our hinderances from good, and our occaſions of euill; mitigating our tentations; helping vs againſt our enemies; deliuering vs from dangers; comforting vs in ſorrowes; furthering our good purpoſes; and at laſt carrying vp our ſoules to Heauen. It would affright a weak Christian that knowes the power and malice of wicked ſpirits, to conſider their preſence, and number, but when with the eyes of Eliſhaes ſeruant, he ſees thoſe on his ſide as preſent, as diligent, more powerfull; he cannot but take heart againe: eſpecially if he conſider, that neither of them is without God, limiting the one the bounds of their tentation; directing the other in the ſafegard of his children. Whereupon it is come to paſſe, that though there be many legions of Deuils, and euery one more ſtrong than many legions of men, and more malicious than ſtrong, yet the little flocke of Gods Church liueth and proſpereth. I haue euer with me inuiſible friends, and enemies. The conſideration of mine enemies ſhall keepe me from ſecurity, and make mee fearefull of doing ought to aduantage them. The conſideration of my ſpirituall friends ſhall comfort me againſt the terrour of the other; ſhall remedy my ſolitarineſſe; ſhall make me warie of doing ought indecently, grieuing me rather, that I haue euer heretofore made them turne away their eyes, for ſhame of that whereof I haue not beene aſhamed; that I haue no more enioyed their ſocietie; that I haue beene no more affected with their preſence. What though I ſee them not? I beleeue them. I were no Christian, if my faith were not as ſure as my ſenſe.

96

There is no word or action, but may be taken with two hands; either with the right hand of charitable conſtruction, or the ſiniſter interpretation of malice, and ſuſpicion: and all things doe ſo ſucceed, as they are taken. I haue noted euill actions well taken, paſſe currant for either indifferent or commendable: Contrarily, a good ſpeech or action ill taken, ſcarce allowed for indifferent; an indifferent one, cenſured for euill; an euill one for notorious: So fauour makes vertues of vices; and ſuſpicion makes vertues faults; and faults crimes. Of the two, I had rather my right hand ſhould offend: It is alwaies ſafer offending on the better part. To conſtrue an euill act well, is but a pleaſing and profitable deceit of my ſelfe: but to miſconſtrue a good thing, is a treble wrong; to my ſelfe, the action, the author. If no good ſenſe can be made of a deed or ſpeech, let the blame light vpon the author: If a good interpretation may be giuen, and I chuſe a worſe, let me be as much cenſured of others, as that miſconceit is puniſhment to my ſelfe.

97

I know not how it comes to paſſe, that the minde of man doth naturally both ouerprize his owne, in compariſon of others, and yet contemne and neglect his owne, in compariſon of what he wants. The remedy of this latter euill is, to compare the good things we haue, with the euils which we haue not, and others grone vnder. Thou art in health and regardeſt it not; Looke on the miſery of thoſe which on their bed of ſickneſſe, through extremity of paine and anguiſh, intreat death to releaſe them. Thou haſt cleare eye-ſight, ſound limbs, vſe of reaſon; and paſſeſt theſe ouer with ſleight reſpect: Thinke how many there are which in their vncomfortable blindneſſe, would giue all the world for but one glimpſe of light: how many that deformedly crawle on all foure, after the manner of the moſt loathſome creatures: how many that in mad phrenſies are worſe than brutiſh, worſe than dead: thus thou mighteſt be, and art not. If I be not happy for the good that I haue, I am yet happy for the euils that I might haue had, and haue eſcaped. I haue deſerued the greateſt euill; euery euill that I miſſe, is a new mercy.

98

Earth, which is the baſeſt element, is both our mother that brought vs forth, our

12637c
Hall, J.

ſtage that beares vs aliue, and our graue wherein at laſt we are entombed; giuing to vs both our originall, our harbour, our Sepulcher: She hath yeelded her backe to beare thouſands of generations; and at laſt opened her mouth to receiue them; ſo ſwallowing them vp, that ſhe ſtill both beareth more, and lookes for more; not bewraying any change in her ſelfe, while ſhe ſo oft hath changed her brood, and her burden. It is a wonder we can be proud of our parentage, or of our ſelues, while we ſee both the baſeneſſe and ſtability of the earth, whence we came. What difference is there? Liuing earth treads vpon the dead earth, which afterwards deſcends into the graue, as ſenſeleſſe and dead, as the earth that receiues it. Not many are proud of their ſoules; and none but fooles can be proud of their bodies. While wee walke and looke vpon the earth, we cannot but acknowledge ſenſible admonitions of humility; and while we remember them, we cannot forget our ſelues. It is a mother-like fauour of the earth, that ſhe beares and nouriſhes me, and at the laſt entertaines my dead carkaſe: but it is a greater pleaſure, that ſhe teacheth me my vileneſſe by her owne, and ſends me to heauen, for what ſhe wants.

99

The wicked man carrieth euery day a brand to his hell, till his heape be come to the height: then he ceaſeth ſinning, and begins his torment; whereas the repentant, in euery fit of holy ſorrow, carries away a whole fagot from the flame, and quencheth the coales that remaine, with his teares. There is no torment for the penitent, no redemption for the obſtinate. Safety conſiſteth not in not ſinning, but in repenting: neither is it ſinne that condemnes, but impenitence. O Lord, I cannot be righteous, let mee be repentant.

100

The eſtate of heauenly and earthly things is plainly repreſented to vs, by the two lights of Heauen, which are appointed to rule the night & the day. Earthly things are rightly reſembled by the Moone, which being neereſt to the region of mortality, is euer in changes, and neuer lookes vpon vs twice with the ſame face; and when it is at the full, is blemiſhed with ſome darke blots, not capable of any illumination. Heauenly things are figured by the Sunne, whoſe great and glorious light is both naturall to it ſelfe, and euer conſtant. That other fickle and dimme ſtarre is fit enough for the night of miſery, wherein we liue here below. And this firme and beautifull light is but good enough for that Day of glory, which the Saints liue in. If it be good liuing here where our ſorrowes are changed with ioyes; what is it to liue aboue, where our ioyes change not? I cannot looke vpon the body of the Sunne: and yet I cannot ſee at all without the light of it. I cannot behold the glory of thy Saints, O Lord; yet without the knowledge of it, I am blinde. If thy creature be ſo glorious to vs here below, how glorious ſhall thy ſelfe be to vs when we are aboue this Sunne? This Sunne ſhall not ſhine vpward, where thy glory ſhineth: the greater light extinguiſheth the leſſer. O thou Sunne of righteouſneſſe (which ſhalt onely ſhine to me when I am glorified) doe thou heat, enlighten, comfort me with the beames of thy preſence, till I be glorified.

AMEN.

All increaſe of true Honour, and HEAVEN begun vpon EARTH.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

I Haue vndertaken a great taske, to teach men how to be happy in this life: I haue vndertaken and performed it: wherein I haue followed Seneca, and gone beyond him; followed him as a Philoſopher, gone beyond him as a Chriſtian, as a Diuine. Finding it a true cenſure of the beſt Moraliſts, that they were like to goodly Ships, graced with great titles, the Sauegard, the Triumph, the Good-ſpeed, and ſuch like, when yet they haue beene both extremely Sea-beaten, and at laſt wracked. The volume is little, perhaps the vſe more; I haue euer thought according to the Greeke Prouerbe, μέγα βιβλίον μέγα κακόν. What it is, euen iuſtice challengeth it to him, to whom the Author hath deuoted himſelfe: The children of the bondman are the goods of the parents Maſter. I humbly betake it to your Honours protection, and your Honour to the protection of the Higheſt.

Your Honours moſt humbly deuoted in all duty and ſeruice,

SECT. I.

Cenſure of Philoſophers.

WHEN I had ſtudiouſly read ouer the morall writings of ſome wiſe Heathen, eſpecially thoſe of the Stoicall profeſſion, I muſt confeſſe, I found a little enuie and pitie ſtriuing together within me. I enuied nature in them, to ſee her ſo witty in deuiſing ſuch plauſible refuges for doubting and troubled minds: I pitied them, to ſee that their carefull diſquiſition of true reſt, led them in the end but to meere vnquietneſſe. Wherein me thought, they were as Hounds ſwift of foot, but not exquiſite in ſent, which in an haſty purſuit take a wrong way, ſpending their mouthes, and courſes in vaine. Their praiſe of gheſſing wittily they ſhall not leeſe, their hopes both they loſt, and whoſoeuer followes them. If Seneca could haue had grace to his wit, what wonders would he haue done in this kinde? what Diuine might not haue yeelded him the chaire for precepts of Tranquillity without any diſparagement? As he was, this he hath gained: Neuer any Heathen wrote more diuinely, neuer any Philoſopher more probably. Neither would I euer deſire better Maſter, if to this purpoſe I needed no other miſtris than Nature. But this in truth is a taske, which Nature hath neuer without preſumption vndertaken, and neuer performed without much imperfection. Like to thoſe vaine and wandring Empirickes, which in Tables and pictures make great oſtentation of Cures, neuer approuing their skill to their credulous Patients. And if ſhe could haue truly effected it alone, I know not what employment in this life ſhe ſhould haue left for grace to buſie her ſelfe about, nor what priuilege it ſhould haue beene here below to be a Chriſtian, ſince this that we ſeeke is the nobleſt worke of the ſoule, and in which alone conſiſts the only heauen of this world; this is the ſumme of all humane deſires: which when we haue attained, then only we begin to liue, and are ſure we cannot thence-forth liue miſerably. No maruell then if all the Heathen haue diligently ſought after it, many wrote of it, none attained it. Not Athens muſt teach this leſſon, but Ieruſalem.

SECT. II.

What Tranquillitie is, and wherein it conſiſts.

YEt ſomething Grace ſcorneth not to learne of Nature, as Moſes may take good counſell of a Midianite. Nature hath euer had more skill in the end, than in the way to it; and whether ſhe haue diſcourſed of the good eſtate of the minde, which we call TRANQVILLITIE, or the beſt, which is happineſſe, hath more happily gheſſed at the generall definition of them, than of the meanes to compaſſe them. She teacheth vs therefore without controlement, that the Tranquillity of the minde is, as of the Sea and weather, when no wind ſtirreth, when the waues doe not tumultuouſly riſe and fall vpon each other, but when the face both of the Heauen and waters is ſtill, faire, and equable. That it is ſuch an euen diſpoſition of the heart, wherein the ſcoales of the minde neither riſe vp towards the beame, through their owne lightneſſe, or the ouer-weening opinion of proſperity, nor are too much depreſſed with any load of ſorrow; but hanging equall and vnmoued betwixt both, giue a man liberty in all occurrences to enioy himſelfe. Not that the moſt temperate minde can be ſo the maſter of his paſſions, as not ſometimes to ouer-ioy his griefe, or ouer-grieue his ioy, according to the contrary occaſions of both: for not the eueneſt weights, but at their firſt putting into the ballance, ſomewhat ſway both parts thereof, not without ſome ſhew of inequality, which yet after ſome little motion, ſettle themſelues in a meet poiſe. It is enough that after ſome ſudden agitation, it can returne to it ſelfe, and reſt it ſelfe at laſt in a reſolued peace. And this due compoſedneſſe of minde we require vnto our Tranquillity, not for ſome ſhort fits of good mood, which ſoone after end in diſcontentment, but with the condition of perpetuity. For there is no heart makes ſo rough weather, as not ſometimes to admit of a calme, and whether for that he knoweth no preſent cauſe of his trouble, or for that he knoweth, that cauſe of trouble is counteruailed with as great an occaſion of priuate ioy, or for that the multitude of euils hath bred careleſneſſe, the man that is moſt diſordered, findes ſome reſpits of quietneſſe. The ballances that are moſt ill matched in their vnſteddy motions, come to an equality, but ſtay not at it. The franticke man cannot auoid the imputation of madneſſe, though he be ſober for many Moones, if he rage in one. So then the calme minde muſt be ſetled in an habituall reſt, not then firme when there is nothing to ſhake it, but then leaſt ſhaken when it is moſt aſſailed.

SECT. III.

Inſufficiencie of humane precepts.

Senecaes rules of Tranquillitie abridged.

WHence eaſily appeares how vainly it hath beene ſought either in ſuch a conſtant eſtate of outward things, as ſhould giue no diſtaſte to the mind whiles all earthly things vary with the weather, and haue no ſtay but in vncertainty, or in the naturall temper of the ſoule, ſo ordered by humane wiſdome, as that it ſhould not be affected with any caſuall euents to either part; ſince that cannot euer by naturall power be held like to it ſelfe; but one while is cheerefull, ſtirring and ready to vndertake; another while drowſie, dull, comfortleſſe, prone to reſt, weary of it ſelfe, loathing his owne purpoſes, his owne reſolutions. In both which ſince the wiſeſt Philoſophers haue grounded all the rules of their Tranquillity, it is plain that they ſaw it afarre off, as they did heauen it ſelfe with a deſire and admiration, but knew not the way to it: whereupon alas, how ſlight and impotent are the remedies they preſcribe for vnquietneſſe! For what is it that for the inconſtancy and lazineſſe of the minde ſtill diſpleaſing it ſelfe in what it doth, and for that diſtemper therof which ariſeth from the fearfull, vnthriuing, and reſtleſſe deſires of it, we ſhould euer be imploying our ſelues in ſome publike affaires, chuſing our buſineſſe according to our inclination, and proſecuting what we haue choſen? wherewith being at laſt cloyed, wee ſhould retire our ſelues, and weare the reſt of our time in priuate ſtudies; that we ſhould make due comparatiue trialls of our owne abilitie; nature of our buſineſſes; diſpoſition of our choſen friends? that in reſpect of Patrimony wee ſhould be but careleſſely affected, ſo drawing it in as it may be leaſt for ſhew, moſt for vſe; remouing all pompe, bridling our hopes, cutting off ſuperfluities; for croſſes, to conſider that cuſtome will abate and mitigate them, that the beſt things are but chaines and burdens to thoſe that haue them, to thoſe that vſe them, that the worſt things haue ſome mixture of comfort to thoſe that grone vnder them. Or leauing theſe lower rudiments that are giuen to weak and ſimple nouices, to examine thoſe golden rules of Morality, which are commended to the moſt wiſe and able practitioners, what it is to account himſelfe as a Tenant at will? To fore-imagine the worſt in all caſuall matters? To auoid all idle and impertinent buſineſſes, all pragmaticall medling with affaires of State? not to fix our ſelues vpon any one eſtate, as to be impatient of a change, to call backe the minde from outward things, and draw it home into it ſelfe? to laugh at and eſteeme lightly of others miſ-demeanours? Not to depend vpon others opinions, but to ſtand on our owne bottomes? to carry our ſelues in an honeſt and ſimple truth, free from a curious hypocriſie, and affectation of ſeeming other than we are, and yet as free from a baſe kinde of careleſneſſe? to intermeddle retiredneſſe with ſocietie, ſo as one may giue ſweetneſſe to the other, and both to vs? So ſlackning the minde that we may not looſen it, and ſo bending as we may not breake it? to make moſt of our ſelues, chearing vp our ſpirits with varietie of recreations, with ſacietie of meales, and all other bodily indulgence, ſauing that drunkenneſſe (me thinkes) can neither beſeeme a wiſe Philoſopher to preſcribe, nor a vertuous man to practiſe? All theſe in their kindes pleaſe well, profit much, and are as ſoueraigne for both theſe, as they are vnable to effect that for which they are propounded. Nature teacheth thee all theſe ſhould be done, ſhee cannot teach thee to doe them: and yet doe all theſe and no more, let me neuer haue reſt, if thou haue it. For neither are here the greateſt enemies of our peace ſo much as deſcried afarre off, nor thoſe that are noted are hereby ſo preuented, that vpon moſt diligent practice we can promiſe our ſelues any ſecurity: wherewith who ſo inſtructed, dare confidently giue challenge to all ſiniſter euents, is like to ſome skilfull Fencer who ſtands vpon his vſuall wards, and plaies well; but if there come a ſtrange fetch of an vnwonted blow, is put beſides the rules of his Art, and with much ſhame ouer-taken. And for thoſe that are knowne, beleeue me, the minde of man is too weake to beare out it ſelfe hereby againſt all onſets. There are light croſſes that will take an eaſie repulſe; others yet ſtronger, that ſhake the houſe ſide, but breake not in vpon vs; others vehement, which by force make way to the heart, where they finde none, breaking open the doore of the ſoule that denies entrance. Others violent, that lift the minde off the hindges, or rend the barres of it in peeces: others furious, that teare vp the very foundations from the bottome, leauing no monument behinde them, but ruine. The wiſeſt and moſt reſolute Moraliſt that euer was, lookt pale when he ſhould taſte of his Hemlocke; and by his timorouſneſſe made ſport to thoſe that enuied his ſpeculations. The beſt of the Heathen Emperours (that was honoured with the title of piety) iuſtly magnified that courage of Chriſtians which made them inſult ouer their tormentors, and by their fearleſneſſe of earth-quakes, and deaths, argued the truth of their Religion. It muſt be, it can be none but a diuine power, that can vphold the minde againſt the rage of main afflictions, and yet the greateſt croſſes are not the greateſt enemies to inward peace. Let vs therefore looke vp aboue our ſelues, and from the rules of an higher Art, ſupply the defects of naturall wiſdome, giuing ſuch infallible directions for tranquillitie, that whoſoeuer ſhall follow, cannot but liue ſweetly and with continuall delight, applauding himſelfe at home, when all the world beſides him ſhall be miſerable. To which purpoſe it ſhall be requiſite, firſt to remoue all cauſes of vnquietneſſe, and then to ſet downe the grounds of our happie reſt.

Allowed yet by Seneca in his laſt chapter of Tranquillitie. Senecaes rules reiected as inſufficient.

Antonius Pius.

An Epiſtle to the Aſians concerning the perſecuted Chriſtians.

Diſpoſition of the worke.

SECT. IV.

I Finde on the hand two vniuerſall enemies of Tranquillity; Conſcience of euill done, Senſe or feare of euill ſuffred. The former in one word, we call ſinnes, the latter Croſſes. The firſt of theſe muſt be quite taken away, the ſecond duly tempered ere the heart can be at reſt. For firſt, how can that man be at peace, that is at variance with God and himſelfe? How ſhould peace be Gods gift, if it could be without him, if it could be againſt him? It is the profeſſion of ſinne, although faire ſpoken at the firſt Enemies of inward peace diuided into their rankes.

12637c Hall, J.

cloſing, to be a perpetuall make-bate betwixt God and man, betwixt a man and himſelfe. And this enmitie, though it doe not continually ſhew it ſelfe, (as the mortalleſt enemies are not alwaies in pitched fields one againſt the other) for that the conſcience is not euer clamorous, but ſome-while is ſilent, other-whiles with ſtill murmurings bewraies his miſlikes, yet doth euermore work ſecret vnquietneſſe to the heart.

The torment of an euill conſcience.

The guilty man may haue a ſeeming truce, a true peace he cannot haue. Look vpon the face of the guilty heart, and thou ſhalt ſee it pale and ghaſtly; the ſmiles and laughters faint and heartleſſe, the ſpeeches doubtfull, and full of abrupt ſtops and vnſeaſonable turnings; the purpoſes and motions vnſteddy, & ſauouring of much diſtraction, arguing plainly that ſin is not ſo ſmooth at her firſt motions, as turbulent afterwards: hence are thoſe vaine wearyings of places and companies together with our ſelues; that the galled ſoule doth after the wont of ſicke Patients ſeeke refreſhing in varietie; and after many toſſed and turned ſides, complaines of remedileſſe and vnabated torment. Nero after ſo much innocent bloud, may change his bed-chamber, but his Fiends euer attend him, euer are within him, and are as parts of him ſelfe. Alas, what auailes it to ſeeke outward releeſes, when thou haſt thine executioner within thee? If thou couldeſt ſhift from thy ſelfe, thou mighteſt haue ſome hope of eaſe; now thou ſhalt neuer want furies ſo long as thou haſt thy ſelfe. Yea, what if thou wouldeſt runne from thy ſelfe? Thy ſoule may flie from thy body, thy conſcience will not flie from thy ſoule, nor thy ſinne from thy conſcience. Some men indeed in the bitterneſſe of theſe pangs of ſinne, like vnto thoſe fondly impatient fiſhes, that leape out of the pan into the flame, haue leapt out of this priuate hell that is in themſelues, into the common pit, chooſing to aduenture vpon the future paines that they haue feared, rather than to endure the preſent horrours they haue felt: wherin what haue they gained, but to that hell which was within them, a ſecond hell without? The conſcience leaues not where the Fiends begin, but both ioyne together in torture. But there are ſome firme and obdurate fore-heads, whoſe reſolution can laugh their ſinnes out of countenance. There are ſo large and able gorges, as that they can ſwallow and digeſt bloudy murders, without complaint, who, with the ſame hands which they haue ſince their laſt meale embrued in bloud, can freely carue to themſelues large morſels at the next ſitting.

The ioy and peace of the guiltie but diſſembled.

Beleeueſt thou that ſuch a mans heart laughes with his face? will not he dare to be an Hypocrite, that durſt be a villaine? Theſe glow-wormes, when a night of ſorrow compaſſes them, make a lightſome and fiery ſhew of ioy, when if thou preſſe them, thou findeſt nothing but a cold and crude moiſture. Knoweſt thou not that there are thoſe which count it no ſhame to ſinne, yet count it a ſhame to be checked with remorſe, eſpecially ſo as others eyes may deſcrie? to whom repentance ſeemes baſe-mindedneſſe, vnworthy of him that profeſſes wiſdome and valour. Such a man can grieue when none ſees it, but himſelfe can laugh when others ſee it, himſelfe feeles not. Aſſure thy ſelfe that mans heart bleedeth, when his face counterfeits a ſmile; he wears out many waking houres, when thou thinkeſt he reſteth: yea as his thoughts afford him not ſleepe, ſo his very ſleepe affords him not reſt, but while his ſenſes are tyed vp, his ſinne is looſe; repreſenting it ſelfe to him in the vglieſt ſhape, and frighting him with horrible and helliſh dreames. And if perhaps cuſtome hath bred a careleſneſſe in him, (as we ſee that vſuall whipping makes the childe not care for the rod) yet an vnwonted extremity of the blow ſhall fetch bloud of the ſoule, and make the backe that is moſt hardened, ſenſible of ſmart: and the further the blow is fetcht through intermiſſion of remorſe, the harder it muſt needs alight. Therefore I may confidently tell the careleſſe ſinner, as that bold Tragedian ſaid to his great Pompey: The time ſhall come wherein thou ſhalt fetch deepe ſighes, and therefore ſhalt ſorrow deſperately, becauſe thou ſorroweſt not ſooner. The fire of the conſcience may lie for a time ſmothered with a pyle of greene wood, that it cannot be diſcerned, whoſe moiſture when once it hath maſtered, it ſends vp ſo much greater flame, by how much it had greater reſiſtance. Hope not then to ſtop the mouth of thy conſcience from exclaiming, whiles thy ſinne continues; that endeuour is both vaine and hurtfull; So I haue ſeene them that haue ſtopt the noſthrill for bleeding, in hope to ſtay the iſſue, when the bloud hindered in his former courſe, hath broken out of the mouth, or found way downe into the ſtomacke. The conſcience is not pacificable, while ſinne is within to vex it: no more than angry ſwelling can ceaſe throbbing and aching, whiles the thorne or the corrupted matter lies rotting vnderneath. Time, that remedies all other euills of the minde, increaſeth this, which like to bodily diſeaſes proues worſe with continuance, and growes vpon vs with our age.

SECT. V.

The remedie of an vnquiet Conſcience.

THere can be therfore no peace without reconciliation; thou canſt not be friends with thy ſelfe, till with God: for thy conſcience (which is thy beſt friend while thou ſinneſt not) like an honeſt ſeruant takes his Maſters part againſt thee when thou haſt ſinned; and will not looke ſtraight vpon thee, till thou vpon God; not daring to be ſo kinde to thee, as to be vnfaithfull to his Maker: There can be no reconciliation without remiſſion. God can neither forget the iniury of ſinne, nor diſſemble hatred. It is for men and thoſe of hollow hearts, to make pretences contrary to their affections: ſoothings and ſmiles, and embracements where we meane not loue, are from weakneſſe: Either for that we feare our inſufficiency of preſent reuenge, or hope for a fitter opportunity afterwards, or for that we deſire to make our further aduantage of him to whom we meane euill. Theſe courſes are not incident into an Almighty power; who hauing the command of all vengeance, can ſmite where he liſt without all doubtings or delayes. There can be no remiſſion without ſatisfaction; neither dealeth God with vs as we men with ſome deſperate debters, whom after long dilations of payments, and many daies broken, we altogether let goe for diſability, or at leaſt diſmiſſe them vpon an eaſie compoſition. All ſins are debts; all Gods debts muſt be diſcharged. It is a bold word, but a true; God ſhould not be iuſt, if any of his debts ſhould paſſe vnſatisfied. The conceit of the profane vulgar, makes him a God of all mercies; and thereupon hopes for pardon without paiment. Fond and ignorant preſumption, to diſioyne mercy and iuſtice in him to whom they are both eſſentiall; to make mercy exceed iuſtice in him, in whom both are infinite. Dareſt thou hope God can be ſo kind to thee, as to be vniuſt to himſelfe? God will be iuſt: goe thou on to preſume and periſh. There can be no ſatisfaction by any recompence of ours: an infinite iuſtice is offended, an infinite puniſhment is deſerued by euery ſinne, and euery mans ſinnes are as neere to infinite, as number can make them. Our beſt endeuour is worſe than finite, imperfect, and faulty. If it could be perfect, we owe it all in preſent; what we are bound to doe in preſent, cannot make amends for what we haue not done in time paſt: which while we offer to God as good payment, we doe with the profane traueller thinke to pleaſe him with emptie Date-ſhells in lieu of preſeruation. Where ſhall we then finde a payment of infinite value, but in him which is only and all infinite? The dignitie of whoſe perſon being infinite, gaue ſuch worth to his ſatisfaction, that what he ſuffered in ſhort time, was proportionable to what we ſhould haue ſuffered beyond all times. He did all, ſuffered all, payed all, he did it for vs, we in him. Where ſhall I begin to wonder at thee, O thou diuine and eternall Peace-maker, the Sauiour of men, the Anointed of God, Mediator betweene God and man, in whom there is nothing which doth not exceed not only the conceit, but the very wonder of Angels, who ſaw thee in thy humiliation with ſilence, and adore thee in thy glory with perpetuall praiſes and reioycings? Thou waſt for euer of thy ſelfe as God, of the Father, as the Sonne; the eternall Sonne of an eternall Father; not later in being, not leſſe in dignity, not other in ſubſtance. Begotten without diminution of him that begot thee, while he communicated that wholly to thee, which he retained wholly in himſelfe, becauſe both were infinite without inequality of nature, without diuiſion of eſſence; when being in this eſtate, thine infinite loue and mercy to deſperate mankinde, cauſed thee, O Sauiour,

12637c

to empty thy ſelfe of thy glory, that thou mighteſt put on our ſhame and miſery. Wherefore not ceaſing to be God as thou wert, thou beganſt to be what thou wert not, Man; to the end that thou mighteſt be a perfect Mediator betwixt God and man, which wert both in one perſon; God, that thou mightſt ſatisfie; man, that thou mightſt ſuffer: that ſince man had ſinned, and God was offended, thou which wert God and Man, mightſt ſatisfie God for man. None but thy ſelfe, which art the eternall Word, can expreſſe the depth of this myſtery, that God ſhould be clothed with fleſh, come downe to men, and become man, that man might be exalted into the higheſt heauens; and that our nature might be taken into the fellowſhip of the Deity. That he to whō all powers in heauen bowed, and thought it their honour to be ſeruiceable, ſhould come downe to be a ſeruant to his ſlaues, a ranſome for his enemies; together with our nature taking vp our very infirmities, our ſhame, our torments, and bearing our ſinnes without ſinne. That thou whom the heauens were too ſtrait to containe, ſhouldſt lay thy ſelfe in an obſcure cratch: thou which wert attended of Angels, ſhouldſt be derided of men, reiected of thine owne, perſecuted by Tyrants, tempted with Deuils, betrayed of thy ſeruant, crucified among theeues, and (which was worſe than all theſe) in thine owne apprehenſion, for the time as forſaken of thy Father; That thou whom our ſins had pierced, ſhouldſt for our ſinnes both ſweat drops of bloud in the Garden, and powre out ſtreames of bloud vpon the Croſſe. O the inualuable purchaſe of our peace! O ranſome enough for moe worlds! Thou which wert in the counſell of thy Father, the Lambe ſlaine from the beginning of time, cam'ſt now in fulneſſe of time to be ſlaine by man, for man; being at once the Sacrifice offered, the Prieſt that did offer, and the God to whom it was offred. How graciouſly didſt thou both proclaime our peace, as a Prophet in the time of thy life vpon earth, and purchaſe it by thy bloud as a Prieſt at thy death, and now confirmeſt and applieſt it as a King in heauen! By thee only it was procured, by thee it is proffered. O mercy without example, without meaſure! God offers peace to man, the holy ſeekes to the vniuſt, the Potter to the clay, the King to the traitor. We are vnworthy that we ſhould be receiued to peace though we deſired it; what are we then that we ſhould haue peace offered for the receiuing? An eaſie condition of ſo great a benefit; he requires vs not to earne it, but to accept it of him: what could he giue more? what could he require leſſe of vs?

SECT. VI.

The receit of our peace offered by Faith.

THe purchaſe therefore of our peace was paid at once, yet muſt be ſeuerally reckoned to euery ſoule whom it ſhall benefit. If we haue not an hand to take what Chriſts hand doth either hold, or offer, what is ſufficient in him, cannot be effectuall to vs. The ſpirituall hand, whereby we apprehend the ſweet offers of our Sauiour, is faith, which in ſhort is no other than an affiance in the Mediator: receiue peace and be happy, beleeue and thou haſt receiued. From hence it is that we are intereſſed in all that either God hath promiſed, or Chriſt hath performed. Hence haue we from God both forgiueneſſe and loue, the ground of all either peace or glory. Hence of enemies we become more than friends, ſonnes: and as ſonnes, may both expect and challenge not only carefull prouiſion and ſafe protection on earth, but an euerlaſting patrimony aboue. This field is ſo ſpacious, that it were eaſie for a man to loſe himſelfe in it: and if I ſhould ſpend all my pilgrimage in this walke, my time would ſooner end than my way; wherein I would haue meaſured more paſes, were it not that our ſcope is not ſo much to magnifie the benefit of our peace, as to ſeeke how to obtaine it.

A corolary of the benefit of this receit.

Behold now, after we haue ſought heauen and earth, where only the wearied Doue may finde an Oliue of peace. The apprehending of this all-ſufficient ſatisfaction, makes it ours; vpon our ſatisfaction we haue remiſſion; vpon remiſſion, followes reconciliation; vpon our reconciliation, peace. When therefore thy conſcience like a ſterne Sergeant ſhall catch thee by the throat, and arreſt thee vpon Gods debt, let thy onely plea be, that thou haſt already paid it: Bring forth that bloudie acquittance ſealed to thee from heauen vpon thy true faith, ſtraightway thou ſhalt ſee the fierce and terrible looke of thy conſcience changed into friendly ſmiles, and that rough and violent hand that was ready to drag thee to priſon, ſhall now louingly embrace thee, and fight for thee againſt all the wrongfull attempts of any ſpirituall aduerſarie. O heauenly Peace, and more than Peace, Friendſhip, whereby alone we are leagued with our ſelues, and God with vs, which who-euer wants, ſhall finde a ſad Remembrancer in the midſt of his diſſembled iollitie, and after all vaine ſtrifes, ſhall fall into many ſecret dumps, from which his guiltie heart ſhall deny to bee cheared, though all the world were his minſtrell! Oh pleaſure worthy to be pittied, and laughter worthy of teares, that is without this! Goe then, fooliſh man, and when thou feeleſt any checke of thy ſinne, ſeeke after thy iocundeſt companions, deceiue the time and thy ſelfe with merry purpoſes, with buſie games, feaſt away thy cares, burie them and thy ſelfe in wine and ſleepe: after all theſe friuolous deferrings, it will returne vpon thee, when thou wakeſt, perhaps ere thou wakeſt, nor will be repelled till it haue ſhewed thee thy hell, nor when it hath ſhewed thee, will yet be repelled. So the ſtricken Deere hauing receiued a deadly arrow, whoſe ſhaft ſhaken out hath left the head behinde it, runnes from one Thicket to another, not able to change his paine with his places, but finding his wounds ſtill the worſe with continuance. Ah foole, thy ſoule feſtereth within, and is affected ſo much more dangerouſly, by how much leſſe it appeareth. Thou maiſt while thy ſelfe with varietie, thou canſt not eaſe thee. Sinne owes thee a ſpight, and will pay it thee, perhaps when thou art in worſt caſe to ſuſtaine it. This flitting doth but prouide for a further violence at laſt. I haue ſeene a little ſtreame of no noiſe, which vpon his ſtoppage hath ſwelled vp, and with a loud guſhing hath borne ouer the heape of turues wherewith it was reſiſted. Thy death-bed ſhall ſmart for theſe wilfull adiournings of repentance; whereon how many haue we heard rauing of their old neglected ſinnes, and fearefully deſpairing when they haue had moſt need of comfort? In ſumme, there is no way but this: Thy conſcience muſt haue either ſatisfaction or torment. Diſcharge thy ſinne betimes, and be at peace. He neuer breakes his ſleepe for debt, that paies when he takes vp.

The vaine ſhifts of the guiltie.

Sect. VII.

Sollicitation of ſinne remedied.

NEither can it ſuffice for peace, to haue croſſed the old ſcrole of our ſinnes, if we preuent not the future; yea the preſent very importunity of tentation breeds vnquietneſſe. Sinne where it hath got an haunt, looketh for more, as humours that fall towards their old iſſue: and if it be not ſtrongly repelled, doth neere as much vex vs with ſolliciting as with yeelding. Let others enuie their happineſſe, I ſhall neuer thinke their life ſo much as quiet, whoſe doores are continually beaten, and their morning ſleepe broken with early clients, whoſe entries are daily thronged with ſuters preſſing neere for the next audience; much leſſe that through their remiſſe anſwers are daily haunted with traitors or other inſtruments of villanie, offering their miſchieuous ſeruice, and inciting them to ſome peſtilent enterpriſe. Such are tentations to the ſoule. Whereof it cannot be rid, ſo long as it holds them in any hope of entertainment: and ſo long they will hope to preuaile, while we giue them but a cold and timorous deniall. Suters are drawne on with an eaſie repulſe; counting that as halfe granted, which is but faintly gaineſaid. Peremptory anſwers can only put ſinne out of heart for any ſecond attempts. It is euer impudent when it meets not with a bold heart; hoping to preuaile by wearying vs, and wearying vs by intreaties. Let all ſuggeſtions therefore finde thee reſolute: ſo ſhall thy ſoule finde it ſelfe at reſt; for as the Deuill, ſo ſinne his naturall brood, flies away with reſiſtance. To which purpoſe, all our heady and diſordered affections, which are the ſecret factors of ſinne and Satan, muſt bee reſtrained by a ſtrong and yet temperate command of Reaſon and Religion: theſe, if they finde the reynes looſe in their necks (like to the wilde horſes of that chaſte hunter in the Tragedie)

The ordering of affections.

12637c
Hall, J.

gedie) carry vs ouer hils and rockes, and neuer leaue vs till we be diſmembred, and they breathleſſe: but contrarily, if they bee pulled in with the ſudden violence of a ſtrait hand, they fall to plunging, and careering, and neuer leaue till their ſaddle bee empty, and euen then dangerouſly ſtrike at their proſtrate Rider. If there be any exerciſe of Chriſtian wiſdome, it is in the managing of theſe vnruly affections, which are not more neceſſary in their beſt vſe, than pernicious in their miſ-gouernance. Reaſon hath alwaies beene buſie in vndertaking this ſo neceſſary a moderation: wherein although ſhee haue preuailed with ſome of colder temper, yet thoſe which haue beene of more ſtubborne metall, like vnto growne ſchollers, which ſcorne the ferule that ruled their minority, haue ſtill deſpiſed her weake endeuours. Onely Chriſtianity hath this power; which with our ſecond birth giues vs a new nature: ſo that now, if exceſſe of paſſions be naturall to vs as men, the order of them is naturall to vs as Chriſtians. Reaſon bids the angry man ſay ouer his Alphabet ere he giue his anſwer; hoping by this intermiſſion of time, to gaine the mitigation of his rage. He was neuer throughly angry, that can endure the recitall of ſo many idle letters. Chriſtianity giues not rules, but power to auoid this ſhort madneſſe. It was a wiſe ſpeech that is reported of our beſt and laſt Cardinall (I hope) that this Iland either did or ſhall ſee; who when a skilfull Aſtrologer, vpon the calculation of his natiuity, had foretold him ſome ſpecialties, concerning his future eſtate, anſwered, Such perhaps I was borne, but ſince that time, I haue beene borne againe, and my ſecond natiuity hath croſſed my firſt. The power of nature is a good plea for thoſe that acknowledge nothing aboue nature. But for a Chriſtian to excuſe his intemperatneſſe, by his naturall inclination, and to ſay, I am borne cholerike, ſullen, amorous, is an Apologie worſe than the fault. Wherefore ſerues Religion, but to ſubdue or gouerne nature? We are ſo much Chriſtians, as we can rule our ſelues, the reſt is but forme and ſpeculation. Yea, the very thought of our profeſſion is ſo powerfull, that (like vnto that precious ſtone) being caſt into this Sea, it aſſwageth thoſe inward tempeſts that were raiſed by the affections. The vnregenerate minde is not capable of this power; and therefore through the continuall mutinies of his paſſions, cannot but be ſubiect to perpetuall vnquietneſſe. There is neither remedy nor hope in this eſtate. But the Chriſtian ſoule, that hath inured it ſelfe to the awe of God, and the exerciſes of true mortification, by the onely looking vp at his holy profeſſion, cureth the burning venome of theſe fiery ſerpents that lurke within him. Haſt thou nothing but nature? Reſolue to looke for no peace. God is not prodigall to caſt away his beſt bleſſings on ſo vnworthy ſubiects. Art thou a Chriſtian? Doe but remember thou art ſo; and then if thou dar'ſt, if thou canſt, yeeld to the exceſſe of paſſions.

SECT. VIII.

The ſecond maine enemy to Peace, Croſſes.

HItherto the moſt inward and dangerous enemie of our peace: which if wee haue once maſtered, the other field ſhall be fought and wonne with leſſe bloud. Croſſes diſquiet vs either in their preſent feeling, or their expectation: both of them, when they meet with weake mindes, ſo extremely diſtempering them, that the patient for the time is not himſelfe. How many haue we knowne, which through a lingring diſeaſe, weary of their paine, weary of their liues, haue made their owne hands their executioners? How many meeting with a headſtrong griefe, which they could not manage, haue by the violence of it beene carried quite from their wits? How many millions, what for incurable maladies, what for loſſes, what for defamations, what for ſad accidents to their children, rub out their liues in perpetuall diſcontentment, therefore liuing, becauſe they cannot yet die, not for that they like to liue? If there could be any humane receipt preſcribed to auoid euils, it would be purchaſed at an high rate: but both it is impoſſible that earth ſhould redreſſe that which is ſent from Heauen; and if it could be done, euen the want of miſeries would proue miſerable: for the minde cloyed with continuall felicity, would grow a burden to it ſelfe, loathing that at laſt, which intermiſſion would haue made pleaſant. Giue a free horſe the full reynes, and he will ſoone tire. Summer is the ſweeteſt ſeaſon by all conſents, wherein the earth is both moſt rich with increaſe, and moſt gorgeous for ornament; yet if it were not receiued with interchanges of cold froſts and piercing winds, who could liue? Summer would be no Summer, if Winter did not both lead it in, and follow it: we may not therefore either hope or ſtriue to eſcape all croſſes; ſome wee may: what thou canſt, flie from; what thou canſt not, allay and mitigate; in croſſes vniuerſally let this be thy rule, Make thy ſelfe none, eſcape ſome, beare the reſt, ſweeten all.

The firſt remedy of croſſes before they come.

Sect. IX.

Of croſſes that ariſe from conceit.

APprehenſion giues life to croſſes: and if ſome be ſimply, moſt are as they are taken. I haue ſeene many, which when God hath meant them no hurt, haue framed themſelues croſſes out of imagination, and haue found that inſupportable for weight, which in truth neuer was, neither had euer any but a fancied being. Others againe laughing out heauy afflictions, for which they were bemoaned of the beholders. One receiues a deadly wound, and lookes not ſo much as pale at the ſmart; another heares of many loſſes, and like Zeno, after newes of his ſhipwracke, (as altogether paſſion-leſſe) goes to his reſt, not breaking an houres ſleepe for that, which would breake the heart of ſome others. Greenham that Saint of ours (whom it cannot diſparage that he was reſerued for our ſo looſe an age) can lie ſpread quietly vpon the forme looking for the Chirurgians knife, binding himſelfe as faſt with a reſolued patience, as others with ſtrongeſt cords, abiding his fleſh carued, and his bowels rifled, and not ſtirring more than if he felt not, while others tremble to expect, and ſhrinke to feele but the pricking of a veine. There can be no remedy for imaginary croſſes but wiſdome, which ſhall teach vs to eſteeme of all euents as they are; like a true glaſſe repreſenting all things to our mindes in their due proportion. So as croſſes may not ſeeme that are not, nor little and gentle ones ſeeme great and intolerable. Giue thy body Ellebore, thy minde good counſell, thine eare to thy friend, and theſe fantaſticall euills ſhall vaniſh away like themſelues.

Sect. X.

Of true and reall croſſes.

IT were idle aduice to bid men auoid euils. Nature hath by a ſecret inſtinct taught brute creatures ſo much, whether wit or ſagacity: and our ſelfe-loue making the beſt aduantage of reaſon, will eaſily make vs ſo wiſe and carefull. It is more worth our labour, ſince our life is ſo open to calamities, and nature to impatience, to teach men to beare what euills they cannot auoid, and how by a well-diſpoſedneſſe of mind we may correct the iniquity of all hard euents. Wherein it is hardly credible, how much good Art and precepts of reſolution may auaile vs. I haue ſeene one man, by the helpe of a little engine, lift vp that weight alone, which forty helping hands by their cleare ſtrength might haue endeuoured in vaine. Wee liue here in an Ocean of troubles, wherein we can ſee no firme land; one waue falling vpon another, ere the former haue wrought all his ſpight. Miſchiefes ſtriue for places, as if they feared to loſe their roome if they haſted not. So many good things as we haue, ſo many euils ariſe from their priuation; beſides no fewer reall and poſitiue euils that afflict vs. To preſcribe and apply receits to euery particular croſſe, were to write a Salmeron-like commentary vpon Petrarchs remedies; and I doubt whether ſo the worke would bee perfect: a life would be too little to write it, and but enough to reade it.

Sect.

Sect. XI.

The firſt remedy of croſſes before they come.

THe ſame medicines cannot help all diſeaſes of the body, of the ſoule they may. Wee ſee Fencers giue their ſchollers the ſame common rules of poſition, of warding and weilding their weapon for offence, for defence, againſt all commers: ſuch vniuerſall precepts there are for croſſes. In the firſt whereof, I would preſcribe Expectation, that either killeth or abateth euills. For Croſſes, after the nature of the Cockatrice, die, if they be foreſeene; whether this prouidence makes vs more ſtrong to reſiſt, or by ſome ſecret power makes them more vnable to aſſault vs. It is not credible what a fore-reſolued minde can doe, can ſuffer. Could our Engliſh Milo, of whom Spaine yet ſpeaketh ſince their laſt peace, haue ouerthrowne that furious Beaſt, made now more violent through the rage of his baiting, if he had not ſetled himſelfe in his ſtation, and expected? The frighted multitude ran away from that ouer-earneſt ſport, which begunne in pleaſure, ended in terrour. If he had turned his backe with the reſt, where had beene his ſafety, where his glory, and reward? Now he ſtood ſtill, expected, ouercame, by one fact he at once preſerued, honoured, enriched himſelfe. Euils will come neuer the ſooner for that thou lookeſt for them, they will come the eaſier: it is a labour well loſt, if they come not; and well beſtowed, if they doe come. We are ſure the worſt may come, why ſhould we be ſecure that it will not? Suddenneſſe findes weake mindes ſecure, makes them miſerable, leaues them deſperate. The beſt way therfore is, to make things preſent, in conceit before they come, that they may be halfe paſt in their violence when they doe come: euen as with woodden waſters we learne to play at the ſharp. As therefore good Souldiers exerciſe themſelues long at the pale, & there vſe thoſe actiuities, which afterwards they ſhall practiſe vpon a true aduerſary: ſo muſt we preſent to our ſelues imaginary croſſes, and manage them in our mind, before God ſends them in euent. Now I eat, ſleepe, digeſt all ſoundly, without complaint: what if a languiſhing diſeaſe ſhould bereaue me of my appetite and reſt? that I ſhould ſee dainties & loath them, ſurfetting of the very ſmell, of the thought of the beſt diſhes? that I ſhould count the lingring houres, and thinke Ezekias long day returned, wearying my ſelfe with changing ſides, and wiſhing any thing but what I am? How could I take this diſtemper? Now I haue (if not what I would, yet) what I need; as not abounding with idle ſuperfluities, ſo not ſtraitned with penury of neceſſary things. What if pouerty ſhould ruſh vpon me as an armed man, ſpoiling me of all my little that I had, and ſend me to the fountaine for my beſt cellar? to the ground for my bed? for my bread to anothers cupbord? for my clothes to the Brokers ſhop, or my friends wardrobe? How could I brooke this want? I am now at home, walking in my owne grounds, looking on my young plants the hope of poſterity, conſidering the nature, aduantages or feares of my ſoile, enioying the patrimony of my Fathers. What if for my Religion, or the malicious ſentence of ſome great one, I ſhould be exiled from my Country, wandering amongſt thoſe, whoſe habit, language, faſhion, my ignorance ſhall make me wonder at; where the ſolitude of places, and ſtrangeneſſe of perſons, ſhal make my life comfortable? How could I abide the ſmell of forraine ſmoke? how ſhould I take the contempt and hard vſage that waits vpon ſtrangers? Thy proſperity is idle, and ill ſpent, if it be not medled with ſuch fore-caſting, and wiſely ſuſpicious thoughts, if it be wholly beſtowed in enioying, no whit in preuenting. Like vnto a fooliſh City, which notwithſtanding a dangerous ſituation, ſpends all her wealth in rich furnitures of chambers and ſtate-houſes; while they beſtow not one ſhouell full of earth on outward Bulwarks to their defence: this is but to make our enemies the happier, and our ſelues the more readily miſerable. If thou wilt not therfore be oppreſſed with euils, Expect & Exerciſe; Exerciſe thy ſelfe with conceit of euils: Expect the euils themſelues; yea exerciſe thy ſelfe in expectation: ſo while the mind pleaſeth it ſelfe in thinking, Yet I am not thus, it prepareth it ſelfe againſt it may be ſo. And if ſome that haue bin good at the Foiles, haue proued cowardly at the ſharp, yet on the contrary, who euer durſt point a ſingle combat in the field, that hath not bin ſomewhat trained in the Fence-ſchoole?

Sect.

Sect. XII.

The next remedy of croſſes when they are come. From their Author.

NEither doth it a little blunt the edge of euils, to conſider that they come from a diuine hand, whoſe almighty power is guided by a moſt wiſe prouidence, and tempered with a Fatherly loue. Euen the ſauage creatures will bee ſmitten of their keeper, and repine not; if of a ſtranger, they teare him in peeces. He ſtrikes mee that made me, that moderates the world; why ſtruggle I with him, why with my ſelfe? Am I a foole, or a Rebell? A foole, if I be ignorant whence my croſſes come: a Rebell, if I know it, and be impatient. My ſufferings are from a God, from my God; he hath deſtin'd me euery dramme of ſorrow that I feele: thus much thou ſhalt abide, and here ſhall thy miſeries be ſtinted. All worldly helps cannot abate them, all powers of hell cannot adde one ſcruple to their weight, that he hath allotted me: I muſt therefore either blaſpheme God in my heart, detracting from his infinite iuſtice, wiſdome, power, mercy, which all ſhall ſtand inuiolable, when millions of ſuch wormes as I am, are gone to duſt; or elſe confeſſe that I ought to be patient. And if I profeſſe I ſhould be that I will not, I befoole my ſelfe, and bewray miſerable impotency. But (as impatience is full of excuſe) it was thine owne raſh improuidence, or the ſpight of thine enemy that impoueriſht, that defamed thee: it was the malignity of ſome vnwholſome diſh, or ſome groſſe corrupted aire, that hath diſtempered thee. Ah fooliſh curre, why doeſt thou bite at the ſtone, which could neuer haue hurt thee, but from the hand that threw it? If I wound thee, what matters it whether with mine owne ſword, or thine, or anothers? God ſtrikes ſome immediatly from Heauen with his owne arme, or with the arme of Angels: others hee buffets with their owne hands, ſome by the reuenging ſword of an enemy, others with the fiſt of his dumbe creatures: God ſtrikes in all; his hand moues theirs. If thou ſee it not, blame thy carnall eyes. Why doſt thou fault the inſtrument, while thou knoweſt the agent? Euen the dying theefe pardons the executioner, exclaimes on his vniuſt Iudge, or his malicious accuſers. Either then blame the firſt mouer, or diſcharge the meanes: which as they could not haue touched thee, but as from him; ſo from him they haue afflicted thee iuſtly, wrongfully perhaps as in themſelues.

Sect. XIII.

The third antidote of croſſes.

BVt neither ſeemeth it enough to bee patient in croſſes, if wee bee not thankfull alſo. Good things challenge more than bare contentment. Croſſes (vniuſtly termed euils) as they are ſent of him that is all goodneſſe, ſo they are ſent for good, and his end cannot be fruſtrate. What greater good can be to the diſeaſed man, than fit and proper Phyſicke to recure him? Croſſes are the onely medicines of ſicke mindes. Thy ſound body carries within it a ſicke ſoule; thou feeleſt it not perhaps: ſo much more art thou ſicke, and ſo much more dangerouſly. Perhaps thou laboureſt of ſome plethory of pride, or of ſome dropſie of couetouſneſſe, or the ſtaggers of inconſtancy, or ſome feuer of luxurie, or conſumption of enuy, or perhaps of the lethargie of idleneſſe, or of the phrenſie of anger: It is a rare ſoule that hath not ſome notable diſeaſe: onely croſſes are thy remedies. What if they be vnpleaſant? They are phyſicke: it is enough if they be wholſome. Not pleaſant taſte, but the ſecret vertue commends medicines. If they cure thee, they ſhall pleaſe thee, euen in diſpleaſing; or elſe thou loueſt thy palate aboue thy ſoule. What madneſſe is this? When thou complaineſt of a bodily diſeaſe, thou ſendeſt to the Phyſitian, that he may ſend thee not ſauoury, but wholſome potions: thou receiueſt them in ſpight of thine abhorring ſtomach, and withall both thankeſt and rewardeſt the Phyſitian. Thy ſoule is ſicke: thy heauenly Phyſitian ſees it, and pitties thee ere thou thy ſelfe; and vnſent to, ſends thee not a plauſible, but a ſoueraigne remedie: thou loatheſt the ſauour, and rather wilt hazard thy life, than offend thy palate; and in ſtead of thankes, repineſt at, reuileſt the Phyſitian. How comes it that we loue our ſelues ſo little (if at leaſt we count our ſoules the beſt or any part) as that we had rather vndergoe death than paine, chuſing rather wilfull ſickneſſe, than an harſh remedie? Surely we men are meere fooles in the eſtimation of our owne good: like children, our choice is lead altogether by ſhew, no whit by ſubſtance. Wee cry after euery well-ſeeming toy, and put from vs ſolid proffers of good things. The wiſe Arbitrator of all things ſees our folly, and corrects it, with-holding our idle deſires, and forcing vpon vs the ſound good we refuſe. It is ſecond folly in vs, if we thanke him not. The fooliſh babe cries for his fathers bright knife, or gilded pilles. The wiſer father knowes that they can but hurt him; and therefore with-holds them after all his teares. The childe thinks he is vſed but vnkindly. Euery wiſe man, and himſelfe at more yeeres, can ſay, it was vſed but childiſh folly, in deſiring it, in complaining that he miſſed it. The loſſe of wealth, friends, health, is ſometimes gaine to vs. Thy body, thy eſtate, is worſe; thy ſoule is better, why complaineſt thou?

Sect. XIV.

The 4. and laſt part, from their iſſue.

NAy, it ſhall not be enough (mee thinkes) if onely we be but contented and thankfull, if not alſo chearefull in afflictions; if that, as we feele their paine, ſo we looke to their end; although indeed this is not more requiſite, than rarely found, as being proper onely to the good heart. Euery Bird can ſing in a cleare heauen, in a temperate ſpring; that one, as moſt familiar, ſo is moſt commended, that ſings merrie notes in the middeſt of a ſhowre, or the dead of Winter. Euery Epicure can enlarge his heart to mirth in the middeſt of his cups and dalliance; onely the three children can ſing in the furnace, Paul and Silas in the ſtockes, Martyrs at the ſtake. It is from heauen that this ioy comes, ſo contrary to all earthly occaſions, bred in the faithfull heart, through a ſerious and feeling reſpect to the iſſue of what he feeles, the quiet and vntroubled fruit of his righteouſneſſe; glory, the crowne after his fight; after his minute of paine, eternity of ioy. He neuer lookt ouer the threſhold of heauen, that cannot more reioyce that he ſhall be glorious, than mourne in preſent that he is miſerable.

Sect. XV.

Of the importunity and terror of Death.

YEa, this conſideration is ſo powerfull, that it alone is able to make a part againſt the feare or ſenſe of the laſt and greateſt of all terribles, Death it ſelfe: which in the conſcience of his owne dreadfulneſſe, iuſtly laughs at all the vaine humane precepts of Tranquillitie, appalling the moſt reſolute, and vexing the moſt cheerefull minds. Neither prophane Lucretius, with all his Epicurean rules of confidence, nor drunken Anacreon, with all his wanton Odes, can ſhift off the importunate and violent horrour of this Aduerſarie. Seeſt thou the Chaldean Tyrant beſet with the ſacred bowles of Ieruſalem, the late ſpoiles of Gods Temple; and (in contempt of their owner) carowſing healths to his Queenes, Concubines, Peeres, ſinging amids his cups, triumphant carols of praiſe to his molten and carued gods? Wouldeſt thou euer ſuſpect that this high courage could be abated? or that this ſumptuous and preſumptuous banquet (after ſo royall and iocond continuance) ſhould haue any other concluſion, but pleaſure? Stay but one houre longer, and thou ſhalt ſee that face, that now ſhines with a ruddy gloſſe (according to the colour of his liquor) looke pale and gaſtly, ſtained with the colours of feare and death; and that proud hand, which now lifts vp her maſſie Goblets in defiance of God, tremble like a leafe in a ſtorme; and thoſe ſtrong knees, which neuer ſtooped to the burden of their laden body, now not able to beare vp themſelues, but looſened with a ſudden palſie of feare, one knocking againſt the other: and all this, for that Death writes him a letter of ſummons to appeare that night before him, and accordingly ere the next Sunne, ſent two Eunuches for his honorable conueiance into another world. Where now are thoſe delicate morſels, thoſe deep draughts, thoſe merry ditties, wherewith the palate and eare ſo pleaſed themſelues? What is now become of all thoſe cheerefull lookes, looſe laughters, ſtately port, reuels, triumphs of the feaſting Court? Why doth none of his gallant Nobles reuiue the fainted courage of their Lord with a new cup? or with ſome ſtirring ieſt ſhake him out of this vnſeaſonable melancholy? O death, how imperious art thou to carnall mindes? aggrauating their miſerie not onely by expectation of future paine, but by the remembrance of the wonted cauſes of their ioy; and not ſuffering them to ſee ought but what may torment them? Euen that monſter of Ceſars, that had beene ſo well acquainted with bloud, and neuer had found better ſport than in cutting of throats; when now it came to his owne turne, how effeminate, how deſperately cowardous did he ſhew himſelfe! to the wonder of all Readers, that he which was euer ſo valiant in killing, ſhould be ſo womaniſhly heartleſſe in dying.

SECT. XVI.

THere are that feare not ſo much to be dead, as to die; the very act of diſſolution frighting them with a tormenting expectation of a ſhort, but intolerable painfulneſſe. Which let if the wiſdome of God had not interpoſed to timorous nature, there would haue beene many more Lucreces, Cleopatraes, Achitophels; and good lawes ſhould haue found little opportunitie of execution, through the wilfull funerals of malefactors. For the ſoule that comes into the body without any (at leaſt ſenſible) pleaſure, departs not from it without an extremitie of paine; which varying according to the manner and meanes of ſeparation, yet in all violent deaths eſpecially retaineth a violence not to be auoided, hard to be endured. And if diſeaſes, which are deſtin'd towards death as their end, bee ſo painfull, what muſt the end and perfection of diſeaſes be? Since as diſeaſes are the maladies of the body, ſo death is the malady of diſeaſes. There are that feare not ſo much to die, as to bee dead. If the pang be bitter, yet it is but ſhort: the comfortleſſe ſtate of the dead ſtrikes ſome that could well reſolue for the act of their paſſage. Not the worſt of the Heathen Emperours, made that moanfull dittie on his death-bed, wherein he bewraieth (to all memory) much feeling pittie of his ſoule, for her doubtfull and impotent condition after her parture. How doth Platoes worldling bewaile the miſerie of the graue, beſides all reſpect of paine! Woe is mee, that I ſhall lie alone rotting in the ſilent earth, amongſt the crawling Wormes, not ſeeing ought aboue, not ſeene. Very not-being is ſufficiently abhorred of nature, if death had no more to make it fearefull. But thoſe that haue liued vnder light enough, to ſhew them the gates of hell, after their paſſage thorow the gates of death, (and haue learned, that death is not onely horrible for our not-being here, but for being infinitly, eternally miſerable in a future world, not ſo much for the diſſolution of life, as the beginning of torment) thoſe cannot, without the certaine hope of their immunitie, but carnally feare to die, and helliſhly feare to be dead. For if it be ſuch paine to die, what is it to be euer dying? And if the ſtraining or luxation of one ioynt can ſo afflict vs, what ſhall the racking of the whole body, and the torturing of the ſoule, whoſe animation alone makes the body to feele and complaine of ſmart? And if men haue deuiſed ſuch exquiſite torments, what can ſpirits, more ſubtile, more malicious? And if our momentanie ſufferings ſeeme long, how long ſhall that be that is eternall? And if the ſorrowes indifferently incident to Gods deare ones vpon earth, be ſo extreme, as ſometimes to driue them within ſight of deſpairing, what ſhall thoſe be that are reſerued onely for thoſe that hate him, and that he hateth? None but thoſe who haue heard the deſperate complaints of ſome guiltie Spyra, or whoſe ſoules haue beene a little ſcorched with theſe flames, can enough conceiue of the horror of this eſtate; it being the policy of our common enemy to conceale it ſo long, that we may ſee and feele it at once, leſt we ſhould feare it, before it be too late to be auoided.

Sect. XVII.

Remedy of the laſt and greateſt breach of peace, ariſing from death.

NOw when this great Aduerſary, like a proud Giant, comes ſtalking out in his fearefull ſhape, and inſults ouer our fraile mortalitie, daring the world to match him with an equall Champion, whiles a whole hoſt of worldlings ſhew him their backes for feare, the true Chriſtian (armed onely with confidence and reſolution of his future happineſſe) dares boldly encounter him, and can wound him in the forehead (the wonted ſeat of terror) and trampling vpon him, can cut off his head with his owne ſword, and victoriouſly returning, can ſing in triumph, O death, where is thy ſting? An happy victory! We die, and are not foiled: yea, we are conquerours in dying: we could not ouercome death, if we died not. That diſſolution is well beſtowed, that parts the ſoule from the body, that it may vnite both to God. All our life here (as that heauenly Doctor well tearmes it) is but a vitall death. How aduantagious is that death that determines this falſe and dying life, and begins a true one, aboue all the titles of happineſſe! The Epicure or Sadduce dare not die, for feare of not being. The guiltie and looſe worldling dares not die, for feare of being miſerable. The diſtruſtfull and doubting ſemi-Chriſtian dares not die, becauſe he knowes not, whether hee ſhall be, or be miſerable, or not be at all. The reſolued Chriſtian dares, and would die, becauſe he knowes he ſhall be happy; and looking merrily towards heauen (the place of his reſt) can vnfainedly ſay, I deſire to be diſſolued: I ſee thee, my home, I ſee thee, (a ſweet and glorious home, after a weary pilgrimage) I ſee thee; and now after many lingring hopes, I aſpire to thee. How oft haue I looked vp at thee, with admiration and rauiſhment of ſoule! and by the goodly beames that I haue ſeene, gheſſed at the glory that is aboue them! How oft haue I ſcorned theſe dead and vnpleaſant pleaſures of earth, in compariſon of thine! I come now, my ioyes, I come to poſſeſſe you: I come through paine and death; yea if hell it ſelfe were in the way betwixt you and mee, I would paſſe through hell it ſelfe to enioy you. And (in truth) if that Heathen Cleombrotus (a follower of the ancient Academie) but vpon onely reading of his Maſter Platoes diſcourſes of the immortalitie of the ſoule, could caſt downe himſelfe head-long from an high rocke, and wilfully breake his necke, that he might be poſſeſſed of that immortalitie which he beleeued to follow vpon death; how contented ſhould they be to die, that knew they ſhall be (more than immortall) glorious? Hee went, not in an hate of the fleſh, as the Patrician Heretickes of old; but in a blinde loue to his ſoule, out of bare opinion: We, vpon an holy loue grounded vpon aſſured knowledge. He, vpon an opinion of future life: we on knowledge of future glory. He went, vnſent for; we, called for by our Maker. Why ſhould his courage exceed ours, ſince our ground, our eſtate ſo farre exceeds his? Euen this age, within the reach of our memorie, bred that peremptory Italian, which in imitation of old Romane courage (leſt, in that degenerated Nation, there ſhould be no ſtep left of the qualities of their Anceſtors) entring vpon his torment for killing a Tyrant, cheered himſelfe with this confidence; My death is ſharpe: my fame ſhall be euerlaſting. The voice of a Romane, not of a Chriſtian. My fame ſhall be eternall: an idle comfort. My fame ſhall liue; not my ſoule liue to ſee it. What ſhall it auaile thee to be talkt of, while thou art not? Then fame onely is precious, when a man liues to enioy it. The fame that ſuruiues the ſoule, is bootleſſe. Yet euen this hope cheered him againſt the violence of his death. What ſhould it doe vs, that (not our fame, but) our life, our glory after death, cannot die? He that hath Stephens eyes to looke into heauen, cannot but haue the tongue of the Saints, Come Lord: How long? That man, ſeeing the glory of the end, cannot but contemne the hardneſſe of the way. But who wants thoſe eyes, if he ſay and ſweares that he feares not death, beleeue him not: if he proteſt this Tranquillitie, and yet feare death, beleeue him not: beleeue him not, if he ſay he is not miſerable.

Sect. XVIII.

These are enemies on the left hand. There want not ſome on the right, which with leſſe profeſſion of hoſtilitie, hurt no leſſe. Not ſo eaſily perceiued, becauſe they diſtemper the minde, not without ſome kinde of pleaſure. Surfet kils more than famine. Theſe are the ouer-deſiring and ouer-ioying of theſe earthly things. All immoderations are enemies, as to health, ſo to peace. He that deſires, wants as much, as he that hath nothing. The drunken man is as thirſty as the ſweating traueller. Hence are the ſtudies, cares, feares, iealouſies, hopes, griefes, enuies, wiſhes, platformes of atchieuing, alterations of purpoſes, and a thouſand like; whereof each one is enough to make the life troubleſome. One is ſicke of his neighbours field, whoſe miſſhapen angles disfigure his, and hinder his Lordſhip of entireneſſe: what he hath, is not regarded, for the want of what he cannot haue. Another feeds on cruſts, to purchaſe what he muſt leaue (perhaps) to a foole, or, (which is not much better) to a prodigall heire. Another, in the extremity of couetous folly, chuſes to die an vnpitied death; hanging himſelfe for the fall of the market, while the Commons laugh at that loſſe, and in their ſpeeches Epitaph vpon him, as on that Pope, He liued as a Wolfe, and died as a Dogge. One cares not what attendance he dances at all houres, on whoſe ſtaires he ſits, what vices he ſoothes, what deformities he imitates, what ſeruile offices he doth in an hope to riſe. Another ſtomackes the couered head and ſtiffe knee of his inferiour; angry that other men thinke him not ſo good as he thinkes himſelfe. Another eats his owne heart, with enuy at the richer furniture, and better eſtate, or more honour of his neighbour; thinking his owne not good, becauſe another hath better. Another vexeth himſelfe with a word of diſgrace, paſt from the mouth of an enemy, which he neither can digeſt, nor caſt vp; reſoluing, becauſe another will be his enemy, to be his owne. Theſe humours are as manifold, as there are men that ſeeme proſperous. For the auoiding of all which ridiculous, and yet ſpightfull inconueniences, the minde muſt be ſetled in a perſwaſion of the worthleſneſſe of theſe outward things. Let it know, that theſe riches haue made many prouder, none better: That, as neuer man was, ſo neuer wiſe man thought himſelfe better for enioying them. Would that wiſe Philoſopher haue caſt his gold into the Sea, if he had not knowne he ſhould liue more happily without it? If hee knew not the vſe of riches, he was no wiſe man: if he knew not the beſt way to quietneſſe, he was no Philoſopher: now euen by the voice of their Oracle, hee was confeſſed to be both; yet caſt away his gold, that he might bee happy. Would that wiſe Prophet haue prayed as well againſt riches, as pouertie? Would ſo many great men (whereof our little Iland hath yeelded nine crowned Kings while it was held of old by the Saxons) after they had continued their life in the Throne, haue ended it in the Cell, and changed their Scepter for a Booke, if they could haue found as much felicity in the higheſt eſtate, as ſecurity in the loweſt? I heare Peter and Iohn (the eldeſt and deareſt Apoſtles) ſay, Gold & Siluer haue I none: I heare the Deuill ſay, All theſe will I giue thee; and they are mine, to giue. Whether ſhall I deſire to be in the ſtate of theſe Saints, or that deuill? He was therefore a better husband than a Philoſopher, that firſt tearmed riches Goods: and he mended the title well, that (adding a fit Epithet) called them goods of Fortune; falſe goods aſcribed to a falſe patron. There is no fortune, to giue or guide riches: there is no true goodneſſe in riches, to be guided. His meaning then was (as I can interpret it) to teach vs, in this title; that it is a chance, if euer riches were good to any. In ſumme, who would account thoſe as riches, or thoſe riches as goods, which hurt the owner, diſquiet others? which the worſt haue; which the beſt haue not, which thoſe that haue not, want not; which thoſe want that haue them: which are loſt in a night; and a man is not worſe, when he hath loſt them? It is true of them, that we ſay of fire and water; They are good ſeruants, ill maſters. Make them thy ſlaues, they ſhall be goods indeed: in vſe, if not in nature; good to thy ſelfe, good to others by thee: But if they bee thy maſters, thou haſt condemned thy ſelfe to thine owne Gallies. If a ſeruant rule, he proues a Tyrant. What madneſſe is this? thou haſt made thy ſelfe, at once, a ſlaue and a foole. What if thy chaines be of Gold? or if, with Heliogabalus, thou haſt made thee ſilken halters? thy ſeruitude may be glorious: it is no leſſe miſerable.

Sect. XIX.

The ſecond enemy on the right hand, Honour.

Honour, perhaps, is yet better; ſuch is the confuſed opinion of thoſe that know little: but a diſtinct and curious head ſhall finde an hard taske, to define in what point the goodneſſe thereof conſiſteth. Is it in high deſcent of bloud? I would thinke ſo, if nature were tied by any law to produce children like qualitied to their Parents. But, although in the brute creatures ſhee bee euer thus regular, that ye ſhall neuer finde a young Pigeon hatched in an Eagles neſt; neither can I thinke that true, or (if true, it was monſtrous) that Nicippus his ſheepe ſhould yeane a Lion: yet in the beſt creature (which hath his forme, and her attending qualities from aboue) with a likeneſſe of face and features, is commonly found an vnlikeneſſe of diſpoſition: only the earthly part followes the ſeed; wiſdome, valour, vertue, are of another beginning. Shall I bow to a molten Calfe, becauſe it was made of golden eare-rings? Shall I condemne all honour of the firſt head (though vpon neuer ſo noble deſeruing) becauſe it can ſhew nothing before it ſelfe, but a white ſhield? If Caſar or Agathocles, bee a Potters ſonne, ſhall I contemne him? Or if wiſe Bion be the ſonne of an infamous Curtizan, ſhall the cenſorious Lawyer raze him out of the Catalogue, with Partus ſequitur ventrem? Laſtly, ſhall I account that good, which is incident to the worſt? Either therefore greatneſſe muſt ſhew ſome Charter, wherein it is priuileged with ſucceſſion of vertue; or elſe the goodneſſe of honour cannot conſiſt in bloud. Is it then in the admiration and high opinion that others haue conceiued of thee, which drawes all dutifull reſpect, and humble offices from them, to thee? O fickle good, that is euer in the keeping of others! eſpecially of the vnſtable vulgar, that beaſt of many heads: whoſe diuided tongues, as they neuer agree with each other; ſo ſeldome (when euer) agree long with themſelues. Doe we not ſee the ſuperſtitious Liſtrians, that ere-while would needs make Paul a God, againſt his will; and in deuout zeale, drew crowned Bulls to the Altars of their new Iupiter and Mercury? violence can ſcarce hold them from ſacrificing to him: now not many houres after, gather vp ſtones againſt him; hauing in their conceits, turned him, from a God, into a malefactor; and are ready to kill him, in ſtead of killing a ſacrifice to him. Such is the multitude; and ſuch the ſtedfaſtneſſe of their honour. There then onely is true honour, where bloud and vertue meet together: the greatneſſe whereof is from bloud; the goodneſſe from vertue. Reioyce, yee great men, that your bloud is ennobled with the vertues and deſerts of your Anceſtors. This onely is yours: this onely challengeth all vnfained reſpect of your inferiours. Count it praiſe-worthy, not that you haue, but that you deſerue honour. Bloud may bee tainted; the opinion of the vulgar cannot be conſtant; onely vertue is euer like it ſelfe, and onely winnes reuerence, euen of thoſe that hate it. Without which, greatneſſe is as a Beacon of vice, to draw mens eyes the more to behold it: and thoſe that ſee it, dare loath it; though they dare not cenſure it. So, while the knee bendeth, the minde abhorreth; and telleth the body, it honours an vnworthy ſubiect: within it ſelfe, ſecretly comparing that vicious great man (on whom his ſubmiſſe courteſie is caſt away) to ſome goodly faire bound Senecaes Tragedies, that is curiouſly gilded without; which if a man open, he ſhall finde Thyeſtes the tombe of his owne children; or Oedipus the husband of his owne mother, or ſome ſuch monſtrous part: which he (at once) reades, and hates.

Sect. XX.

The ſecond remedy of ouer-ioyed proſperitie.

LEt him thinke, that not only theſe outward things are not in themſelues good, but that they expoſe their owners to miſery. For, beſides that God vſually puniſhes our ouer-louing them, with their loſſe, (becauſe he thinkes them vnworthy Riuals to himſelfe, who challengeth all height of loue, as his only right) ſo that the way to loſe, is to loue much; the largeneſſe moreouer either of affection, or eſtate, makes an open way to ruine: while a man walkes on plaine ground, he falls not; or, if he fall, he doth but meaſure his length on the ground, and riſe againe without harme: but he that climbeth high, is in danger of falling; and if he fall, of killing. All the ſailes hoiſed, giue vantage to a tempeſt; which (through the Mariners foreſight giuing timely roome thereto) by their fall, deliuer the Veſſell from the danger of that guſt, whoſe rage now paſſeth ouer with only beating her with waues for anger that he was preuented. So the larger our eſtate is, the fairer marke hath Miſchiefe giuen to hit; and (which is worſe) that which makes vs ſo eaſie to hit, makes our wound more deepe and grieuous. If poore Codrus his houſe burne, he ſtands by and warmes him with the flame, becauſe hee knowes it is but the loſſe of an out-ſide; which (by gathering ſome few ſtickes, ſtraw, and clay) may with little labour, and no coſt, be repaired. But, when the many lofts of the rich man doe one giue fire to another; he cries out one while of his Counting houſe, another while of his Wardrobe: then of ſome noted Cheſt; and ſtraight of ſome rich Cabinet: and lamenting both the frame and the furniture, is therefore impatient, becauſe he had ſomething.

Sect. XXI.

The vanitie of pleaſure; the third enemie on the right hand.

BVt, if there be any Sorcereſſe vpon earth, it is pleaſure: which ſo inchanteth the mindes of men, and worketh the diſturbance of our Peace, with ſuch ſecret delight, that fooliſh men thinke this want of Tranquillitie, happineſſe. She turneth men into ſwine, with ſuch ſweet charmes, that they would not change their brutiſh nature, for their former reaſon. It is a good vnquietneſſe (ſay they) that contenteth: it is a good enemy, that profiteth. Is it any wonder that men ſhould be ſottiſh, when their reaſon is maſtered with ſenſualitie? Thou foole, thy pleaſure contents thee: how much? how long? If ſhe haue not more befriended thee, than euer ſhe did any earthly fauourite: yea, if ſhee haue not giuen thee more, than ſhee hath her ſelfe; thy beſt delight hath had ſome mixture of diſcontentment. For either ſome circumſtance croſſeth thy deſire, or the inward diſtaſte of thy conſcience (checking thine appetite) permits thee not any entire fruition of thy ioy. Euen the ſweeteſt of all flowers hath his thornes: and who can determine whether the ſent be more delectable, or the prickes more irkeſome? It is enough for heauen to haue abſolute pleaſures: which if they could bee found here below; certainly, that heauen, which is now not enough deſired, would then bee feared. God will haue our pleaſures here (according to the faſhion of our ſelues) compounded: ſo as the beſt delights may ſtill ſauour of their earth. See how that great King, which neuer had any match for wiſdome, ſcarce euer any ſuperiour for wealth, trauerſed ouer all this inferiour world, with diligent inquiry, and obſeruation, and all to finde out that goodneſſe of the children of men which they enioy vnder the Sunne; abridging himſelfe of nothing that either his eyes, or his heart could ſuggeſt to him: (as what is it, that he could not either know or purchaſe?) and now comming home to himſelfe, (after the diſquiſition of all naturall and humane things) complaines, that Behold, all is not onely vanitie, but vexation. Goe then, thou wiſe Scholler of experience, and make a more accurate ſearch for that which hee ſought, and miſſed. Perhaps ſome-where (betwixt the talleſt Cedar in Lebanon, and the ſhrubby Hyſop vpon the wall) Pleaſure ſhrouded her ſelfe, that ſhe could not be de-ſcried of him; whether through ignorance, or negligence: thine inſight may be more piercing, thy meanes more commodious, thy ſucceſſe happier. If it were poſſible for any man to entertaine ſuch hopes, his vaine experience could not make him a greater foole: it could but teach him what he is and knoweth not. And yet ſo imperfect, as our Pleaſures are, they haue their ſatietie: and as their Continuance is not good, ſo their Concluſion is worſe: looke to the end, and ſee how ſudden, how bitter it is. Their only Courteſie is, to ſalute vs with a farewell; and ſuch a one, as makes their ſalutation vncomfortable. This Dalila ſhewes and ſpeakes faire; but in the end ſhe will bereaue thee of thy ſtrength, of thy ſight, yea of thy ſelfe. Theſe Gnats flie about thine eares, and make thee muſicke a while; but euermore they ſting, ere they part. Sorrow and Repentance is the beſt end of Pleaſure: Paine is yet worſe; but the worſt is Deſpaire. If thou miſſe of the firſt of theſe, one of the latter ſhall finde thee; perhaps both. How much better is it for thee, to want a little honie, than to bee ſwolne vp with a venomous ſting?

Thus then, the minde reſolued that theſe earthly things (Honour, Wealth, Pleaſures) are caſuall, vnſtable, deceitfull, imperfect, dangerous; muſt learne to vſe them without truſt, and to want them without griefe; thinking ſtill, If I haue them, I haue ſome benefit with a great charge: If I haue them not; with little reſpect of others, I haue much ſecuritie and eaſe, in my ſelfe: which once obtained, we cannot fare amiſſe in either eſtate; and without which, we cannot but miſcarrie in both.

Sect. XXII.

Poſitiue Rules of our peace.

ALL the enemies of our inward peace, are thus deſcried and diſcomforted. Which done, wee haue enough to preſerue vs from miſerie: but (ſince wee moreouer ſeek how to liue well and happily) there yet remaine thoſe Poſitiue Rules whereby our Tranquillity may be both had, continued, and confirmed. Wherein, I feare not leſt I ſhould ſeem ouer-diuine, in caſting the Anchor of Quietneſſe ſo deep as Heauen (the only ſeat of conſtancie;) whiles it can finde no hold at all vpon earth. All earthly things are full of variableneſſe: and therefore hauing no ſtay in themſelues, can giue none to vs. He that will haue and hold right Tranquillity, muſt finde in himſelſe a ſweet fruition of God, and a feeling apprehenſion of his preſence; that when he findes manifold occaſions of vexation in theſe earthly things, he (ouer-looking them all, and hauing recourſe to his Comforter) may finde in him ſuch matter of contentment, that he may paſſe ouer all theſe pettie grieuances with contempt: which whoſoeuer wants, may be ſecure, cannot be quiet. The minde of man cannot want ſome refuge, and (as we ſay of the Elephant) cannot reſt, vnleſſe it haue ſomething to leane vpon. The Couetous man, (whoſe heauen is his cheſt) when he heares himſelſe rated and curſed for oppreſſion, comes home; and ſeeing his bagges ſafe, applauds himſelſe againſt all cenſurers. The Glutton, when he loſeth friends or good name, yet ioyeth in his well furniſht table, and the laughter of his Wine: more pleaſing himſelſe in one diſh, than hee can be grieued with all the worlds miſ-carriage. The needy Scholler (whoſe wealth lies all in his braine) cheeres himſelſe againſt iniquitie of times, with the conceit of his knowledge. Theſe ſtarting holes the minde cannot want, when it is hard driuen. Now, when as like to ſome chaſed Siſera, it ſhrowds it ſelſe vnder the harbour of theſe Iaels; although they giue it houſe-roome and milke for a time, yet at laſt either they entertaine it with a naile in the Temples, or (being guiltie to their owne impotencie) ſend it out of themſelues, for ſafetie and peace. For, if the Croſſe light in that which it made his refuge (as, if the couetous man be croſſed in his riches) what earthly thing can ſtay him from a deſperate phrenſie? Or, if the Croſſe fall in a degree aboue the height of his ſtay; as if the rich man be ſicke, or dying (wherein, all wealth is either contemned, or remembred with anguiſh) how doe all his comforts (like vermine, from an houſe on fire) runne away from him, and leaue him ouer to his ruine! whiles the Soule, that hath placed his refuge aboue, is ſure that the ground of his comfort cannot be matched with an earthly ſorrow, cannot be made variable by the change of any euent; but is infinitely aboue all caſualties, and without all vncertainties. What ſtate is there, wherein this heauenly ſtay ſhall not affoord me, not only Peace, but Ioy? Am I in priſon? or in the hell of priſons (in ſome darke, low, and deſolate dungeon?) Loe there Algerius (that ſweet Martyr) findes more light than aboue; and pities the darkneſſe of our libertie. We haue but a Sunne to enlighten our world, which euery cloud dimmeth, and hideth from our eyes: but the Father of lights (in reſpect of whom, all the bright ſtars of heauen are but as the ſnuffe of a dimme candle) ſhines into his pit, and the preſence of his glorious Angels make that an heauen to him, which the world purpoſed as an hell of diſcomfort. What walls can keepe out that infinite Spirit, that fills all things? What darkneſſe can be where the God of this Sunne dwelleth? What ſorrow where he comforteth? Am I wandring in baniſhment? Can I go whither God is not? what Sea can diuide betwixt him and me? then would I feare exile, if I could be driuen away as well from God, as my countrey. Now he is as much in all earths: His title is alike to all places; and mine in him: His Sunne ſhines to me; his ſea or earth beares me vp; his preſence cheereth me, whitherſoeuer I goe. He cannot be ſaid to flit, that neuer changeth his Hoſt. He alone is a thouſand companions; he alone is a world of friends. That man neuer knew what it was to be familiar with God, that complains of the want of home, of friends, of companions, while God is with him. Am I contemned of the world? It is enough for me, that I am honoured of God: of both, I cannot. The world would loue me more, if I were leſſe friends with God. It cannot hate me ſo much as God hates it. What care I to be hated of them, whom God hateth? He is vnworthy of Gods fauour, that cannot thinke it happineſſe enough without the worlds. How eaſie is it for ſuch a man, whiles the world diſgraces him, at once to ſcorne and pitie it, that it cannot thinke nothing more contemptible than it ſelfe? I am impoueriſhed with loſſes: That was neuer throughly good, that may be loſt. My riches will not leeſe me, yea, though I forgoe all, to my skin, yet haue I not loſt any part of my wealth. For, if he be rich that hath ſomething; how rich is he, that hath the Maker and owner of all things! I am weake and diſeaſed in body: He cannot miſcarry, that hath his Maker for his Phyſitian. Yet, my ſoule (the better part) is ſound; for that cannot be weake, whoſe ſtrength God is. How many are ſicke in that, and complaine not! I can be content to be let bloud in the arme or foot, for the curing of the head or heart. The health of the principall part is more ioy to me, than it is trouble to be diſtempered in the inferiour. Let me know that God fauours me: then I haue libertie in priſon, home in baniſhment, honour in contempt, in loſſes wealth, health in infirmity, life in death; and in all theſe happineſſe. And (ſurely) if our perfect fruition of God be our compleat heauen; it muſt needs be, that our inchoate conuerſing with him is our heauen imperfectly, and the entrance into the other: which (me thinkes) differs from this, not in the kinde of it, but in the degree. For the continuation of which happy ſociety (ſith ſtrangeneſſe loſeth acquaintance and breedeth neglect) on our part muſt be a daily renuing of heauenly familiaritie, by ſeeking him vp, euen with the contempt of all inferiour diſtraction; by talking with him in our ſecret inuocations; by hearing his conference with vs; and by mutuall entertainment of each other in the ſweet diſcourſes of our daily meditations. He is a ſullen and vnſociable friend, that wants words. God ſhall take no pleaſure in vs if we be ſilent. The heart that is full of loue, cannot but haue a buſie tongue. All our talke with God is either Suits or Thankes. In them the Chriſtian heart powres out it ſelfe to his Maker; and would not change this priuilege for a world. All his annoiances, all his wants, all his diſlikes are powred into the boſome of his inuiſible friend; who likes vs ſtill ſo much more as we aske more, as we complaine more. Oh the eaſie and happy recourſe that the poore ſoule hath to the high throne of Heauen! we ſtay not for the holding out of a golden ſcepter, to warne our admiſſion, before which our preſence ſhould be preſumption and death. No houre is vnſeaſonable, no perſon too baſe, no words too homely, no fact too hard, no importunitie too great. We ſpeake familiarly, we are heard, anſwered, comforted. Another while God interchangeably ſpeakes vnto vs by the ſecret voice of his ſpirit; or by the audible ſound of his word; we heare, adore, anſwer him; by both which the minde ſo communicates it ſelfe to God, and hath God ſo plentifully communicated vnto it, that hereby it growes to ſuch an habit of heauenlineſſe, as that now it wants nothing, but diſſolution, of full glory.

Sect. XXIII.

The ſubordinate rules of Tranquillitie. 1. For actions.

OVt of this maine ground once ſetled in the heart (like as ſo many riuers from one common ſea) flow thoſe ſubordinate reſolutions, which we require as neceſſary to our peace, whether in reſpect of our actions, or our eſtate. For our actions, there muſt be a ſecret vow paſſed in the ſoule, both of conſtant refraining from whatſoeuer may offend that maieſtie we reſt vpon; and aboue this, of true and canonicall obedience to God, without all care of difficulty, and in ſpight of all contradictions of nature. Not out of the confidence of our owne power, impotent men, who are we, that we ſhould either vow or performe? But as he ſaid; Giue what thou bidſt, and bid what thou wilt. Hence the courage of Moſes durſt venture his hand to take vp the crawling and hiſſing Serpent. Hence Peter durſt walke vpon the pauement of the waues. Hence that heroicall ſpirit of Luther (a man made of metall fit for ſo great a worke) durſt reſolue and profeſſe to enter into that fore-warned Citie, though there had beene as many Deuils in their ſtreets as tiles on their houſes. Both theſe vowes as we once ſolemnly made by others; ſo, for our peace we muſt renew in our ſelues. Thus the experienced minde both knowing that it hath met with a good friend, and withall what the price of a friend is; cannot but be carefull to retaine him, and warie of diſpleaſing, and therefore to cut off all dangers of variance, voluntarily takes a double oath of allegeance of it ſelfe to God; which neither benefit ſhall induce vs to breake, if we might gaine a world, nor feare vrge vs therto, though we muſt loſe our ſelues. The wauering heart that findes continuall combats in it ſelfe betwixt Pleaſure and Conſcience, ſo equally matched that neither gets the day, is not yet capable of peace; & whether euer ouercommeth, is troubled both with reſiſtance and victory. Barren Rebecca found more eaſe, than when her twins ſtruggled in her wombe. If Iacob had beene there alone, ſhe had not complained of that painfull contention: One while Pleaſure holds the Fort, and conſcience aſſaults it; which when it hath entred at laſt by ſtrong hand, after many batteries of iudgements denounced; ere long Pleaſure either corrupts the watch, or by ſome cunning ſtratagem, findes way to recouer her firſt hold. So, one part is euer attempting, and euer reſiſting. Betwixt both, the heart cannot haue peace, becauſe it reſolues not. For while the ſoule is held in ſuſpence, it cannot enioy the pleaſure it vſeth; becauſe it is halfe taken vp with feare; only a ſtrong and reſolute repulſe of pleaſure is truly pleaſant: for therein the Conſcience (filling vs with heauenly delight) maketh ſweet triumphs in it ſelfe; as being now the Lord of his owne dominions, and knowing what to truſt to. No man knowes the pleaſure of this thought, I haue done well, but he that hath felt it: and he that hath felt it, contemnes all pleaſure to it. It is a falſe ſlander raiſed on Chriſtianitie, that it maketh men dumpiſh and melancholicke: for therefore are we heauie, becauſe we are not enough Chriſtians. We haue religion enough to miſlike pleaſures, not enough to ouercome them. But if we be once conquerours ouer our ſelues, and haue deuoted our ſelues wholly to God, there can be nothing but heauenly mirth in the ſoule. Loe here, ye Philoſophers, the true muſicke of Heauen, which the good heart continually heareth, and anſwers it in the iuſt meaſures of ioy. Others may talke of mirth, as a thing they haue heard of, or vainly fancied; only the Chriſtian feeles it; and in compariſon thereof ſcorneth the idle, ribaldiſh, and ſcurrilous mirth of the prophane.

Sᴇᴄᴛ. XXIV.

2. Rule for our actions.

AND this reſolution which we call for, muſt not only exclude manifeſtly euill actions, but alſo doubting and ſuſpenſion of minde in actions ſuſpected, and queſtionable; wherein the iudgement muſt euer giue confident determination one way. For this Tranquillitie conſiſteth in a ſteadineſſe of the minde: and how can that veſſell which is beaten vpon, by contrary waues and winds (and tottereth to either part) be ſaid to keepe a ſteady courſe? Reſolution is the only mother of ſecuritie. For inſtance: I ſee, that Vſury which was wont to be condemned for no better than a Legall theft, hath now obtained (with many) the reputation of an honeſt Trade; and is both vſed by many, and by ſome defended. It is pitie that a bad practice ſhould finde any learned or religious Patron. The ſumme of my patrimony lieth dead by me, ſealed vp in the bagge of my Father: my thriftier friends aduiſe me to this eaſie and ſure improuement. Their counſell and my gaine preuaile; my yeerely ſummes come in with no coſt but of time, wax, parchment: my eſtate likes it well; better than my conſcience; which tells me ſtill, he doubts, my trade is too eaſie to be honeſt: Yet I continue my illiberall courſe not without ſome ſcruple and contradiction: ſo as my feare of offence hinders the ioy of my profit, and the pleaſure of my gaine, heartens mee againſt the feare of iniuſtice; I would be rich with eaſe; and yet I would not be vncharitable, I would not be vniuſt. All the while I liue in vnquiet doubts, and diſtraction: Others are not ſo much entangled in my bonds, as I in my owne. At laſt, that I may be both iuſt and quiet, I conclude to referre this caſe wholly to the ſentence of my inward Iudge, the Conſcience: the Aduocates Gaine and Iuſtice plead on either part at this barre with doubtfull ſucceſſe. Gaine informes the Iudge of a new and nice diſtinction, of toothleſſe, and biting Intereſt, and brings preſidents of particular caſes of Vſury ſo farre from any breach of charitie or iuſtice, that both parts therein confeſſe themſelues aduantaged. Iuſtice pleads euen the moſt toothleſſe vſury to haue ſharpe gummes, and findes in the moſt harmeleſſe and profitable practice of it, an inſenſible wrong to the common body; beſides the infinite wrackes of priuate eſtates. The weake Iudge ſuſpends in ſuch probable allegations, and demurreth; as being ouercome of both, and of neither part: and leaues me yet no whit more quiet, no whit leſſe vncertaine. I ſuſpend my practice accordingly; being ſure it is good not to doe, what I am not ſure is good to be done: and now Gaine ſollicits me as much as Iuſtice did before. Betwixt both I liue troubleſomely: nor euer ſhall doe other, till (in a reſolute deteſtation) I haue whipped this euill Merchant out of the Temple of my heart. This rigour is my peace. Before, I could not be well, either full or faſting. Vncertaintie is much paine, euen in a more tolerable action. Neither is it (I thinke) eaſie to determine, whether it be worſe to doe a lawfull act with doubting, or an euill with reſolution: ſince that which in it ſelfe is good, is made euill to me by my doubt: and what is in nature euill, is in this one point not euill to me, that I doe it vpon a verdict of a Conſcience: ſo now my iudgement offends in not following the truth: I offend not in that I follow my iudgement: Wherein if the moſt wiſe God had left vs to roue onely according to the aime of our owne coniectures, it ſhould haue beene leſſe faultie to be Sceptickes in our actions, and either not to iudge at all, or to iudge amiſſe: but now that he hath giuen vs a perfect rule of eternall equitie, and truth, whereby to direct the ſentences of our iudgement; that vncertainty which alloweth no peace to vs, will affoord vs no excuſe before the tribunall of Heauen: wherefore, then onely is the heart quiet, when our actions are grounded vpon iudgement, and our iudgement vpon truth.

SECT. XXV.

Rules for eſtate.
1. Reliance vpon the prouidence of God.

FOr his eſtate, the quiet minde muſt firſt roll it ſelfe vpon the prouidence of the Higheſt. For, whoſoeuer ſo caſts himſelfe vpon theſe outward things, that in their proſperous eſtate he reioyceth, and (contrarily) is caſt downe in their miſcariage; I know not whether he ſhall finde more vncertaintie of reſt, or more certaintie of vnquietneſſe; ſince he muſt needs be like a light vnballaced Veſſell, that riſes and falls with euery waue, and depends only on the mercy of wind and water: But who relies on the ineuitable decree, and all-ſeeing prouidence of God, (which can neither be croſſed with ſecond thoughts, nor with euents vnlooked for,) layes a ſure ground of Tranquillitie. Let the world toſſe how it liſt, and vary it ſelfe (as it euer doth) in ſtormes and calmes; his reſt is pitched aloft, aboue the ſphere of changeable mortalitie. To begin, is harder than to proſecute: What counſell had God in the firſt moulding of thee in the wombe of thy mother? what aid ſhall he haue in repairing thee from the wombe of the earth? And if he could make, and ſhall reſtore thee without thee, why ſhall he not much more (without thy endeuour) diſpoſe of thee? Is God wiſe enough to guide the Heauens, and to produce all creatures in their kindes and ſeaſons? And ſhall he not be able to order thee alone? Thou ſayeſt, I haue ſriends, and (which is my beſt friend) I haue wealth to make both them and me; and wit to put both to beſt vſe. O the broken reeds of humane confidence! Who euer truſted on friends that could truſt to himſelfe? Who euer was ſo wiſe, as not ſometimes to be a foole in his owne conceit? oft-times in the conceit of others? Who was euer more diſcontent, than the wealthy? Friends may be falſe: Wealth cannot but be deceitfull: Wit hath made many fooles. Truſt thou to that, which (if thou wouldeſt) cannot faile thee. Not that thou deſireſt ſhall come to paſſe; but that which God hath decreed. Neither thy feares, nor thy hopes, nor vowes ſhall either forſlow or alter it. The vnexperienced paſſenger, when he ſees the Veſſell goe amiſſe or too farre, layes faſt hold on the contrary part, or on the Maſt for remedy: the Pilot laughs at his ſolly; knowing, that (what-euer he labours) the Barke will go which way the wind and his ſterne directeth it. Thy goods are embarked: Now thou wiſheſt a direct North-wind to driue thee to the Straits; and then a West, to runne in: and now, when thou haſt emptied and laded againe, thou calleſt as earneſtly for the South, and South-eaſt, to returne; and lowreſt, if all theſe anſwer thee not: As if Heauen and Earth had nothing elſe to doe, but to wait vpon thy pleaſure; and ſerued only, to be commanded ſeruice by thee. Another that hath contrary occaſion, askes for winds quite oppoſite to thine. He that ſits in Heauen, neither fits thy ſancie nor his: but bids his winds ſpet ſometimes in thy face; ſometimes to fauour thee with a ſide blaſt; ſometimes, to be boiſtrous; otherwiles, to be ſilent, at his owne pleaſure. Whether the Mariner ſing or curſe, it ſhall goe, whither it is ſent. Striue, or lie ſtill, thy deſtiny ſhall runne on; and what muſt be, ſhall be: Not that we ſhould hence exclude benefit of meanes, (which are alwaies neceſſarily included in this wiſe preordination of all things) but perplexitie of cares, and wreſtling with prouidence. Oh, the idle and ill-ſpent cares of curious men, that conſult with ſtarres, and ſpirits for their deſtinies, vnder colour of preuention! If it be not thy deſtiny; why wouldſt thou know it, what needſt thou reſiſt it? If it be thy deſtiny; why wouldſt thou know that thou canſt not preuent? That which God hath decreed, is already done in Heauen, and muſt be done on Earth. This kinde of expectation doth but haſten ſlow euils, and prolong them in their continuance: haſten them, not in their euent, but in our conceit. Shortly then, if thou ſwimmeſt againſt the ſtreame of this prouidence, thou canſt not eſcape drowning; euery waue turnes thee ouer, like a Porkpiſce before a tempeſt: But if thou ſwimmeſt with the ſtreame, doe but caſt thine armes abroad, thou paſſeſt with ſafetie, and with eaſe: it both beares thee vp, and carries thee on to the Hauen (whither God hath determined thine arriuall) in peace.

SECT.

SECT. XXVI.

The ſecond rule for eſtate. A perſwaſion of the goodnes and fitneſſe of it for vs.

NExt to this, the minde of the vnquiet man muſt be ſo wrought by theſe former reſolutions, that it be throughly perſwaded, The eſtate wherein he is, is beſt of all; if not in it ſelfe, yet to him: Not out of pride, but out of contentment: Which whoſoeuer wanteth, cannot but be continually vexed with enuie, and racked with ambition. Yea, if it were poſſible to be in Heauen without this, he could not be happy, for it is as impoſſible, for the minde at once to long after and enioy, as for a man to feed and ſleepe at once. And this is the more to be ſtriuen for, becauſe we are all naturally prone to afflict our ſelues with our owne frowardneſſe: ingratefully contemning all we haue, for what we would haue. Euen the beſt of the Patriarkes could ſay, O Lord, what wilt thou giue me, ſince I goe childleſſe? The bond-man deſires now, nothing but libertie: that alone would make him happy. Once free (forgetting his former thought) he wiſhes ſome wealth, to make vſe of his freedome; and ſaies, it were as good be ſtraited in place, as in abilitie. Once rich, he longeth after Nobilitie, thinking it no praiſe, to be a wealthy peaſant. Once noble, he begins to deeme it a baſe matter to be ſubiect: nothing can now content him but a Crowne. Then it is a ſmall matter to rule, ſo long as he hath but little Dominions, and greater neighbours. Hee would therefore be an Vniuerſall Monarch: whither then? ſurely, it vexeth him as much, that the earth is ſo ſmall a globe, ſo little a mole-hill; and that there are no more worlds to conquer. And now that he hath attained the higheſt dignitie amongſt men, he would needs be a God, conceits his immortalitie, erects Temples to his owne name, commands his dead Statues to be adored, and (not thus contented) is angry that hee cannot command heauen, and controll nature. O vaine fooles! whither doth our reſtleſſe ambition climbe? What ſhall be at length the period of our wiſhes? I could not blame theſe deſires, if contentment conſiſted in hauing much: but, now that he only hath much, that hath contentment, (and that it is as eaſily obtained in a low eſtate,) I can account of theſe thoughts no better than proudly fooliſh. Thou art poore: what difference is there betwixt a greater man and thee? ſaue that he doth his buſineſſes by others; thou doeſt them thy ſelfe. Hee hath Caters, Cookes, Baylines, Stewards, Secretaries, and all other officers for his ſeuerall ſeruices: thou prouideſt, dreſſeſt, gathereſt, receiueſt, expendeſt, writeſt for thy ſelfe. His patrimony is large: thine earnings ſmall. If Briareus feed fiftie bellies with his hundred hands; what is hee the better, than he that with two hands feedeth one? He is ſerued in ſiluer: thou in veſſell of the ſame colour, of leſſer price; as good for vſe, though not for value. His diſhes are more dainty, thine as well relliſhed to thee, and no leſſe wholſome. Hee eats Oliues, thou Garlike: hee miſlikes not more the ſmell of thy ſawce, than thou doeſt the taſte of his. Thou wanteſt ſomewhat that he hath: hee wiſheth ſomething which thou haſt, and regardeſt not. Thou couldſt be content to haue the rich mans purſe, but his gout thou wouldſt not haue: He would haue thy health, but not thy fare. If we might picke out of all mens eſtates, that which is laudable, omitting the inconueniences, we would make our ſelues complete: but if we muſt take all together, we ſhould perhaps little aduantage our ſelues with the change. For the moſt wiſe God hath ſo proportion'd out euery mans condition, that hee hath ſome iuſt cauſe of ſorrow inſeparably mixed with other contentments, and hath allotted to no man liuing, an abſolute happineſſe, without ſome grieuances; nor to any man ſuch an exquiſite miſerie, as that hee findeth not ſomewhat wherein to ſolace himſelfe: the weight whereof varies, according to our eſtimation of them. One hath much wealth, but no childe to inherit it: he enuies at the poore mans fruitfulneſſe, which hath many heires, and no lands; and could be content, with all his abundance to purchaſe a ſucceſſor of his owne loines. Another hath many children, little maintenance: he commendeth the careleſſe quietneſſe of the barren; and thinkes, fewer mouthes and more meat would doe better. The labouring man hath the bleſſing of a ſtrong body, fit to digeſt any fare, to endure any labour: yet hee wiſheth himſelfe weaker, on condition hee might bee wealthier. The man of nice education hath a feeble ſtomacke ; and (raſping ſince his laſt meale) doubts, whether he ſhould eat of his beſt diſh, or nothing : this man repines at nothing more, than to ſee his hungry Plough-man feed on a cruſt ; and wiſheth to change eſtates, on condition he might change bodies with him. Say that God ſhould giue thee thy wiſh : what wouldeſt thou deſire ? Let me (thou ſaieſt) be wiſe, healthfull, rich, honourable, ſtrong, learned, beautifull, immortall. I know thou loueſt thy ſelfe ſo well, that thou canſt wiſh all theſe and more. But ſay that God hath ſo ſhared out theſe gifts (by a moſt wiſe and iuſt diſtribution) that thou canſt haue but ſome of theſe, perhaps but one ; which wouldeſt thou ſingle out for thy ſelfe ? Any thing, beſide what thou haſt : If learned, thou wouldeſt bee ſtrong ; if ſtrong, honourable ; if honourable, long-liued : Some of theſe thou art already. Thou foole ! cannot God chooſe better for thee, than thou for thy ſelfe ? In other matches thou truſteſt the choice of a skilfuller chapman : when thou ſeeſt a goodly horſe in the Faire (though his ſhape pleaſe thine eye well) yet thou dareſt not buy him, if a cunning Horſe-maſter ſhall tell thee he is faultie ; and art willing to take a plainer and ſounder, on his commendation, againſt thy fancie. How much more ſhould we in this caſe, allow his choice that cannot deceiue vs ; that cannot bee deceiued ? But, thou knoweſt that other thou deſireſt, to be better than what thou haſt : Better perhaps for him that hath it ; not better for thee. Libertie is ſweet and profitable to thoſe that can vſe it : but fetters are better for the franticke man. Wine is good nouriſhment for the healthfull ; poyſon to the aguiſh. It is good for a ſound body to ſleepe in a whole skinne ; but hee that complaines of ſwelling ſores, cannot ſleepe till it bee broken. Hemlock to the Goat, and Spiders to the Monkey, turne to good ſuſtenance ; which to other creatures are accounted deadly. As in diets, ſo in eſtimation of good and euill, of greater and leſſer good, there is much varietie. All palats commend not one diſh ; and what one commends for moſt delicate, another reiects for vnſauourie. And if thou know what diſh is moſt pleaſant to thee, thy Phyſitian knowes beſt which is wholſome. Thou wouldeſt follow thine appetite too much ; and (as the French haue in their Prouerbe) wouldſt dig thy owne graue with thy teeth : thy wiſe Phyſitian ouer-ſees and ouer-rules thee. He ſees, if thou wert more eſteemed, thou wouldſt be proud ; if more ſtrong, licentious ; if richer, couetous ; if healthfuller, more ſecure : but thou thinkeſt not thus hardly of thy ſelfe. Fond man ! what knoweſt thou future things ? beleeue thou him, that onely knowes what would be, what will be. Thou wouldeſt willingly goe to heauen ; what better guide canſt thou haue, than him that dwells there ? If hee lead thee thorow deepe ſloughs, and brakie thickets ; know, that he knowes this the neerer way, though more comberſome. Can there be in him any want of wiſdome, not to foreſee the beſt ? Can there be any want of power, not to effect the beſt ? any want of loue, not to giue thee what hee knowes is beſt ? How canſt thou then faile of the beſt ? Since what his power can doe, and what his Wiſdome ſees ſhould be done, his Loue hath done, becauſe all are infinite. Hee willeth not things, becauſe they are good, but they are good, becauſe hee wills them. Yea, if ought had beene better, this had not beene. God willeth what hee doth : and if thy will accord not with his, whether wilt thou condemne of imperfection ?

Sect. XXVII.

The concluſion of the whole.

I Haue chalked out the way of Peace : What remaineth, but that we walke alone in it ? I haue conducted my Reader to the Mine, yea, to the Mint of happineſſe ; and ſhewed him thoſe glorious heaps, which may eternally enrich him : If (now) he ſhall goe away with his hands and skirt empty ; how is he but worthy of a miſerable want ?

Who ſhall pity vs, while we haue no mercy on our ſelues? Wilfull diſtreſſe hath neither remedie, nor compaſſion. And to ſpeake freely, I haue oft wondered at this painefull folly of vs men, who in the open view of our peace (as if we were condemned to a neceſſarie and fatall vnquietneſſe) liue vpon our owne racke, finding no more ioy, than if we were vnder no other hands, but our executioners. One droupeth vnder a fained euill; another augments a ſmall ſorrow through impatience; another drawes vpon himſelfe an vncertaine euill through feare; one ſeekes true contentment, but not enough; another hath iuſt cauſe of ioy, and perceiues it not: One is vexed, for that his grounds of ioy are matched with equall grieuances; another cannot complaine of any preſent occaſion of ſorrow, yet liues ſullenly, becauſe he findes not any preſent cauſe of comfort; one is hanted with his ſinne; another diſtracted with his paſſion: amongſt all which, he is a miracle of all men that liues, not ſome-way diſcontented. So we liue not while we doe liue, onely for that we want either wiſdome, or will, to husband our liues to our owne beſt aduantage. O the inequality of our cares! Let riches or honour be in queſtion, we ſue to them, we ſeeke for them with importunity, with ſeruile ambition: our paines need no ſollicitor; yea, there is no way wrong that leads to this end; wee abhorre the patience to ſtay till they inquire for vs. And if euer (as it rarely happens) our deſert and worthineſſe winnes vs the fauour of this proffer, we meet it with both hands, not daring with our modeſt denials to whet the inſtancie, and double the intreaties of ſo welcome ſuiters. Yet loe, here the onely true and precious riches, the higheſt aduancement of the ſoule, peace and happineſſe, ſeekes for vs, ſues to vs for acceptation; our anſwers are coy and ouerly, ſuch as we giue to thoſe clients that looke to gaine by our fauours. If our want were through the ſcarcitie of good, we might yet hope for pity to eaſe vs: but now that it is through negligence, and that we periſh with our hands in our boſome, we are rather worthy of ſtripes, for the wrong we doe our ſelues, than of pity for what we ſuffer. That wee may and will not, in opportunitie of hurting others, is noble and Chriſtian: but in our owne benefit ſluggiſh, and ſauouring of the worſt kinde of vnthriftineſſe.

Saieſt thou then, this peace is good to haue, but hard to get? It were a ſhamefull neglect that hath no pretence. Is difficulty ſufficient excuſe to hinder thee from the purſuit of riches, of preferment, of learning, of bodily pleaſures? Art thou content to ſit ſhrugging in a baſe cottage, ragged, famiſhed, becauſe houſe, clothes, and food will neither be had without money, nor money without labour, nor labour without trouble and painfulneſſe? Who is ſo mercifull, as not to ſay that a whip is the beſt almes for ſo lazie and wilfull need? Peace ſhould not be good if it were not hard: Goe, and by this excuſe ſhut thy ſelfe out of heauen at thy death, and liue miſerably till thy death, becauſe the good of both worlds is hard to compaſſe. There is nothing but miſerie on earth and hell below, that thou canſt come to without labour: And if we can bee content to caſt away ſuch immoderate and vnſeaſonable paines vpon theſe earthly trifles, as to weare our bodies with violence, and to encroach vpon the night for time to get them; what madneſſe ſhall it ſeeme in vs, not to afford a leſſe labour to that which is infinitely better, and which onely giues worth and goodneſſe to the other? Wherefore if we haue not vowed enmity with our ſelues, if we be not in loue with miſery and vexation, if wee be not obſtinately careleſſe of our owne good; let vs ſhake off this vnthriftie, dangerous, and deſperate negligence, and quicken theſe dull hearts to a liuely and effectuall ſearch of what onely can yeeld them ſweet and abiding contentment: which once attained, how ſhall we inſult ouer euils, and bid them doe their worſt? How ſhall we vnder this calme and quiet day, laugh at the rough wether and vnſteady motions of the world? How ſhall heauen and earth ſmile vpon vs, and we on them; commanding the one, aſpiring to the other? How pleaſant ſhall our life be, while neither ioyes nor ſorrowes can diſtemper it with exceſſe? yea while the matter of ioy that is within vs, turnes all the moſt ſad occurrences into pleaſure? How deare and welcome ſhall our death be, that ſhall but lead vs from one heauen to another, from peace to glory? Go now, ye vaine and idle worldlings, and pleaſe your ſelues in the large extent of your rich Mannors, or in the homage of thoſe whom baſeneſſe of minde hath made ſlaues to your greatneſſe, or in the price and faſhions of your full ward-robe, or in the wanton varieties of your delicate Gardens, or in your coffers full of red and white earth; or if there be any other earthly thing, more alluring, more precious, enioy it, poſſeſſe it, and let it poſſeſſe you: Let mee haue onely my Peace; and let mee neuer want it, till I enuie you.

THE ART OF DIVINE MEDITATION:

EXEMPLIFIED WITH TWO Large Patternes of Meditation:

The one of eternall Life, as the end;

The other of Death, as the way.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVLL SIR

RICHARD LEA, Knight, all increaſe of true honour with God and men.

SIR, euer ſince I began to beſtow my ſelfe vpon the common good, ſtudying wherein my labours might bee moſt ſeruiceable; I ſtill found they could be no way ſo wel improued, as in that part which concerneth deuotion, and the practiſe of true pietie. For on the one ſide I perceiued the number of Polemicall bookes, rather to breed than end ſtrifes; and thoſe which are doctrinall, by reaſon of their multitude, rather to oppreſſe than ſatisfie the Reader; wherein, if we write the ſame things, we are iudged tedious; if different, ſingular. On the other part, reſpecting the Reader, I ſaw the braines of men neuer more ſtuffed, their tongues neuer more ſtirring, their hearts neuer more emptie, nor their hands more idle. Wherefore after thoſe ſudden Meditations which paſſed me without rule, I was eaſily induced by their ſucceſſe (as a ſmall thing moues the willing) to ſend forth this Rule of Meditation, and after my Heauen vpon Earth, to diſcourſe (although by way of example) of Heauen aboue. In this Art of mine, I confeſſe to haue receiued more light from one obſcure nameleſſe Monke, which wrote ſome hundred and twelue yeeres agoe, than from the directions of all other Writers. I would his humility had not not made him niggardly of his name, that we might haue knowne whom to haue thanked. It had beene eaſie to haue framed it with more curioſitie: but God and my ſoule know, that I made profit the ſcope of my labour, and not applauſe; and therefore (to chuſe) I wiſhed rather to be rude than vnprofitable. If now the ſimplicitie of any Reader ſhall bereaue him of the benefit of my precepts, I know he may make his vſe of my examples. Why I haue honoured it with your name, I need not giue account to the world, which already knoweth your worth and deſerts; and ſhall ſee by this, that I acknowledge them. Goe you on happily (according to the heauenly aduice of your Iunius*) in your worthy and glorious profeſſion, ſtill bearing your ſelfe as one that knoweth vertue the trueſt Nobilitie, and Religion the beſt vertue. The God whom you ſerue, ſhall honour you with men, and crowne you in heauen. To his grace I humbly commend you: requeſting you onely to accept the worke, and continue your fauour to the Author.*

Your VVorſhips humbly deuoted,

THE

THE ART OF DIVINE MEDITATION.

Chap. I.

The benefit and vſes of Meditation.

IT is not, I ſuppoſe, a more bold than profitable labour, after the endeuours of ſo many contemplatiue men, to teach the Art of Meditation: An heauenly buſineſſe, as any belongeth either to man or Chriſtian; and ſuch as whereby the ſoule doth vnſpeakably benefit it ſelfe. For by this doe we ranſacke our deepe and falſe hearts, finde out our ſecret enemies, buckle with them, expell them, arme our ſelues againſt their re-entrance. By this, wee make vſe of all good meanes, fit our ſelues to all good duties; by this we deſcrie our weakneſſe, obtaine redreſſe, preuent tentations, cheare vp our ſolitarineſſe, temper our occaſions of delight, get more light vnto our knowledge, more heat to our affections, more life to our deuotion. By this we grow to be (as wee are) ſtrangers vpon earth; and, out of a right eſtimation of all earthly things, into a ſweet fruition of inuiſible comforts. By this, wee ſee our Sauiour with Steuen, we talke with God as Moſes, and by this we are rauiſhed with bleſſed Paul into Paradiſe, and ſee that Heauen which we are loth to leaue, which we cannot vtter. This alone is the remedie of ſecuritie and worldlineſſe, the paſtime of Saints, the ladder of heauen, and in ſhort, the beſt improuement of Chriſtianitie. Learne it who can, and neglect it who liſt; he ſhall neuer finde ioy, neither in God nor in himſelfe, which doth not both know and practiſe it. And how-euer of old ſome hidden Cloyſters haue ingroſſed it to themſelues, and confined it within their Cells, who indeed profeſſing nothing but contemplation, through their immunitie from thoſe cares which accompany an actiue life, might haue the beſt leiſure to this buſineſſe: yet ſeeing there is no man ſo taken vp with action, as not ſometimes to haue a free minde; and there is no reaſonable minde ſo ſimple, as not to be able both to diſcourſe ſomewhat and to better it ſelfe by her ſecret thoughts; I deeme it an enuious wrong to conceale that from any, whoſe benefit may be vniuerſall. Thoſe that haue but a little ſtocke, had need to know the beſt rules of thrift.

Which are vniuerſall to all Chriſtians, and not to be appropriated to ſome profeſſions.

Chap. II.

The deſcription and kindes of Meditation.

THe rather, for that whereas our Diuine Meditation is nothing elſe but a bending of the minde vpon ſome ſpirituall obiect, through diuers formes of diſcourſe, vntill our thoughts come to an iſſue: and this muſt needs be either Extemporall, and occaſioned by outward occurrences offered to the minde; or deliberate, and wrought out of our owne heart: which againe is either in matter of Knowledge, ledge, for the finding out of ſome hidden truth, and conuincing of an hereſie by profound trauerſing of reaſon; or in matter of Affection, for the enkindling of our loue to God: the former of theſe two laſt, wee ſending to the Schooles and Maſters of Controuerſies, ſearch after the latter; which is both of larger vſe, and ſuch as no Chriſtian can reiect, as either vnneceſſary, or ouer-difficult: for, both euery Chriſtian had need of fire put to his affections, and weaker iudgements are no leſſe capable of this diuine heat, which proceeds not ſo much from reaſon, as from faith.

One ſaith (and I beleeue him) that Gods Schoole is more of Affection, than Vnderſtanding: Both leſſons very needfull, very profitable; but for this age, eſpecially the latter: for if there be ſome that haue much zeale, little knowledge, there are more that haue much knowledge without zeale. And he that hath much skill, and no affection, may doe good to others by information of iudgement, but ſhall neuer haue thanke either of his owne heart, or of God, who vſeth not to caſt away his loue on thoſe, of whom he is but knowne, not loued.

Chap. III.

Concerning Meditation Extemporall.

OF Extemporall Meditation there may be much vſe, no rule: foraſmuch as our conceits herein varie according to the infinite multitude of obiects, and their diuers manner of profering themſelues to the minde; as alſo for the ſuddenneſſe of this act. Man is placed in this Stage of the world, to view the ſeuerall natures and actions of the creature; to view them, not idly, without his vſe, as they doe him: God made all theſe for man, and man for his owne ſake. Both theſe purpoſes were loſt, if man ſhould let the creatures paſſe careleſly by him, only ſeene, not thought vpon. He only can make benefit of what he ſees; which if he doe not, it is all one, as if he were blinde or bruit. Whence it is, that wiſe Salomon putteth the ſluggard to ſchoole vnto the Ant; and our Sauiour ſendeth the diſtruſtfull to the Lillie of the field.

In this kinde was that Meditation of the diuine Pſalmiſt, which vpon the view of the glorious frame of the Heauens, was led to wonder at the mercifull reſpect God hath to ſo poore a creature as man. Thus our Sauiour tooke occaſion of the water fetcht vp ſolemnly to the Altar, from the Well of Shilo, on the day of the great Hoſannah, to meditate and diſcourſe of the Water of life. Thus holy and ſweet Auguſtine, from occaſion of the water-courſe neere to his lodging, running among the pebbles, ſometimes more ſilently, ſometimes in a baſer murmure, and ſometimes in a ſhriller note, entred into the thought & diſcourſe of that excellent order which God hath ſetled in all theſe inferiour things. Thus that learned and heauenly ſoule of our late Eſtye, when we ſate together and heard a ſweet conſort of Muſicke, ſeemed vpon this occaſion carried vp for the time before-hand to the place of his reſt, ſaying, not without ſome paſſion, What Muſicke may wee thinke there is in heauen? Thus laſtly (for who knowes not that examples of this kinde are infinite?) that faithfull and reuerend Deering, when the Sun ſhined on his face now lying on his death-bed, fell into a ſweet Meditation of the glory of God, and his approching ioy. The thoughts of this nature are not only lawful, but ſo behoueful, that we cannot omit them, without neglect of God, his creatures, our ſelues. The creatures are halfe loſt, if we only employ them, not learne ſomething of them. God is wronged, if his creatures be vnregarded; our ſelues moſt of all, if we reade this great volume of the creatures, and take out no leſſon for our inſtruction.

Chap. IV.

Cautions of Extemporall Meditation.

WHerein yet caution is to be had, that our Meditations be not either too farre fetcht, or ſauouring of ſuperſtition. Farre fetcht I call thoſe, which haue not a faire & eaſie reſemblance vnto the matter from whence they are raiſed; in which caſe our thoughts proue looſe and heartleſſe, making no memorable impreſſion in the mind. Superſtitious, when we make choiſe of thoſe grounds of Meditation, which are forbidden vs as Teachers of Vanitie; or imploy our owne deuices (though well grounded) to an vſe aboue their reach; making them, vpon our owne pleaſures, not onely furtherances, but parts of Gods worſhip; in both which, our Meditations degenerate, and grow rather perillous to the ſoule. Whereto adde, that the minde be not too much cloyed with too frequent iteration of the ſame thought; which at laſt breeds a wearineſſe in our ſelues, & an vnpleaſantneſſe of that conceit, which at the firſt entertainment promiſed much delight. Our nature is too ready to abuſe familiaritie in any kinde: and it is with Meditations, as with Medicines; which with ouer-ordinarie vſe, loſe their ſoueraignty; and fill, in ſtead of purging. God hath not ſtraited vs for matter, hauing giuen vs the ſcope of the whole world; ſo that there is no creature, euent, action, ſpeech, which may not afford vs new matter of Meditation. And that which we are wont to ſay of fine wits, we may as truly affirme of the Chriſtian heart, that it can make vſe of any thing. Wherefore as trauellers in a foraine countrey make euery ſight a leſſon; ſo ought we in this our pilgrimage. Thou ſeeſt the heauen rolling aboue thine head, in a conſtant and vnmoueable motion; the ſtarres ſo ouer-looking one another, that the greateſt ſhew little, the leaſt greateſt, all glorious: the aire full of the bottles of raine, or fleeces of ſnow, or diuers formes of fiery Exhalations: the Sea vnder one vniforme face, full of ſtrange and monſtrous ſhapes beneath: the earth ſo adorned with varietie of plants, that thou canſt not but tread on many at once with euery foot; beſides the ſtore of creatures, that flie about it, walke vpon it, liue in it. Thou idle Truant, doeſt thou learne nothing of ſo many maſters? Haſt thou ſo long read theſe capitall letters of Gods great Booke, and canſt thou not yet ſpell one word of them? The brute creatures ſee the ſame things, with as cleere, perhaps better eies. If thine inward eies ſee not their vſe, as well as thy bodily eies their ſhape, I know not whether is more reaſonable or leſſe brutiſh.

Chap. V.

Of Meditation deliberate.

DEliberate Meditation is that wee chiefly inquire for; which both may bee well guided, and ſhall be not a little furthered by precepts; part whereof the labours of others ſhall yeeld vs, and part, the plaineſt miſtreſſe, Experience: wherein order requires of vs firſt, the qualities of the perſon fit for meditation; then the circumſtances, manner, and proceedings of the worke.

Wherein firſt, the qualities of the perſon. Of whom is required: Firſt, that hee bee pure from his ſinnes.

The hill of Meditation may not be climbed with a profane foot; but as in the deliuery of the Law, ſo here, no beaſt may touch Gods hill, leſt he die; only the pure of heart haue promiſe to ſee God. Sinne dimmeth and dazeleth the eie, that it cannot behold ſpirituall things. The Guard of heauenly Souldiers was about Eliſhaes ſeruant before; hee ſaw them not before, through the ſcales of his infidelity. The ſoule muſt therefore bee purged, ere it can profitably meditate. And as of old they were wont to ſearch for, and thruſt out malefactors from the preſence, ere they went to ſacrifice; ſo muſt we our ſins, ere we offer our thoughts to God. Firſt, ſaith Dauid, I will waſh my hands in innocency, then I will compaſſe thine Altar. Whereupon not vnfitly did that worthy Chancellour of Paris make the firſt ſtaire of his Ladder of Contemplation, Humble Repentance. The cloth that is white (which is wont to be the colour of innocencie) is capable of any Dye; the blacke, of none other. Not that we require an abſolute perfection, (which, as it is incident vnto none, ſo if it were, would exclude all need and vſe of Meditation) but rather an honeſt ſinceritie of the heart, not willingly ſinning, willingly repenting when we haue ſinned: which who ſo findes in himſelfe, let him not thinke any weakneſſe a lawfull barre to Meditation. He that pleads this excuſe, is like ſome ſimple man, which being halfe ſtarued with cold, refuſeth to come neere the fire, becauſe hee findeth not heat enough in himſelfe.

Chap.

Hall, J.

CHAP. VI.

Secondly, that hee bee free from worldly thoughts.

NEither may the ſoule that hopeth to profit by meditation, ſuffer it ſelfe for the time entangled with the world; which is all one, as to come to Gods flaming buſh on the hill of viſions, with our ſhooes on our feet. Thou ſeeſt the bird, whoſe feathers are limed, vnable to take her former flight: ſo are wee, when our thoughts are clinged together by the world, to ſoare vp to our heauen in Meditation. The paire of brothers muſt leaue their nets, if they wil follow Chriſt; Eliſha his oxen, if he will attend a Prophet. It muſt be a free and a light minde that can aſcend this Mount of Contemplation, ouercomming this height, this ſteepeneſſe. Cares are an heauy load, and vneaſie: theſe muſt be laid downe at the bottome of this hill, if we euer looke to attaine the top. Thou art loaded with houſhold cares, perhaps publike; I bid thee not caſt them away: euen theſe haue their ſeaſon, which thou canſt not omit without impietie: I bid thee lay them downe at thy Cloſet doore, when thou attempteſt this worke. Let them in with thee, thou ſhalt finde them troubleſome companions, euer diſtracting thee from thy beſt errand. Thou wouldeſt thinke of heauen, thy Barne comes in thy way, or perhaps thy count-Booke, or thy Coffers, or it may be, thy minde is beforehand trauelling vpon the morrowes iourney. So, while thou thinkeſt of many things, thou thinkeſt of nothing; while thou wouldeſt goe many waies, thou ſtandeſt ſtill. And as in a crowd, while many preſſe forward at once thorow one doore, none proceedeth; ſo when variety of thoughts tumultuouſly throng in vpon the minde, each proueth a barre to the other, and all an hinderance to him that entertaines them.

CHAP. VII.

Thirdly, that he be conſtant: and that, Firſt, in time and matter.

ANd as our Clyent of Meditation muſt both bee pure and free in vndertaking this taske, ſo alſo conſtant in continuing it; Conſtant both in time and in matter, both in a ſet courſe and houre reſerued for this worke, and in an vnwearied proſecution of it once begunne. Thoſe that meditate by ſnatches and vncertaine fits, when onely all other employments forſake them, or when good motions are thruſt vpon them by neceſſity, let them neuer hope to reach to any perfection. For theſe feeble beginnings of luke-warme grace, which are wrought in them by one fit of ſerious Meditation, are ſoone extinguiſhed by intermiſſion, and by miſ-wonting periſh: This daies meale (though large and liberall) ſtrengthens thee not for to morrow: the body languiſheth, if there be not a daily ſupply of repaſt. Thus feed thy ſoule by meditation; Set thine houres and keep them, and yeeld not to an eaſie diſtraction. There is no hardneſſe in this practice, but in the beginning; vſe ſhall giue it not eaſe onely, but delight. Thy companion entertaineth thee this while in louing diſcourſes, or ſome inexpected buſineſſe offers to interrupt thee. Neuer any good worke ſhall want ſome hinderance: Either breake thorow the lets, except it be with inciuilitie or loſſe; or if they be importunate, pay thy ſelfe the time that was vnſeaſonably borrowed; and recompence thine omitted houres with the double labours of another day: For thou ſhalt finde, that deferring breeds (beſide the loſſe) an indiſpoſition to good; So that what was before pleaſant to thee, being omitted, to morrow growes harſh; the next day vnneceſſarie; afterward odious: To day thou canſt, but wilt not; to morrow thou couldeſt, but liſteſt not; the next day thou neither wilt nor canſt bend thy minde on theſe thoughts. So I haue ſeene friends that vpon neglect of duty grow ouerly: vpon ouerlineſſe ſtrange; vpon ſtrangeneſſe to vtter defiance. Thoſe, whoſe very trade is Diuinitie, (mee thinkes) ſhould omit no day without his line of Meditation: thoſe which are ſecular men, not many; remembring that they haue a common calling of Chriſtianitie to attend, as well as a ſpeciall vocation in the world: and that other being more noble and important, may iuſtly challenge both often and diligent ſeruice.

Chap. VIII.

Secondly, that he be conſtant in the continuance.

ANd as this conſtancy requires thee to keepe day with thy ſelfe, vnleſſe thou wilt proue bankrupt in good exerciſes; ſo alſo that thy minde ſhould dwell vpon the ſame thought without flitting, without wearineſſe, vntill it haue attained to ſome iſſue of ſpirituall profit: otherwiſe it attempteth much, effecteth nothing. What auaileth it to knock at the doore of the hart, if we depart ere we haue an anſwer? What are we the warmer, if we paſſe haſtily along by the heart, and ſtay not at it? Thoſe that doe onely trauell thorow Africke, become not Blackmoores; but thoſe which are borne there, thoſe that inhabit there. We account thoſe damoſels too light of their loue, which betroth themſelues vpon the firſt ſight, vpon the firſt motion: and thoſe we deeme of much price, which require long and earneſt ſolliciting. He deceiueth himſelfe that thinketh grace ſo eaſily wonne; there muſt be much ſuit and importunity, ere it will yeeld to our deſires: Not that we call for a perpetuitie of this labour of Meditation; Humane frailty could neuer beare ſo great a toile. Nothing vnder Heauen is capable of a continuall motion without complaint. It is enough for the glorified ſpirits aboue, to be euer thinking, and neuer weary. The minde of man is of a ſtrange metall; if it be not vſed, it ruſteth; if vſed hardly, it breaketh: briefly, is ſooner dulled than ſatisfied with a continuall Meditation. Whence it came to paſſe, that thoſe ancient Monkes, who intermedled bodily labour with their contemplations, proued ſo excellent in this diuine buſineſſe; when thoſe at this day, which hauing mewed and mured vp themſelues from the world, ſpend themſelues wholly vpon their Beads and Crucifix, pretending no other worke but Meditation, haue cold hearts to God, and to the world ſhew nothing but a dull ſhadow of deuotion: for, that, if the thoughts of theſe latter were as diuine as they are ſuperſtitious, yet being, without all interchangeableneſſe, bent vpon the ſame diſcourſe, the mind muſt needs grow weary, the thoughts remiſſe and languiſhing, the obiects tedious: while the other refreſhed themſelues with this wiſe variety, employing the hands, while they called off the minde, as good Comœdians ſo mix their parts, that the pleaſantneſſe of the one, may temper the auſtereneſſe of the other; whereupon they gained both enough to the body, and to the ſoule more than if it had beene all the while buſied.

Beſides, the excellencie of the obiect letteth this aſſiduity of Meditation, which is ſo glorious, that like vnto the Sunne, it may abide to haue an eye caſt vp to it for a while, will not be gazed vpon; whoſoeuer ventureth ſo farre, loſeth both his hope and his wits. If we hold with that bleſſed Monica, that ſuch like cogitations are the food of the minde, yet euen the minde alſo hath her ſatiety, and may ſurfet of too much. It ſhall be ſufficient therefore, that we perſeuere in our Meditation, without any ſuch affectation of perpetuity, and leaue without a light fickleneſſe; making alwaies not our Houreglaſſe, but ſome competent increaſe of our deuotion, the meaſure of our continuance; knowing, that as for Heauen, ſo for our purſuit of grace, it ſhall auaile vs little to haue begun well, without perſeuerance: and withall, that the ſoule of man is not alwaies in the like diſpoſition: but ſometimes is longer in ſetling, through ſome vnquietneſſe, or more obſtinate diſtraction; ſometimes heauier, and ſometimes more actiue, and nimble to diſpatch. * Gerſon (whoſe authority I rather vſe, becauſe our aduerſaries diſclaime him for theirs) profeſſeth, he hath beene ſometimes foure houres together working his heart, ere he could frame it to purpoſe. A ſingular patterne of vnwearied conſtancy, of an vnconquerable ſpirit; whom his preſent vnfitneſſe did not ſo much diſcourage, as it whetted him to ſtriue with himſelfe till he could ouercome. And ſurely other victories are hazzardous, this certaine, if we will perſiſt to ſtriue: other fights are vpon hope, this vpon aſſurance; whiles our ſucceſſe dependeth vpon the promiſe of God, which cannot diſappoint vs. Perſiſt therefore, and preuaile: perſiſt till thou haſt preuailed: ſo that which thou beganſt with difficulty, ſhall end in comfort.

* Sauing our iuſt quarrell againſt him for the Councell of Conſtance.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Circumſtance of Meditation.

And therein, Firſt, of the place.

FRom the qualities of the Perſon, we deſcend towards the action it ſelfe: where firſt we meet with thoſe circumſtances which are neceſſary for our prediſpoſition to the worke; Place, Time, Site of the body.

Solitarineſſe of Place is fitteſt for Meditation. Retire thy ſelfe from others, if thou wouldſt talke profitably with thy ſelfe. So IESVS meditates alone in the Mount, Iſaac in the fields, Iohn Baptiſt in the Deſart, Dauid on his bed, Chryſoſtome in the Bath, each in ſeuerall places; but all ſolitary. There is no place free from God, none to which he is more tied: one findes his Cloſet moſt conuenient, where his eyes being limited by the knowne walls, call the minde after a ſort from wandring abroad. Another findeth his ſoule more free, when it beholdeth his heauen aboue and about him. It matters not ſo we be ſolitary and ſilent. It was a witty and diuine ſpeech of Bernard, that the Spouſe of the ſoule, CHRIST IESVS, is baſhfull, neither willingly commeth to his Bride in the preſence of a multitude. And hence is that ſweet inuitation which we finde of her: Come, my welbeloued, let vs goe forth into the fields: let vs lodge in the villages. Let vs goe up early to the Vines: let vs ſee if the Vine flouriſh, whether it hath diſcloſed the firſt Grape, or whether the Pomegranates bloſſome; there will I giue thee my loue. Abandon therefore all worldly ſocietie, that thou mayeſt change it for the company of GOD and his Angels; the ſociety, I ſay, of the world, not outward onely, but inward alſo. There be many that ſequeſter themſelues from the viſible company of men; which yet carry a world within them; who being alone in body, are haunted with a throng of fancies: as Ierome, in his wildeſt Deſart, found himſelfe too oft in his thoughts amongſt the dances of the Roman Dames. This company is worſe than the other: for it is more poſſible for ſome thoughtfull men to haue a ſolitary minde in the middeſt of a market, than for a man thus diſpoſed to be alone in a wilderneſſe. Both companies are enemies to Meditations: whither tendeth that ancient counſell of a great Maſter in this Art, of three things requiſite to this buſineſſe, Secrecie, Silence, Reſt: whereof the firſt excludeth company, the ſecond noiſe, the third motion. It cannot be ſpoken how ſubiect we are in this worke, to diſtraction, like Salomons old man, whom the noiſe of euery bird wakeneth: ſenſuall delights we are not drawne from with the three-fold cords of iudgement; but our ſpirituall pleaſures are eaſily hindered. Make choice therefore of that place, which ſhall admit the feweſt occaſions of with-drawing thy ſoule from good thoughts: wherein alſo euen change of places is ſomewhat preiudiciall; and I know not how it falls out, that wee finde God neerer vs in the place where wee haue beene accuſtomed familiarly to meet him: not for that his preſence is confined to one place aboue others, but that our thoughts are, through cuſtome more eaſily gathered to the place where we haue ordinarily conuerſed with him.

CHAP. X.

Secondly, of the time.

ONe Time cannot be preſcribed to all: for neither is God bound to houres, neither doth the contrary diſpoſition of men agree in one choice of opportunities: the golden houres of the morning ſome finde fitteſt for Meditation, when the body newly raiſed, is well calmed with his late reſt, and the ſoule hath not as yet had from theſe outward things any motiues of alienation. Others finde it beſt to learne wiſdome of their reines in the night; hoping with Iob, that their bed will bring them comfort in their Meditation; when both all other things are ſtill, and themſelues, wearied with theſe earthly cares, doe out of a contempt of them, grow into greater liking and loue of heauenly things. I haue euer found Iſaacs time fitteſt, who went out in the euening to meditate. No precept, no practice of others can preſcribe to vs in this circumſtance. It ſhall be enough, that firſt we ſet out ſelues a time: ſecondly, that we ſet apart that time, wherein we are apteſt for this ſeruice. And as no time is preiudiced with vnfitneſſe, but euery day is without difference ſeaſonable for this worke, ſo eſpecially Gods Day. No day is barren of grace to the ſearcher of it, none alike fruitfull to this; which being by God ſanctified to himſelfe, and to be ſanctified by vs to God, is priuileged with bleſſings aboue others: for the plentifull inſtruction of that Day ſtirreth thee vp to this action, and fills thee with matter; and the zeale of thy publike ſeruice warmeth thy heart to this other buſineſſe of deuotion. No MANNA fell to the Iſraelites on their Sabbath; our ſpirituall MANNA falleth on ours, moſt frequent: if thou wouldſt haue a full ſoule, gather as it falls; gather it by hearing, reading, meditation: ſpirituall idleneſſe is a fault this Day, perhaps not leſſe than bodily worke.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Site and geſture of the body.

NEither is there leſſe varietie in the Site and geſture of the body: the due compoſedneſſe whereof is no little aduantage to this exerciſe; euen in our ſpeech to God, we obſerue not alwaies one and the ſame poſition; ſometimes we fall groueling on our faces; ſometimes we bow our knees; ſometimes ſtand on our feet; ſometimes we lift vp our hands, ſometimes caſt downe our eyes. God is a Spirit, who therefore being a ſeuere obſeruer of the diſpoſition of the ſoule, is not ſcrupulous for the body; requiring not ſo much, that the geſture thereof ſhould be vniforme, as reuerent. No maruell therefore though in this, all our teachers of Meditation haue commended ſeuerall poſitions of body, according to their diſpoſition and practice.* One, ſitting with the face turned vp to heauen-ward, according to the precept of the Philoſopher, who taught him, that by ſitting and reſting, the mind gathereth wiſdome.* Another, leaning to ſome Reſt, towards the left ſide, for the greater quieting of the heart. * A third, ſtanding with the eyes lift vp to Heauen, but ſhut, for feare of diſtractions. But of all other (me thinketh) Iſaacs choice the beſt, who meditated walking. In this let euery man be his owne maſter; ſo be we vſe that frame of body that may both teſtifie reuerence, and in ſome caſes helpe to ſtirre vp further deuotion; which alſo muſt needs be varied according to the matter of our Meditation. If we thinke of our ſinnes, Ahabs ſoft paſe, the Publicans deiected eyes, and his hand beating his breſt, are more ſeaſonable. If of the ioyes of heauen, Steuens countenance fixed aboue, and Dauids hands lift vp on high, are moſt fitting. In all which, the body, as it is the inſtrument and vaſſall of the ſoule, ſo will eaſily follow the affections thereof; and in truth then is our deuotion moſt kindly, when the body is thus commanded his ſeruice by the Spirit, and not ſuffered to goe before it, and by his forwardneſſe to prouoke his maſter to emulation.

CHAP. XII.

Of the matter and ſubiect of our Meditation.

NOw time and order call vs from theſe circumſtances, to the matter and ſubiect of Meditation: which muſt be Diuine and Spirituall; not euill, nor worldly. O the carnall and vnprofitable thoughts of men! We all meditate; one, how to doe ill to others; another, how to doe ſome earthly good to himſelfe: another, to hurt himſelfe, vnder a colour of good, as how to accompliſh his lewd deſires, the fulfilling whereof proueth the bane of the ſoule; how he may ſinne vnſeene, and goe to hell with the leaſt noiſe of the world. Or perhaps, ſome better mindes bend their thoughts vpon the ſearch of naturall things; the motions of euery heauen, and of euery ſtarre; the reaſon and courſe of the ebbing and flowing of the Sea; the manifold kindes of ſimples that grow out of the earth, and creatures that creepe vpon it; with all their ſtrange qualities, and operations. Or perhaps, the ſeuerall formes of gouernment, and rules of State take vp their buſie heads: ſo that while they would be acquainted with the whole world, they are ſtrangers at home, and while they ſeeke to know all other things, they remaine vnknowne of themſelues. The God that made them, the vileneſſe of their nature, the danger of their ſinnes, the multitude of their imperfections, the Sauiour that bought them, the Heauen that he bought for them, are in the meane time as vnknowne, as vnregarded, as if they were not.

Thus do fooliſh children ſpend their time and labour, in turning ouer leaues to looke for painted babes, not at all reſpecting the ſolid matter vnder their hands. We fooles, when will we be wiſe, and turning our eyes from vanity, with that ſweet Singer of Iſrael, make Gods ſtatutes our ſong and meditation in the houſe of our pilgrimage?

Earthly things proffer themſelues with importunity; Heauenly things muſt with importunity be ſued to. Thoſe, if they were not ſo little worth, would not be ſo forward, and being forward, need not any Meditation to ſolicit them: Theſe, by how much more hard they are to intreat, by ſo much more precious they are being obtained; and therefore worthier our endeuour. As then we cannot goe amiſſe, ſo long as we keepe our ſelues in the tracke of Diuinity; while the ſoule is taken vp with the thoughts, either of the Deity in his eſſence, and perſons (ſparingly yet in this point, and more in faith and admiration than inquiry) or of his attributes, his Iuſtice, Power, Wiſdome, Mercy, Truth: or of his workes, in the creation, preſeruation, gouernment of all things; according to the Pſalmiſt, I will meditate of the beautie of thy glorious Maieſtie, and thy wonderfull workes: ſo, moſt directly in our way, and beſt fitting our exerciſe of Meditation, are thoſe matters in Diuinitie, which can moſt of all worke compunction in the heart, and moſt ſtirre vs vp to deuotion. Of which kinde, are the Meditations concerning Chriſt Ieſus our Mediator, his Incarnation, Miracles, Life, Paſſion, Buriall, Reſurrection, Aſcenſion, Interceſſion, the benefit of our Redemption, the certaintie of our Election, the graces and proceeding of our Sanctification, our glorious eſtate in Paradiſe loſt in our firſt Parents, our preſent vileneſſe, our inclination to ſinne; our ſeuerall actuall offences, the tentations and ſleights of euill Angels, the vſe of the Sacraments, nature and practice of Faith and Repentance: the miſeries of our life, with the frailty of it; the certainty and vncertainty of our death, the glory of Gods Saints aboue, the awfulneſſe of iudgement, the terrours of hell, and the reſt of this quality: wherein both it is fit to haue variety (for that euen the ſtrongeſt ſtomack doth not alwaies delight in one diſh) and yet ſo to change, that our choice may be free from wildneſſe and inconſtancie.

CHAP. XIII.

The order of the worke it ſelfe.

NOw after that we haue thus orderly ſuited the perſon and his qualities, with the due circumſtances of time, place, diſpoſition of body, and ſubſtance of the matter diſcuſſed, I know not what can remaine, beſides the maine buſineſſe it ſelfe, and the manner and degrees of our proſecution thereof; which aboue all other calleth for an intentiue Reader, and reſolute practice. Wherein that we may auoid all niceneſſe and obſcurity (ſince we ſtriue to profit) we will giue direction for the Entrance, Proceeding, Concluſion of this Diuine worke.

CHAP. XIV.

The entrance into the worke.

A Goodly building muſt ſhew ſome magnificence in the gate; and great perſonages haue ſeemely Vſhers to goe before them; who by their vncouered heads command reuerence and way. Euen very Poets of old had wont, before their Ballads to implore the aid of their gods. And the Heathen Romans entred not vpon any publike ciuill buſineſſe, without a ſolemne apprecation of good ſucceſſe: How much leſſe ſhould a Chriſtian dare to vndertake a ſpirituall worke of ſuch importance, not hauing craued the aſſiſtance of his God? which (me thinkes) is no leſſe, than to profeſſe he could doe well without Gods leaue. When we thinke euill, it is from our ſelues: when good, from God. As Prayer is our ſpeech to God, ſo is each good Meditation (according to Bernard) Gods ſpeech to the heart: The heart muſt ſpeake to God, that God may ſpeake to it. Prayer therefore and Meditation, are as thoſe famous Twinnes in the ſtory, or as Two louing Tuttles, whereof ſeparate one, the other languiſheth.

1 The common entrance, which is Prayer.

Prayer maketh way for Meditation. Meditation giueth matter, ſtrength, and life to our prayers. By which, as all other things are ſanctified to vs, ſo we are ſanctified to all holy things. This is as ſome royall Eunuch to perfume and dreſſe our ſoules, that they may be fit to conuerſe with the King of Heauen.

But the prayer that leadeth in Meditation, would not be long, requiring rather that the extenſion and length ſhould be put into the vigour and feruency of it; for that is not here intended to be the principall buſineſſe, but an introduction to another; and no otherwiſe, than as a Portall to this building of Meditation: The matter whereof ſhall be, that the courſe of our Meditation may be guided aright and bleſſed; that all diſtractions may be auoided; our iudgement enlightned, our inuentions quickned, our wills rectified, our affections whetted to heauenly things, our hearts enlarged to God-ward, our deuotion enkindled; ſo that we may finde our corruptions abated, our graces thriuen, our ſoules and liues euery way bettered by this exerciſe.

CHAP. XV.

Particular and proper entrance into the matter, which is in our choice thereof.

SVch is the common entrance into this worke: there is another yet more particular and proper; wherein the minde, recollecting it ſelfe, maketh choice of that Theme or matter whereupon it will beſtow it ſelfe for the preſent; ſettling it ſelfe on that which it hath choſen: which is done by an inward inquiſition made into our heart, of what we both doe, and ſhould thinke vpon: reiecting what is vnexpedient and vnprofitable. In both which, the Soule, like vnto ſome noble Hawke, lets paſſe the Crowes, and Larkes, and ſuch other worthleſſe Birds that croſſe her way, and ſtoopeth vpon a Fowle of price, worthy of her flight: after this manner.

What wilt thou muſe vpon, O my ſoule? thou ſeeſt how little it auaileth thee to wander and roue about in vncertainties: thou findeſt how little ſauour there is in theſe earthly things, wherewith thou haſt wearied thy ſelfe; Trouble not thy ſelfe any longer (with Martha*) about the many and needleſſe thoughts of the world: None but heauenly things can afford thee comfort: vp then, my ſoule, and minde thoſe things that are aboue, whence thy ſelfe art: Amongſt all which, wherein ſhouldeſt thou rather meditate than of the life and glory of Gods Saints? A worthier imployment thou canſt neuer finde, than to thinke vpon that eſtate thou ſhalt once poſſeſſe, and now deſireſt.*

CHAP. XVI.

The proceeding of our Meditation.

HItherto the entrance; after which, our Meditation muſt proceed in due order, not troubledly, nor prepoſterouſly: It begins in the vnderſtanding, endeth in the affection; It begins in the braine, deſcends to the heart; Begins on earth, aſcends to Heauen; Not ſuddenly, but by certaine ſtaires and degrees, till we come to the higheſt.

I haue found a ſubtill ſcale of Meditation, admired by ſome Profeſſors of this Art, And therein a Method allowed by ſome Authors reiected by vs.

aboue all other humane deuices, and farre preferred by them to the beſt directions of Origen, Auſten, Bernard, Hugo Bonauenture, Gerſon, and whoſoeuer hath beene reputed of greateſt perfection in this skill. The ſeuerall ſtaires whereof (leſt I ſhould ſeeme to defraud my Reader through enuy) I would willingly deſcribe, were it not that I feared to ſcarre him rather with the danger of obſcuritie, from venturing further vpon this ſo worthy a buſineſſe: yet leſt any man perhaps might complaine of an vnknowne loſſe, my Margent ſhall finde roome for that which I hold too knottie for my Text.

* In all which, (after the incredible commendations of ſome practitioners) I doubt not but an ordinarie Reader will eaſily eſpie a double fault at the leaſt, Darkneſſe and Coincidence: that they are both too obſcurely deliuered, and that diuers of them fall into other, not without ſome vaine ſuperfluity. For this part therefore which concerneth the vnderſtanding, I had rather to require onely a deepe and firme Conſideration of the thing propounded: which ſhall bee done if we follow it in our diſcourſe, through all, or the principall of thoſe places which naturall reaſon doth affoord vs: wherein, let no man pleade ignorance, or feare difficultie: we are all thus farre borne Logicians; neither is there, in this, ſo much need of skill, as of induſtrie. In which courſe yet, wee may not bee too curious, in a preciſe ſearch of euery place and argument, without omiſſion of any (though to bee fetcht in with racking the inuention.) For as the minde, if it goe looſe and without rule, roues to no purpoſe; ſo if it bee too much fettered, with the gieues of ſtrict regularitie, moueth nothing at all.

The Scale of Meditation of an Author, ancient, but nameleſſe.

* Degrees of Preparation.

1	Queſtion.	What I thinke. What I ſhould thinke.
2	Excuſſion.	A repelling of what I ſhould not thinke.
3	Choice, or Election.	Of what moſt neceſſary. Of what moſt expedient. Of what moſt comely.

* Degrees of proceeding in the vnderſtanding.

4	Commemoration.	An actuall thinking vpon the matter elected.
5	Conſideration.	A redoubled Commemoration of the ſame, till it be fully knowne.
6	Attention.	A fixed and earneſt conſideration whereby it is faſtned in the minde.
7	Explanation.	A clearing of the thing conſidered by ſimilitudes.
8	Tractation.	An extending the thing conſidered to other points, where all queſtions of doubts are diſcuſſed.
9	Dijudication.	An eſtimation of the worth of the thing thus handled.
10	Cauſation.	A confirmation of the eſtimation thus made.
11	Rumination.	A ſad and ſerious Meditation of all the former, till it may worke vpon the affections.

From hence to the degrees of affection.

CHAP. XVII.

Premonitions concerning our proceeding in the firſt part of Meditation.

ERe I enter therefore into any particular tractation, there are three things whereof I would premoniſh my Reader, concerning this firſt part, which is in the vnderſtanding. Firſt, that I deſire not to binde euery man to the ſame vniforme proceeding in this part: Practice and cuſtome may perhaps haue taught other courſes more familiar, and not leſſe direct. If then we can, by any other method, worke in our hearts ſo deepe an apprehenſion of the matter meditated, as it may duly ſtirre the affections, it is that only we require.

Secondly, that whoſoeuer applieth himſelfe to this direction, thinke him not neceſſarily tied to the proſecution of all theſe Logicall places, which he findeth in the ſequell of our Treatiſe, ſo as his Meditation ſhould be lame and imperfect without the whole number: for there are ſome Themes will not beare all theſe; as when we meditate of God, there is no roome for Cauſes or Compariſons, and others yeeld them with ſuch difficulty, that their ſearch interrupteth the chiefe worke intended. It ſhall be ſufficient, if we take the moſt pregnant, and moſt voluntary.

Thirdly, that when we ſticke in the diſpoſition of any the places following (as if, meditating of Sinne, I cannot readily meet with the Materiall and Formall Cauſes, or the Appendances of it) we racke not our mindes too much with the inquiry thereof; which were to ſtriue more for Logique, than deuotion: but without too much diſturbance of our thoughts, quietly paſſe ouer to the next. If we breake our teeth with the ſhell, we ſhall finde ſmall pleaſure in the kernell.

Now then for that my only feare is, leſt this part of my diſcourſe ſhall ſeeme ouerperplexed vnto the vnlearned Reader; I will in this whole proceſſe, ſecond my rule with his example, that ſo what might ſeeme obſcure in the one, may by the other be explained; and the ſame ſteps he ſeeth me take in this, he may accordingly tread in any other Theme.

CHAP. XVIII.

FIrſt therefore it ſhall be expedient to conſider ſeriouſly, what the thing is whereof we meditate.

What then, O my ſoule, is the life of the Saints, whereof thou ſtudieſt? Who are the Saints, but thoſe which hauing beene weakly holy vpon earth, are perfectly holy aboue? which euen on earth were perfectly holy in their Sauiour, now are ſo in themſelues? which ouercomming on earth, are truly canonized in Heauen? What is their life, but that bleſſed eſtate aboue, wherein their glorified ſoule hath a full fruition of God?

The practice of Meditation; wherein, Firſt, we begin with ſome deſcription of that wee meditate of.

CHAP. XIX.

THe nature whereof, after we haue thus ſhadowed out to our ſelues by a deſcription, not curious alwaies, and exactly framed according to the rules of Art, but ſufficient for our owne conceit; the next is (if it ſhall ſeeme needfull, or if the matter will beare, or offer it) ſome eaſie and voluntary diuiſion, whereby our thoughts ſhall haue more roome made for them, and our proceeding ſhall be more diſtinct.

There is a life of nature, when thou, my ſoule, dwelleſt in this body, and informeſt thine earthly burthen. There is a life of grace, when the Spirit of God dwels in thee. There is a life of glory, when the body being vnited to thee, both ſhall be vnited to God: or when, in the meane time, being ſeparated from thy companion, thou enioyeſt God alone. This life of thine therefore, as the other, hath his ages, hath his ſtatures; for it entreth vpon his birth, when thou paſſeſt out of thy body, & changeſt this earthly houſe for an Heauenly: It enters into his full vigour, when at the day of the common reſurrection, thou reſumeſt this thy companion, vnlike to it ſelfe, like to thee, like to thy Sauiour, immortall now, and glorious. In this life here may be degrees; there can be no imperfection. If ſome be like the Skie, others like the Starres, yet all ſhine. If ſome ſit at their Sauiours right hand, others at his left, all are bleſſed. If ſome veſſels hold more, all are full; none complaineth of want, none enuieth at him that hath more.

Secondly, followes an eaſie and voluntary diuiſion of the matter meditated.

Hall, J.

Chap. XX.

3 A conſideration of the cauſes thereof in all kinds of them.

WHich done, it ſhall be requiſit for our perfecter vnderſtanding, & for the laying grounds of matter for our affection, to carry it thorow thoſe other principall places, and heads of reaſon, which nature hath taught euery man, both for knowledge and amplification: the firſt whereof are the Cauſes, of all ſorts.

Whence is this eternall life, but from him which onely is eternall, which only is the fountaine of life, yea life it ſelfe? Who but the ſame God that giues our temporall life, giueth alſo that eternall? The Father beſtoweth it, the Sonne meriteth it, the holy Ghoſt ſeales and applieth it. Expect it onely from him, O my ſoule, whoſe free election gaue thee the firſt title to it, to be purchaſed by the bloud of thy Sauiour. For thou ſhalt not therefore be happy, becauſe he ſaw that thou wouldſt be good; but therefore art thou good, becauſe he hath ordained, thou ſhalt be happy. He hath ordained thee to life; he hath giuen thee a Sauiour to giue this life vnto thee; faith, whereby thou mighteſt attaine to this Sauiour; his Word, by which thou mightſt attaine to this faith; what is there in this not his? And yet not his ſo ſimply, as that it is without thee: without thy merit indeed, not without thine act. Thou liueſt here through his bleſsing, but by bread; thou ſhalt liue aboue through his mercy, but by thy faith below, apprehending the Author of thy life. And yet as he will not ſaue thee without thy faith, ſo thou canſt neuer haue faith without his gift. Looke vp to him therefore, O my ſoule, as the beginner and finiſher of thy ſaluation; and while thou magnifieſt the Author, be rauiſhed with the glory of the worke: which farre paſſeth both the tongue of Angels, and the heart of man. It can be no good thing that is not there. How can they want water that haue the ſpring? Where God is enioyed, in whom only all things are good, what good can bee wanting? And what perfection of bliſſe is there, where all goodneſſe is met and vnited? In thy preſence is fulneſſe of ioy, and at thy right hand are pleaſures for euermore. O bleſſed reflection of glory! We ſee there, as we are ſeene: in that we are ſeene, it is our glory; in that wee ſee, it is Gods glory; therefore doth he glorifie vs, that our glory ſhould be to his. How worthy art thou, O Lord, that through vs thou ſhouldeſt looke at thy ſelfe!

Chap. XXI.

4 The conſideration of the Fruits and Effects.

THe next place ſhall be the fruits and effects following vpon their ſeuerall cauſes: which alſo affords very feeling and copious matter to our meditation; wherein it ſhall be euer beſt, not ſo much to ſeeke for all, as to chuſe out the chiefeſt.

No maruell then if from this glory proceed vnſpeakable ioy, and from this ioy the ſweet ſongs of praiſe and thanksgiuing. The Spirit bids vs, when we are merry, ſing: How much more then, when we are merry without all mixture of ſorrow, beyond all meaſure of our earthly affections, ſhall we ſing ioyfull Hallelu-iahs and Hoſannahs to him that dwelleth in the higheſt Heauens? our hearts ſhall be ſo full, that we cannot chuſe but ſing, and wee cannot but ſing melodiouſly. There is no iar in this Muſicke, no end of this ſong. O bleſſed change of the Saints! They doe nothing but weepe below, and now nothing but ſing aboue. We ſowed in teares, reape in ioy; there was ſome comfort in thoſe teares, when they were at worſt; but there is no danger of complaint in this heauenly mirth. If we cannot ſing here with Angels, On earth peace, yet there we ſhall ſing with them, Glory to God on high; and ioyning our voices to theirs, ſhall make vp that celeſtiall conſort, which none can either heare or beare part in, and not be happy.

Chap. XXII.

5 Conſideration of the Subiect wherein, or whereabout it is.

AFter which comes to be conſidered the Subiect, either wherein that is, or whereabout that is imploied, which we meditate of: As, exhibited? which is no other than the Paradiſe of God. Here below we dwell, or rather we wander in a continued wildernes; there we ſhall reſt vs in the true Eden: I am come into my Garden, my Siſter, my Spouſe. Kings vſe not to dwell in Cottages of Clay, but in Royall Courts fit for their eſtate: How much more ſhall the King of Heauen, who hath prepared for men ſo faire manſions on earth, make himſelfe an habitation ſutable to his Maieſtie? Euen earthly Princes haue dwelt in Cedar and Yuory: But the great City, Holy Ieruſalem, the Palace of the Higheſt, hath her walls of Iaſper, her building of gold, her foundation of precious ſtones, her gates of pearle: How glorious things are ſpoken of thee, O thou City of God! We ſee but the pauement, and yet how goodly it is! The beleeuing Centurion thought himſelfe vnworthy that Chriſt ſhould come vnder his roofe: yet wert thou, O Sauiour, in thine humbled eſtate, in the forme of a ſeruant: How then ſhall I thinke my ſelfe worthy to come vnder this roofe of thine, ſo ſhining and glorious? O, if this clay of mine may come to this honour aboue, let it bee trampled vpon and deſpiſed on earth.

And indeed, what leſſe happineſſe doth the very place promiſe, wherein this glory is exhibited?

Chap. XXIII.

6 Conſid. of the Appendances and Qualities of it.

Sixtly, ſhall follow the Appendances and Qualities, which cleaue vnto the ſubiect whereof we meditate: As,

But were the place leſſe noble and maieſticall; yet the company which it affordeth, hath enough to make the ſoule bleſſed. For, not the place giueth ornament to the gueſt, ſo much as the gueſt to the place. How loth are we to leaue this earth, onely for the ſociety of ſome few friends in whom we delight, which yet are ſubiect euery day to mutuall diſlikes? what pleaſure ſhall we then take in the enioying of the Saints; when there is nothing in them not amiable, nothing in vs that may coole the feruour of our loue? There ſhalt thou, my ſoule, thy ſelfe glorified, meet with thy deare Parents and friends alike glorious, neuer to be ſeuered: There thou ſhalt ſee and conuerſe with thoſe ancient Worthies of the former World; the bleſſed Patriarchs and Prophets, with the crowned Martyrs and Confeſſors; with the holy Apoſtles, and the Fathers of that Primitiue and this preſent Church, ſhining each one according to the meaſure of his bleſſed labours. There ſhalt thou liue familiarly in the ſight of thoſe Angels, whom now thou receiueſt good from, but ſeeſt not. There (which is the head of all thy felicity,) thine eies ſhall ſee Him whom now thine heart longeth for, (that Sauiour of thine) in the only hope of whom now thou liueſt. Alas, how dimly, and afarre off doeſt thou now behold him? How imperfectly doeſt thou enioy him, while euery temptation bereaues thee, for the time, of his preſence? I ſought him whom my ſoule loueth: I ſought him, but found him not his backe is now towards thee many times through thy ſinnes, and therefore thou hardly diſcerneſt him. Other-while and often thy backe is turned vnto him through negligence, that when thou mighteſt obſcurely ſee him, thou doeſt not: now thou ſhalt ſee him, and thine eyes thus fixed ſhall not be remoued. Yet neither could this glory make vs happy, if being thus abſolute, it were not perpetuall. To be happy, is not ſo ſweet a ſtate, as it is miſerable to haue beene happy. Leſt ought therefore ſhould bee wanting, behold, this felicity knoweth no end, feareth no intermiſſion, and is as eternall for the continuance, as he that had no beginning. O bleſſedneſſe truly infinite! Our earthly ioyes doe ſcarce euer begin; but when they begin, their end bordereth vpon their beginning. One houre ſeeth vs oft times ioyfull and miſerable: here alone is nothing but eternity. If then the Diuine Prophet thought here one day in Gods earthly houſe, better than a thouſand other-where; what ſhall I compare to thouſands of millions of yeeres in Gods heauenly Temple? Yea, millions of yeeres are not ſo much as a minute to eternity, and that other houſe not a cottage to this.

Chap. XXIV.

7 Of that which is diuers from it, or contrary to it.

Seuenthly, our thoughts, leauing a while the conſideration of the thing as it is in it ſelfe, ſhall deſcend vnto it as reſpectiuely with others; and therefore firſt ſhall meditate of that which is diuers from it, or contrary vnto it.

What doeſt thou here then, O my ſoule? What doeſt thou here groueling vpon earth? where the beſt things are vanity, the reſt no better than vexation. Looke round about thee, and ſee whether thine eies can meet with any thing but either ſinnes or miſeries. Thoſe few and ſhort pleaſures thou ſeeſt, and euer ſorrowfully; and in the meane time are intermingled with many grieuances. Here thou heareſt one cry out of a ſicke body, whereof there is no part which affords not choice of diſeaſes. This man layeth his hand vpon his conſuming lungs, and complaineth of ſhort wind: that other, vpon his riſing ſpleene: a third ſhaketh his painfull head: another roares out for the torment of his reines or bladder; another for the racking of his gowty ioints: one is diſtempered with a watery Dropſie, another with a windie Collicke, a third with a fiery Ague, a fourth with an earthen Melancholy; one grouels and fometh with the falling ſickneſſe; another lyeth bed-rid, halfe ſenſeleſſe with a dead Palſie. There are but few bodies that complaine not of ſome diſeaſe; and that thou maiſt not looke farre, it is a wonder if thy ſelfe feele not alwaies one of theſe euills within thee. There, thou heareſt another lament his loſſe: either his eſtate is impaired by ſuretiſhip, or ſtealth, or ſhipwracke, or oppreſsion; or his childe is vnruly, or miſcarried; or his wife dead, or diſloyall; another tormented with paſsions; each one is ſome way miſerable. But, that which is yet more irkeſome, thy one eare is beaten with curſings and blaſphemies; thy other with ſcornefull, or wanton, or murthering ſpeeches; thine eies ſee nothing but pride, filthineſſe, profaneneſſe, bloud, exceſſe, and whatſoeuer elſe might vex a righteous ſoule: and if all the world beſides were innocent, thou findeſt enough within thy ſelfe to make thy ſelfe weary, and thy life loathſome. Thou needeſt not fetch cauſe of complaint from others; thy corruptions yeeld thee too much at home; euer ſinning, euer preſuming; Sinning euen when thou haſt repented: yea, euen while thou repenteſt, ſinning. Goe to now, my ſoule, and ſolace thy ſelfe here below, & ſuffer thy ſelfe beſotted with theſe goodly contentments; worthy of no better, while thou fixeſt thy ſelfe on theſe: ſee if thou canſt find any of theſe aboue; and if thou canſt meet with any diſtemper, any loſſe, any ſinne, any complaint, from thy ſelfe or any other aboue, deſpiſe thine Heauen as much as now thou loueſt the earth. Or if all this cannot enough commend vnto thee the ſtate of Heauenly Glory, caſt downe thine eyes yet lower, into that deepe and bottomleſſe pit, full of horrour, full of torment, where there is nothing but flames, and teares, and ſhrikes, and gnaſhing of teeth, nothing but Fiends and tortures: where there is palpable darkneſſe, and yet perpetuall fire; where the damned are euer boyling, neuer conſumed; euer dying, neuer dead; euer complaining, neuer pitied; where the Glutton, that once would not giue a cruſt of bread, now begs for one drop of water; and yet alas, if whole riuers of water ſhould fall into his mouth, how ſhould they quench thoſe riuers of Brimſtone that feed this flame? where there is no intermiſsion of complaints, no breathing from paine, & after millions of yeeres, no poſsibility of comfort. And if the rod wherewith thou chaſtiſeſt thy children, O Lord, euen in this life, be ſo ſmart and galling, that they haue beene brought downe to the brim of deſpaire; and in the bitterneſſe of their ſoule haue intreated death to releaſe them: What ſhall I thinke of their plagues, in whoſe righteous confuſion thou inſulteſt, and ſaieſt; Aha, I will auenge me of mine enemies? Euen that thou ſhalt not be thus miſerable, O my ſoule, is ſome kinde of happineſſe: but that thou ſhalt be as happy, as the reprobate are miſerable, how worthy is it of more eſtimation, than thy ſelfe is capable of?

CHAP. XXV.

8 Of compariſons and ſimilitudes whereby it may be moſt fitly ſet forth.

AFter this oppoſition, the minde ſhall make compariſon of the matter meditated, with what may neereſt reſemble it; and ſhall illuſtrate it with fitteſt ſimilitudes, which giue no ſmall light to the vnderſtanding, nor leſſe force to the affection.

Wonder then, O my ſoule, as much as thou canſt, at this glory; and in compariſon thereof, contemne this earth, which now thou treadeſt vpon; whoſe ioyes if they were perfect, are but ſhort; and if they were long, are imperfect. One day when thou art aboue, looking downe from the height of thy glory, and ſeeing the ſonnes of men creeping like ſo many Ants on this Molehill of earth, thou ſhalt thinke, Alas, how baſely I once liued! Was yonder ſilly dungeon the place place I ſo loued, and was ſo loth to leaue! Thinke ſo now before hand; and ſince of heauen thou canſt not, yet account of the earth as it is worthy: How heartleſſe and irkeſome are yee, O yee beſt earthly pleaſures, if ye be matched with the leaſt of thoſe aboue? How vile are you, O yee ſumptuous buildings of Kings, euen if all the entrailes of the earth had agreed to enrich you, in compariſon of this frame not made with hands? It is not ſo high aboue the earth in diſtance of place, as in worth and Maieſty. Wee may ſee the face of Heauen from the heart of the earth; but from the neereſt part of the earth who can ſee the leaſt glory of Heauen? The three Diſciples, on mount Tabor, ſaw but a glimpſe of this glory ſhining vpon the face of their Sauiour; and yet being rauiſhed with the ſight, cryed out, Maſter, it is good being here; and, thinking of building of three Tabernacles (for Chriſt, Moſes, Elias) could haue beene content themſelues to haue lien without ſhelter, ſo they might alwaies haue enioyed that ſight. Alas, how could earthly Tabernacles haue fitted thoſe heauenly bodies? They knew what they ſaw; what they ſaid, they knew not. Loe, theſe three Diſciples were not transfigured; yet how deeply they were affected euen with the glory of others! How happy ſhall we be, when our ſelues ſhall be changed into glorious? and ſhall haue Tabernacles not of our owne making, but prepared for vs by God? and yet not Tabernacles, but eternall Manſions. Moſes ſaw God but a while, and ſhined: how ſhall wee ſhine, that ſhall behold his face for euer? What greater honour is there than in Soueraignty? What greater pleaſure than in feaſting? This life is both a Kingdome and a feaſt. A Kingdome: He that ouercomes, ſhall rule the Nations, and ſhall ſit with me in my Throne: O bleſſed promotion! Oh large dominion, and royall ſeat! to which Salomons Throne of Iuory was not worthy to become a foot-ſtoole. A feaſt: Bleſſed are they that are called to the Marriage-ſupper of the Lambe. Feaſts haue more than neceſſity of prouiſion, more than ordinary diet; but marriage-feaſts yet more than common abundance; but the Marriage-feaſt of the Sonne of God to his bleſſed Spouſe the Church, muſt ſo farre exceed in all heauenly munificence and variety, as the perſons are of the greater ſtate and Maieſty. There is new wine, pure Manna, and all manner of ſpirituall dainties; and with the continuall cheere, a ſweet and anſwerable welcome; while the Bridegroome louingly cheereth vs vp, Eat, O friends, drinke, and make you merry, O welbeloued: yea, there ſhalt thou be my ſoule, not a gueſt, but (how vnworthy ſoeuer) the Bride her ſelfe, whom he hath euerlaſtingly eſpouſed to himſelfe in truth and righteouſneſſe. The contract is paſſed here below, the marriage is conſummate aboue, and ſolemnized with a perpetuall feaſt: ſo that now thou maiſt ſafely ſay, My welbeloued is mine, and I am his: Wherefore hearken, O my ſoule, and conſider and incline thine eare, forget alſo thine owne people, and thy fathers houſe, (thy ſuppoſed home of this world) ſo ſhall the King haue pleaſure in thy beauty; for hee is the Lord, and worſhip thou him.

Chap. XXVI.

9 The Titles and Names of the thing conſidered.

THe very Names and Titles of the matter conſidered, yeeld no ſmall ſtore to our Meditation: which being commonly ſo impoſed, that they ſecretly comprehend the nature of the thing which they repreſent, are not vnworthy of our diſcourſe.

What need I ſeeke thoſe reſemblances, when the very name of life implieth ſweetneſſe to men on earth, euen to them which confeſſe to liue with ſome diſcontentment? Surely the light is a pleaſant thing, and it is good to the eyes to ſee the Sunne: yet when Temporall is added to Life, I know not how this addition detracteth ſomething, and doth greatly abate the pleaſure of Life; for thoſe which ioy to thinke of Life, grieue to thinke it but Temporall: ſo vexing is the end of that whoſe continuance was delightfull. But now when there is an addition (aboue Time) of Eternity, it maketh life ſo much more ſweet as it is moſt laſting; and laſting infinitely, what can it giue leſſe than an infinite contentment? Oh dying and falſe life, which wee enioy here, and ſcarce a ſhadow and counterfeit of that other! What is more eſteemed than glory? which is ſo precious to men of ſpirit, that it makes them prodigall of their bloud, proud of their wounds, careleſſe of themſelues: & yet (alas) how pent, & how fading is this glory, affected with ſuch dangers and death? hardly after all Trophees & monuments, either knowne to the next Sea, or ſuruiuing him that dieth for it: It is true glory to triumph in heauen where is neither enuy nor forgetfulnes.

What is more deare to vs than our Country? which the worthy and faithfull Patriots of all times haue reſpected aboue their parents, their Children, their liues, counting it only happy to liue in it, and to die for it. The baniſht man pines for the want of it: the traueller digeſteth all the tediouſneſſe of his way, all the ſorrowes of an ill iourney, in the only hope of home; forgetting all his forraine miſeries, when he feeleth his owne ſmoke. Where is our Country but aboue? Thence thou cameſt, O my ſoule; thither thou art going, in a ſhort, but weary pilgrimage. O miſerable men, if we account our ſelues at home in our pilgrimage; if in our iourney, we long not for home! Doeſt thou ſee men ſo in loue with their natiue ſoile, that euen when it is all deformed with the deſolations of warre, and turned into rude heapes, or while it is euen now flaming with the fire of ciuill broiles, they couet yet ſtill to liue in it, preferring it to all other places of more peace and pleaſure? and ſhalt thou, ſeeing nothing but peace and bleſſedneſſe at home, nothing but trouble abroad, content thy ſelfe with a faint wiſh of thy diſſolution? If heauen were thy Iayle, thou couldeſt but thinke of it vncomfortably. Oh what affection can be worthy of ſuch an home?

Chap. XXVII.

10. Conſid. of fit teſtimonies of Scripture, concerning our Theme.

LAſtly, if wee can recall any pregnant Teſtimonies of Scripture concerning our Theme, thoſe ſhall fitly conclude this part of our Meditation. Of Scripture; for that in theſe matters of God, none but diuine authority can command aſſent, and ſettle the conſcience. Witneſſes of holy men may ſerue for colours; but the ground muſt be onely from God.

There it is (ſaith the Spirit of God, which cannot deceiue thee) that all teares ſhall be wiped from our eies; there ſhall be no more death, nor ſorrow, nor crying, neither ſhall there be any more paine: yea, there ſhall not onely bee an end of ſorrowes, but an abundant recompence for the ſorrowes of our life; as he that was rapt vp into the third Heauen, and there ſaw what cannot be ſpoken, ſpeaketh yet thus of what he ſaw: I count, that the afflictions of this preſent time are not worthy of the glory which ſhall be ſhewed to vs: It was ſhewed vnto him what ſhould hereafter be ſhewed vnto vs; and he ſaw, that if all the world full of miſeries were laid in one ballance, and the leaſt glory of heauen in another, thoſe would be incomparably light, yea (as that diuine Father) that one daies felicity aboue, were worth a thouſand yeeres torment below; what then can be matched with the eternity of ſuch ioyes? Oh how great therefore is this thy goodneſſe, O Lord, which thou haſt laid vp for them that feare thee, and done to them that truſt in thee, before the ſonnes of men!

Chap. XXVIII.

Of our ſecond part of Meditation: which is in the affections.

THe moſt difficult and knotty part of Meditation thus finiſhed, there remaineth that which is both more liuely, & more eaſie vnto a good heart to be wrought altogether by the affections: which if our diſcourſes reach not vnto, they proue vaine, and to no purpoſe. That which followeth therefore, is the very ſoule of Meditation, whereto all that is paſt ſerueth but as an inſtrument. A man is a man by his vnderſtanding part: but he is Chriſtian by his will and affections. Seeing therefore, that all our former labour of the braine is onely to affect the heart, after that the minde hath thus trauerſed the point propoſed through all the heads of reaſon, it ſhall endeuour to find in the firſt place ſome feeling touch, and ſweet relliſh in that which it hath thus chewed; which fruit through the bleſſing of God, will voluntarily follow vpon a ſerious Meditation. Dauid ſaith, Oh taſte, and ſee how ſweet the Lord is. In Meditation we doe both ſee and taſte; but we ſee before we taſte: ſight, is of the vnderſtanding:

Wherein is required a Taſte and relliſh of what we haue thought vpon.

taſte, of the affection; neither can we ſee, but we muſt taſte; we cannot know aright but we muſt needs be affected. Let the heart therefore firſt conceiue and feele in it ſelfe the ſweetneſſe or bitterneſſe of the matter meditated: which is neuer done, without ſome paſſion; nor expreſſed, without ſome hearty exclamation.

Oh bleſſed eſtate of the Saints! O glory not to be expreſſed, euen by thoſe which are glorified! O incomprehenſible ſaluation! What ſauour hath this earth to thee? Who can regard the world, that beleeueth thee? What can thinke of thee, and not be rauiſhed with wonder and deſire? Who can hope for thee, and not reioyce? Who can know thee, and not be ſwallowed vp with admiration at the mercy of him that beſtoweth thee? O bleſſedneſſe worthy of Chriſts bloud to purchaſe thee! Worthy of the continuall ſongs of Saints and Angels to celebrate thee! How ſhould I magnifie thee! How ſhould I long for thee? How ſhould I hate all this world for thee!

CHAP. XXIX.

After this Taſte ſhall follow a Complaint, wherein the heart bewaileth to it ſelfe his owne pouertie, dulneſſe, and imperfection; chiding and abaſing it ſelfe in reſpect of his wants and indiſpoſition: wherein Humiliation truly goeth before glory. For the more we are caſt downe in our conceit, the higher ſhall God lift vs vp at the end of this exerciſe, in ſpirituall reioycing.

Secondly, a Complaint, bewailing our wants and vntowardneſſe.

But alas, where is my loue? Where is my longing? Where art thou, O my ſoule? What heauineſſe hath ouertaken thee? How hath the world bewitched and poſſeſſed thee, that thou art become ſo careleſſe of thine home, ſo ſenſeleſſe of ſpirituall delights, ſo fond vpon theſe vanities? Doeſt thou doubt whether there be an heauen? or whether thou haue a God, and a Sauiour there? O farre be from thee this Atheiſme; far be from thee the leaſt thought of this deſperate impiety. Woe were thee, if thou beleeuedſt not: But, O thou of little Faith, doeſt thou beleeue there is happineſſe, and happineſſe for thee, and deſireſt it not, and delighteſt not in it? Alas, how weake and vnbeleeuing is thy beleefe! How cold and faint are thy deſires? Tell me, what ſuch goodly entertainment haſt thou met withall here on earth, that was worthy to withdraw thee from theſe heauenly ioyes? What pleaſure in it euer gaue thee contentment? or what cauſe of diſlike findeſt thou aboue? Oh no, my ſoule, it is only thy miſerable drowſineſſe, only thy ſecuritie: The world, the world hath beſotted thee, hath vndone thee with careleſneſſe. Alas, if thy delight be ſo cold, what difference is there in thee from an ignorant Heathen, that doubts of another life: yea, from an Epicure, that denies it? Art thou a Chriſtian, or art thou none? If thou be what thou profeſſeſt, away with this dull and ſenſeleſſe worldlineſſe; away with this earthly vncheerefulneſſe; ſhake off at laſt this profane and godleſſe ſecurity, that hath thus long weighed thee downe from mounting vp to thy ioyes. Looke vp to thy God, and to thy Crowne, and ſay with confidence, O Lord, I haue waited for thy ſaluation.

CHAP. XXX.

After this Complaint, muſt ſucceed an hearty and paſſionate Wiſh of the ſoule, which ariſeth cleerely from the two former degrees: For, that which a man hath found ſweet, and comfortable, and complaines that he ſtill wanteth, he cannot but wiſh to enioy.

Thirdly, an hearty Wiſh of the ſoule, for what it complaineth to want.

O Lord, that I could wait and long for thy ſaluation! Oh that I could minde the things aboue; that as I am a ſtranger indeed, ſo I could be alſo in affection! Oh that mine eyes, like the eyes of thy firſt Martyr, could by the light of Faith ſee but a glimpſe of heauen! Oh that my heart could be rapt vp thither in deſire! How ſhould I trample vpon theſe poore vanities of the earth! How willingly ſhould I endure all ſorrowes, all torments! How ſcornfully ſhould I paſſe by all pleaſures! How ſhould I be in trauaile of my diſſolution! Oh when ſhall that bleſſed day come, when all this wretched worldlineſſe remoued, I ſhall ſolace my ſelfe in my God? Behold, as the Hart brayeth for the riuers of waters, ſo panteth my ſoule after thee, O God: My ſoule thirſteth for God, euen for the liuing God; Oh when ſhall I come and appeare before the preſence of God?

Hall, J.

Chap. XXXI.

4. An humble Confeſſion of our diſabilitie to effect what we wiſh.

AFter this Wiſhing, ſhall follow humble Confeſſion, by iuſt order of nature: for, hauing bemoaned our want, and wiſhed ſupply, not finding this hope in our ſelues, we muſt needs acknowledge it to him, of whom only we may both ſeeke and finde; where it is to be duly obſerued, how the minde is by turnes depreſſed, and lifted vp: Being lifted vp with our taſte of ioy, it is caſt downe with Complaint: lift vp with Wiſhes, it is caſt downe with Confeſſion; which order doth beſt hold it in vre, and iuſt temper; and maketh it more feeling of the comfort which followeth in the concluſion. This Confeſſion muſt derogate all from our ſelues, and aſcribe all to God.

Thus I deſire, O Lord, to be aright affected towards thee and thy glory; I deſire to come to thee: but, alas, how weakely? how heartleſly? Thou knoweſt that I can neither come to thee, nor deſire to come, but from thee. It is Nature that holds me from thee; this treacherous Nature fauours it ſelfe, loueth the world, hateth to thinke of a diſſolution, and chuſeth rather to dwell in this dungeon with continuall ſorrow and complaint, than to endure a parting, although to liberty and ioy. Alas, Lord, it is my miſery that I loue my paine. How long ſhall theſe vanities thus beſot me? It is thou only that canſt turne away mine eyes from regarding theſe follies, and my heart from affecting them: thou only, who as thou ſhalt one day receiue my ſoule into heauen, ſo now before-hand canſt fix my ſoule vpon heauen and thee.

Chap. XXXII.

5. An earneſt Petition for that which we confeſſe to want.

AFter Confeſſion, naturally followes Petition; earneſtly requeſting that at his hands, which wee acknowledge our ſelues vnable, and none but God able to performe.

O carry it vp therefore, thou that haſt created and redeemed it, carry it vp to thy glory: Oh let me not alwaies be thus dull and brutiſh; let not theſe ſcales of earthly affection alwaies dim and blinde mine eyes: Oh thou that layedſt clay vpon the blinde mans eyes, take away this clay from mine eyes, wherewith (alas) they are ſo dawbed vp, that they cannot ſee heauen. Illuminate them from aboue, and in thy light let me ſee light. Oh thou that haſt prepared a place for my ſoule, prepare my ſoule for that place; prepare it with holineſſe, prepare it with deſire: and euen while it ſoiourneth on earth, let it dwell in heauen with thee, beholding euer the beautie of thy face, the glory of thy Saints, and of it ſelfe.

Chap. XXXIII.

6. A vehement Enforcement of our petition

AFter Petition ſhall follow the Enforcement of our requeſt, from argument and importunate obſecration; wherein we muſt take heed of complementing in termes with God, as knowing that he will not be mocked by any faſhionable forme of ſuit, but requireth holy and feeling intreatie.

How graciouſly haſt thou proclaimed to the world, that who-euer wants wiſdome, ſhall aske it of thee, which neither denieſt nor vpbraideſt! O Lord, I want heauenly wiſdome, to conceiue aright of heauen; I want it, and aske it of thee; giue me to aske it inſtantly, and giue me according to thy promiſe abundantly. Thou ſeeſt, it is no ſtrange fauour that I begge of thee: no other than that which thou haſt richly beſtowed vpon all thy valiant Martyrs, Confeſſors, Seruants, from the beginning: who neuer could haue ſo cheerefully embraced death and torment, if through the middeſt of their flames and paine they had not ſeene their Crowne of glory. The poore Theefe on the Croſſe had no ſooner craued thy remembrance when thou cameſt to thy Kingdome, than thou promiſedſt to take him with thee into heauen. Preſence was better to him than remembrance. Behold, now thou art in thy Kingdome; I am on earth; remember thine vnworthy ſeruant, and let my ſoule in conceit, in affection, in conuerſation, be this day and for euer with thee in Paradiſe. I ſee, man walketh in a vaine ſhadow, and diſquieteth himſelfe in vaine: they are pittifull pleaſures he enioyeth, while he forgetteth thee; I am as vaine, make me more wiſe: Oh let me ſee heauen, and I know, I ſhall neuer enuie, nor follow them. My times are in thine hand: I am no better than my fathers, a ſtranger on earth. As I ſpeake of them, ſo the next; yea this generation ſhall ſpeake of me as one that was. My life is a bubble, a ſmoake, a ſhadow, a thought: I know, it is no abiding in this thorow-fare: Oh ſuffer me not ſo mad, as while I paſſe on the way, I ſhould forget the end. It is that other life that I muſt truſt to: With thee it is that I ſhall continue: Oh let me not be ſo fooliſh, as to ſettle my ſelfe on what I muſt leaue, and to neglect eternitie. I haue ſeene enough of this earth, and yet I loue it too much. O let me ſee heauen another while, and loue it ſo much more than the earth, by how much the things there are more worthy to be loued. Oh God, looke downe on thy wretched Pilgrim; and teach me to looke vp to thee, and to ſee thy goodneſſe in the Land of the liuing. Thou that boughteſt heauen for me, guide me thither; and for the price that it coſt thee, for thy mercies ſake, in ſpight of all tentations, enlighten thou my ſoule, direct it, crowne it.

Chap. XXXIV.

7. A cheerefull Confidence of obtaining what we haue requeſted and enforced.

AFter this Enforcement, doth follow Confidence; wherein the ſoule, after many doubtfull and vnquiet bickerings, gathereth vp her forces, and cheerefully rowzeth vp it ſelfe; and like one of Dauids Worthies, breaketh thorow a whole Armie of doubts, and fetcheth comfort from the Well of life, which, though in ſome latter, yet in all is a ſure reward from God of ſincere Meditation.

Yea, be thou bold, O my ſoule, and doe not meerely craue, but challenge this fauour of God, as that which he oweth thee, he oweth it thee, becauſe he hath promiſed it, and by his mercy hath made his gift, his debt: Faithfull is he that hath promiſed, which will alſo doe it. Hath he not giuen thee not onely his hand in the ſweet hopes of the Goſpell, but his ſeale alſo in the Sacraments? Yea, beſides promiſe, hand, ſeale, hath he not giuen thee a ſure earneſt of thy ſaluation, in ſome weake, but true graces? Yet more, hath he not giuen thee, beſides Earneſt, poſſeſſion? while he that is the Truth and Life, ſaith, He that beleeueth hath euerlaſting life, and hath paſſed from death to life. Canſt thou not then be content to caſt thy ſelfe vpon this bleſſed iſſue; If God be mercifull, I am glorious; I haue thee already, Oh my life? God is faithfull, and I doe beleeue: who ſhall ſeparate me from the loue of Chriſt? from my glory with Chriſt? Who ſhall pull me out of my heauen? Goe to then, and returne to thy reſt, O my ſoule; make vſe of that heauen wherein thou art, and be happy.

Thus we haue found, that our Meditation, like the wind, gathereth ſtrength in proceeding; and as naturall bodies, the neerer they come to their places, moue with more celeritie; ſo doth the ſoule in this courſe of Meditation, to the vnſpeakable benefit of it ſelfe.

Chap. XXXV.

The Concluſion of our Meditation, in what order it muſt be.

THe Concluſion remaineth: wherein we muſt aduiſe (like as Phyſitians do in their ſweats and exerciſe) that we ceaſe not ouer-ſuddenly, but leaue off by little and little. The minde may not be ſuffered to fall head-long from this height, but muſt alſo deſcend by degrees.

Firſt, with Thankſgiuing.

The firſt whereof, after our Confidence, ſhall be an heartie Gratulation, and thankſgiuing. For, as man naturally cannot be miſerable, but he muſt complaine, and craue remedie; ſo the good heart cannot finde it ſelfe happy, and not be thankfull: and this thankfulneſſe which it feeleth and expreſſeth, maketh it yet more good, and affecteth it more.

Hall, J.

What ſhall I then doe to thee for this mercy, O thou Sauiour of men? What ſhould I render to my Lord, for all his benefits? Alas! what can I giue thee, which is not thine owne before? Oh that I could giue thee but all thine! Thou giueſt me to drinke of this cup of ſaluation: I will therefore take the cup of ſaluation, and call vpon the name of the Lord: Praiſe thou the Lord, O my ſoule; and all that is within me, praiſe his holy name. And ſince here thou beginneſt thine heauen, begin here alſo that ioyfull ſong of thankſgiuing, which there thou ſhalt ſing more ſweetly, and neuer end.

Chap. XXXVI.

Secondly, with Recommendation of our ſoules and waies to God.

After this Thankſgiuing, ſhall follow a faithfull recommendation of our ſelues to God; wherein the ſoule doth cheerefully giue vp it ſelfe, and repoſe it ſelfe wholly vpon her Maker and Redeemer; committing her ſelfe to him in all her waies, ſubmitting her ſelfe to him in all his waies, deſiring in all things to glorifie him, and to walke worthy of her high and glorious calling.

Both which latter ſhall be done (as I haue euer found) with much life and comfort, if for the full concluſion, wee ſhall lift vp our heart and voice to God, in ſinging ſome Verſicle of Dauids diuine Pſalmes, anſwerable to our diſpoſition, and matter; whereby the heart cloſes vp it ſelfe with much ſweetneſſe and contentment.

This courſe of Meditation thus heartily obſerued, let him that practiſeth it, tell me whether he finde not that his ſoule, which at the beginning of this exerciſe did but creepe and grouell vpon earth, doe not now in the concluſion ſoare aloft in Heauen; and being before aloofe off, doe not now finde it ſelfe neere to God, yea with him and in him.

Chap. XXXVII.

An Epilogue.

Thus haue I endeuoured (Right Worſhipfull Sir) according to my ſlender facultie, to preſcribe a method of Meditation: not vpon ſo ſtrict tearmes of neceſſitie, that whoſoeuer goeth not my way, erreth. Diuers paths lead oft times to the ſame end, and euery man aboundeth in his owne ſenſe. If experience and cuſtome hath made another forme familiar to any man, I forbid it not: as that learned Father ſaid of his Tranſlation, Let him vſe his owne, not contemne mine. If any man bee to chuſe, and begin, let him practiſe mine, till he meet with a better Maſter: If another courſe may be better, I am ſure this is good. Neither is it to be ſuffered, that like as fantaſticall men, while they doubt what faſhioned ſute they ſhould weare, put on nothing; ſo, that wee Chriſtians ſhould neglect the matter of this worthy buſineſſe, while we nicely ſtand vpon the forme thereof. Wherein giue me leaue to complaine with iuſt ſorrow and ſhame, that if there be any Chriſtian duty, whoſe omiſſion is notoriouſly ſhamefull and preiudiciall to the ſoules of Profeſſors, it is this of Meditation. This is the very end God hath giuen vs our ſoules for: we miſſe-ſpend them, if wee vſe them not thus. How lamentable is it, that we ſo imploy them, as if our faculty of diſcourſe ſerued for nothing but our earthly prouiſion? as if our reaſonable and Chriſtian minds were appointed for the ſlaues and drudges of this body, onely to be the Caters and Cookes of our Appetite?

Reprouing the neglect of Meditation.

The world filleth vs, yea cloieth vs: wee finde our ſelues worke enough to thinke; What haue I yet? How may I get more? What muſt I lay out? What ſhall I leaue for poſteritie? How may I preuent the wrong of mine Aduerſary? How may I returne it? What anſwers ſhall I make to ſuch allegations? What entertainment ſhall I giue to ſuch friends! What courſes ſhall I take in ſuch ſuits? In what paſtime ſhall I ſpend this day? In what the next? What aduantage ſhall I reape by this practice, what loſſe? What was ſaid, anſwered, replied, done, followed?

Goodly thoughts, and fit for ſpirituall minds! Say there were no other world; how could we ſpend our eares otherwiſe? Vnto this only neglect, let me aſcribe the commonneſſe of that Laodicean temper of men, or (if that be worſe) of the dead coldneſſe which hath ſtricken the hearts of many, hauing left them nothing but the bodies of men, and viſors of Chriſtians; to this only, They haue not meditated. It is not more impoſſible to liue without an heart, than to be deuout without Meditation. Would God therefore my words could be in this (as the Wiſe-man ſaith the words of the wiſe are) like vnto Goades in the ſides of euery Reader, to quicken him vp out of this dull and lazie ſecuritie, to a cheerefull practice of this Diuine Meditation. Let him curſe me vpon his death-bed, if looking backe from thence to the beſtowing of his former times, he acknowledge not theſe houres placed the moſt happily in his whole life; if he then wiſh not he had worne out more daies in ſo profitable and heauenly a worke.

Exhorting to the vſe of Meditation.

M 3 A

A MEDITATION OF DEATH, ACCORDING to the former Rules.

The Entrance.

AND now, my ſoule, that thou haſt thought of the end, what can fit thee better than to thinke of the way? And though the forepart of the way to Heauen be a good life, the latter and more immediate is death: ſhall I call it the way, or the gate of life? Sure I am, that by it only we paſſe into that bleſſedneſſe, whereof we haue ſo thought, that we haue found it cannot be thought of enough.

The Deſcription.

What then is this death, but the taking downe of theſe ſtickes, whereof this earthly Tent is compoſed? The ſeparation of two great and old friends till they meet againe? The Gaole-deliuery of a long priſoner? Our iourney into that other world, for which we, and this thorow-fare were made? Our payment of our firſt debt to Nature, the ſleepe of the body, and the awaking of the ſoule?

The Diuiſion.

But leſt thou ſhouldeſt ſeeme to flatter him, whoſe name and face hath euer ſeemed terrible to others, remember that there are more deaths than one: if the firſt death be not ſo fearefull as he is made, (his horrour lying more in the conceit of the beholder, than in his owne aſpect) ſurely, the ſecond is not made ſo fearefull as he is. No liuing eye can behold the terrours thereof: it is as impoſſible to ſee them, as to feele them, and liue. Nothing but a name is common to both: The firſt hath men, caſualties, diſeaſes, for his executioners: the ſecond, Deuils. The power of the firſt is in the graue: the ſecond, in hell. The worſt of the firſt, is ſenſeleſneſſe; the eaſieſt of the ſecond, is, a perpetuall ſenſe of all the paine that can make a man exquiſitely miſerable.

The Cauſes.

Thou ſhalt haue no buſineſſe, O my ſoule, with the ſecond death: Thy firſt Reſurrection hath ſecured thee: Thanke him that hath redeemed thee, for thy ſafety. And how can I thanke thee enough, O my Sauiour, which haſt ſo mercifully bought off my torment, with thy owne; and haſt drunke off that bitter potion of thy Fathers wrath, whereof the very taſte had beene our death? Yea, ſuch is thy mercy, O thou Redeemer of men, that thou haſt not only ſubdued the ſecond death, but reconciled the firſt; ſo as thy children taſte not at all of the ſecond, and finde the firſt ſo ſweetned to them by thee, that they complaine of bitterneſſe. It was not thou, O God, that madeſt death; our hands are they that were guilty of this euill. Thou ſaweſt all thy work that it was good; we brought forth ſinne, and ſinne brought forth death. To the diſcharge of thy Iuſtice and Mercy, we acknowledge this miſerable conception; and needs muſt that child be vgly, that hath ſuch parents. Certainly, if Being and Good be (as they are) of an equall extent, then the diſſolution of our Being muſt needs in it ſelfe be euill. How full of darkneſſe and horrour then is the priuation of this vitall light? eſpecially ſince thy wiſdome intended it to the reuenge of ſinne, which is no leſſe than the violation of an infinite Iuſtice? it was thy iuſt pleaſure to plague vs with this brood of our own begetting: Behold, that death which was not till then in the world, is now in euery thing: one great Conquerour findes it in a Slate, another findes it in a Fly; one findes it in the kernel of a Grape, another in the pricke of a thorne; one in the taſte of an herbe, another in the ſmell of a flower; one in a bit of meat, another in a mouthful of aire; one in the very ſight of a danger, another in the conceit of what might haue beene: Nothing in all our life is too little to hide death vnder it: There need no cords, nor kniues, nor ſwords, nor Peeces: we haue made our ſelues as many wayes to death, as there are helpes of liuing.

But if we were the authors of our death, it was thou that didſt alter it: our diſobedience made it, and thy mercy made it not to be euill. It had beene all one to thee, to haue taken away the very Being of death from thine owne: but thou thoughteſt it beſt to take away the ſting of it only, as good Phyſitians, when they would apply their Leeches, ſcowre them with Salt and Nettles, and when their corrupt bloud is voided, imploy them to the health of the patient. It is more glory to thee, that thou haſt remoued enmity from this Eſau, that now he meets vs with kiſſes in ſtead of frownes: and if we receiue a blow from this rough hand, yet that very ſtripe is healing. Oh how much more powerfull is thy death, than our ſinne! O my Sauiour, how haſt thou perfumed and ſoftened this bed of my graue by dying? How can it grieue me to tread in thy ſteps to glory?

The Effects.

Our ſinne made death our laſt enemy; thy goodneſſe hath made it the firſt friend that we meet with, in our paſſage to another world: For as ſhe that receiues vs from the knees of our mother, in our firſt entrance to the light, waſheth, cleanſeth, dreſſeth vs, and preſents vs to the breſt of our nurſe, or the armes of our mother, challenges ſome intereſt in vs when we come to our growth; ſo death, which in our paſſage to that other life, is the firſt that receiues and preſents our naked ſoules to the hands of thoſe Angels, which carry it vp to her glory, cannot but thinke this office friendly and meritorious. What if this guide leade my carcaſe through corruption and rottenneſſe, when my ſoule in the very inſtant of her ſeparation knowes it ſelfe happy? What if my friends mourne about my bed and coffin, when my ſoule ſees the ſmiling face and louing embracements of him that was dead, and is aliue? What care I, who ſhuts theſe earthen eyes, when death opens the eye of my ſoule, to ſee as I am ſeene? What if my name be forgotten of men, when I liue aboue with the God of Spirits?

The Subiect.

If death would be ſtill an enemie, it is the worſt part of me that he hath any thing to doe withall: the beſt is aboue his reach, and gaines more than the other can leeſe. The worſt peece of the horrour of death is the graue; and ſet aſide infidelity, what ſo great miſery is this? That part which is corrupted, feeles it not; that which is free from corruption, feeles an abundant recompence, and foreſees a ioyfull reparation. What is here but a iuſt reſtitution? We carry heauen and earth wrapt vp in our boſomes; each part returnes homeward: And if the exceeding glory of heauen cannot counteruaile the doleſomneſſe of the graue, what doe I beleeuing? But if the beauty of that celeſtiall Sanctuary doe more than equalize the horrour of the bottomleſſe pit, how can I ſhrinke at earth like my ſelfe, when I know my glory? And if examples can moue thee any whit, looke behinde thee, O my ſoule, and ſee which of the Worthies of that ancient latter world, which of the Patriarchs, Kings, Prophets, Apoſtles, haue not trod in theſe red ſteps. Where are thoſe millions of generations, which haue hitherto peopled the earth? How many paſſing-bels haſt thou heard for thy knowne friends? How many ſicke beds haſt thou viſited? How many eyes haſt thou ſeene cloſed? How many vaine men haſt thou ſeene that haue gone into the field to ſeeke death, in hope to finde an honour as fooliſh as themſelues? How many poore creatures haſt thou mulcted with death for thine owne pleaſure? And canſt thou hope that that God will make a by-way and a Poſterne for thee alone, that thou mayeſt paſſe to the next world, not by the gates of death, not by the bottome of the graue?

The Adiunct.

What then doeſt thou feare, O my ſoule? There are but two ſtages of death, the bed and the graue: This latter, if it haue ſenſeleſneſſe, yet it hath reſt: The former, if it haue paine, yet it hath ſpeedineſſe; and when it lights vpon a faithfull heart, meets with many and ſtrong antidotes of comfort. The euill that is euer in motion, is not fearefull: That which both time and eternitie findes ſtanding where it was, is worthy of terrour. Well may thoſe tremble at death, which finde more diſtreſſe within, than without, whoſe conſciences are more ſicke, and neerer to death, than their bodies. It was thy Fathers wrath that did ſo terrifie thy ſoule, O my Sauiour, that it put thy body into a bloudy ſweat. The mention and thought of thy death ended in a Pſalme, but this began in an agony. Then didſt thou ſweat out my feares. The power of that agonie doth more comfort all thine, than the Angels could comfort thee. That very voice deſerued an eternall ſeparation of horrour from death, where thou ſaidſt, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? Thou hadſt not complained of being left, if thou wouldeſt haue any of thine left deſtitute of comfort in their parting. I know not whom I can feare, while I know whom I haue beleeued; how can I be diſcouraged with the ſight of my loſſe, when I ſee ſo cleere an aduantage?

The Contrary.

What diſcomfort is this, to leaue a fraile body, to be ioyned vnto a glorious head? To forſake vaine pleaſures, falſe honours, bootleſſe hopes, vnſatisfying wealth, ſtormie contentments, ſinfull men, perillous tentations, a ſea of troubles, a gally of ſeruitude, an euill world, and a conſuming life; for Freedome, Reſt, Happineſſe, Eternitie? And if thou wert ſentenced, O my ſoule, to liue a thouſand yeeres in this body, with theſe infirmities, how wouldſt thou be weary, not of being only, but of complaining? Whiles, ere the firſt hundred, I ſhould bee a childe; ere the ſecond, a beaſt; a ſtone, ere the third; and therefore ſhould be ſo farre from finding pleaſure in my continuance, that I ſhould not haue ſenſe enough left, to feele my ſelfe miſerable. And when I am once gone, what difference is there betwixt the agedſt of the firſt Patriarchs, and me, and the childe that did but liue to be borne, ſaue only in what was; and that which was, is not? And if this body had no weakneſſe, to make my life tedious, yet what a torment is it, that while I liue, I muſt ſinne? Alas, my ſoule, euery one of thy knowne ſinnes, is not a diſeaſe, but a death. What an enemie art thou to thy ſelfe, if thou canſt not be content, that one bodily death ſhould excuſe thee from many ſpirituall; to caſt off thy body, that thou mayeſt be ſtripped of the ragges, yea the fetters of thy ſinne, and cloathed with the Robes of glory? Yet theſe termes are too hard: Thou ſhalt not be caſt off, O my body; rather thou ſhalt be put to making: this change is no leſſe happie for thee, than for thy partner. This very skinne of thine, which is now tawnie, and wrinkled, ſhall once ſhine; this earth ſhall be heauen, this duſt ſhall be glorious. Theſe eyes, that are now weary of being witneſſes of thy ſinnes and miſeries, ſhall then neuer be weary of ſeeing the beauty of thy Sauiour, and thine owne in his. Theſe eares, that haue been now tormented with the impious tongues of men, ſhall firſt heare the voice of the Sonne of God, and then the voices of Saints and Angels in their ſongs of Alleluia. And this tongue, that now complaines of miſeries, and feares, ſhall then beare a part in that diuine harmonie.

The compariſons.

In the meane time, thou ſhalt but ſleepe in this bed of earth: he that hath tried the worſt of death, hath called it no worſe; very Heathens haue termed them couſins; and it is no vnuſuall thing for couſins of bloud, to cary both the ſame names and features. Haſt thou wont, O my body, when the day hath wearied thee, to lie downe vnwillingly to thy reſt? Behold in this ſleep there is more quietneſſe, more pleaſure of viſions, more certainty of waking, more cheerefulneſſe in riſing: why then art thou loth to thinke of laying off thy ragges, and repoſing thy ſelfe? Why art thou like a childe, vnwilling to goe to bed? Haſt thou euer ſeene any bird, which when the cage hath beene opened, would rather ſit ſtill, and ſing within her grates, than flie forth vnto her freedome in the woods? Haſt thou euer ſeene any priſoner, in loue with his bolts and fetters? Did the Chiefe of the Apoſtles, when the Angell of God ſhined in his Iayle, and ſtrooke him on the ſide, and looſed his two chaines, and bade him, Ariſe quickly, and opened both the woodden, and Iron gate, ſay, What, ſo ſoone? yet, a little ſleepe? What madneſſe had it beene, rather to ſlumber betwixt his two Keepers, than to follow the Angell of God into libertie? Haſt thou euer ſeene any Mariner that hath ſaluted the ſea with ſongs, and the Hauen with teares? What ſhall I ſay to this diffidence, O my ſoule, that thou art vnwilling to thinke of reſt after thy toile, of freedome after thy durance, of the Hauen after an vnquiet and tempeſtuous paſſage? How many are there that ſeeke death, and cannot finde it? meerely out of the irkſomneſſe of life. Hath it found thee, and offered thee better conditions, not of immunitie from euils, but of poſſeſſion of more good, than thou canſt thinke, and wouldeſt thou now flie from happineſſe, to be rid of it?

The Names.

What? Is it a name that troubles thee? what if men would call ſleepe death, wouldſt thou be afraid to cloſe thine eyes? what hurt is it then, if he that ſent the firſt ſleepe vpon man, whileſt hee made him an helper, ſend this laſt and ſoundeſt ſleepe vpon me; whiles he prepares my ſoule for a glorious Spouſe to himſelfe? It is but a parting, which we call death; as two friends, when they haue lead each other on the way, ſhake hands till they returne from their iourney: If either could miſcarry, there were cauſe of ſorrow; now they are more ſure of a meeting, than of a parture; what folly is it, not to be content to redeeme the vnſpeakable gaine of ſo deare a friend, with a little intermiſſion of enioying him? He will returne laden with the riches of heauen, and will fetch his old partner to the participation of this glorious wealth. Goe then, my Soule, to this ſure and gainfull traffique, and leaue my other halfe in an harbour as ſafe, though not ſo bleſſed; yet ſo ſhalt thou be ſeparated, that my very duſt ſhall be vnited to thee ſtill, and to my Sauiour in thee.

The Teſtimonies.

Wert thou vnwilling at the cōmand of thy Creator to ioine thy ſelfe at the firſt with this body of mine? why art thou then loth to part with that, which thou haſt found, though intire, yet troubleſome? Doeſt thou not heare Salomon ſay, The day of death is better than the day of thy birth? doſt thou not beleeue him? or art thou in loue with the worſe, and diſpleaſed with the better? If any man could haue found a life worthy to be preferred vnto death, ſo great a King muſt needs haue done it; now in his very Throne, he commends his Coffin. Yea, what wilt thou ſay to thoſe Heathens, that mourned at the birth, and feaſted at the death of their children? They knew the miſeries of liuing as well as thou, the happineſſe of dying they could not know; and if they reioyced out of a conceit of ceaſing to be miſerable; how ſhouldeſt thou cheere thy ſelfe in an expectation, yea an aſſurance of being happy? He that is the Lord of life, and tried what it was to die, hath proclaimed them bleſſed that die in the Lord. Thoſe are bleſſed, I know, that liue in him, but they reſt not from their labours; Toyle and ſorrow is betweene them, and a perfect enioying of that bleſſedneſſe, which they now poſſeſſe only in hope and inchoation; when death hath added reſt, their happineſſe is finiſhed.

The taſte of our Meditation.

O death, how ſweet is that reſt, wherewith thou refreſheſt the weary Pilgrims of this vale of mortality? How pleaſant is thy face to thoſe eies, that haue acquainted themſelues with the ſight of it, which to ſtrangers is grim and gaſtly? How worthy art thou to be welcome vnto thoſe that know whence thou art, and whither thou tendeſt? who that knowes thee, can feare thee? who that is not all nature, would rather hide himſelfe amongſt the baggage of this vile life, than follow thee to a Crowne? what indifferent Iudge that ſhould ſee life painted ouer, with vaine ſemblances of pleaſures, attended with troups of ſorrowes on the one ſide, and on the other with vncertaintie of continuance, and certainty of diſſolution; and then ſhould turne his eyes vnto death, and ſee her blacke, but comely, attended on the one hand with a momentany paine, with eternity of glory on the other, would not ſay, out of choice, that which the Prophet ſaid out of paſſion, It is better for me to die than to liue?

The Complaint.

But, O my Soule, what ailes thee to be thus ſuddenly backward, and fearefull? No heart hath more freely diſcourſed of death, in ſpeculation; no tongue hath more extolled it in abſence. And now, that it is come to thy beds ſide, and hath drawne thy curtaines, and takes thee by the hand, and offers thee ſeruice, thou ſhrinkeſt inward, and by the paleneſſe of thy face, and wildneſſe of thine eye, bewraieſt an amazement at the preſence of ſuch a gueſt. That face, which was ſo familiar to thy thoughts, is now vnwelcome to thine eyes; I am aſhamed of this weake irreſolution. Whitherto haue tended all thy ſerious meditations? what hath Chriſtianity done to thee, if thy feares bee ſtill heatheniſh? Is this thine imitation of ſo many worthy Saints of God, whom thou haſt ſeene entertaine the violenteſt deaths with ſmiles and ſongs? Is this the fruit of thy long long and frequent inſtruction ? Didſt thou thinke death would haue beene content with words? didſt thou hope it would ſuffice thee to talke, while all other ſuffer? Where is thy faith ? Yea, where art thou thy ſelfe, O my ſoule ? Is heauen worthy of no more thankes, no more ioy? Shall Heretickes, ſhall Pagans giue death a better welcome than thou ? Hath thy Maker, thy Redeemer ſent for thee, and art thou loth to goe ? hath hee ſent for thee, to put thee in poſſeſſion of that glorious Inheritance, which thy wardſhip hath cheerefully expected, and art thou loth to goe ? Hath God with this Sergeant of his, ſent his Angels to fetch thee, and art thou loth to goe? Rouſe vp thy ſelfe for ſhame, O my ſoule : and if euer thou haſt truly beleeued, ſhake off this vnchriſtian diffidence, and addreſſe thy ſelfe ioyfully for thy glory.

Hall, J.

The wiſh.

Yea, O my Lord, it is thou, that muſt raiſe vp this faint and drooping heart of mine; thou onely canſt rid me of this weake and cowardly diſtruſt; Thou that ſendeſt for my ſoule, canſt prepare it for thy ſelfe ; thou onely canſt make thy meſſenger welcome to me. O that I could but ſee thy face through death ! Oh that I could ſee death, not as it was, but as thou haſt made it ! Oh that I could heartily pledge thee, my Sauiour, in this cup, that ſo I might drinke new wine with thee, in thy Fathers Kingdome !

The Confeſſion.

But alas, O my God, nature is ſtrong and weake in me, at once : I cannot wiſh to welcome death, as it is worthy; when I looke for moſt courage, I finde ſtrongeſt temptations : I ſee and confeſſe, that when I am my ſelfe, thou haſt no ſuch coward as I : Let me alone, and I ſhall ſhame that name of thine, which I haue profeſſed : euery ſecure worldling ſhall laugh at my feebleneſſe. O God, were thy Martyrs thus haled to their ſtakes ? might they not haue beene looſed from their rackes, and choſe to dye in thoſe torments ? Let it be no ſhame for thy ſeruant to take vp that complaint which thou mad'ſt of thy better Attendants; The ſpirit is willing, but the fleſh is weake.

The Petition and enforcement.

O thou God of ſpirits, that haſt coupled theſe two together, vnite them in a deſire of their diſſolution; weaken this fleſh to receiue, and encourage this ſpirit either to deſire, or to contemne death; and now, as I grow neerer to my home, let me increaſe in the ſenſe of my ioyes : I am thine, ſaue me, O Lord ; It was thou that didſt put ſuch courage into thine ancient, and late witneſſes, that they either inuited, or challenged death ; and held their perſecutors their beſt friends, for letting them looſe from theſe gieues of fleſh. I know, thine hand is not ſhortned ; neither any of them hath receiued more proofes of thy former mercies ; Oh let thy goodneſſe inable me to reach them in the comfortable ſteadineſſe of my paſſage: Doe but draw this Vaile a little, that I may ſee my glory, and I cannot but be inflamed with the deſire of it: It was not I, that either made this body for the earth, or this ſoule for my body, or this heauen for my ſoule, or this glory of Heauen, or this entrance into glory : All is thine owne worke; Oh perfect what thou haſt begun, that thy praiſe and my happineſſe may be conſummate at once.

The aſſurance, or Confidence.

Yea, O my ſoule, what need'ſt thou wiſh the God of mercies to be tender of his owne honour ? Art thou not a member of that body, whereof thy Sauiour is the Head? canſt thou drowne, when thy Head is aboue ? was it not for thee, that he triumpht ouer death? Is there any feare in a foiled aduerſary ? Oh my Redeemer, I haue already ouercome in thee: how can I miſcarry in my ſelfe? O my ſoule, thou haſt marched valiantly! Behold, the Damoſels of that heauenly Ieruſalem come forth with Timbrels and Harps to meet thee, and to applaud thy ſucceſſe : And now, there remaines nothing for thee but a Crowne of righteouſneſſe, which that righteous Iudge ſhall giue thee, at that Day: Oh Death, where is thy ſting ? Oh graue, where is thy victory ?

The thankſgiuing.

Returne now vnto thy reſt, O my ſoule; for the Lord hath beene beneficiall vnto thee. O Lord God, the ſtrength of my ſaluation, thou haſt couered my head in the day of battell : O my God, and King, I will extoll thee, and will bleſſe thy name for euer, and euer. I will bleſſe thee daily, and praiſe thy Name for euer, and euer. Great is the Lord, and moſt worthy to be praiſed, and his greatneſſe is incomprehenſible : I will meditate of the beauty of thy glorious Maieſty, and thy wonderfull workes : Hoſanna, thou that dwelleſt in the higheſt Heauens. Amen.

Hall, J.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, EDVVARD LORD DENNY, BARON OF VVALTHAM, MY moſt bountifull Patron; Grace and Peace.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

THis aduantage a Scholar hath aboue others, that he cannot be idle, and that he can worke without inſtruments. For, the minde inured to contemplation, will ſet it ſelfe on worke, when other occaſions faile: and hath no more power not to ſtudie, than the eye which is open, hath, not to ſee ſome thing; in which buſineſſe it carries about his owne Library, neither can complaine to want Bookes while it enioyeth it ſelfe.

I could not then neglect the commoditie of this plentifull leaſure in my ſo eaſie attendance here; but (though beſides my courſe, and without the helpe of others writings) muſt needs buſie my ſelfe in ſuch thoughts as I haue euer giuen account of, to your Lordſhip: ſuch as I hope ſhall not be vnprofitable, nor vnwelcome to their Patron, to their Readers. I ſend them forth from hence, vnder your Honourable name; to ſhew you that no abſence, no imployment can make me forget my due reſpect to your Lordſhip: to whom

Hall, J.

(next vnder my gracious Maſter) I haue deſeruedly bequeathed my ſelfe and my endeuours. Your goodneſſe hath not wont to magnifie it ſelfe more in giuing, than in receiuing ſuch like holy preſents: the knowledge whereof hath intitled you to more labours of this nature (if I haue numbred aright) than any of your Peeres. I miſdoubt not either your acceptation, or their vſe. That God, who hath aboue all his other fauours giuen your Lordſhip, euen in theſe careleſſe times, an heart truly religious, giue you an happie increaſe of all his heauenly graces by my vnworthy ſeruice. To his gracious care I daily commend your Lordſhip with my Honourable Lady; wiſhing you both, all that little ioy earth can affoord you, and fulneſſe of glory aboue.

Non-ſuch. Iuly 3.

Your Lordſhips

Moſt humbly deuoted for euer in all dutie and obſeruance,

HOLY OBSERVATIONS.

1

AS there is nothing ſooner drie than a teare; ſo there is nothing ſooner out of ſeaſon than worldly ſorrow: which if it be freſh and ſtill bleeding, findes ſome to comfort and pitie it; if ſtale and skinned ouer with time, is rather entertained with ſmiles, than commiſeration: But the ſorrow of repentance comes neuer out of time. All times are alike vnto that Eternity, whereto we make our ſpirituall mones: That which is paſt, that which is future, are both preſent with him. It is neither weake nor vncomely, for an old man to weepe for the ſinnes of his youth. Thoſe teares can neuer be ſhed either too ſoone, or too late.

Some men liue to be their owne executors for their good name; which they ſee (not honeſtly) buried, before themſelues die. Some other of great place, and ill deſert, part with their good name and breath, at once. There is ſcarce a vicious man, whoſe name is not rotten before his carcaſſe. Contrarily, the good mans name is oft times heire to his life; either borne after the death of the parent, for that enuy would not ſuffer it to come forth before: or perhaps ſo well growne vp in his life-time, that the hope thereof is the ſtaffe of his age, and ioy of his death. A wicked mans name may be feared a while; ſoone after, it is either forgottten or curſed: The good man either ſleepeth with his body in peace, or waketh (as his ſoule) in glory.

3

Oft-times thoſe which ſhew much valour while there is equall poſſibilitie of life, when they ſee a preſent neceſſity of death, are found moſt ſhamefully timorous. Their courage was before grounded vpon hope; that, cut off, leaues them at once deſperate and cowardly: whereas men of feebler ſpirits meet more cheerefully with death; becauſe though their courage be leſſe, yet their expectation was more.

4

I haue ſeldome ſeene the ſonne of an excellent and famous man, excellent: But that an ill bird hath an ill egge, is not rare; children poſſeſſing as the bodily diſeaſes, ſo the vices of their Parents. Vertue is not propagated: Vice is; euen in them which haue it not reigning in themſelues. The graine is ſowne pure, but comes vp with chaffe and huske. Haſt thou a good ſonne? He is Gods, not thine. Is he euill? Nothing but his ſinne is thine. Helpe by thy prayers and endeuours to take away that which thou haſt giuen him, and to obtaine from God that which thou haſt, and canſt not giue: Elſe thou mayeſt name him a poſſeſſion; but thou ſhalt finde him a loſſe.

Hall, J.

5

Theſe things be comely and pleaſant to ſee, and worthy of honour from the beholder: A young Saint, an old Martyr, a religious Souldier, a conſcionable Stateſman, a great man courteous, a learned man humble, a ſilent woman, a childe vnderſtanding the eye of his Parent, a merry companion without vanitie, a friend not changed with honour, a ſicke man cheerefull, a ſoule departing with comfort and aſſurance.

6

I haue oft obſerued in merry meetings ſolemnly made, that ſomewhat hath fallen out croſſe, either in the time, or immediatly vpon it; to ſeaſon (as I thinke) our immoderation in deſiring or enioying our friends: and againe, euents ſuſpected, haue proued euer beſt; God herein bleſſing our awfull ſubmiſſion with good ſucceſſe. In all theſe humane things, indifferencie is ſafe. Let thy doubts be euer equall to thy deſires: ſo thy diſappointment ſhall not be grieuous, becauſe thy expectation was not peremptory.

7

You ſhall rarely finde a man eminent in ſundry faculties of minde, or ſundry manuary trades. If his memory be excellent, his fantaſie is but dull: if his fanſie be buſie and quicke, his iudgement is but ſhallow: If his iudgement be deepe, his vtterance is harſh: which alſo holds no leſſe in the actiuities of the hand. And if it happen that one man be qualified with skill of diuers trades, and practiſe this varietie, you ſhall ſeldome finde ſuch one thriuing in his eſtate: with ſpirituall gifts it is otherwiſe; which are ſo chained together, that who excels in one, hath ſome eminencie in more, yea, in all. Looke vpon faith: ſhee is attended with a Beuie of Graces: Hee that beleeues, cannot but haue hope: if hope, patience. Hee that beleeues and hopes, muſt needs finde ioy in God: if ioy, loue of God; he that loues God, cannot but loue his brother: his loue to God, breeds piety and care to pleaſe, ſorrow for offending, feare to offend: his loue to men, fidelitie and Chriſtian beneficence. Vices are ſeldome ſingle; but vertues goe euer in troupes: they go ſo thicke, that ſometimes ſome are hid in the crowd; which yet are, but appeare not. They may be ſhut out from ſight; they cannot be ſeuered.

8

The Heauen euer moues, and yet is the place of our reſt: Earth euer reſts, and yet is the place of our trouble. Outward motion can be no enemie to inward reſt; as outward reſt may well ſtand with inward vnquietneſſe.

9

None liue ſo ill, but they content themſelues in ſomewhat: Euen the begger likes the ſmell of his diſh. It is a rare euill that hath not ſomething to ſweeten it, either in ſenſe, or in hope: Otherwiſe men would grow deſperate, mutinous, enuious of others, weary of themſelues. The better that thing is wherein we place our comfort, the happier we liue: and the more we loue good things, the better they are to vs. The worldlings comfort, though it be good to him becauſe he loues it; yet becauſe it is not abſolutely and eternally good, it failes him: wherein the Chriſtian hath iuſt aduantage of him, while he hath all the ſame cauſes of ioy refined and exalted; beſides, more and higher, which the other knowes not of: the worldling laughes more, but the Chriſtian is more delighted. Theſe two are eaſily ſeuered. Thou ſeeſt a goodly picture, or an heape of thy gold: thou laugheſt not, yet thy delight is more than in a ieſt that ſhaketh thy ſpleene. As griefe, ſo ioy is not leſſe when it is leaſt expreſſed.

10

I haue ſeene the worſt natures, and moſt depraued mindes, not affecting all ſins; but ſtill ſome they haue condemned in others, and abhorred in themſelues. One exclaimes on couetouſneſſe, yet he can too well abide riotous good fellowſhip. Another inueighs againſt drunkenneſſe and exceſſe, not caring how cruell hee bee in vſury and oppreſſion. One cannot endure a rough and quarrellous diſpoſition, yet giues himſelfe ouer to vncleane and laſciuious courſes. Another hates all wrongs, ſaue wrong to God. One is a ciuill Atheiſt, another a religious Vſurer, a third an honeſt Drunkard, a fourth an vnchaſte Iuſticer, a fiſt a chaſte Quarreller. I know not whether euery Deuill excell in all ſinnes: I am ſure ſome of them haue denomination from ſome ſinnes more ſpeciall. Let no man applaud himſelfe for thoſe ſinnes he wanteth, but condemne himſelfe rather for that ſinne he hath. Thou cenſureſt another mans ſinne, he thine; God curſeth both.

11

Gold is the heauieſt of all metals: It is no wonder that the rich man is vſually carried downeward to his place. It is hard for the ſoule, clogged with many weights, to aſcend to Heauen: It muſt be a ſtrong and nimble ſoule, that can carry vp it ſelfe, and ſuch a load, yet Adam and Noah flew vp thither with the double Monarchy of the world, the Patriarkes with much wealth, many holy Kings with maſſie Crownes and Scepters. The burthen of couetous deſires is more heauy to an empty ſoule, than much treaſure to the full. Our affections giue poize or lightneſſe to earthly things. Either abate of thy load, if thou finde it too preſſing, whether by hauing leſſe, or louing leſſe: or adde to thy ſtrength and actiuity, that thou maieſt yet aſcend. It is more commendable, by how much more hard, to climbe into heauen with a burden.

12

A Chriſtian in all his waies muſt haue three guides: Truth, Charitie, Wiſdome. Truth to goe before him; Charity and Wiſdome on either hand. If any of the three be abſent, he walkes amiſſe. I haue ſeene ſome doe hurt by following a truth vncharitably. And others, while they would ſalue vp an errour with loue, haue failed in their wiſdome, and offended againſt iuſtice. A charitable vntruth, and an vncharitable truth, and an vnwiſe menaging of truth or loue, are all to be carefully auoided of him, that would goe with a right foot in the narrow way.

13

God brought man forth at firſt, not into a wilderneſſe, but a Garden; yet then he expected the beſt ſeruice of him. I neuer finde that hee delights in the miſery, but in the proſperity of his ſeruants. Cheerefulneſſe pleaſes him better than a deiected and dull heauineſſe of heart. If we can be good with pleaſure, hee grudgeth not our ioy: If not, it is beſt to ſtint our ſelues; not for that theſe comforts are not good, but becauſe our hearts are euill: faulting not their nature, but our vſe and corruption.

14

The homelieſt ſeruice that we doe in an honeſt calling, though it be but to plow, or digge, if done in obedience, and conſcience of Gods Commandement, is crowned with an ample reward; whereas the beſt workes for their kinde (preaching, praying, offering Euangelicall ſacrifices) if without reſpect of Gods iniunction and glory, are loaded with curſes. God loueth aduerbs; and cares not how good, but how well.

15

The golden infancy of ſome hath proceeded to a brazen youth, and ended in a leaden age. All humane maturities haue their period: onely grace hath none. I durſt neuer lay too much hope on the forward beginnings of wit and memory, which haue beene applauded in children. I knew, they could but attaine their vigor; and that if ſooner, no whit the better: for the earlier is their perfection of wiſdome, the longer ſhall be their witleſſe age. Seaſonableneſſe is the beſt in all theſe things which haue their ripeneſſe and decay. We can neuer hope too much of the timely bloſſomes of grace, whoſe ſpring is perpetuall, and whoſe harueſt begins with our end.

16

A man muſt giue thankes for ſomewhat which he may not pray for. It hath beene ſaid of Courtiers, that they muſt receiue iniuries, and giue thankes. God cannot wrong his, but he will croſſe them; thoſe croſſes are beneficiall; all benefits challenge thankes: yet I haue read, that Gods children haue with condition prayed againſt them, neuer for them. In good things, we pray both for them, and their good vſe: in euill, for their good vſe, not themſelues; yet we muſt giue thankes for both. For there is no euill of paine which God doth not; nothing that God doth, is not good; no good thing but is worthy of thankes.

17

One halfe of the world knowes not how the other liues: and therefore the better ſort pitty not the diſtreſſed; and the miſerable enuy not thoſe which fare better, becauſe they know it not. Each man iudges of others conditions, by his owne. The worſt ſort would bee too much diſcontented, if they ſaw how far more pleaſant the life of others is. And if the better ſort (ſuch we call thoſe which are greater) could looke downe to the infinite miſeries of inferiours, it would make them either miſerable in compaſſion, or proud in conceit. It is good, ſometimes, for the delicate rich man to looke into the poore mans Cupbord: and ſeeing God in mercy giues him not to know their ſorrow by experience, to know it yet in ſpeculation: This ſhall teach him more thanks to God, more mercy to men, more contentment in himſelfe.

18

Such as a mans prayer is for another, it ſhall be in time of his extremitie for himſelfe: for though he loue himſelfe more than others, yet his apprehenſion of God is alike for both. Such as his prayer is in a former extremity, it ſhall be alſo in death: this way we may haue experience euen of a thing future: If God haue beene farre off from thee in a fit of thine ordinary ſickneſſe, feare leſt he will not be neerer thee in thy laſt: what differs that from this, but in time? Correct thy dulneſſe vpon former proofes; or elſe at laſt thy deuotion ſhall want life before thy body.

19

Thoſe that come to their meat as to a medicine (as Auguſtine reports of himſelfe) liue in an auſtere and Chriſtian temper, and ſhall be ſure not to ioy too much in the creature, nor to abuſe themſelues: Thoſe that come to their medicine as to meat, ſhall be ſure to liue miſerably, and die ſoone. To come to meat, if without a gluttonous appetite and palate, is allowed to Chriſtians: To come to meat as to a ſacrifice vnto the belly, is a moſt baſe and brutiſh idolatry.

20

The worſt that euer were, euen Cain and Iudas, haue had ſome Fautors that haue honoured them for Saints: and the Serpent that beguiled our firſt Parents, hath in that name had diuine honour and thankes. Neuer any man trod ſo perillous and deepe ſteps, but ſome haue followed, and admired him. Each maſter of Hereſie hath found ſome clients; euen hee, that taught all mens opinions were true. Againe, no man hath beene ſo exquiſite, but ſome haue detracted from him, euen in thoſe qualities, which haue ſeemed moſt worthy of wonder to others. A man ſhall bee ſure to bee backed by ſome, either in good or euill, and by ſome ſhouldred in both. It is good for a man not to ſtand vpon his Abbetters, but his quarrell, and not to depend vpon others, but himſelfe.

21

We ſee thouſands of creatures die for our vſe, and neuer doe ſo much as pittie them: why doe we thinke much to die once for God? They are not ours ſo much as we are his; nor our pleaſure ſo much to vs, as his glory to him: their liues are loſt to vs, ours but changed to him.

22

Much ornament is no good ſigne: painting of the face argues an ill complexion of body, a worſe minde. Truth hath a face both honeſt and comely, and lookes beſt in her owne colours: but, aboue all, Diuine Truth is moſt faire, and moſt ſcorneth to borrow beautie of mans wit or tongue: ſhe loueth to come forth in her natiue grace, like a princely Matrone; and counts it the greateſt indignitie, to bee dallied with as a wanton Strumpet: ſhe lookes to command reuerence, not pleaſure: ſhe would bee kneeled to, not laughed at. To pranke her vp in vaine dreſſes and faſhions, or to ſport with her in a light and youthfull manner, is moſt abhorring from her nature: they know her not, that giue her ſuch entertainment; and ſhall firſt know her angry, when they doe know her. Againe, ſhe would be plaine, but not baſe, not ſluttiſh: ſhe would be clad, not gariſhly, yet not in ragges: ſhe likes as little to be ſet out by a baſe ſoile, as to ſeeme credited with gay colours. It is no ſmall wiſdome to know her iuſt guiſe, but more to follow it; and ſo to keepe the meane, that while we pleaſe her, we diſcontent not the beholders.

23

In worldly carriage, ſo much is a man made of, as he takes vpon himſelfe: but ſuch is Gods bleſſing vpon true humilitie, that it ſtill procureth reuerence. I neuer ſaw Chriſtian leſſe honoured for a wiſe neglect of himſelfe. If our deiection proceed from the conſcience of our want, it is poſſible we ſhould be as little eſteemed of others, as of our ſelues: but if we haue true graces, and prize them not at the higheſt, others ſhall value both them in vs, and vs for them, and with vſury giue vs that honour we with-held modeſtly from our ſelues.

24

He that takes his full libertie in what he may, ſhall repent him: how much more in what he ſhould not? I nener read of Chriſtian that repented him of too little worldly delight. The ſureſt courſe I haue ſtill found in all earthly pleaſures, to riſe with an appetite, and to be ſatisfied with a little.

25

There is a time when Kings goe not forth to warfare: our ſpirituall warre admits no intermiſſion: it knowes no night, no winter, abides no peace, no truce. This calls vs not into garriſon, where we may haue eaſe and reſpit, but into pitched fields continually: we ſee our enemies in the face alwaies, and are alwaies ſeene and aſſaulted; euer reſiſting, euer defending, receiuing and returning blowes. If either wee be negligent or weary, we die: what other hope is there while one fights, and the other ſtands ſtill? We can neuer haue ſafetie and peace, but in victory. There muſt our reſiſtance be couragious and conſtant, where both yeelding is death, and all treaties of peace mortall.

26

Neutralitie in things good or euill, is both odious, and preiudiciall; but in matters of an indifferent nature is ſafe and commendable. Herein taking of parts maketh ſides, and breaketh vnitie. In an vniuſt cauſe of ſeparation, he that fauoureth both parts may (perhaps) haue leaſt loue of either ſide, but hath moſt charitie in himſelfe.

27

Nothing is more abſurd, than that Epicurean reſolution, Let vs eat and drinke, to mor- row we ſhall die: As if we were made onely for the panch, and liued that we might liue: yet there was neuer any naturall man found ſauour in that meat which he knew ſhould be his laſt: whereas they ſhould ſay, Let vs faſt and pray, to morrow we ſhall die: for, to what purpoſe is the bodie ſtrengthned, that it may periſh? Whoſe greater ſtrength makes our death more violent. No man beſtowes a coſtly roofe on a ruinous tenement: that mans end is eaſie and happy, whom death findes with a weake bodie, and a ſtrong ſoule.

28

Sometime, euen things in themſelues naturally good, are to bee refuſed for thoſe, which (being euill) may be an occaſion to a greater good. Life is in it ſelfe good, and death euill: elſe Dauid, Elias, and many excellent Martyrs would not haue fled, to hold life, and auoid death; nor Ezechiah haue praied for it, nor our Sauiour haue bidden vs to flee for it, nor God promiſed it to his for a reward: yet if in ſome caſes we hate not life, we loue not God, nor our ſoules. Herein, as much as in any thing, the peruerſeneſſe of our nature appeares, that we wiſh death, or loue life vpon wrong cauſes: wee would liue for pleaſure, or we would die for paine; Iob for his ſores, Elias for his perſecution, Ionas for his Gourd would preſently die, and will needs out-face God that it is better for him to die than to liue: wherein we are like to garrriſon-ſouldiers, that while they liue within ſafe walls, and ſhew themſelues once a day rather for ceremonie and pompe, than need or danger, like warfare well enough; but if once called forth to the field, they wiſh themſelues at home.

29

Not onely the leaſt, but the worſt is euer in the bottome: what ſhould God doe with the dregges of our age? When ſinne will admit thee his Client no longer, then God ſhall be beholden to thee for thy ſeruice: Thus is God dealt with in all other offerings: The worſt and leaſt ſheafe muſt be Gods Tenth: The deformedſt or ſimpleſt of our children muſt be Gods Miniſters: the vncleanlieſt and moſt careleſſe houſe muſt be Gods Temple: The idleſt and ſleepieſt houres of the day muſt be reſerued for our praiers: The worſt part of our age for deuotion. We would haue God giue vs ſtill of the beſt, and are ready to murmure at euery little euill he ſends vs: yet nothing is bad enough for him, of whom we receiue all. Nature condemnes this inequalitie; and tels vs, that he which is the Author of good, ſhould haue the beſt; and he which giues all ſhould haue his choice.

30

When we goe about an euill buſineſſe, it is ſtrange how readie the deuill is to ſet vs forward; how carefull, that we ſhould want no furtherances. So that if a man would be lewdly witty, hee ſhall be ſure to be furniſhed with ſtore of prophane ieſts, wherein a looſe heart hath double aduantage of the conſcionable. If he would be voluptuous, he ſhall want neither obiects nor opportunities. The currant paſſage of ill enterpriſes is ſo farre from giuing cauſe of encouragement, that it ſhould iuſtly fright a man to looke backe to the Author; and to conſider that he therefore goes faſt, becauſe the deuill driues him.

31

In the choice of companions for our conuerſation, it is good dealing with men of good natures: for though grace exerciſeth her power in bridling nature, yet, (ſith wee are ſtill men, at the beſt) ſome ſwinge ſhe will haue in the moſt mortified. Auſteritie, ſullenneſſe, or ſtrangeneſſe of diſpoſition, and whatſoeuer qualities may make a man vnſociable, cleaue faſter to our nature, than thoſe which are morally euill. True Chriſtian loue may be ſeparated from acquaintance, and acquaintance from intireneſſe: Theſe are not qualities to hinder our loue, but our familiaritie.

32

Ignorance, as it makes bold, intruding men careleſly into vnknowne dangers; ſo alſo it makes men oft-times cauſeleſly fearefull. Herod feared Chriſts comming, becauſe he miſtooke it: If that Tyrant had knowne the manner of his ſpirituall Regiment, he had ſpared both his owne fright and the bloud of other. And hence it is that we feare death, becauſe we are not acquainted with the vertue of it. Nothing but innocencie and knowledge can giue ſound confidence to the heart.

33

Where are diuers opinions, they may be all falſe; there can be but one true: and that one truth oft-times muſt be fetcht by peece-meale out of diuers branches of contrary opinions. For, it falls out not ſeldome, that Truth is through ignorance or raſh vehemencie, ſcattered into ſundry parts; and like to a little Siluer melted amongſt the ruines of a burnt houſe, muſt be tried out from heapes of much ſuperfluous aſhes. There is much paines in the ſearch of it; much skill in finding it: the value of it once found, requites the coſt of both.

34

Affectation of ſuperfluitie, is in all things a ſigne of weakneſſe: As, in words, he that vſeth circumlocutions to expreſſe himſelfe, ſhewes want of memory, and want of proper ſpeech: And much talke argues a braine feeble and diſtempered. What good can any earthly thing yeeld vs beſide his vſe? and what is it but vanity, to affect that which doth vs no good? and what vſe is it in that which is ſuperfluous? It is a great skill to know what is enough, and great wiſdome to care for no more.

35

Good things, which in abſence were deſired, now offering themſelues to our preſence, are ſcarce entertained; or at leaſt not with our puposed cheerefulneſſe. Chriſts comming to vs, and our going to him, are in our profeſſion well eſteemed, much wiſhed: but when he ſingleth vs out by a direct meſſage of death, or by ſome fearefull ſigne giueth likelihood of a preſent returne, we are as much affected with feare, as before with deſire. All changes, although to the better, are troubleſome for the time, vntill our ſetling: There is no remedy hereof but inward preuention: Our minde muſt change, before our eſtate be changed.

36

Thoſe are greateſt enemies to Religion, that are not moſt irreligious. Atheiſts, though in themſelues they be the worſt, yet are ſeldome found hot Perſecutors of others: whereas thoſe which in ſome one fundamentall point be hereticall, are commonly moſt violent in oppoſitions. One hurts by ſecret infection, the other by open reſiſtance: One is careleſſe of all truth, the other vehement for ſome vntruth. An Atheiſt is worthy of more hatred, an Heretike of more feare; both of auoidance.

37

Wayes, if neuer vſed, cannot but be faire; if much vſed, are made commodiouſly paſſable; if before oft vſed, and now ſeldome, they become deepe and dangerous. If the heart be not at all inured to meditation, it findeth no fault with it ſelfe; not for that it is innocent, but ſecure; if often, it findeth comfortable paſſage for his thoughts; if rarely, and with intermiſſion, tedious and troubleſome. In things of this nature, wee only eſcape complaint, if we vſe them either alwayes or neuer.

38

Our ſenſuall hand holds faſt whatſoeuer delight it apprehendeth: our ſpirituall hand

eaſily

Hall, J.

eaſily remitteth; becauſe appetite is ſtronger in vs than grace: whence it is, that we ſo hardly deliuer our ſelues of earthly pleaſures, which we haue once entertained; and with ſuch difficulty draw our ſelues to a conſtant courſe of faith, hope and ſpirituall ioy, or to the renued acts of them once intermitted. Age is naturally weake, and youth vigorous; but in vs the old man is ſtrong, the new faint and feeble: the fault is not in grace, but in vs: Faith doth not want ſtrength, but we want faith.

39

It is not good in worldly eſtates for a man to make himſelfe neceſſary; for hereupon he is both more toiled, and more ſuſpected: but in the ſacred Common-wealth of the Church, a man cannot be engaged too deepely by his ſeruice. The ambition of ſpirituall well-doing breeds no danger. Hee that doth beſt, and may worſt bee ſpared, is happieſt.

40

It was a fit compariſon of worldly cares, to thornes: for as they choke the Word, ſo they pricke our ſoules: Neither the Word can grow vp amongſt them, nor the heart can reſt vpon them: Neither body nor ſoule can finde eaſe while they are within, or cloſe to vs. Spirituall cares are as ſharpe; but more profitable: they paine vs, but leaue the ſoule better. They breake our ſleepe, but for a ſweeter reſt: we are not well, but either while we haue them, or after we haue had them. It is as impoſſible to haue ſpirituall health without theſe, as to haue bodily ſtrength with the other.

41

In temporall good things, it is beſt to liue in doubt; not making full account of that which we hold in ſo weake a tenure: In ſpirituall, with confidence; not fearing that which is warranted to vs by an infallible promiſe and ſure earneſt. He liues more contentedly, that is moſt ſecure for this world, moſt reſolute for the other.

42

God hath in nature giuen euery man inclinations to ſome one particular calling; which if he follow, he excells; if he croſſe, he proues a non-proficient, and changeable: but all mens natures are equally indiſpoſed to grace, and to the common vocation of Chriſtianity: we are all borne Heathens. To doe well, Nature muſt in the firſt be obſerued and followed, in the other croſſed and ouercome.

43

Good-man is a title giuen to the loweſt; whereas all Titles of Greatneſſe, Worſhip, Honour, are obſerued and attributed with choice. The ſpeech of the World bewrayes their minde, and ſhewes the common eſtimation of goodneſſe compared with other qualities. The World therefore is an ill Herald, and vnſkilfull in the true ſtiles. It were happy that Goodneſſe were ſo common; and pity that it either ſhould not ſtand with Greatneſſe, or not be preferred to it.

44

Amongſt all actions, Satan is euer buſieſt in the beſt, and moſt in the beſt part of the beſt; as in the end of Prayer, when the heart ſhould cloze vp it ſelfe with moſt comfort. He neuer feares vs, but when we are well employed: and the more likelihood he ſees of our profit, the more is his enuy and labour to diſtract vs. We ſhould loue our ſelues as much as he hates vs; and therefore ſtriue ſo much the more towards our good, as his malice ſtriueth to interrupt it. We doe nothing, if we contend not, when we are reſiſted. The good ſoule is euer in contradiction; denying what is granted, and contending for that which is denied; ſuſpecting when it is gain-ſaid, and fearing libertie.

45

God fore-warnes ere he trie, becauſe he would be preuented: Satan ſteales vpon vs ſuddenly by temptations, becauſe he would ſoile vs. If we relent not vpon Gods premonition, and meet not the lingring paſe of his puniſhments, to fore-ſtall them, he puniſheth more, by how much his warning was more euident and more large. Gods trialls muſt be met when they come: Satans muſt be ſeene before they come; and if wee be not armed ere we be aſſaulted, we ſhall be foiled ere we can be armed.

46

It is not good to be continuall in denunciation of iudgement: The noiſe to which we are accuſtomed (though loud) wakes vs not; whereas a leſſe (if vnuſuall) ſtirreth vs. The next way to make threatnings contemned, is to make them common. It is a profitable rod that ſtrikes ſparingly, and frights ſomewhat oftner than it ſmiteth.

47

Want of vſe cauſeth diſability, and cuſtome perfection. Thoſe that haue not vſed to pray in their Cloſet, cannot pray in publike, but coldly and in forme. He that diſcontinues meditation, ſhall be long in recouering; whereas the man inured to theſe exerciſes (who is not dreſſed till he haue prayed, nor hath ſupped till he haue meditated) doth both theſe well, and with eaſe. Hee that intermits good duties, incurres a double loſſe: of the bleſſing that followeth good; of the facultie of doing it.

48

Chriſtianity is both an eaſie yoke, and an hard; hard to take vp; eaſie to beare when once taken. The heart requires much labour, ere it can be induced to ſtoope vnder it; and findes as much contentment when it hath ſtooped. The worldling thinkes Religion ſeruilitie; but the Chriſtian knowes whoſe ſlaue he was, till he entred into this ſeruice; and that no bondage can be ſo euill, as freedome from theſe bonds.

49

It is a wonder how full of ſhifts Nature is; ready to turne ouer all good purpoſes. If we thinke of death, ſhe ſuggeſts ſecretly; Tuſh, it ſhall not come yet: If of iudgement for ſinne; This concernes not thee; it ſhall not come at all: If of heauen, and our labour to reach it; Trouble not thy ſelfe; it will come ſoone enough alone. Addreſſe thy ſelfe to pray; It is yet vnſeaſonable; ſtay for a better opportunity: To giue almes; Thou knoweſt not thy owne future wants: To reproue; What needſt thou thruſt thy ſelfe into wilfull hatred? Euery good action hath his let: He can neuer be good, that is not reſolute.

50

All Arts are Maids to Diuinitie; therefore they both vaile to her, and doe her ſeruice, and ſhe, like a graue Miſtreſſe, controlles them at pleaſure: Naturall Philoſophy teacheth, that of nothing can be nothing made; and that from the priuation to the habit, is no returne: Diuinitie takes her vp for theſe; and vpon ſupernaturall principles, teaches her a Creation, a Reſurrection. Philoſophy teaches vs to follow ſenſe, as an infallible guide: Diuinitie tells her, that faith is of things not ſeene. Logicke teaches vs firſt to diſcourſe, then to reſolue: Diuinitie, to aſſent without arguing. Ciuill Law teacheth, that long cuſtome preſcribeth: Diuinitie, that old things are paſſed. Morall Philoſophy, that tallying of iniuries is iuſtice: Diuinitie, that good muſt be returned for ill. Policy, that better is a miſchiefe than an inconuenience: Diuinitie, that we may not doe euill, that good may enſue. The Schoole is well ordered, while Diuinitie keepes the Chaire: but, if any other skill vſurpe it, and checke their Miſtreſſe, there can follow nothing but confuſion and Atheiſme.

51

Much difference is to be made betwixt a reuolter and a man trained vp in errour. A Iew and an Arrian both deny Chriſts Deitie, yet this opinion is not in both puniſht with bodily death. Yea a reuolt to a leſſe errour, is more puniſhable than education in a capitall Hereſie. Errours of iudgement, though leſſe regarded than errours of practice, yet are more pernicious: but none ſo deadly as theirs, that once were in the truth. If truth be not ſued to, it is dangerous; but if forſaken, deſperate.

52

It is an ill argument of a good action not well done, when we are glad that it is done. To be affected with the comfort of the conſcience of well performing it, is good: but meerely to reioyce that the act is ouer, is carnall. He neuer can begin cheerefully, that is glad he hath ended.

53

He that doth not ſecret ſeruice to God with ſome delight, doth but counterfeit in publike. The truth of any act or paſſion is then beſt tried, when it is without witneſſe. Openly, many ſiniſter reſpects may draw from vs a forme of religious duties: ſecretly, nothing but the power of a good conſcience. It is to be feared, God hath more true and deuout ſeruice in Cloſets, than in Churches.

54

Words and diſeaſes grow vpon vs with yeeres. In age, we talke much, becauſe we haue ſeene much, and ſoone after ſhall ceaſe talking for euer: We are moſt diſeaſed, becauſe nature is weakeſt; and death which is neere, muſt haue harbingers: ſuch is the old age of the World. No maruell, if this laſt time be full of writing, and weake diſcourſe, full of ſects and hereſies, which are the ſickneſſes of this great and decayed bodie.

55

The beſt ground vntilled, ſooneſt runs out into ranke weeds. Such are Gods Children; Ouer-growne with ſecuritie ere they are aware, vnleſſe they be well exerciſed both with Gods plow of affliction, and their owne induſtry in meditation. A man of knowledge that is either negligent or vncorrected, cannot but grow wilde and godleſſe.

56

With vs, vileſt things are moſt common; But with God the beſt things are moſt frequently giuen. Grace, which is the nobleſt of all Gods fauours, is vnpartially beſtowed vpon all willing receiuers; whereas Nobilitie of bloud and height of place, bleſſings of an inferiour nature, are reſerued for few. Herein the Chriſtian followes his Father; his prayers which are his richeſt portion, he communicates to all; his ſubſtance according to his ability, to few.

57

God therefore giues, becauſe he hath giuen; making his former fauours, arguments for more; Man therefore ſhuts his hand, becauſe he hath opened it. There is no ſuch way to procure more from God, as to vrge him with what he hath done. All Gods bleſſings are profitable and excellent; not ſo much in themſelues, as that they are inducements to greater.

58

Gods immediate actions are beſt, at firſt. The frame of this creation how exquiſite was it vnder his hand! afterward, blemiſhed by our ſinne: mans indeuours are weake in their beginnings, and perfecter by degrees. No ſcience, no deuice hath euer beene perfect in his cradle; or at once hath ſeene his birth and maturitie: of the ſame nature are thoſe actions which God worketh mediatly by vs according to our meaſure of receit.

The cauſe of both is, on the one ſide the infiniteneſſe of his wiſdome and power, which cannot be corrected by any ſecond aſſayes: On the other, our weakneſſe, helping it ſelfe by former grounds and trialls. He is an happy man that detracts nothing from Gods workes, and addes moſt to his owne.

The old ſaying is more common than true; that thoſe which are in hell, know no other heauen: for this makes the damned perfectly miſerable, that out of their owne torment, they ſee the felicitie of the Saints; together with their impoſſibility of attaining it. Sight without hope of fruition, is a torment alone: Thoſe that here might ſee God and will not, or doe ſee him obſcurely and loue him not, ſhall once ſee him with anguiſh of ſoule and not enioy him.

60

Sometimes euill ſpeeches come from good men, in their vnaduiſedneſſe: and ſometimes euen the good ſpeeches of men may proceed from an ill ſpirit. No confeſſion could be better than Satan gaue of Chriſt: It is not enough to conſider what is ſpoken, or by whom; but whence, and for what. The ſpirit is oftentimes tried by the ſpeech: but other-times the ſpeech muſt be examined by the ſpirit; and the ſpirit, by the rule of an higher word.

61

Greatneſſe puts high thoughts, and bigge words into a man; whereas the deiected minde takes, careleſly, what offers it ſelfe. Euery worldling is baſe-minded; and therefore his thoughts creepe ſtill low vpon the earth. The Chriſtian both is and knowes himſelfe truly great; and thereupon mindeth and ſpeaketh of ſpirituall, immortall, glorious, heauenly things. So much as the ſoule ſtoopeth vnto earthly thoughts, ſo much is it vnregenerate.

62

Long acquaintance, as it maketh thoſe things which are euill, to ſeeme leſſe euill; ſo it makes good things, which at firſt were vnpleaſant, delightfull. There is no euill of paine, nor no morall good action, which is not harſh at the firſt. Continuance of euill, which might ſeeme to weary vs, is the remedie and abatement of wearineſſe: and the practiſe of good, as it profiteth, ſo it pleaſeth. He that is a ſtranger to good and euill, findes both of them troubleſome. God therefore doth well for vs, while he exerciſeth vs with long afflictions: and we doe well to our ſelues, while we continually buſie our ſelues in good exerciſes.

63

Sometimes it is well taken by men, that we humble our ſelues lower than there is cauſe. Thy ſeruant IACOB, ſaith that good Patriarch, to his brother, to his inferiour. And no leſſe well doth God take theſe ſubmiſſe extenuations of our ſelues; I am a worme, and no man: Surely I am more fooliſh than a man, and haue not the vnderſtanding of a man in me. But I neuer finde that any man bragged to God, although in a matter of truth, and within the compaſſe of his deſert, and was accepted. A man may be too lowly in his dealing with men, euen vnto contempt: with God he cannot; but the lower he falleth, the higher is his exaltation.

64

The ſoule is fed as the body, ſtarued with hunger as the body, requires proportionable diet and neceſſary variety, as the body. All ages and ſtatures of the ſoule beare not the ſame nouriſhment. There is milke for ſpirituall Infants, ſtrong meat for the growne Chriſtian. The ſpoone is fit for one, the knife for the other. The beſt Chriſtian is not ſo growne, that he need to ſcorne the ſpoone; but the weake Chriſtian may finde a ſtrong feed dangerous. How many haue beene caſt away with ſpirituall ſurfets; becauſe being but new-borne, they haue ſwallowed downe bigge morſels of the higheſt myſteries of godlineſſe, which they neuer could digeſt; but together with them haue caſt vp their proper nouriſhment? A man muſt firſt know the power of his ſtomack, ere he know how with ſafetie and profit to frequent Gods Ordinary.

65

It is very hard for the beſt man in a ſudden extremity of death, to ſatisfie himſelfe in apprehending his ſtay, and repoſing his heart vpon it: for the ſoule is ſo oppreſſed with ſudden terrour, that it cannot well command it ſelfe, till it haue digeſted an euill. It were miſerable for the beſt Chriſtian, if all his former prayers and meditations did not ſerue to aid him in his laſt ſtraits, and meet together in the center of his extremitie; yeelding, though not ſenſible releefe, yet ſecret benefit to the ſoule: whereas the worldly man in this caſe, hauing not laid vp for this houre, hath no comfort from God, or from others, or from himſelfe.

66

All externall good or euill is meaſured by ſenſe: neither can we account that either good or ill, which doth neither actually auaile, nor hurt vs: ſpiritually this rule holds not. All our beſt good is inſenſible. For all our future (which is the greateſt) good, we hold only in hope; and the preſent fauour of God we haue many times, and feele not. The ſtomacke findes the beſt digeſtion euen in ſleepe, when we leaſt perceiue it: and whiles we are moſt awake, this power worketh in vs either to further ſtrength or diſeaſe, without our knowledge of what is done within: And on the other ſide; that man is moſt dangerouſly ſicke, in whom nature decayes without his feeling, without complaint. To know our ſelues happy, is good; but woe were to vs Chriſtians, if we could not be happy, and know it not.

67

There are none that euer did ſo much miſchiefe to the Church, as thoſe that haue beene excellent in wit and learning. Others may be ſpightfull enough, but want power to accompliſh their malice. An enemie that hath both ſtrength and craft, is worthy be feared. None can ſinne againſt the Holy Ghoſt, but thoſe which haue had former illumination. Tell not me what parts a man hath, but what grace: honeſt ſottiſhneſſe is better than prophane eminence.

68

The entertainment of all ſpirituall euents muſt be with feare, or hope; but, of all earthly extremities, muſt be with contempt or deriſion. For what is terrible, is worthy of a Chriſtians contempt; what is pleaſant, to be turned ouer with a ſcorne. The meane requires a meane affection betwixt loue and hatred. We may not loue them, becauſe of their vanity: wee may not hate them, becauſe of their neceſſary vſe. It is an hard thing to be a wiſe Oaſt, and to fit our entertainment to all commers: which if it be not done, the ſoule is ſoone waſted, either for want of cuſtomers, or for the miſ-rule of ill gueſts.

69

God and man build in a contrary order. Man layes the foundation firſt, then addes the walles, the roofe laſt. God began the roofe firſt, ſpreading out this vault of heauen, ere hee laid the Baſe of the earth. Our thoughts muſt follow the order of his workmanſhip. Heauen muſt be minded firſt; earth afterward: and ſo much more, as it is ſeene more. Our meditation muſt herein follow our ſenſe: A few miles giue bounds to our view of earth; whereas we may neere ſee halfe the heauen at once. He that thinkes moſt both of that which is moſt ſeene, and of that which is not ſeene at all, is happieſt.

70

I haue euer noted it a true ſigne of a falſe heart, To be ſcrupulous and nice in ſmall matters, negligent in the maine: whereas the good ſoule is ſtill curious in ſubſtantiall points, and not careleſſe in things of an inferiour nature; accounting no duty ſo ſmall as to be neglected, and no care great enough for principall duties: not ſo tything Mint and Cummin, that hee ſhould forget iuſtice and iudgement; nor yet ſo regarding iudgement and iuſtice, that hee ſhould contemne Mint and Cummin. Hee that thus miſplaces his conſcience, will be found either hypocriticall or ſuperſtitious.

71

It argues the world full of Atheiſts, that thoſe offences which may impeach humane ſocietie, are entertained with an anſwerable hatred and rigour: thoſe which doe immediately wrong the ſupreme Maieſtie of God, are turned ouer with ſcarce ſo much as diſlike. If wee conuerſed with God as we doe with men, his right would be at leaſt as precious to vs as our owne. All that conuerſe not with God, are without God: not onely thoſe that are againſt God, but thoſe that are without God, are Atheiſts. Wee may be too charitable: I feare not to ſay, that theſe our laſt times abound with honeſt Atheiſts.

72

The beſt thing corrupted, is worſt: An ill man is the worſt of all creatures, an ill Chriſtian the worſt of all men, an ill profeſſour the worſt of all Chriſtians, an ill Miniſter the worſt of all profeſſours.

73

Naturally life is before death; and death is only a priuation of life: Spiritually it is contrary. As Paul ſaith of the graine, ſo may we of man in the buſineſſe of regeneration: He muſt die before he can liue: yet this death preſuppoſes a life that was once, and ſhould be. God chuſes to haue the difficulteſt, firſt: we muſt be content with the paine of dying, ere wee feele the comfort of life. As we die to nature, ere we liue in glory: ſo we muſt die to ſinne, ere we can liue to grace.

74

Death did not firſt ſtrike Adam the firſt ſinfull man, nor Caine the firſt hypocrite, but Abel the innocent and righteous. The firſt ſoule that met with death, ouercame death: the firſt ſoule that parted from earth, went to heauen. Death argues not diſpleaſure; becauſe he whom God loued beſt, dies firſt, and the murtherer is puniſhed with liuing.

75

The liues of moſt are miſ-ſpent, onely for want of a certaine end of their actions: wherein they doe as vnwiſe Archers, ſhoot away their arrowes they know not at what marke. They liue onely out of the preſent, not directing themſelues and their proceedings to one vniuerſall ſcope: whence they alter vpon all change of occaſions, and neuer reach any perfection; neither can doe other but continue in vncertaintie, and end in diſcomfort. Others aime at one certaine marke, but a wrong one. Some (though fewer) leuell at the right end, but amiſſe. To liue without one maine and common end, is idleneſſe and folly. To liue to a falſe end, is deceit and loſſe. True Chriſtian wiſdome both ſhewes the end, and findes the way. And as cunning Politikes haue many plots to compaſſe one and the ſame deſigne by a determined ſucceſſion; ſo the wiſe Chriſtian failing in the meanes, yet ſtill fetcheth about to his ſteady end with a conſtant change of endeuours: ſuch one only liues to purpoſe, and at laſt repents not that he hath liued.

76

The ſhipwracke of a good conſcience, is the caſting away of all other excellencies. It is no rare thing to note the ſoule of a wilfull ſinner ſtripped of all her graces, and by degrees expoſed to ſhame: ſo thoſe, whom we haue knowne admired, haue fallen to be leuell with their fellowes; and from thence beneath them, to a mediocritie; and afterwards to ſottiſhneſſe and contempt, below the vulgar. Since they haue caſt away the beſt, it is iuſt with God to take away the worſt; and to caſt off them in leſſer regards, which haue reiected him in greater.

77

It hath euer beene counted more noble and ſucceſſefull to ſet vpon an open enemie in his owne home, than to expect till he ſet vpon vs, whiles he make onely a defenſiue warre. This rule ſerues vs for our laſt enemy Death: whence that old demand of Epicure is eaſily anſwered, Whether it be better Death ſhould come to vs, or that wee ſhould meet him in the way: meet him in our mindes, ere hee ſeize vpon our bodies. Our cowardlineſſe, our vnpreparation is his aduantage: whereas true boldneſſe in confronting him, diſmaies and weakens his forces. Happie is that ſoule, that can ſend out the ſcouts of his thoughts before-hand, to diſcouer the power of death a farre off; and then can reſolutely encounter him at vnawares vpon aduantage: ſuch one liues with ſecurity, dies with comfort.

78

Many a man ſends others to heauen, and yet goes to hell himſelfe: and not few hauing drawne others to hell, yet themſelues returne by a late repentance, to life. In a good action, it is not good to ſearch too deepely into the intention of the agent, but in ſilence to make our beſt benefit of the worke: In an euill, it is not ſafe to regard the qualitie of the perſon, or his ſucceſſe, but to conſider the action abſtracted from all circumſtances, in his owne kinde. So wee ſhall neither neglect good deeds, becauſe they ſpeed not well in ſome hands, nor affect a proſperous euill.

79

God doth ſome ſingular actions, wherein we cannot imitate him; ſome, wherein we may not; moſt, wherein he may and would faine be followed. Hee fetcheth good out of euill; ſo may we turne our owne and others ſinnes to priuate or publike good: we may not doe euill for a good vſe; but we muſt vſe our euill once done, to good. I hope I ſhall not offend, to ſay, that the good vſe which is made of ſinnes, is as gainfull to God, as that which ariſes from good actions. Happy is that man, that can vſe either his good well, or his euill.

80

There is no difference betwixt anger and madneſſe, but continuance: for, raging anger is a ſhort madneſſe. What elſe argues the ſhaking of the hands and lips, paleneſſe, or redneſſe, or ſwelling of the face, glaring of the eyes, ſtammering of the tongue, ſtamping with the feet, vnſteady motions of the whole body, raſh actions which we remember not to haue done, diſtracted and wilde ſpeeches? and madneſſe againe is nothing but a continued rage, yea ſome madneſſe rageth not: ſuch a milde madneſſe is more tolerable, than frequent and furious anger.

81

Thoſe that would keepe ſtate, muſt keepe aloofe off; eſpecially if their qualities be not anſwerable in height to their place. For many great perſons are like a wel-wrought picture vpon a courſe cloth; which a farre off ſhewes faire, but neere-hand the roundneſſe of the threed marres the good workmanſhip. Concealement of gifts, after ſome one commended act, is the beſt way to admiration, and ſecret honour: but hee that would profit, muſt vent himſelfe oft, and liberally, and ſhew what he is, without all priuate regard. As therefore, many times, honour followes modeſty vnlookt for; ſo, contrarily, a man may ſhew no leſſe pride in ſilence and obſcuritie, than others, which ſpeake and write for glory. And that other pride is ſo much the worſe, as it is more vnprofitable: for whereas thoſe which put forth their gifts, benefit others whiles they ſeeke themſelues; theſe are ſo wholly deuoted to themſelues, that their ſecrecie doth no good to others.

82

Such as a mans delights and cares are in health, ſuch are both his thoughts and ſpeeches commonly on his death-bed: The proud man talkes of his faire ſutes, the glutton of his diſhes, the wanton of his beaſtlineſſe, the religious man of heauenly things. The tongue will hardly leaue that to which the heart is inured. If we would haue good motions to viſit vs while we are ſicke, we muſt ſend for them familiarly in our health.

83

He is a rare man, that hath not ſome kinde of madneſſe raigning in him: One a dull madneſſe of melancholy, another a conceited madneſſe of pride; another a ſuperſtitious madneſſe of falſe deuotion; a fourth of ambition, or couetouſneſſe; a fift, the furious madneſſe of anger; a ſixt, the laughing madneſſe of extreme mirth; a ſeuenth, a drunken madneſſe; an eight, of outragious luſt; a ninth, the learned madneſſe of curioſitie; a tenth, the worſt madneſſe of prophaneneſſe and Atheiſme. It is as hard to reckon vp all kindes of madneſſes, as of diſpoſitions. Some are more noted and puniſhed than others; ſo that, the mad-man in one kinde as much condemnes another, as the ſober man condemnes him. Only that man is both good, and wiſe, and happie, that is free from all kindes of phrenſie.

84

There be ſome honeſt errours, where-with I neuer found that God was offended. That an huſband ſhould thinke his owne Wiſe comely, although ill-fauoured in the eyes of others: That a man ſhould thinke more meanely of his owne good parts, than of weaker in others: To giue charitable (though miſtaken) conſtructions of doubtfull actions and perſons (which are the effects of naturall affection, humility, loue) were neuer cenſured by God: Herein alone we erre, if we erre not.

85

No maruell if the worldling eſcape earthly afflictions. God corrects him not, becauſe he loues him not. He is baſe borne and begot. God will not doe him the fauour to whip him. The world afflicts him not, becauſe it loues him: for each man is indulgent to his owne. God vſes not the rod where he meanes to vſe the ſword. The Pillory or ſcourge is for thoſe malefactors which ſhall eſcape execution.

86

Weake ſtomackes which cannot digeſt large meales, feed oft and little: For our ſoules, that which we want in meaſure, we muſt ſupply in frequence. We can neuer fully enough comprehend in our thoughts the ioyes of heauen, the meritorious ſufferings of Chriſt, the terrours of the ſecond death: therefore we muſt meditate of them often.

87

The ſame thoughts doe commonly meet vs in the ſame places; as if we had left them there till our returne. For that the minde doth ſecretly frame to it ſelfe memoratiue heads, whereby it recalls eaſily the ſame conceits. It is beſt to imploy our minde there, where it is moſt fixed. Our deuotion is ſo dull, it cannot haue too many aduantages.

88

I finde but one example in all Scripture, of any bodily cure which our Sauiour wrought by degrees: only the blinde man, whoſe weake faith craued helpe by others, not by himſelfe, ſaw men firſt like trees, then in their true ſhape. All other miraculous cures of Chriſt were done at once, and perfect at firſt. Contrarily, I finde but one example of a ſoule fully healed (that is) ſanctified and glorified, both in a day; all other by degrees and leiſure. The ſteps of grace are ſoft and ſhort. Thoſe externall miracles he wrought immediatly by himſelfe; and therefore no maruell if they were abſolute like their Author. The miraculous worke of our Regeneration he works together with vs: He giueth it efficacie; wee giue it imperfection.

SIC ELEVABITVR FILIVS HOMINIS · Io. 3 ∴ ANCHORA FIDEI ∴

Imprinted at London, 1627.

TO MY LOVING AND LEARNED COVSIN,

Mr. SAMVEL BVRTON.

Archdeacon of Glouceſter.

INdeed, my Poetry was long ſithence out of date, and yeelded her place to grauer ſtudies: but whoſe veine would it not reuiue, to looke into thoſe heauenly Songs? I were not worthy to be a Diuine, if it ſhould repent me to be a Poet with Dauid, after I ſhall haue aged in the Pulpit. This worke is holy and ſtrict, and abides not any youthfull or heatheniſh liberty, but requires hands free from prophanneſſe, looſeneſſe, affection. It is a ſeruice to God and the Church by ſo much more carefully to be regarded, as it is more common. For who is there that will not challenge a part in this labour? and that ſhall not finde himſelfe much more affected with holy meaſure rightly compoſed? Wherefore I haue oft wondred, how it could be offenſiue to our aduerſaries, that theſe diuine Ditties which the Spirit of God wrote in verſe, ſhould be ſung in verſe; and that an Hebrew Poem ſhould be made Engliſh. For if this kind of compoſition had beene vnfit, God would neuer haue made choice of numbers, wherin to expreſſe himſelfe. Yea, who knows not that ſome other Scriptures, which the Spirit hath indited in proſe, haue yet beene happily and with good allowance put into ſtrict numbers? If hiſtories tell vs of a wanton Poet of old, which loſt his eyes while hee went about to turne Moſes into verſe; yet euery ſtudent knowes with what good ſucceſſe and commendation Nonnus hath turned Iohns Goſpell into Greeke Heroicks. And Apollinarius, that learned Syrian matched with Baſil and Gregory (who liued in his time) in the termes of this equality, that Baſils ſpeech was σαθερώτερος, but Apollinaries ἁδρότερος, wrote, as Suidas reports, all the Hebrew Scripture in Heroicks, as Sozomen (ſomewhat more reſtrainedly) all the Archaiology of the Iewes, till Sauls gouernment, in 24. parts; or as Socrates yet more particularly, all Moſes in Heroicks, and all the other Hiſtories in diuers metres: but how-euer his labours lie hid, his other Metaphraſe of the Pſalmes is ſtill in our hands, with the applauſe of all the learned: beſides the labours of their owne Flaminius and Arias Montanus (to ſeeke for no more) which haue worthily beſtowed themſelues in this ſubiect. Neither doe I ſee how it can be offenſiue to our friends, that we ſhould deſire our Engliſh Metaphraſe bettered. I ſay nothing to the diſgrace of that wee haue: I know how glad our aduerſaries are of all ſuch aduantages; which they are ready enough to finde out without me, euer reprochfully vpbraiding vs with theſe defects. But ſince our whole Tranſlation is now vniuerſally reuiſed; what inconuenience or ſhew of innouation can it beare, that the verſe ſhould accompany the proſe? eſpecially ſince it is well knowne how rude and homely our Engliſh Poeſie was in thoſe times, compared with the preſent; wherein, if euer, it ſeeth her full perfection. I haue beene ſollicited by ſome reuerend friends to vndertake this taske; as that which ſeemed well to accord with the former exerciſes of my youth, and my preſent profeſſion. The difficulties I found many, the worke long and great; yet not more painfull than beneficiall to Gods Church. Whereto as I dare not profeſſe any ſufficiency; ſo I will not deny my readineſſe, and vtmoſt endeuour, if I ſhall be emploied by Authority: wherefore, in this part, I doe humbly ſubmit my ſelfe to the graue cenſures of them, whoſe wiſdome menageth theſe common affaires of the Church: and am ready either to ſtand ſtill or proceed, as I ſhall ſee their Cloud or Fire goe before or behinde me. Only (howſoeuer) I ſhall, for my true affection to the Church, wiſh it done by better workmen. Wherein as you approue, ſo further my bold, but not vnprofitable motion, and commend it vnto greater cares; as I doe you to the Greateſt.

Non-ſuch. July 3.

Some few of DAVIDS Pſalmes Metaphraſed.

Psalme 1.

In the tune of the 148. Pſalme.

Giue laud vnto the Lord.

WHo hath not walkt aſtray,
In wicked mens aduice,
Nor ſtood in ſinners way;
Nor in their companies
That ſcorners are,
As their fit mate,
In ſcoffing chaire,
Hath euer ſate.

2 But in thy lawes diuine,
O Lord ſets his delight,
And in thoſe lawes of thine
Studies all day and night;
Oh, how that man
Thrice bleſſed is!
And ſure ſhall gaine
Eternall bliſſe.

3 He ſhall be like the tree
Set by the water-ſprings,
Which when his ſeaſons be Moſt pleaſant fruit forth brings:
Whoſe boughs ſo greene
Shall neuer fade,
But couered beene
With comely ſhade.

So, to this happy wight,
All his deſignes ſhall thriue:
4 Whereas the man vnright,
As chaffe which winds do driue,
With euery blaſt
Is toſt on hie,
Nor can at laſt
In ſafety lie.

5 Wherefore in that ſad doome,
They dare not riſe from duſt:
Nor ſhall no ſinner come
To glory of the iuſt.
For, God will grace
The iuſt mans way;
While ſinners race
Runs to decay.

Psalme 2.

In the tune of the 125. Pſalme.

Thoſe that doe put their confidence.

WHy doe the Gentiles tumults make,
And nations all conſpire in vaine,
2 And earthly Princes counſell take
Againſt their God; againſt the Raigne
Of his deare Chriſt? let vs, they ſaine,
3 Breake all their bonds: and from vs ſhake
Their thraldome, yoke, and ſeruile chaine.
4 Whiles thus (alas) they fondly ſpake,

He that aloft rides on the skies,
Laughs all their lewd deuice to ſcorne,
5 And when his wrathfull rage ſhall riſe,
With plagues ſhall make them all forlorne,
And in his furie thus replies;
6 But I, my King with ſacred horne
Anointing, ſhall in princely guiſe
His head with royall Crowne adorne.

Vpon my Sions holy mount
His Empires glorious ſeat ſhall be.
And I thus rais'd ſhall farre recount
The tenour of his true degree.
7 My Sonne thou art, ſaid God, I thee
Begat this day by due account:
Thy Scepter, doe but aske of me,
All earthly kingdomes ſhall ſurmount.

8 All nations to thy rightfull ſway,
I will ſubiect from furtheſt end
9 Of all the world, and thou ſhalt bray
Thoſe ſtubborne foes that will not bend,
With iron Mace (like Potters clay)
10 In peeces ſmall: ye Kings attend;
And yee, whom others wont obey,
Learne wiſdome, and at laſt amend.

11 See, ye ſerue God, with greater dread
Than others you: and in your feare
Reioyce the while; and (lowly ſpread)
12 Doe homage to his Sonne ſo deare:
Leſt he be wroth, and doe you dead
13 Amids your way. If kindled
His wrath ſhall be; O bleſſed thoſe,
That doe on him their truſt repoſe.

PSALME 3.

As the 113. Pſalme.

Ye children which,&c.

AH Lord! how many be my foes!
How many are againſt me roſe,
2 That to my grieued ſoule haue ſed,
Tuſh, God ſhall him no ſuccour yeeld;
3 Whiles thou, Lord, art my praiſe, my ſhield,
And doſt aduance my carefull head!

4 Loud with my voice to God I cry'd:
His Grace vnto my ſute reply'd,
From out his holy Hill.
5 I laid me downe, ſlept, roſe againe:
For thou, O Lord, doſt me ſuſtaine,
And ſau'ſt my ſoule from feared ill.

6 Not if ten thouſand armed foes
My naked ſide ſhould round encloſe,
Would I be thereof ought a-dread.
Vp, Lord, and ſhield me from diſgrace:
7 For thou haſt broke my foe-mens face,
And all the wickeds teeth haſt ſhed.

8 From thee, O God, is ſafe defence;
Doe thou thy free beneficence
Vpon thy people largely ſpread.

PSALME 4.

As the ten Commandements.

Attend my people.

THou witneſſe of my truth ſincere,
My God, vnto my poore requeſt
Vouchſafe to lend thy gracious eare:
Thou haſt my ſoule from thrall releaſt.

2 Fauour me ſtill, and daigne to heare
Mine humble ſute. O wretched wights,
3 How long will ye mine honour deare
Turne into ſhame through your deſpights?

Still will ye loue what thing is vaine,
4 And ſeeke falſe hopes? know then at laſt,
That God hath choſe, and will maintaine
His fauorite, whom ye diſgrac't.

God will regard my inſtant mone.
5 Oh! tremble then, and ceaſe offending;
And on your ſilent bed alone,
Talke with your hearts, your waies amending.

6 Offer the trueſt ſacrifice
Of broken hearts; on God beſetting
7 Your only truſt. The moſt deuiſe
The waies of worldly treaſure getting:

But thou, O Lord, lift vp to me
The light of that ſweet looke of thine;
8 So ſhall my ſoule more gladſome be,
Than theirs with all their corne and wine.

9 So I in peace ſhall lay me downe,
And on my bed take quiet ſleepe;
Whiles thou, O Lord, ſhalt me alone
From dangers all ſecurely keepe.

PSALME 5.

In the tune of the 124. Pſalme.

Now Iſrael may ſay,&c.

BOw downe thine eare,
Lord, to theſe words of mine,

And well regard the ſecret plaints I make.
2 My King, my God,
to thee I doe betake
My ſad eſtate:
oh doe thine eare incline
To theſe loud cries that to thee powred bin.

3 At early morne
thou ſhalt my voice attend:
For, at day breake,
I will my ſelfe addreſſe
Thee to implore,
and wait for due redreſſe.
4 Thou doſt not, Lord,
delight in wickedneſſe;
Nor to bad men
wilt thy protection lend.

5 The boaſters proud cannot before thee ſtay:
Thou hat'ſt all thoſe that are to ſinne deuoted:
6 The lying lips,
and who with blood are ſpotted,
Thou doeſt abhorre,
and wilt for euer ſlay:
7 But I vnto
thine houſe ſhall take the way.

And through thy grace abundant ſhall adore,
With humble feare
within thy holy place.
8 Oh! lead me, Lord,
within thy righteous trace:
Euen for their ſakes
that malice me ſo ſore,
Make ſmooth thy paths
my dimmer eies before.

9 Within their mouth
no truth is euer found:
Pure miſchiefe is their heart: a gaping tombe 10 Is their wide throat;
and yet their tongues ſtill ſound,
11 With ſmoothing words.
O Lord, giue them their doome,
And let them fall
in thoſe their plots profound.
In their exceſſe of miſchiefe them deſtroy 12 That Rebels are;
ſo thoſe that to thee flie,
Shall all reioyce
and ſing eternally:
13 And whom thou doſt
protect, and who loue thee,
And thy deare name,
in thee ſhall euer ioy;
Since thou with bliſſe
the righteous doſt reward,
And with thy grace
as with a ſhield him guard.

* * *

PSALME 6.

As the 50. Pſalme.

The mightie God, &c.

LEt me not, Lord,
be in thy wrath reproued:
Oh! ſcourge me not when thy fierce wrath is moued.
2 Pity me, Lord,
that doe with languor pine:
Heale me whoſe bones
with paine diſſolued bin;
3 Whoſe wearie ſoule
is vexed aboue meaſure.
Oh Lord, how long
ſhall I bide thy diſpleaſure!
4 Turne thee, O Lord,
reſcue my ſoule diſtreſt;
5 And ſaue me of thy grace.
'Mongſt thoſe that reſt
In ſilent death can none remember thee;
And in the graue
how ſhouldſt thou praiſed be?
6 Wearie with ſighes
All night I cauſ'd my bed
To ſwim: with teares
my couch I watered.
7 Deepe ſorrow hath conſum'd my dimmed eyne,
Sunke in with griefe
at theſe lewd foes of mine:
8 But now hence, hence,
vaine plotters of mine ill:
The Lord hath heard
my lamentations ſhrill;

9 God heard my ſuit
and ſtill attends the ſame:
10 Bluſh now my foes,
and flie with ſudden ſhame.

PSALME 7.

As the 112. Pſalme,

The man is bleſt that God, &c.

ON thee, O Lord my God, relies
My onely truſt: from bloudy ſpight
Of all my raging enemies
Oh! let thy mercy me acquite:
2 Leſt they like greedy Lions rend
My ſoule, while none ſhall it defend.

3 O Lord, if I this thing haue wrought,
If in my hands be found ſuch ill:
4 If I with miſchiefe euer ſought
To pay good turnes; or did not ſtill
Doe good vnto my cauſleſſe foe,
That thirſted for my ouerthrow;

5 Then let my foe in eager chace,
Ore-take my ſoule, and proudly tread
My life below; and with diſgrace
In duſt lay downe mine honour dead.
6 Riſe vp in rage, O Lord, eſt-ſoone
Aduance thine arme againſt my fo'ne:

And wake for me, till thou fulfill 7 My promis'd right; ſo ſhall glad throngs
Of people flocke vnto thine hill.
For their ſakes then reuenge my wrongs,
8 And rouſe thy ſelfe. Thy iudgements be
O're all the world: Lord iudge thou me.

As truth and honeſt innocence
Thou find'ſt in me, Lord, iudge thou me.
9 Settle the iuſt with ſure defence:
Let me the wicked's malice ſee
10 Brought to an end. For thy iuſt eie
Doth heart and inward reynes deſcry.

11 My ſafety ſtands in God, who ſhields
The ſound in heart: whoſe doome each day
12 To iuſt men and contemners yeelds
13 Their due. Except he change his way,
His ſword is whet, to bloud intended,
His murdering Bow is ready bended.

14 Weapons of death he hath addreſt
And arrowes keene to pierce my foe,
15 Who late bred miſchiefe in his breſt;
But when he doth on trauell goe,
16 Brings forth a lie: deepe pits doth delue,
And fals into his pits himſelue.

17 Backe to his owne head ſhall rebound
His plotted miſchiefe; and his wrongs
18 His crowne ſhall craze: But I ſhall ſound
Iehouah's praiſe with thankfull ſongs,
And will his glorious name expreſſe,
And tell of all his righteouſneſſe.

PSALME 8.

As the 113. Pſalme,

Yee children which, &c.

HOw noble is thy mighty Name,
O Lord, o're all the worlds wide frame,
Whoſe glorie is aduanc't on high aboue the rowling heauens racke!
2 How for the graceleſſe ſcorners ſake,
To ſtill th'auenging enemie,
Haſt thou by tender infants tongue,
The praiſe of thy great name made ſtrong,
While they hang ſucking on the breſt!
3 But when I ſee the heauens bright,
The moone and glittering ſtarres of night,
By thine almighty hand addreſt,
4 Oh! what is man, poore ſilly man,
That thou ſo mind'ſt him, and doſt daine
To looke at his vnworthy ſeed!
5 Thou haſt him ſet not much beneath
Thine Angels bright; and with a wreath
Of glory haſt adorn'd his head.
6 Thou haſt him made high ſoueraigne
7 Of all thy workes, and ſtretcht his raigne
Vnto the heards, and beaſts vntame,
8 To fowles, and to the ſcaly traine,
That glideth through the watry Maine.
9 How noble each-where is thy Name!

PSALME 9.

To the tune of that knowne ſong,
beginning,

Preſerue vs, Lord.

THee, and thy wondrous deeds, O God,
With all my ſoule I ſound abroad:
2 My ioy, my triumph is in thee.
Of thy dread name my ſong ſhall be,

3 O higheſt God: ſince put to flight,
And fal'ne and vaniſht at thy ſight
4 Are all my foes; for thou haſt paſt
Iuſt ſentence on my cauſe at laſt:

And ſitting on thy throne aboue,
A rightfull Iudge thy ſelfe doeſt proue:
5 The troupes profane thy checks haue ſtroid,
And made their name for euer void.

6 Wheres now, my foes, your threatned wrack?
So well you did our Cities ſacke,
And bring to duſt; while that ye ſay,
Their name ſhall die as well as they.

7 Loe, in eternall ſtate God ſits:
And his high Throne to iuſtice fits:
8 Whoſe righteous hand the world ſhall weeld,
And to all folke iuſt doome ſhall yeeld.

9 The poore from high finde his releefe;
The poore in needfull times of griefe:
10 Who knowes the Lord, to thee ſhall cleaue,
That neuer doeſt thy clients leaue.

11 Oh! ſing the God that doth abide,
On Sion mount; and blazon wide
12 His worthy deeds. For he purſues
The guiltleſſe bloud with vengeance due:

He mindes their cauſe, nor can paſſe o're
Sad clamors of the wronged poore.
13 Oh! mercy Lord: thou that doſt ſaue
My ſoule from gates of death and graue:

Oh! ſee the wrong my foes haue done:
14 That I thy praiſe, to all that gone
Through daughter Sions beauteous gate,
With thankfull ſongs may loud relate;
And may reioyce in thy ſafe aid.
Behold, the Gentiles whiles they made
A deadly pit my ſoule to drowne,
Into their pit are ſunken downe;

In that cloſe ſnare they hid for me,
Loe, their owne feet intangled be.
16 By this iuſt doome the Lord is knowne,
That th'ill are puniſht with their owne.

17 Downe ſhall the wicked backward fall
To deepeſt hell, and nations all 18 That God forget; nor ſhall the poore
Forgotten be for euermore.

The conſtant hope of ſoules oppreſt
19 Shall not aye die. Riſe from thy reſt,
Oh. Lord, let not men baſe and rude
Preuaile: iugde thou the multitude

20 Of lawleſſe Pagans: ſtrike pale feare
Into thoſe breſts that ſtubborne were:
And let the Gentiles feele and finde,
They beene but men of mortall kinde.

PSALME 10.

As the 51. Pſalme,

O God, conſider.

WHy ſtand'ſt thou Lord, alooſe ſo long,
And hid'ſt thee in due times of need,
2 Whiles lewd men proudly offer wrong
Vnto the poore? In their owne deed,
And their deuice let them be caught.
3 For loe, the wicked braues and boaſts
In his vile and outragious thought,
And bleſſeth him that rauines moſt.

4 On God he dares inſult: his pride
Scornes to enquire of powers aboue,
But his ſtout thoughts haue ſtill deni'd
5 There is a God; His waies yet proue
Aye proſperous: thy iudgements hye
Doe farre ſurmount his dimmer ſight.
6 Therefore doth he all foes defie:
His heart ſaith, I ſhall ſtand in ſpight,

Nor euer moue; nor danger 'bide.
7 His mouth is fil'd with curſes foule,
And with cloſe fraud: His tongue doth hide

8 Miſchiefe and ill: he ſeekes the ſoule
Of harmeleſſe men in ſecret wait,
And in the corners of the ſtreet
Doth ſhed their bloud; with ſcorne and hate,
His eies vpon the poore are ſet.

9 As ſome fell Lion in his den,
He cloſely lurkes the poore to ſpoile:
He ſpoiles the poore and helpleſſe men,
When once he ſnares them in his toile.
10 He croucheth low in cunning wile,
And bowes his breſt; whereon whole throngs
Of poore, whom his faire ſhewes beguile,
Fall to be ſubiect to his wrongs.

11 God hath forgot (in ſoule he ſaies)
He hides his face to neuer ſee.
12 Lord God, ariſe; thine hand vp-raiſe:
Let not thy poore forgotten be.
13 Shall theſe inſulting wretches ſcorne
Their God; and ſay, thou wilt not care?
14 Thou ſee'ſt (for all thou haſt forborne)
Thou ſee'ſt what all their miſchiefes are;

That to thine hand of vengeance iuſt
Thou maiſt them take: the poore diſtreſſed
Rely on thee with conſtant truſt,
The helpe of Orphans and oppreſſed.
15 Oh! breake the wickeds arme of might,
And ſearch out all their curſed traines,
And let them vaniſh out of ſight.
16 The Lord as King for euer reignes.

From forth his coaſts, the heathen ſect
17 Are rooted quite: thou Lord attend'ſt
To poore mens ſuits; thou do'ſt direct
Their hearts: to them thine eare thou bend'ſt;
18 That thou maiſt reſcue from deſpight,
The wofull fatherleſſe, and poore:
That ſo, the vaine and earthen wight
On vs may tyrannize no more.

A PREMONITION OF THE TITLE AND VSE of Characters.

READER,

THe Diuines of the old Heathens were their Morall Philoſophers: Theſe receiued the Acts of an inbred law, in the Sinai of Nature, and deliuered them with many expoſitions to the multitude: Theſe were the Ouerſeers of manners, Correctors of vices, Directors of liues, Doctors of vertue, which yet taught their people the bodie of their naturall Diuinitie, not after one manner: While ſome ſpent themſelues in deepe diſcourſes of humane felicitie, and the way to it in common; others thought it beſt to apply the generall precepts of goodneſſe or decencie, to particular conditions and perſons. A third ſort in a meane courſe betwixt the two other, and compounded of them both, beſtowed their time in drawing out the true lineaments of euery vertue and vice, ſo liuely, that who ſaw the medals, might know the face: which Art they ſignificantly tearmed Charactery. Their papers were ſo many tables, their writings ſo many ſpeaking pictures, or liuing images, whereby the ruder multitude might euen by their ſenſe learne to know vertue, and diſcerne what to deteſt. I am deceiued if any courſe could be more likely to preuaile; for herein the groſſe conceit is led on with pleaſure, and informed while it feeles nothing but delight: And if pictures haue beene accounted the bookes of Idiots, behold here the benefit of an image without the offence. It is no ſhame for vs to learne wit of Heathens; neither is it materiall, in whoſe Schoole we take out a good leſſon: yea, it is more ſhame not to follow their good, than not to lead them better. As one therefore that in worthy examples hold imitation better than inuention, I haue trod in their pathes, but with an higher and wider ſteppe; and out of their Tablets haue drawne theſe larger portraitures of both ſorts. More might be ſaid, I deny not, of euery Vertue, of euery Vice: I deſired not to ſay all, but enough. If thou doe but read or like theſe, I haue ſpent good houres ill; but if thou ſhalt hence abiure thoſe Vices, which before thou thoughteſt not ill-fauoured, or fall in loue with any of theſe goodly faces of Vertue; or ſhalt hence finde where thou haſt any little touch of theſe euils, to cleare thy ſelfe, or where any defect in theſe graces to ſupply it, neither of vs ſhall need to repent of our labour.

THE PROOEME.

Vertue is not loued enough, becauſe ſhe is not ſeene; and Vice loſeth much deteſtation, becauſe her vglineſſe is ſecret. Certainly, my Lords, there are ſo many beauties, and ſo many graces in the face of Goodneſſe, that no eye can poſsibly ſee it without affection, without rauiſhment: and the viſage of Euill is ſo monſtrous through loathſome deformities, that if her louers were not ignorant, they would be mad with diſdaine and aſtoniſhment. What need we more than to diſcouer theſe two to the world? This worke ſhall ſaue the labour of exhorting, and diſſwaſion. I haue here done it as I could, following that ancient Maſter of Morality, who thought this the fitteſt taske for the ninety and ninth yeere of his age, and the profitableſt monument that he could leaue for a fare-well to his Grecians. Loe here then Vertue and Vice ſtript naked to the open view, and deſpoiled, one of her rags, the other of her ornaments, and nothing left them but bare preſence to plead for affection: ſee now whether ſhall finde more ſuters. And if ſtill the vaine mindes of lewd men ſhall dote vpon their old miſtreſſe, it will appeare to be, not becauſe ſhe is not foule, but for that they are blinde, and bewitched. And firſt behold the goodly features of VViſdome, an amiable Vertue, and worthy to leade this Stage: which as ſhe extends her ſelfe to all the following Graces, ſo amongſt the reſt is for her largeneſſe moſt conſpicuous.

CHARACTER OF THE WISE MAN.

THere is nothing that he deſires not to know, but moſt and firſt himſelfe; and not ſo much his owne ſtrength, as his weakneſſes; neither is his knowledge reduced to diſcourſe, but practice. He is a skilfull Logician, not by nature ſo much as vſe; his working minde doth nothing all his time but make ſyllogiſmes, and draw out concluſions, euery thing that he ſees and heares, ſerues for one of the premiſſes: with theſe he cares firſt to informe himſelfe, then to direct others. Both his eies are neuer at once from home, but one keepes houſe while the other roues abroad for intelligence. In materiall and weightie points he abides not his minde ſuſpended in vncertainties; but hates doubting, where hee may, where he ſhould be reſolute: and firſt he makes ſure worke for his ſoule; accounting it no ſafety to bee vnſetled in the fore-knowledge of his finall eſtate. The beſt is firſt regarded; and vaine is that regard which endeth not in ſecuritie. Euery care hath his iuſt order; neither is there any one either neglected or miſplaced. He is ſeldome ouerſeene with credulity; for knowing the falſeneſſe of the world, he hath learn'd to truſt himſelfe alwaies; others ſo farre, as hee may not bee dammaged by their diſappointment. He ſeekes his quietneſſe in ſecrecie, and is wont both to hide himſelfe in retiredneſſe, and his tongue in himſelfe. He loues to be gheſſed at, not knowne; and to ſee the world vnſeene; and when he is forced into the light, ſhewes by his actions that his obſcuritie was neither from affectation nor weakneſſe. His purpoſes are neither ſo variable as may argue inconſtancie; nor obſtinately vnchangeable, but framed according to his after-wits, or the ſtrength of new occaſions. He is both an apt ſcholler and an excellent maſter; for both euery thing he ſees informes him, and his minde enriched with plentifull obſeruation, can giue the beſt precepts. His free diſcourſe runs backe to the ages paſt, and recouers euents out of memorie, and then preuenteth Time in flying forward to future things; and comparing one with the other, can giue a verdict well-neere propheticall: wherein his coniectures are better than anothers iudgments. His paſſions, are ſo many good ſeruants, which ſtand in a diligent attendance ready to be commanded by reaſon, by Religion; and if at any time forgetting their duty, they be miſcarried to rebell, he can firſt conceale their mutinie; then ſuppreſſe it. In all his iuſt and worthy deſignes, hee is neuer at a loſſe, but hath ſo proiected all his courſes, that a ſecond begins where the firſt failed; and fetcheth ſtrength from that which ſucceeded not. There be wrongs which he will not ſee; neither doth he alwaies looke that way which he meaneth; nor take notice of his ſecret ſmarts, when they come from great ones. In good turnes, he loues not to owe more than he muſt; in euill, to owe and not pay. Iuſt cenſures he deſerues not, for he liues without the compaſſe of an aduerſarie; vniuſt he contemneth, & had rather ſuffer falſe infamie to die alone, than lay hands vpon it in an open violence. He confineth himſelfe in the circle of his owne affaires, and liſts not to thruſt his finger into a needleſſe fire. He ſtands like a center vnmoued, while the circumference of his eſtate is drawne aboue, beneath, about him. Finally, his wit hath coſt him much; and he can both keepe, and value, and imploy it. He is his owne Lawyer; the treaſurie of knowledge, the oracle of counſell; blinde in no mans cauſe, beſt-ſighted in his owne.

Hall, J.

Of an Honeſt man.

HEe lookes not to what he might doe, but what he ſhould. Iuſtice is his firſt guide; the ſecond law of his actions, is expedience. Hee had rather complaine than offend, and hates ſin more for the indignitie of it, than the danger: his ſimple vprightneſſe workes in him that confidence, which oft times wrongs him, and giues aduantage to the ſubtill, when he rather pities their faithleſneſſe, than repents of his credulitie: he hath but one heart, and that lies open to ſight; and were it not for diſcretion, he neuer thinks ought whereof he would auoid a witneſſe: his word is his parchment, and his yea, his oath, which he will not violate for feare, or for loſſe. The miſ-haps of following euents, may cauſe him to blame his prouidence, can neuer cauſe him to eat his promiſe: neither ſaith he, This I ſaw not; but, This I ſaid. When hee is made his friends Executor, he defrayes debts, payes legacies, and ſcorneth to gaine by Orphans, or to ranſacke graues; and therefore will be true to a dead friend, becauſe he ſees him not. All his dealings are ſquare, and aboue the boord: he bewrayes the fault of what he ſells, and reſtores the ouerſeene gaine of a falſe reckoning. He eſteemes a bribe venomous, though it come guilded ouer with the colour of gratuitie. His cheeks are neuer ſtained with the bluſhes of recantation; neither doth his tongue falter, to make good a lie with the ſecret gloſes of double or reſerued ſenſes; and when his name is traduced, his innocencie beares him out with courage: then, loe, he goes on the plaine way of truth, and will either triumph in his integritie, or ſuffer with it. His conſcience ouer-rules his prouidence; ſo as in all things good or ill, he reſpects the nature of the actions, not the ſequell. If he ſee what he muſt doe, let God ſee what ſhall follow. Hee neuer loadeth himſelfe with burdens aboue his ſtrength, beyond his will; and once bound, what he can he will doe, neither doth he will but what he can doe. His eare is the Sanctuarie of his abſent friends name, of his preſent friends ſecret: neither of them can miſ-carrie in his truſt. He remembers the wrongs of his youth, and repaies them with that vſury which he himſelfe would not take. He would rather want, than borrow, and begge, than not to pay: his faire conditions are without diſſembling; and he loues actions aboue words. Finally, he hates falſhood worſe than death: he is a faithfull client of truth; no mans enemie; and it is a queſtion, whether more another mans friend or his owne; and if there were no heauen, yet he would be vertuous.

Of the Faithfull man.

HIs eies haue no other obiects, but abſent and inuiſible; which they ſee ſo cleerly, as that to them, ſenſe is blinde: that which is preſent, they ſee not: if I may not rather ſay, that what is paſt or future, is preſent to them. Herein he exceeds all others, that to him nothing is impoſſible, nothing difficult, whether to beare, or vndertake. He walkes euery day with his Maker, and talkes with him familiarly, and liues euer in heauen, and ſees all earthly things beneath him: when he goes in, to conuerſe with God, he weares not his owne clothes, but takes them ſtill out of the rich Wardrobe of his Redeemer, and then dare boldly preaſe in and challenge a bleſſing. The celeſtiall ſpirits doe not ſcorne his company, yea, his ſeruice. He deales in theſe worldly affaires as a ſtranger, and hath his heart euer at home: without a written warrant he dare doe nothing, and with it any thing. His warre is perpetuall, without truce, without intermiſſion; and his victorie certaine: he meets with the infernall powers, and tramples them vnder feet. The ſhield that he euer beares before him, can neither be miſſed, nor pierced; if his hand be wounded, yet his heart is ſafe: he is often tripped, ſeldome foyled; and if ſometimes ſoyled, neuer vanquiſhed. He hath white hands, and a cleane ſoule, fit to lodge God in, all the roomes whrreof are ſet apart for his Holineſſe: Iniquitie hath oſt called at the doore, and craued entertainment, but with a repulſe; or if ſin of force will be his tenant, his Lord he cannot. His faults are few, and thoſe he hath, God will not ſee. He is allied ſo high, that he dare call God Father, his Sauiour Brother, heauen his Patrimonie, and thinkes it no preſumption to truſt to the attendance of Angels. His vnderſtanding is inlightened with the beames of diuine truth; God hath acquainted him with his will; and what he knowes, he dare confeſſe: there is not more loue in his heart, than libertie in his tongue. If torments ſtand betwixt him and Chriſt, if death, he contemnes them; and if his owne parents lie in his way to God, his holy careleſneſſe makes them his foot-ſteps. His experiments haue drawne forth rules of confidence, which he dares oppoſe againſt all the feares of diſtruſt: wherein he thinks it ſafe to charge God with what he hath done; with what he hath promiſed. Examples are his proofes, and inſtances his demonſtrations. What hath God giuen, which he cannot giue? What haue others ſuffered, which he may not be enabled to endure? Is he threatned baniſhment? There he ſees the deare Euangeliſt in Pathmos. Cutting in peeces? he ſees Eſay vnder the ſaw. Drowning? he ſees Ionas diuing in the liuing gulfe. Burning? he ſees the three Children in the hot walke of the Furnace. Deuouring? hee ſees Daniel in the ſealed denne amids his terrible companions. Stoning? he ſees the firſt Martyr vnder his heape of many graue-ſtones. Heading? loe there the Baptiſts necke bleeding in Herodias platter. He emulates their paine, their ſtrength, their glory. He wearies not himſelfe with cares; for he knowes he liues not of his owne coſt: not idlely, omitting meanes, but not vſing them with diffidence. In the midſt of ill rumors and amazements, his countenance changeth not; for he knowes both whom he hath truſted, and whither death can leade him. He is not ſo ſure he ſhall die, as that he ſhall be reſtored; and out-faceth his death with his reſurrection. Finally, he is rich in workes, buſie in obedience, cheerfull and vnmoued in expectation, better with euils, in common opinion miſerable, but in true iudgement more than a man.

Of the Humble man.

HEe is a friendly enemie to himſelfe: for though hee bee not out of his owne fauour, no man ſets ſo low a value of his worth as himſelfe; not out of ignorance, or careleſneſſe, but of a voluntarie and meeke deiectedneſſe. Hee admires euery thing in another, whiles the ſame or better in himſelfe hee thinks not vnworthily contemned: his eies are full of his owne wants, and others perfections. Hee loues rather to giue than take honour, not in a faſhion of complementall courteſie, but in ſimplicitie of his iudgement; neither doth he fret at thoſe, on whom hee forceth precedency, as one that hoped their modeſtie would haue refuſed; but holds his minde vnfainedly below his place, and is readie to goe lower (if need be) without diſcontent. When he hath but his due, he magnifieth courteſie, and diſclaimes his deſerts. He can be more aſhamed of honour, than grieued with contempt; becauſe hee thinkes that cauſleſſe, this deſerued. His face, his cariage, his habit, ſauour of lowlineſſe without affectation, and yet he is much vnder that he ſeemeth. His words are few & ſoft, neuer either peremptorie or cenſorious, becauſe he thinkes both each man more wiſe, and none more faultie than himſelfe: and when he approcheth to the Throne of God, he is ſo taken vp with the diuine greatneſſe, that in his own eies he is either vile or nothing.

Places of publike charge are ſaine to ſue to him, and hale him out of his choſen obſcuritie; which he holds off, not cunningly to cauſe importunity, but ſincerely in the conſcience of his defects. He frequenteth not the ſtages of common reſorts; and then alone thinkes himſelfe in his naturall element, when he is ſhrowded within his owne walls. He is euer iealous ouer himſelfe, and ſtill ſuſpecteth that which others applaud. There is no better obiect of beneficence; for what he receiues, he aſcribes meerely to the bountie of the giuer; nothing to merit. He emulates no man in any thing but goodneſſe, and that with more deſire, than hope to ouertake. No man is ſo contented with his little, and ſo patient vnder miſeries, becauſe he knowes the greateſt euils are below his ſinnes, and the leaſt fauours aboue his deſeruings. He walkes euer in awe, and dare not but ſubiect euery word and action to an high and iuſt cenſure. He is a lowly valley ſweetly planted and well watered; the proud mans earth, whereon he trampleth; but ſecretly full of wealthy Mines, more worth than he that walkes ouer them; a rich ſtone ſet in Lead; and laſtly, a true Temple of God built with a low roofe.

Of a Valiant man.

HE vndertakes without raſhneſſe, and performes without feare: he ſeekes not for dangers; but when they finde him, he beares them ouer with courage, with ſucceſſe. He hath oft times lookt Death in the face, and paſſed by it with a ſmile, and when he ſees he muſt yeeld, doth at once welcome and contemne it. Hee fore-caſts the worſt of all euents, and encounters them before they come in a ſecret and mentall warre; and if the ſuddenneſſe of an vnexpected euill haue ſurprized his thoughts, and infected his cheekes with paleneſſe; he hath no ſooner digeſted it in his conceit, than he gathers vp himſelfe, and inſults ouer miſchiefe. He is the maſter of himſelfe, and ſubdues his paſſions to reaſon; and by his inward victorie workes his owne peace. He is afraid of nothing but the diſpleaſure of the Higheſt, and runnes away from nothing but ſin: he lookes not on his hands, but his cauſe; not how ſtrong he is, but how innocent: and where goodneſſe is his warrant, he may be ouer-maſtered, he cannot be foiled. The ſword is to him the laſt of all trials, which he drawes forth ſtill as Defendant, not as Challenger, with a willing kinde of vnwillingneſſe: no man can better mannage it with more ſafety, with more fauour: he had rather haue his bloud ſeene than his backe; and diſdaines life vpon baſe condition. No man is more milde to a relenting or vanquiſht aduerſarie, or more hates to ſet his foot on a carcaſe. He had rather ſmother an iniurie, than reuenge himſelfe of the impotent: and I know not whether more deteſts cowardlineſſe or crueltie. He talkes little, and brags leſſe; and loues rather the ſilent language of the hand; to be ſeene than heard. He lies euer cloſe within himſelfe, armed with wiſe reſolution, and wil not be diſcouered but by death or danger. He is neither prodigall of bloud to miſ-ſpend it idlely, nor niggardly to grudge it, when either God calls for it, or his Countrey; neither is he more liberall of his owne life than of others. His power is limited by his will, & he holds it the nobleſt reuenge, that he might hurt and doth not. He commands without tyranny and imperiouſneſſe, obeyes without ſeruilitie, and changes not his minde with his eſtate. The height of his ſpirits ouer-lookes all caſualties, and his boldneſſe proceedes neither from ignorance nor ſenſeleſneſſe: but firſt he values euils, and then deſpiſes them: he is ſo ballaced with wiſdome, that he floats ſteddily in the midſt of all tempeſts. Deliberate in his purpoſes, firme in reſolution, bold in enterpriſing, vnwearied in atchieuing, and howſoeuer, happy in ſucceſſe: and if euer he be ouercome, his heart yeelds laſt.

Of

Of a Patient man.

THe patient man is made of a metall, not ſo hard as flexible : his ſhoulders are large, fit for a load of iniuries; which he beares not out of baſeneſſe and cowardlineſſe, becauſe he dare not reuenge, but out of Christian fortitude, becauſe he may not: he hath ſo conquered himſelfe, that wrongs cannot conquer him; and herein alone findes, that victory conſiſts in yeelding. He is aboue nature, while he ſeemes below himſelfe. The vildeſt creature knowes how to turne againe; but to command himſelfe not to reſiſt being vrged, is more than heroicall. His conſtructions are euer full of charity and fauour; either this wrong was not done, or not with intent of wrong; or if that, vpon miſ-information; or if none of theſe, raſhneſſe (though a fault) ſhall ſerue for an excuſe. Himſelfe craues the offendors pardon, before his confeſſion; and a ſlight anſwer contents, where the offended deſires to forgiue. He is Gods beſt witneſſe, & when he ſtands before the barre for truth, his tongue is calmely free, his forehead firme, and he with erect and ſetled countenance heares his iuſt ſentence, and reioyces in it. The Iaylors that attend him, are to him his Pages of honour; his dungeon, the lower part of the vault of heauen; his racke or wheele, the ſtaires of his aſcent to glory; he challengeth his executioners, and encounters the fierceſt paines with ſtrength of reſolution, and while he ſuffers, the beholders pity him, the tormentors complaine of wearineſſe, and both of them wonder. No anguiſh can maſter him whether by violence or by lingring. He accounts expectation no puniſhment, & can abide to haue his hopes adiourned till a new day. Good lawes ſerue for his protection, not for his reuenge; and his owne power, to auoid indignities, not to returne them. His hopes are ſo ſtrong, that they can inſult ouer the greateſt diſcouragements; and his apprehenſions ſo deepe, that when he hath once faſtned, he ſooner leaueth his life than his hold. Neither time nor peruerſneſſe can make him caſt off his charitable endeuors, and deſpaire of preuailing; but in ſpight of all croſſes, and all denials, he redoubleth his beneficiall offers of loue. He trieth the ſea after many ſhipwracks, & beats ſtill at that doore which he neuer ſaw opened. Contrariety of euents doth but exerciſe, not diſmay him; and when croſſes afflict him, he ſees a diuine hand inuiſibly ſtriking with theſe ſenſible ſcourges : againſt which he dares not rebell nor murmure. Hence all things befall him alike; and he goes with the ſame minde to the ſhambles, and to the fold. His recreations are calme and gentle; and not more full of relaxation than void of fury. This man onely can turne neceſſity into vertue, and put euill to good vſe. He is the ſureſt friend, the lateſt and eaſieſt enemie, the greateſt conquerour, and ſo much more happy than others, by how much he could abide to be more miſerable.

Of the true friend.

HIs affections are both vnited and diuided; vnited to him he loueth; diuided betwixt another and himſelfe; and his owne heart is ſo parted, that whiles he hath ſome, his friend hath all. His choice is led by vertue, or by the beſt of vertues, Religion; not by gaine, not by pleaſure; yet not without reſpect of equal conditiō, of diſpoſition not vnlike; which once made, admits of no change, except he whom hee loueth, be changed quite from himſelfe; nor that ſuddenly, but after long expectation. Extremity doth but faſten him, whiles he, like a wel-wrought vault, lies the ſtronger, by how much more weight he beares. When neceſſity calls him to it, he can be a ſeruant to his equall, with the ſame will wherwith he can command his inferior; and though he riſe to honor,forgets not his familiarity,not ſuffers inequality of eſtate to work ſtrangenes of countenance;on the other ſide,he lifts vp his friend to aduancement, with a willing hand, without enuy, without diſſimulation. When his mate is dead, he accounts himſelfe but half aliue;then his loue not diſſolued by death,deriues it ſelfe to thoſe orphans which neuer knew the price of their father;they become the heires of his affection,and the burden of his cares.He embraces a free community of all things,ſaue thoſe which either honeſty reſerues proper, or nature; and hates to enioy that which would doe his friend more good:his charity ſerues to cloke noted infirmities,not by vntruth, not by flattery,but by diſcreet ſecrecy;neither is he more fauourable in concealement, than round in his priuate reprehenſions; and when anothers ſimple fidelity ſhewes it ſelfe in his reproofe, he loues his monitor ſo much the more, by how much more hee ſmarteth. His boſome is his friends cloſet,where he may ſafely lay vp his complaints, his doubts,his cares;and look how he leaues, ſo he findes them;ſaue for ſome addition of ſeaſonable counſell for redreſſe. If ſome vnhappy ſuggeſtion ſhall either diſioint his affection,or breake it,it ſoone knits againe,and growes the ſtronger by that ſtreſſe.He is ſo ſenſible of anothers iniuries,that when his friend is ſtricken,he cries out,& equally ſmarteth vntouched, as one affected not with ſympathy, but with a reall feeling of paine: and in what miſchiefe may be preuented,he interpoſeth his aid,and offers to redeeme his friend with himſelfe;no houre can be vnſeaſonable,no buſineſſe difficult,nor paine grieuous in condition of his eaſe:and what either he doth or ſuffereth, he neither cares nor deſires to haue knowne; leſt he ſhould ſeeme to looke for thanks. If he can therefore ſteale the performance of a good office vnſeene,the conſcience of his faithfulneſſe herein is ſo much ſweeter as it is more ſecret. In fauours done, his memory is fraile;in benefits receiued,eternall:he ſcorneth either to regard recompence,or not to offer it. He is the comfort of miſeries, the guide of difficulties, the ioy of life, the treaſure of earth; and no other than a good Angell cloathed in fleſh.

Of the Truly-Noble.

HE ſtands not vpon what he borrowed of his Anceſtors, but thinkes hee muſt worke out his owne honour : and if he cannot reach the vertue of them that gaue him outward glory by inheritance, he is more abaſhed of his impotencie, than tranſported with a great name. Greatneſſe doth not make him ſcornfull and imperious,but rather like the fixed ſtarres;the higher he is,the leſſe he deſires to ſeeme. Neither cares he ſo much for pompe and frothy oſtentation, as for the ſolid truth of Nobleneſſe. Courteſie and ſweet affability can be no more ſeuered from him, than life from his ſoule;not out of a baſe and ſeruile popularitie,and deſire of ambitious inſinuation; but of a natiue gentleneſſe of diſpoſition, and true value of himſelfe. His hand is open & bounteous,yet not ſo,as that he ſhould rather reſpect his glory,than his eſtate; wherein his wiſdome can diſtinguiſh betwixt paraſites and friends, betwixt changing of fauours and expending them. He ſcorneth to make his height a priuilege of looſeneſſe, but accounts his titles vaine,if he be inferiour to others in goodneſſe: and thinks he ſhould be more ſtrict,the more eminent he is;becauſe he is more obſerued,and now his offences are become exemplar.There is no vertue that he holds vnfit for ornament, for vſe;nor any vice which he condemnes not as ſordid, & a fit companion of baſenes; and whereof he doth not more hate the blemiſh,than affect the pleaſure.He ſo ſtudies, as one that knowes,ignorance can neither purchaſe honor,nor wield it;and that knowledge muſt both guide and grace him. His exerciſes are from his childhood ingenious, manly,decent,and ſuch as tend ſtill to wit,valor,actiuity:and if(as ſeldome)he deſcend to diſports of chance,his games ſhal neuer make him either pale with feare,or hot with deſire of gaine. He doth not ſo vſe his followers, as if he thought they were made for nothing but his ſeruitude ; whoſe felicity were only to be commanded and pleaſe: wearing them to the backe, & then either finding or framing excuſes to diſcard them empty; but vpon all opportunities lets them feele the ſweetneſſe of their owne ſeruiceableneſſe and his bounty. Silence in officious ſeruice is the beſt Oratory to plead for his reſpect: all diligence is but lent to him, none loſt. His wealth ſtands in receiuing, his honour in giuing: he cares not either how many hold of his goodneſſe, or to how few he is beholden: & if he haue caſt away fauours, he hates either to vpbraid them to his enemie, or to challenge reſtitution. None can bee more pitifull to the diſtreſſed, or more prone to ſuccour; and then moſt, where is leaſt meanes to ſollicite, leaſt poſſibility of requitall. He is equally addreſſed to warre and peace ; & knows not more how to command others, than how to be his Countries ſeruant in both. He is more carefull to giue true honour to his Maker, than to receiue ciuill honour from men. He knowes that this ſeruice is free and noble, and euer loaded with ſincere glory; and how vaine it is to hunt after applauſe from the world, till he be ſure of him that moldeth all hearts, and powreth contempt on Princes ; and ſhortly, ſo demeanes himſelfe, as one that accounts the body of Nobility to conſiſt in Bloud, the ſoule in the eminence of Vertue.

Of the good Magiſtrate.

HE is the faithfull Deputy of his Maker, whoſe obedience is the rule whereby he ruleth ; his breſt is the Ocean whereinto all the cares of priuate men empty themſelues ; which as he receiues without complaint and ouerflowing, ſo hee ſends them forth againe by a wiſe conueyance in the ſtreames of iuſtice: his doores, his eares are euer open to ſuters; and not who comes firſt ſpeeds well, but whoſe cauſe is beſt. His nights, his meales are ſhort & interrupted ; all which he beares well, becauſe he knowes himſelfe made for a publike ſeruant of Peace and Iuſtice. He ſits quietly at the ſterne, and commands one to the top-ſaile, another to the maine, a third to the plummer, a fourth to the anchor, as he ſees the need of their courſe and weather requires; & doth no leſſe by his tongue, than all the Mariners with their hands. On the Bench he is another from himſelfe at home; now all priuate reſpects of bloud, alliance, amity are forgotten; and if his owne Sonne come vnder tryall, hee knowes him not: Pity which in all others is wont to be the beſt praiſe of humanity, and the fruit of Chriſtian loue, is by him thrown ouer the barre for corruption: as for Fauour, the falſe Aduocate of the gracious, he allowes him not to appeare in the Court; there only cauſes are heard ſpeake, not perſons: Eloquence is then only not diſcouraged, when ſhe ſerues for a Client of truth: meere narrations are allowed in this Oratory, not Proems, not excurſions, not Gloſſes: Truth muſt ſtrip her ſelfe, & come in naked to his barre, without falſe bodies, or colors, without diſguiſes: A bribe in his Cloſet, or a letter on the Bench, or the whiſpering and winks of a great neighbour, are anſwered with an angry and couragious repulſe. Diſpleaſure, Reuenge, Recompence ſtand on both ſides the Bench, but he ſcornes to turne his eye towards them ; looking onely right forward at Equity, which ſtands full before him. His ſentence is euer deliberate and guided with ripe wiſdome, yet his hand is ſlower than his tongue; but when he is vrged by occaſion either to doome or execution, he ſhewes how much he hateth mercifull iniuſtice: neither can his reſolution or act be reuerſed with partiall importunitie. His forehead is rugged and ſeuere, able to diſcountenance villany, yet his words are more awfull than his brow, and his hand than his words. I know not whether he be more feared or loued, both affections are ſo ſweetly contempered in all hearts. The good feare him louingly, the middle ſort loue him fearefully, and only the wicked man feares him ſlauiſhly without loue. He hates to pay priuate wrongs with the aduantage of his Office; and if euer he be partiall, it is to his enemy. He is not more ſage in his gowne, than valorous in armes, and increaſeth in the rigour of diſcipline, as the times in danger. His ſword hath neither ruſted for want of vſe, nor ſurfetteth of bloud, but after many threats is vnſheathed, as the dreadfull inſtrument of diuine reuenge. He is the Guard of good lawes, the Refuge of innocency, the Comet of the guilty, the Pay-maſter of good deſerts, the Champion of iuſtice, the patron of peace, the Tutor of the Church, the Father of his Country, and as it were another God vpon earth.

Of the Penitent.

HE hath a wounded heart & a ſad face; yet not ſo much for feare, as for vnkindneſſe: The wrong of his ſinne troubles him more than the danger: None but he is the better for his ſorrow; neither is any paſſion more hurtfull to others, than this is gainefull to him; The more he ſeekes to hide his griefe, the leſſe it will bee hid; Euery man may reade it not onely in his eyes, but in his bones. Whiles he is in charity with all others, he is ſo fallen out with himſelfe, that none but God can reconcile him: He hath ſued himſelfe in all Courts, accuſeth, arraigneth, ſentenceth, puniſheth himſelfe vnpartially, & ſooner may finde mercy at any hand, than at his owne. He onely hath pulled off the faire viſor of ſinne; ſo as that appeares not but masked vnto others, is ſeene of him barefac'd; & bewraies that fearefull vglineſſe, which none can conceiue but he that hath viewed it. He hath lookt into the depth of the bottomeleſſe pit, and hath ſeene his owne offence tormented in others, and the ſame brands ſhaken at him. He hath ſeene the change of faces in that euill one, as a tempter, as a tormenter; and hath heard the noiſe of a conſcience, and is ſo frighted with all theſe, that he can neuer haue reſt, till he haue runne out of himſelfe, to God; in whoſe face at firſt, hee findes rigour, but afterwards, ſweetneſſe in his boſome: He bleeds firſt from the hand that heales him. The Law of God hath made worke for mercy; which he hath no ſooner apprehended, than he forgets his wounds, & lookes careleſly vpon all theſe terrors of guiltineſſe. When he caſts his eye backe vpon himſelfe, he wonders where he was, and how he came there; and grants, that if there were not ſome witchcraft in ſinne, he could not haue beene ſo ſottiſhly graceleſſe. And now, in the iſſue, Satan findes, (not without indignation and repentance) that he hath done him a good turne in tempting him: For he had neuer beene ſo good, if he had not ſinned; he had neuer fought with ſuch courage, if he had not ſeene his bloud, and beene aſhamed of his foile: Now hee is ſeene, and felt in the front of the ſpirituall battell; and can teach others how to fight, and incourage them in fighting. His heart was neuer more taken vp with the pleaſure of ſinne, than now with care of auoiding it: The very ſight of that cup, wherein ſuch a fulſome potion was brought him, turnes his ſtomacke: the firſt offers of ſinne make him tremble more now, than he did before at the iudgments of his ſinne; neither dares he ſo much as looke towards Sodom: All the powers and craft of hell cannot fetch him in for a cuſtomer to euill; his infirmity may yeeld once, his reſolution neuer. There is none of his ſenſes or parts, which hee hath not within couenants for their good behauiour; which they cannot euer breake with impunity. The wrongs of his ſin he repaies to men with recompence, as hating it ſhould be ſaid, he owes any thing to his offence; to God (what in him lies) with ſighs, teares, vowes, and endeuours of amendment. No heart is more waxen to the impreſſions of forgiueneſſe; neither are his hands more open to receiue, than to giue pardon. All the iniuries which are offered to him, are ſwallowed vp in his wrongs to his Maker, and Redeemer; neither can hee call for the arrerages of his farthings, when he lookes vpon the millions forgiuen him; he feeles not what he ſuffers from men, when he thinks of what hee hath done, and ſhould haue ſuffered. He is a thankfull Herauld of the mercies of his God; which if all the world heare not from his mouth, it is no fault of his : Neither did hee ſo burne with the euill fires of concupiſcence, as now with the holy flames of zeale to that glory which hee hath blemiſhed ; and his eies are full of moiſture, as his heart of heat. The gates of heauen are not ſo knockt at by any ſuter, whether for frequence, or importunitie. You ſhall finde his cheekes furrowed, his knees hard, his lips ſealed vp, ſaue when he muſt accuſe himſelfe, or glorifie God, his eies humbly deiected, and ſometimes you ſhall take him breaking off a ſigh in the midſt ; as one that would ſteale an humiliation vnknowne, and would be offended with any part that ſhould not keepe his counſell. When he findes his ſoule oppreſſed with the heauy guilt of a ſinne, he giues it vent thorow his mouth, into the eare of his ſpirituall Phyſitian, from whom he receiues Cordials anſwerable to his complaint. He is a ſeuere exactor of diſcipline, firſt vpon himſelfe, on whom he impoſes more than one Lent ; then, vpon others, as one that vowed to bee reuenged on ſinne whereſoeuer he finds it ; and though but one hath offended him, yet his deteſtation is vniuerſall. He is his owne taske-maſter for deuotion ; and if Chriſtianity haue any worke more difficult, or perillous than other, that he enioynes himſelfe, and reſolues contentment euen in miſcarriage. It is no maruell if the acquaintance of his wilder times know him not ; for he is quite another from himſelfe ; and if his minde could haue had any intermiſſion of dwelling within his breaſt, it could not haue knowne this was the lodging : Nothing but an out-ſide is the ſame it was, and that altred more with Regeneration than with age. None but he can relliſh the promiſes of the Goſpel ; which he findes ſo ſweet, that he complaines not, his thirſt after them is vnſatiable ; and now that he hath found his Sauiour he hugs him ſo faſt, and holds him ſo deare, that he feeles not when his life is fetcht away from him, for his martyrdome. The latter part of his life is ſo led, as if he deſired to vnliue his youth ; and his laſt Teſtament is full of reſtitutions, & legacies of piety. In ſumme, he hath ſo liued and died, as that Satan hath no ſuch match, ſinne hath no ſuch enemy, God hath no ſuch ſeruant as he.

He is an Happy man,

THat hath learn'd to read himſelfe more than all bookes ; and hath ſo taken out this leſſon, that he can neuer forget it ; That knowes the world, and cares not for it ; That after many trauerſes of thoughts, is growne to know what he may truſt to, and ſtands now equally armed for all euents. That hath got the maſtery at home, ſo as he can croſſe his will without a mutiny, & ſo pleaſe it, that he makes it not a wanton : That in earthly things wiſhes no more than nature ; in ſpirituall, is euer graciouſly ambitious : That for his condition, ſtands on his owne feet, not needing to leane vpon the great, and can ſo frame his thoughts to his eſtate, that when he hath leaſt, he cannot want, becauſe he is as free from deſire, as ſuperfluity : That hath ſeaſonably broken the head-ſtrong reſtineſſe of proſperitie, and can now menage it at pleaſure : Vpon whom, all ſmaller croſſes light as haile-ſtones vpon a roofe ; & for the greater calamities, he can take them as tributes of life, and tokens of loue ; and if his ſhip be toſſed, yet he is ſure his Anchor is faſt. If all the world were his, he could be no other than he is ; no whit gladder of himſelfe, no whit higher in his carriage, becauſe he knowes, contentment lies not in the things hee hath, but in the minde that values them. The powers of his reſolution can either multiply, or ſubſtract at pleaſure. He can make his cottage a Mannor, or a Palace when he liſts ; and his home-cloſe, a large dominion ; his ſtaind-cloth, Arras ; his earth, plate, and can ſee ſtate in the attendance of one ſeruant ; as one that hath learned, a mans greatneſſe or baſeneſſe is in himſelfe ; & in this he may euen conteſt with the proud, that he thinks his owne the beſt. Or, if he muſt be outwardly great, he can but turne the other end of the glaſſe, and make his ſtately Mannor a low and ſtrait Cottage;and in all his coſtly furniture,he can ſee not richneſſe,but vſe; he can ſee droſſe in the beſt metall, and earth thorow the beſt clothes; and in all his troupe, he can ſee himſelfe his owne ſeruant. He liues quietly at home, out of the noiſe of the world,and loues to enioy himſelfe alwaies, and ſometimes his friend, and hath as full ſcope to his thoughts, as to his eies. He walkes euer euen, in the mid-way betwixt hopes and feares, reſolued to feare nothing but God, to hope for nothing but that which he muſt haue. He hath a wiſe and vertuous minde in a ſeruiceable body; which that better part affects as a preſent ſeruant,and a future companion; ſo cheriſhing his fleſh, as one that would ſcorne to be all fleſh. He hath no enemies, not for that all loue him,but becauſe he knowes to make a gaine of malice. He is not ſo ingaged to any earthly thing, that they two cannot part on euen tearmes; there is neither laughter in their meeting,nor in their ſhaking of hands, teares.He keepes euer the beſt company, the God of Spirits, and the Spirits of that God; whom he entertaines continually in an awfull familiaritie, not being hindred, either with too much light, or with none at all. His conſcience and his hand are friends, and (what Deuill ſoeuer tempt him) will not fall out. That diuine part goes euer vprightly and freely, not ſtooping vnder the burden of a willing ſinne, not fettered with the gieues of vniuſt ſcruples. He would not,if he could, run away from himſelfe, or from God; not caring from whom he lies hid, ſo he may looke theſe two in the face. Cenſures and applauſes are paſſengers to him, not gueſts; his eare is their thorow-fare, not their harbour; he hath learned to fetch both his counſell, and his ſentence from his owne breaſt. He doth not lay weight vpon his own ſhoulders, as one that loues to torment himſelfe with the honor of much imploiment,but as he makes worke his game,ſo doth he not liſt to make himſelfe worke. His ſtrife is euer to redeeme, and not to ſpend time. It is his trade to doe good; and to thinke of it, his recreation. He hath hands enow for himſelfe and others, which are euer ſtretched forth for beneficence, not for need. He walkes cheerefully in the way that God hath chalked,and neuer wiſhes it more wide,or more ſmooth.Thoſe very tentations whereby he is foiled, ſtrengthen him; he comes forth crowned, and triumphing out of the ſpirituall Battels, and thoſe ſcars that he hath, make him beautifull. His ſoule is euery day dilated to receiue that God, in whom he is; and hath attained to loue himſelfe for God,and God for his owne ſake.His eies ſtick ſo faſt in heauen, that no earthly obiect can remoue them; yea his whole ſelfe is there before his time, and ſees with Steuen, and heares with Paul, and enioyes with Lazarus, the glory that he ſhall haue; and takes poſſeſſion before-hand of his roome amongſt the Saints: and theſe heauenly contentments haue ſo taken him vp,that now he lookes downe diſpleaſedly vpon the earth,as the Region of his ſorrow and baniſhment;yet ioying more in hope, than troubled with the ſenſe of euils, he holds it no great matter to liue, and his greateſt buſineſſe to die; and is ſo well acquainted with his laſt gueſt, that he feares no vnkindneſſe from him: neither makes he any other of dying, than of walking home when he is abroad, or of going to bed when he is weary of the day.He is well prouided for both worlds,and is ſure of peace here, of glory hereafter; and therefore hath a light heart, and a cheerefull face. All his fellow-creatures reioyce to ſerue him; his betters, the Angels,loue to obſerue him; God himſelfe takes pleaſure to conuerſe with him, and hath Sainted him afore his death,and in his death crowned him.

THE PROOEME.

I Haue ſhewed you many faire Vertues: I ſpeake not for them; if their ſight cannot command affection, let them loſe it. They ſhall pleaſe yet better, after you haue troubled your eies a little with the view of deformities; and by how much more they pleaſe, ſo much more odious, and like themſelues, ſhall theſe deformities appeare. This light, contraries giue to each other, in the midſt of their enmitie, that one makes the other ſeeme more good, or ill. Perhaps in ſome of theſe (which thing I doe at once feare, and hate) my ſtile ſhall ſeeme to ſome leſſe graue, more Satyricall: if you finde me not without cauſe iealous, let it pleaſe you to impute it to the nature of thoſe Vices, which will not be otherwiſe handled. The faſhions of ſome euills are beſides the odiouſneſſe, ridiculous; which to repeat, is to ſeeme bitterly merry. I abhorre to make ſport with wickedneſſe, and forbid any laughter here, but of diſdaine. Hypocriſie ſhall leade this ring; worthily, I thinke, becauſe both ſhe commeth neereſt to Vertue, and is the worſt of Vices.

CHARACTER OF THE HYPOCRITE.

AN Hypocrite is the worſt kinde of Player, by ſo much as he acts the better part; w^{ch} hath alwaies two faces, oft times two hearts: That can compoſe his forehead to ſadneſſe and grauity, while he bids his heart be wanton and careleſſe within, and (in the meane time) laughs within himſelf, to think how ſmoothly he hath cozened the beholder. In whoſe ſilent face are written the characters of Religion, which his tongue & geſtures pronounce, but his hands recant. That hath a clean face and garment, with a foule ſoule: whoſe mouth belies his heart, and his fingers belie his mouth. Walking early vp into the Citie, he turnes into the great Church, and ſalutes one of the pillars on one knee, worſhipping that God which at home he cares not for; while his eie is fixed on ſome window, on ſome paſſenger, and his heart knowes not whither his lips goe. He riſes, & looking about with admiration, complaines on our frozen charity, commends the ancient. At Church he will euer ſit where he may be ſeene beſt, and in the middeſt of the Sermon puls out his Tables in haſte, as if he feared to loſe that note; when he writes either his forgotten errand, or nothing: then he turnes his Bible with a noiſe, to ſeeke an omitted quotation; and folds the leafe, as if he had found it; and askes aloud the name of the Preacher, and repeats it, whom he publikely ſalutes, thankes, praiſes, inuites, entertaines with tedious good counſell, with good diſcourſe, if it had come from an honeſter mouth. He can command teares when he ſpeakes of his youth; indeed becauſe it is paſt, not becauſe it was ſinfull: himſelfe is now better, but the times are worſe. All other ſinnes he reckons vp with deteſtation, while he loues and hides his darling in his boſome. All his ſpeech returnes to himſelfe, and euery occurrent drawes in a ſtory to his owne praiſe. When he ſhould giue, he lookes about him, and ſaies, Who ſees me? No almes, no prayers, fall from him without a witneſſe; belike leſt God ſhould deny that he hath receiued them: and when he hath done (leſt the world ſhould not know it) his owne mouth is his Trumpet to proclaime it. With the ſuperfluity of his vſury he builds an Hoſpitall, and harbours them whom his extortion hath ſpoiled; ſo while he makes many beggers, he keepes ſome. He turneth all Gnats into Camels, and cares not to vndoe the world for a circumſtance. Fleſh on a Friday is more abomination to him than his neighbours bed: He abhorres more not to vncouer at the name of Ieſus, than to ſweare by the name of God. When a Rimer reads his Poeme to him, he begs a Copie, and perſwades the Preſſe; there is nothing that he diſlikes in preſence, that in abſence he cenſures not. He comes to the ſicke bed of his ſtepmother, and weepes, when he ſecretly feares her recouerie. He greets his friend in the ſtreet with ſo cleere a countenance, ſo faſt a cloſure, that the other thinkes he reads his heart in his face; and ſhakes hands with an indefinite inuitation of When will you come? and when

when his backe is turned, ioyes that he is ſo well rid of a gueſt: yet if that gueſt viſit him vnſeared, he counterfets a ſmiling welcome, and excuſes his cheare, when cloſely he frownes on his wife for too much. He ſhewes well, and ſaies well; and himſelfe is the worſt thing he hath. In briefe, he is the ſtrangers Saint, the neighbours diſeaſe, the blot of goodneſſe; a rotten ſticke in a darke night, a Poppie in a corne field, an ill tempered candle, with a great ſnuffe, that in going out ſmels ill; and an Angell abroad, a Deuill at home; and worſe when an Angell, than when a Deuill.

Of the Buſie-bodie.

His eſtate is too narrow for his minde, and therefore he is faine to make himſelfe roome in others affaires; yet euer in pretence of loue. No newes can ſtir but by his doore; neither can he know that, which he muſt not tell. What euery man ventures in Guiana voyage, and what they gained, he knowes to a haire. Whether Holland will haue peace he knowes, and on what conditions, and with what ſucceſſe, is familiar to him ere it be concluded. No Poſt can paſſe him without a queſtion, and rather than he will leeſe the newes, he rides backe with him to appoſe him of tidings; and then to the next man he meets, he ſupplies the wants of his haſty intelligence, and makes vp a perfect tale; wherewith he ſo haunteth the patient auditor, that after many excuſes, he is faine to endure rather the cenſure of his manners in running away, than the tediousneſſe of an impertinent diſcourſe. His ſpeech is oft broken off with a ſucceſſion of long parentheſis, which he euer vowes to fill vp ere the concluſion, and perhaps would effect it, if the others eare were as vnweariable as his tongue. If he ſee but two men talke and reade a letter in the ſtreet, he runnes to them, and askes if he may not be partner of that ſecret relation; and if they deny it, he offers to tell, ſince he may not heare, wonders: and then falls vpon the report of the Scottiſh Mine, or of the great Fiſh taken vp at Linne, or of the Freezing of the Thames; and after many thankes and diſmiſſions, is hardly intreated ſilence. He vndertakes as much as he performes little: this man will thruſt himſelfe forward to bee the guide of the way he knowes not; and calls at his neighbours window, and askes why his ſeruants are not at worke. The Market hath no commoditie which he prizeth not, and which the next table ſhall not heare recited. His tongue, like the taile of Sampſons Foxes, carries firebrands, and is enough to ſet the whole field of the world on a flame. Himſelfe begins table-talke of his neighbour at anothers boord, to whom he beares the firſt newes, and adiures him to conceale the reporter: whoſe cholericke anſwer he returnes to his firſt Oaſt, inlarged with a ſecond edition; ſo, as it vſes to be done in the fight of vnwilling Maſtiues, he claps each on the ſide apart, and prouokes them to an eager conflict. There can no act paſſe without his Comment, which is euer farre-fetcht, raſh, ſuſpicious, delatorie. His eares are long, and his eies quicke, but moſt of all to imperfections; which as he eaſily ſees, ſo he increaſes with intermedling. He harbours another mans ſeruant, & amids his entertainment askes what fare is vſuall at home, what houres are kept, what talke paſſeth their meales, what his Maſters diſpoſition is, what his gouernment, what his gueſts? and when he hath by curious inquiries extracted all the iuice and ſpirit of hoped intelligence, turnes him off whence he came, and workes on a new. He hates conſtancie as an earthen dulneſſe, vnfit for men of ſpirit: and loues to change his worke and his place; neither yet can he be ſo ſoone wearie of any place, as euery place is wearie of him; for as he ſets himſelfe on worke, ſo others pay him with hatred, and looke how many maſters he hath, ſo many enemies: neither is it poſſible that any ſhould not hate him, but who know him not. So then hee labours without thankes, talkes without credit, liues without loue, dies without teares, without pitie; ſaue that ſome ſay it was pity he died no ſooner.

Of the Superſtitious.

SVperſtition is godleſſe Religion, deuout impietie. The ſuperſtitious is fond in obſeruation, ſeruile in feare, he worſhips God but as he liſts: he giues God what he askes not, more than he askes; and all but what he ſhould giue; and makes more ſinne than the Ten Commandements. This man dares not ſtirre forth till his breſt be croſſed, and his face ſprinkled: if but an Hare croſſe him the way, he returnes; or if his iourney began vnawares on the diſmall day; or if he ſtumble at the threſhold. If he ſee a Snake vnkilled, he feares a miſchiefe; if the ſalt fall towards him, he lookes pale and red, and is not quiet till one of the waiters haue powred wine on his lappe; and when he neezeth, thinkes them not his friends that vncouer not. In the morning he liſtens whether the Crow crieth euen or odde, and by that token preſages of the weather. If he heare but a Rauen croke from the next roofe, he makes his will, or if a Bittour flie ouer his head by night: but if his troubled fancie ſhall ſecond his thoughts with the dreame of a faire garden, or greene ruſhes, or the ſalutation of a dead friend, he takes leaue of the world, and ſaies he cannot liue. He will neuer ſet to ſea but on a Sunday; neither euer goes without an Erra Pater in his pocket. Saint Pauls day and Saint Swithunes with the Twelue, are his Oracles; which he dares beleeue againſt the Almanacke. When he lies ſicke on his death-bed, no ſin troubles him ſo much, as that he did once eat fleſh on a Friday, no repentance can expiate that; the reſt need none. There is no dreame of his without an interpretation, without a prediction; and if the euent anſwer not his expoſition, he expounds it according to the euent. Euery darke groue and pictured wall ſtrikes him with an awfull, but carnall deuotion. Old wiues and Starres are his counſellers; his night ſpell is his guard, and charmes his phyſitian. He weares Paracelſian Charecters for the tooth-ach; and a little hollowed wax is his Antidote for all euils. This man is ſtrangely credulous; and calls impoſſible things, miraculous: If he heare that ſome ſacred blocke ſpeakes; moues, weepes, ſmiles, his beare feet carry him thither with an offering: and if a danger miſſe him in the way, his Saint hath the thankes. Some way he will not goe, and ſome he dares not; either there he bugges, or he faineth them; euery lanterne is a ghoſt, and euery noiſe is of chaines. He knows not why, but his cuſtome is to goe a little about, and to leaue the Croſſe ſtill on the right hand. One euent is enough to make a rule; out of theſe he concludes faſhions proper to himſelſe, and nothing can turne him out of his owne courſe. If hee haue done his taske, he is ſafe, it matters not with what affection. Finally, if God will let him be the caruer of his owne obedience, he could not haue a better ſubiect, as he is, he cannot haue a worſe.

Of the Profane.

THe Supeſtitious hath too many gods: the Profane man hath none at all, vnleſſe perhaps himſelſe be his owne deitie, and the world his heauen. To matter of Relion, his heart is a peece of dead fleſh, without feeling of loue, of feare, of care, or of paine from the deafe ſtrokes of a reuenging conſcience. Cuſtome of ſinne hath wrought this ſenſleſneſſe, which now hath beene ſo long entertained, that it pleads preſcription, and knowes not to be altered. This is no ſudden euill: we are borne ſinfull, but haue made our ſelues profane; through many degrees we climbe to this height of impiety. At firſt he ſinned, and cared not; now he ſinneth and knoweth not.

Appetite

Hall, J.

Appetite is his Lord, and Reaſon his ſeruant, and Religion his drudge. Senſe is the rule of his beleefe; and if Pietie may be an aduantage, he can at once counterfeit and deride it. When ought ſucceedeth to him, he ſacrifices to his nets, and thanks either his fortune, or his wit; and will rather make a falſe God, than acknowledge the true: if contrary, he cries out of deſtinie, and blames him to whom he will not be beholden. His conſcience would faine ſpeake with him, but he will not heare it; ſets the day, but hee diſappoints it; and when it cries loud for audience, he drownes the noiſe with good fellowſhip. He neuer names God, but in his oathes; neuer thinkes of him, but in extremity; and then he knowes not how to thinke of him, becauſe he begins but then. He quarrels for the hard conditions of his pleaſure, for his future damnation; and from himſelfe laies all the fault vpon his Maker; and from his decree fetcheth excuſes of his wickedneſſe. The ineuitable neceſſity of Gods counſel makes him deſperately careleſſe: ſo with good food he poiſons himſelfe. Goodneſſe is his Minſtrell; neither is any mirth ſo cordiall to him as his ſport with Gods fooles. Euery vertue hath his ſlander, and his ieſt to laugh it out of faſhion: euery vice his colour. His vſualleſt theame is the boaſt of his young ſinnes, which he can ſtill ioy in, though he cannot commit; and (if it may be) his ſpeech makes him worſe than he is. He cannot thinke of death with patience, without terrour, which he therefore feares worſe than hell, becauſe this he is ſure of, the other he but doubts of. He comes to Church as to the Theater, ſauing that not ſo willingly; for company, for cuſtome, for recreation, perhaps for ſleepe; or to feed his eies or his eares: as for his ſoule, he cares no more than if he had none. He loues none but himſelfe, and that not enough to ſeeke his true good; neither cares he on whom he treads that he may riſe. His life is full of licence, and his practice of outrage. Hee is hated of God, as much as he hateth goodneſſe, and differs little from a Deuill, but that he hath a body.

Of the Male-content.

HE is neither well full nor faſting; and though he abound with complaints, yet nothing diſlikes him but the preſent: for what hee condemned while it was, once paſt he magnifies, and ſtriues to recall it out of the iawes of Time. What he hath, he ſees not, his eies are ſo taken vp with what he wants; and what he ſees hee cares not for, becauſe he cares ſo much for that which is not. When his friend carues him the beſt morſell, he murmures that it is an happy feaſt wherein each one may cut for himſelfe. When a preſent is ſent him, he askes, Is this all? and What, no better? and ſo accepts it, as if he would haue his friend know how much he is bound to him for vouchſafing to receiue it. It is hard to entertaine him with a proportionable gift. If nothing, he cries out of vnthankfulneſſe; if little, that he is baſely regarded; if much, he exclaimes of flattery, and expectation of a large requitall. Euery bleſſing hath ſomewhat to diſparage and diſtaſte it: Children bring cares, ſingle life is wilde and ſolitarie; eminencie is enuious, retiredneſſe obſcure; faſting painfull; ſatietie vnweildie; Religion nicely ſeuere; liberty is lawleſſe; wealth burdenſome; mediocrity contemptible: Euery thing faulteth, either in too much, or too little. This man is euer head-ſtrong, and ſelfe-willed, neither is he alwaies tied to eſteeme or pronounce according to reaſon; ſome things he muſt diſlike he knowes not wherefore, but he likes them not; and other-where rather than not cenſure, he will accuſe a man of vertue. Euery thing he medleth with, he either findeth imperfect, or maketh ſo: neither is there any thing that ſoundeth ſo harſh in his eare, as the commendation of another, whereto yet perhaps he faſhionably and coldly aſſenteth, but with ſuch an after-clauſe of exception, as doth more than marre his former allowance, and if he liſt not to giue a verball diſgrace, yet he ſhakes his head and ſmiles, as if his ſilence ſhould ſay, I could and will not. And when himſelfe is praiſed without exceſſe, hee complaines that ſuch imperfect kindneſſe hath not done him right. If but an vnſeaſonable ſhowre croſſe his recreation, he is ready to fall out with heauen, and thinkes he is wronged, if God will not take his times when to raine, when to ſhine. He is a ſlaue to enuie, and loſeth fleſh with fretting, not ſo much at his owne infelicitie, as at others good; neither hath he leiſure to ioy in his owne bleſſings whileſt another proſpereth. Faine would hee ſee ſome mutinies, but dares not raiſe them; & ſuffers his lawleſſe tongue to walke thorow the dangerous paths of conceited alterations; but ſo, as in good manners he had rather thruſt euery man before him when it comes to acting. Nothing but feare keepes him from conſpiracies, & no man is more cruell when he is not manicled with danger. Hee ſpeakes nothing but Satyrs and Libels, and lodgeth no gueſts in his heart but Rebels. The inconſtant and he agree well in their felicitie, which both place in change: but herein they differ; the inconſtant man affects that which will be, the male-content commonly that which was. Finally, he is a querulous curre, whom no horſe can paſſe by without barking at; yea, in the deepe ſilence of night the very moone-ſhine openeth his clamorous mouth: hee is the wheele of a well-couched fire-worke, that flies out on all ſides, not without ſcorching it ſelfe. Euery eare is long agoe wearie of him, and he is now almoſt wearie of himſelfe. Giue him but a little reſpit, and he will die alone; of no other death, than others welfare.

Of the Vnconſtant.

THe inconſtant man treads vpon a mouing earth, and keepes no paſe. His proceedings are euer heady and peremptorie; for he hath not the patience to conſult with reaſon, but determines meerely vpon fancie. No man is ſo hot in the purſuit of what he liketh; no man ſooner wearie. He is fierie in his paſſions, which yet are not more violent than momentanie: it is a wonder if his loue or hatred laſt ſo many daies as a wonder. His heart is the Inne of all good motions, wherein if they lodge for a night, it is well; by morning they are gone, and take no leaue: and if they come that way againe, they are entertained as gueſts, not as friends. At firſt like another Ecebolius he loued ſimple truth; thence diuerting his eies, hee fell in loue with idolatrie; thoſe heatheniſh ſhrines had neuer any more doting and beſotted client; and now of late he is leapt from Rome to Munſter, and is growne to giddie Anabaptiſme: what he will be next, as yet he knoweth not; but ere he haue wintred his opinion, it will be maniſeſt. Hee is good to make an enemie of, ill for a friend; becauſe as there is no truſt in his affection, ſo no rancor in his diſpleaſure. The multitude of his changed purpoſes brings with it forgetfulneſſe; & not of others more than of himſelfe. He ſaies, ſweares, renounces, becauſe what he promiſed, he meant not long enough to make an impreſſion. Herein alone he is good for a Common-wealth, that he ſets many on worke, with building, ruining, altering; and makes more buſineſſe than Time it ſelfe; neither is he a greater enemie to thrift, than to idleneſſe. Proprietie is to him enough cauſe of diſlike; each thing pleaſes him better that is not his owne. Euen in the beſt things, long continuance is a iuſt quarrell; Manna it ſelfe growes tedious with age, and Noueltie is the higheſt ſtile of commendation to the meaneſt offers: neither doth he in bookes and faſhions aske How good, but, How new. Varietie carries him away with delight, and no vniforme pleaſure can be without an irkſome fulneſſe. He is ſo transformable into all opinions, manners, qualities, that he ſeemes rather made immediatly of the firſt matter, than of well-tempered elements; and therefore is in poſſibilitie any thing or euery thing; nothing in preſent ſubſtance. Finally, he is ſeruile in imitation, waxey to perſwaſions, wittie to wrong himſelfe, a gueſt in his owne houſe, an Ape of others, and in a word, any thing rather than himſelfe.

Of the Flatterer.

FLatterie is nothing but falſe friendſhip, fawning hypocriſie, diſhoneſt ciuilitie, baſe merchandize of words, a plauſible diſcord of the heart & lips. The Flatterer is bleare-eyed to ill, and cannot ſee vices; and his tongue walkes euer in one track of vniuſt praiſes, and can no more tell how to diſcommend, than to ſpeake true. His ſpeeches are full of wondring interiections; and all his titles are ſuperlatiue, and both of them ſeldome euer but in preſence. His baſe minde is well matched with a mercenarie tongue, which is a willing ſlaue to another mans eare; neither regardeth he how true, but how pleaſing. His Art is nothing but delightfull coozenage, whoſe rules are ſmoothing, and garded with periurie; whoſe ſcope is to make men fooles, in teaching them to ouer-value themſelues, and to tickle his friends to death. This man is a Porter of all good tales, and mends them in the carriage: One of Fames beſt friends, and his own; that helps to furniſh her with thoſe rumours, that may aduantage himſelfe. Conſcience hath no greater aduerſarie; for when ſhe is about to play her iuſt part of accuſation, he ſtops her mouth with good termes, and wel-neere ſtrangleth her with ſhifts. Like that ſubtill fiſh, he turnes himſelfe into the colour of euery ſtone, for a bootie. In himſelfe he is nothing, but what pleaſeth his Great-one, whoſe vertues he cannot more extoll, than imitate his imperfections, that he may thinke his worſt gracefull. Let him ſay it is hot, he wipes his forehead and vnbraceth himſelfe; if cold, he ſhiuers, and calls for a warmer garment. When he walkes with his friend, he ſweares to him, that no man elſe is looked at; no man talked of; and that whomſoeuer he vouchſafes to looke on and nod to, is graced enough: That he knowes not his owne worth, leſt he ſhould be too happy; and when he tells what others ſay in his praiſe, he interrupts himſelfe modeſtly, and dares not ſpeake the reſt: ſo his concealement is more inſinuating than his ſpeech. He hangs vpon the lips which he admireth, as if they could let fall nothing but Oracles, and findes occaſion to cite ſome approued ſentence, vnder the name hee honoureth; and when ought is nobly ſpoken, both his hands are little enough to bleſſe him. Sometimes euen in abſence he extolleth his Patron, where he may preſume of ſafe conueyance to his eares; and in preſence ſo whiſpereth his commendation to a common friend, that it may not be vnheard where he meant it. He hath ſalues for euery ſore, to hide them, not to heale them; complexion for euery face: ſinne hath not any more Artificiall Broker, or more impudent Bawd. There is no vice, that hath not from him his colour, his allurement; and his beſt ſeruice is, either to further guiltineſſe, or ſmother it. If he grant euill things inexpedient, or crimes errours, he hath yeelded much; either thy eſtate giues priuilege of libertie, or thy youth; or if neither, What if it be ill? yet it is pleaſant. Honeſty to him is nice ſingularity, repentance ſuperſtitious melancholie, grauitie, dulneſſe, and all vertue, an innocent conceit of the baſe-minded. In ſhort, he is the Moth of liberall mens coats, the Eare-wig of the mightie, the bane of Courts, a friend and a ſlaue to the trencher, and good for nothing but to be a factor for the Deuill.

Of the Slothfull.

HE is a religious man, and weares the time in his Cloiſter; and as the cloke of his doing nothing, pleads contemplation; yet is he no whit the leaner for his thoughts, no whit learneder. He takes no leſſe care how to ſpend time, than others how to gaine by the expenſe; and when buſineſſe importunes him, is more troubled to fore-thinke what he muſt doe, than another to effect it. Summer is out of his fauour, for nothing but long daies that make no haſte to their euen. He loues ſtill to haue the Sunne witneſſe of his riſing; and lies long, more for lothneſſe to dreſſe him, than will to ſleepe: and after ſome ſtreaking and yawning, cals for dinner, vnwaſhed; which hauing digeſted with a ſleepe in his chaire, he walkes forth to the bench in the Market-place, and lookes for Companions: whomſoeuer he meets, he ſtaies with idle queſtions, & lingring diſcourſe; how the daies are lengthned, how kindly the weather is, how falſe the clocke, how forward the Spring, and ends euer with What ſhall we doe? It pleaſes him no leſſe to hinder others, than not to worke himſelfe. When all the people are gone from Church, he is left ſleeping in his ſeat alone. Hee enters bonds, and forfeits them by forgetting the day; and askes his neighbour when his owne field was fallowed, whether the next peece of ground belong not to himſelfe. His care is either none, or too late: when Winter is come, after ſome ſharpe viſitations, he lookes on his pile of wood, and askes how much was cropped the laſt Spring. Neceſſitie driues him to euery action, and what he cannot auoid, he will yet deferre. Euery change troubles him, although to the better; and his dulneſſe counterfeits a kinde of contentment. When he is warned on a Iury, he had rather pay the mulct, than appeare. All but that which nature will not permit, he doth by a Deputy, and counts it troubleſome to doe nothing; but to doe any thing yet more. He is witty in nothing but framing excuſes to ſit ſtill, which if the occaſion yeeld not, he coineth with eaſe. There is no worke that is not either dangerous or thankleſſe, and whereof he foreſees not the inconuenience and gainleſneſſe before he enters; which if it bee verified in euent, his next idleneſſe hath found a reaſon to patronize it. He had rather freeze than fetch wood, and chuſes rather to ſteale than worke; to begge than take paines to ſteale, and in many things to want than begge. He is ſo loth to leaue his neighbours fire, that he is faine to walke home in the darke; and if he be not lookt to, weares out the night in the chimney corner; or if not that, lies downe in his clothes to ſaue two labours. Hee eats and prayes himſelfe aſleepe; and dreames of no other torment but worke. This man is a ſtanding Poole, and cannot chuſe but gather corruption: he is deſcried amongſt a thouſand neighbours by a dry and naſty hand, that ſtill ſauours of the ſheet, a beard vncut, vnkembed; an eye and eare yellow, with their excretions; a coat ſhaken on, ragged, vnbruſht; by linnen and face ſtriuing whether ſhall excell in vncleanneſſe. For body, he hath a ſwoine legge, a dusky and ſwiniſh eye, a blowne cheeke, a drawling tongue, an heauy foot, and is nothing but a colder earth molded with ſtanding water. To conclude, is a man in nothing but in ſpeech and ſhape.

Of the Couetous.

HEE is a ſeruant to himſelſe, yea to his ſeruant; and doth baſe homage to that which ſhould be the worſt drudge. A liueleſſe peece of earth is his maſter, yea his God, which he ſhrines in his coffer, and to which he ſacrifices his heart. Euery face of his coine is a new image, which he adores with the higheſt veneration; yet takes vpon him to be Protector of that he worſhippeth: which he feares to keepe, and abhorres to loſe: not daring to truſt either any other god, or his owne. Like a true Chymiſt he turnes euery thing into Siluer, both what hee ſhould eat, and what he ſhould weare; and that he keepes to looke on, not to vſe. When he returnes from his field, he askes, not without much rage, what became of the looſe cruſt in his cup-bord, and who hath rioted among his Leekes. He neuer eats good meale, but on his neighbours trencher; and there he makes amends to his complaining ſtomacke for his former and future faſts. He bids his neighbours to dinner, and when they haue done, ſends in a trencher for the ſhot. Once in a yeere perhaps, he giues himſelfe leaue to feaſt,and for the time thinks no man more lauiſh; wherein he liſts not to fetch his diſhes from farre, nor will be beholden to the ſhambles, his owne prouiſion ſhall furniſh his boord with an inſenſible coſt,and when his gueſts are parted, talkes how much euery man deuoured,and how many cups were emptied,and feeds his family with the mouldy remnants a moneth after. If his ſeruant breake but an earthen diſh for want of light, he abates it out of his quarters wages. Hee chips his bread, and ſends it backe to exchange for ſtaler. He lets money, and ſells Time for a price; and will not be importuned either to preuent or deferre his day; and in the meane time looks for ſecret gratuities,beſides the maine intereſt which he ſels and returnes into the ſtocke. He breeds of Money to the third generation; neither hath it ſooner any being, than hee ſets it to beget more. In all things he affects ſecrecy and propriety: he grudgeth his neighbour the water of his Well: and next to ſtealing, hee hates borrowing. In his ſhort and vnquiet ſleepes he dreames of theeues,and runs to the doore, and names more men than he hath. The leaſt ſheafe he euer culls out for Tithe; and to rob God, holds it the beſt paſtime, the cleereſt gaine. This man cries out aboue others, of the prodigalitie of our times, and tells of the thrift of our fore-fathers: How that great Prince thought himſelfe royally attired,when he beſtowed thirteene ſhillings and foure pence on halfe a ſute,How one wedding gowne ſerued our Grandmothers,till they exchanged it for a winding ſheet; and praiſes plainneſſe,not for leſſe ſin,but for leſſe coſt. For himſelfe he is ſtill knowne by his fore-fathers coat, which he meanes with his bleſſing, to bequeath to the many deſcents of his heires.He neither would be poore,nor be accounted rich. No man complaines ſo much of want, to auoid a Subſidie;no man is ſo importunate in begging,ſo cruell in exaction;and when he moſt complaines of want,he feares that which he complaines to haue. No way is indirect to wealth; whether of fraud or violence. Gaine is his godlineſſe; which if conſcience goe about to preiudice, and grow troubleſome by exclaiming againſt, he is condemned for a common Barretor. Like another Ahab, hee is ſicke of the next field, and thinkes he is ill ſeated, while he dwels by neighbours. Shortly,his neighbours doe not much more hate him,than he himſelfe. He cares not (for no great aduantage) to loſe his friend,pine his body,damne his ſoule;and would diſpatch himſelfe when corne falls,but that he is loth to caſt away mony on a cord.

Hall, J.

Of the Vaine-glorious.

ALL his humour riſes vp into the froth of oſtentation;which if it once ſettle,falls downe into a narrow roome. If the exceſſe be in the vnderſtanding part,all his wit is in print; the Preſſe hath left his head empty; yea, not onely what he had, but what he could borrow without leaue. If his glory be in his deuotion, he giues not an Almes but on record; and if he haue once done well, God heares of it often; for vpon euery vnkindneſſe hee is ready to vpbraid him with merits. Ouer and aboue his owne diſcharge,he hath ſome ſatisfactions to ſpare for the common treaſure. He can fulfill the Law with eaſe,and earne God with ſuperfluity. If he haue beſtowed but a little ſumme in the glazing, pauing, parieting of Gods houſe, you ſhall finde it in the Church-window. Or if a more gallant humour poſſeſſe him,he weares all his land on his backe; and walking high, lookes ouer his left ſhoulder, to ſee if the point of his Rapier follow him with a Grace. He is proud of another mans horſe; and well mounted, thinkes euery man wrongs him,that lookes not at him. A bare head in the ſtreet,doth him more good than a meales meat. He ſweares bigge at an Ordinary, and talkes of the Court with a ſharpe accent; neither vouchſafes to name any not honourable, nor thoſe without ſome tearme of familiarity; and likes well to ſee the hearer looke vpon him amazedly, as if he ſaid, How happy is this man that is ſo great with Great-Ones!

Vnder pretence of ſeeking for a ſcroll of newes, he drawes out an handfull of letters indorſed with his owne ſtile, to the height: and halfe reading euery title, paſſes ouer the latter part, with a murmur; not without ſignifying, what Lord ſent this, what great Lady the other; and for what ſutes; the laſt paper (as it happens) is his newes from his honorable friend in the French Court. In the midſt of dinner, his Lacquay comes ſweating in, with a ſealed note from his Creditor, who now threatens a ſpeedy arreſt, and whiſpers the ill newes in his Maſters eare, when he aloud names a Councellor of State, and profeſſes to know the emploiment. The ſame meſſenger he calls with an imperious nod; and after expoſtulation, where he hath left his fellowes, in his eare ſends him for ſome new ſpur-lethers or ſtockings by this time footed; and when he is gone halfe the roome, recals him, and ſaith aloud, It is no matter, Let the greater bagge alone till I come; and yet againe calling him cloſer, whiſpers (ſo that all the Table may heare) that if his crimſon ſuit be ready againſt the day, the reſt need no haſte. He picks his teeth when his ſtomacke is empty, and calls for Pheſants at a common Inne. You ſhall finde him prizing the richeſt Iewels, and faireſt horſes, when his purſe yeelds not money enough for earneſt. He thruſts himſelfe into the preaſe, before ſome great Ladies; and loues to be ſeene neere the head of a great traine. His talke is how many Mourners hee furniſht with gownes at his Fathers funerals, how many meſſes, how rich his Coat is, and how ancient, how great his alliance: what challenges he hath made and anſwered; what exploits he did at Cales or Newport; and when he hath commended others buildings, furnitures, ſutes, compares them with his owne. When he hath vndertaken to be the Broker for ſome rich Diamond, he weares it, and pulling off his Gloue to ſtroke vp his haire, thinkes no eye ſhould haue any other obiect. Entertaining his friend, he chides his Cooke for no better cheere, and names the diſhes he meant, and wants. To conclude, he is euer on the Stage, and acts ſtill a glorious part abroad, when no man caries a baſer heart, no man is more ſordid and careleſſe at home. He is a Spaniſh Souldier on an Italian Theater; a Bladder full of wind, a skin full of words, a fooles wonder, and a wiſe mans foole.

Of the Preſumptuous.

PReſumption is nothing but hope out of his wits, an high houſe vpon weak pillars. The preſumptuous man loues to attempt great things, onely becauſe they are hard and rare: his actions are bold and venturous, and more full of hazard than vſe. He hoiſeth ſaile in a tempeſt, and ſaith, neuer any of his Anceſtors were drowned: he goes into an infected houſe, and ſaies, the plague dares not ſeize on noble bloud: he runnes on high battlements, gallops downe ſteepe hills, rides ouer narrow bridges, walkes on weake Ice, and neuer thinks, What if I fall? but, What if I runne ouer and fall not? He is a confident Alchymiſt, and braggeth, that the wombe of his Furnace hath conceiued a burthen that will do all the world good: which yet he deſires ſecretly borne, for feare of his owne bondage: in the meane time, his Glaſſe breakes; yet hee vpon better luting laies wagers of the ſucceſſe, and promiſeth wedges before hand to his friend. He ſaith, I will ſinne, and be ſorry, and eſcape; either God will not ſee, or not be angry, or not puniſh it; or remit the meaſure. If I doe well, he is iuſt to reward; if ill, he is mercifull to forgiue. Thus his praiſes wrong God no leſſe than his offence; and hurt himſelfe no leſſe than they wrong God. Any patterne is enough to encourage him: ſhew him the way where any foot hath trod, he dare follow, although he ſee no ſteps returning; what if a thouſand haue attempted, and miſcarried; if but one haue preuailed, it ſufficeth. He ſuggeſts to himſelfe falſe hopes of neuer too late; as if hee could command either Time or repentance: and dare defer the expectation of mercy, till betwixt the bridge and the water. Giue him but where to ſet his foot, and he will remoue the earth. He fore-knowes the mutations of States, the euents of warre, the temper of the ſeaſons; either his old prophecy tels it him, or his ſtarres. Yea, he is no ſtranger to the Records of Gods ſecret counſell, but he turnes them ouer, and copies them out at pleaſure. I know not whether in all his enterpriſes hee ſhew leſſe feare, or wiſdome: no man promiſes himſelfe more, no man more beleeues himſelfe. I will goe and ſell, and returne and purchaſe, and ſpend and leaue my ſonnes ſuch eſtates; all which if it ſucceed, he thanks himſelfe; if not, he blames not himſelfe. His purpoſes are meaſured, not by his ability, but his will, and his actions by his purpoſes. Laſtly, he is euer credulous in aſſent, raſh in vndertaking, peremptory in reſoluing, witleſſe in proceeding, and in his ending miſerable; which is neuer other, than either the laughter of the wiſe, or the pitie of fooles.

Of the Diſtruſtfull.

THE diſtruſtfull man hath his heart in his eyes, or in his hand; nothing is ſure to him but what he ſees, what he handles. He is either very ſimple, or very falſe; and therefore beleeues not others, becauſe hee knowes how little himſelfe is worthy of beleefe. In ſpirituall things, either God muſt leaue a pawne with him, or ſeeke ſome other Creditor. All abſent things and vnuſuall, haue no other, but a conditionall entertainment: they are ſtrange, if true. If hee ſee two neighbours whiſper in his preſence, he bids them ſpeake out, and charges them to ſay no more than they can iuſtifie. When he hath committed a meſſage to his ſeruant, he ſends a ſecond after him, to liſten how it is deliuered. He is his owne Secretary, and of his owne counſell, for what he hath, for what he purpoſeth: and when he tells ouer his bags, looks thorow the key-hole, to ſee if he haue any hidden witneſſe, and askes aloud, Who is there? when no man heares him. He borrowes mony when he needs not, for feare leſt others ſhould borrow of him. He is euer timorous, and cowardly; and askes euery mans errand at the doore, ere he opens. After his firſt ſleepe, he ſtarts vp, and askes if the furtheſt gate were barred, and out of a fearefull ſweat calls vp his ſeruant, and bolts the doore after him; and then ſtudies whether it were better to lie ſtill and beleeue, or riſe and ſee. Neither is his heart fuller of feares, than his head full of ſtrange proiects, and farre-fetcht conſtructions: What meanes the State, thinke you, in ſuch an action, and whither tends this courſe? Learne of me (if you know not:) the waies of deepe policies are ſecret, and full of vnknowne windings; that is their act, this will be their iſſue: ſo caſting beyond the Moone, he makes wiſe and iuſt proceedings ſuſpected. In all his predictions and imaginations, he euer lights vpon the worſt; not what is moſt likely will fall out, but what is moſt ill. There is nothing that he takes not with the left hand: no text which his gloſſe corrupts not. Words, oathes, parchments, ſeales, are but broken Reeds; theſe ſhall neuer deceiue him; he loues no paiments but reall. If but one in an age haue miſcarried by a rare caſualtie, he miſdoubts the ſame euent. If but a Tile falne from an high roofe, haue brained a paſſenger, or the breaking of a Coach-wheele haue indangered the burden, he ſweares he will keepe home, or take him to his horſe. He dares not come to Church, for feare of the crowd; not ſpare the Sabbaths labour, for feare of the want; nor come neere the Parliament houſe, becauſe it ſhould haue beene blowne vp. What might haue beene, affects him as much as what will be. Argue, vow, proteſt, ſweare; he heares thee, and beleeues himſelfe. He is a Scepticke, and dare hardly giue credit to his ſenſes, which he hath often arraigned of falſe intelligence. Hee ſo liues, as if hee thought all the world were theeues, and were not ſure whether himſelfe were one. He is vncharitable in his cenſures, vnquiet in his feares; bad enough alwaies, but in his owne opinion much worſe than he is.

Of the Ambitious.

Ambition is a proud couetouſneſſe, a dry thirſt of honour, the longing diſeaſe of reaſon, an aſpiring and gallant madneſſe. The ambitious climbes vp high and perillous ſtaires, and neuer cares how to come downe; the deſire of riſing hath ſwallowed vp his feare of a fall. Hauing once cleaued (like a Burre) to ſome great mans coat, he reſolues not to be ſhaken off with any ſmall indignities, and finding his hold thorowly faſt, caſts how to inſinuate yet neerer; and therefore he is buſie and ſeruile in his endeuours to pleaſe, and all his officious reſpects turne home to himſelfe. He can be at once a ſlaue to command, an Intelligencer to informe, a Paraſite to ſooth & flatter, a Champion to defend, an Executioner to reuenge any thing for an aduantage of fauour. He hath proiected a plot to riſe, and woe be to the friend that ſtands in his way. He ſtill haunteth the Court, and his vnquiet ſpirit haunteth him; which hauing fetcht him from the ſecure peace of his Country-reſt, ſets him new and impoſſible taskes; and after many diſappointments, incourages him to try the ſame ſea in ſpight of his ſhipwracks, and promiſes better ſucceſſe. A ſmall hope giues him heart againſt great difficulties, and drawes on new expenſe, new ſeruilitie; perſwading him (like fooliſh boies) to ſhoot away a ſecond ſhaft, that he may finde the firſt. He yeeldeth, and now ſecure of the iſſue, applauds himſelfe in that honour, which he ſtill affecteth, ſtill miſſeth; and for the laſt of all trialls, will rather bribe for a troubleſome preferment, than returne void of a title. But now when he findes himſelfe deſperatly croſſed, and at once ſpoiled both of aduancement and hope, both of fruition and poſſibility, all his deſire is turned into rage, his thirſt is now only of reuenge; his tongue ſounds of nothing but detraction and ſlander: Now the place he ſought for, is baſe, his riuall vnworthy, his aduerſary iniurious, officers corrupt, Court infectious; and how well is he that may be his owne man, his owne maſter; that may liue ſafely in a meane diſtance, at pleaſure, free from ſtaruing, free from burning? But if his deſignes ſpeed well; ere he be warme in that ſeat, his minde is poſſeſſed of an higher. What he hath, is but a degree to what he would haue: now he ſcorneth what he formerly aſpired to; his ſucceſſe doth not giue him ſo much contentment as prouocation; neither can he be at reſt, ſo long as he hath one, either to ouer-look, or to match, or to emulate him. When his Country-friend comes to viſit him, he carries him vp to the awfull Preſence; and now in his ſight crowding neerer to the Chaire of State, deſires to be lookt on, deſires to be ſpoken to by the greateſt, and ſtudies how to offer an occaſion, leſt he ſhould ſeeme vnknowne, vnregarded; and if any geſture of the leaſt grace fall haply vpon him, he lookes backe vpon his friend, leſt he ſhould careleſly let it paſſe, without a note: and what he wanteth in ſenſe, hee ſupplies in Hiſtory. His diſpoſition is neuer but ſhamefully vnthankfull: for vnleſſe he haue all, he hath nothing. It muſt be a large draught, whereof he will not ſay, that thoſe few drops doe not ſlake, but inflame him: ſo ſtill he thinkes himſelfe the worſe for ſmall fauours. His wit ſo contriues the likely plots of his promotion, as if he would ſteale it away without Gods knowledge, beſides his will: neither doth he euer look vp, and conſult in his fore-caſts, with the ſupreme Moderator of all things; as one that thinkes honour is ruled by Fortune, and that heauen medleth not with the diſpoſing of theſe earthly lots: and therefore it is iuſt with that wiſe God to defeat his faireſt hopes, and to bring him to a loſſe in the hotteſt of his chace; and to cauſe honour to flie away ſo much the faſter, by how much it is more eagerly purſued. Finally, he is an importunate ſuter, a corrupt client, a violent vndertaker, a ſmooth Factor, but vntruſty, a reſtleſſe maſter of his owne; a Bladder puft vp with the wind of hope, and ſelfe-loue. He is in the common body, as a Mole in the earth, euer vnquietly caſting; and in one word, is nothing but a confuſed heape of enuy, pride, couetouſneſſe.

Hall, J.

Of the Vnthrift.

HE ranges beyond his pale,and liues without compaſſe. His expence is meaſured,not by abilitie,but will. His pleaſures are immoderate,and not honeſt. A wanton eye, a lickoriſh tongue,a gameſome hand haue impoueriſht him. The vulgar ſort call him bountifull,and applaud him while he ſpends,and recompence him with wiſhes when he giues, with pitie when hee wants. Neither can it be denied that he taught true liberality, but ouerwent it. No man could haue liued more laudably, if when he was at the beſt, he had ſtayed there. While he is preſent,none of the wealthier gueſts may pay ought to the ſhot, without much vehemency,without danger of vnkindneſſe. Vſe hath made it vnpleaſant to him,not to ſpend. He is in all things more ambitious of the title of good fellowſhip, than of wiſdome. When he lookes into the wealthy cheſt of his Father, his conceit ſuggeſts that it cannot be emptied; and while he takes out ſome deale euery day, hee perceiues not any diminution; and when the heape is ſenſibly abated, yet ſtill flatters himſelfe with enough. One hand couzens the other, and the belly deceiues both: hee doth not ſo much beſtow benefits, as ſcatter them. True merit doth not carry them, but ſmoothneſſe of adulation. His ſenſes are too much his guides,and his purueyors;and appetite is his ſteward. He is an impotent ſeruant to his luſts;and knowes not to gouerne either his minde or his purſe. Improuidence is euer the companion of vnthriftineſſe: This man cannot looke beyond the preſent,and neither thinkes nor cares what ſhall be; much leſſe ſuſpects what may be: and while he lauiſhes out his ſubſtance in ſuperfluities, thinkes he onely knowes what the world is worth, and that others ouerprize it. He feeles pouerty before he ſees it, neuer complaines till he be pinched with wants; neuer ſpares till the bottome,when it is too late either to ſpend or recouer.He is euery mans friend ſaue his owne,and then wrongs himſelfe moſt,when he courteth himſelfe with moſt kindneſſe. He vies Time with the ſlothfull, and it is an hard match,whether chaſes away good houres to worſe purpoſe; the one by doing nothing, or the other by idle paſtime. Hee hath ſo dilated himſelfe with the beames of proſperitie, that he lies open to all dangers,and cannot gather vp himſelfe, on iuſt warning, to auoid a miſchiefe. Hee were good for an Almner, ill for a Steward. Finally, hee is the liuing tombe of his fore-fathers, of his poſterity; and when he hath ſwallowed both,is more empty than before he deuoured them.

Of the Enuious.

HE feeds on others euils,and hath no diſeaſe but his neighbours welfare: whatſoeuer God doe for him,he cannot be happy with company; and if he were put to chuſe, whether hee would rather haue equals in a common felicitie, or ſuperiours in miſery, hee would demurre vpon the election. His eye caſts out too much,and neuer returnes home,but to make compariſons with anothers good. He is an ill prizer of forraine commoditie; worſe of his owne; for, that hee rates too high, this vnder value. You ſhall haue him euer inquiring into the eſtates of his equals and betters; wherein he is not more deſirous to heare all, than loth to heare any thing ouer-good: and if iuſt report relate ought better than he would, he redoubles the queſtion, as being hard to beleeue what he likes not; and hopes yet, if that be auerred againe to his griefe,that there is ſomewhat concealed in the relation,which if it were knowne,would argue the commended partie miſerable, and blemiſh him with ſecret ſhame. He is readie to quarrell with God,becauſe the next field is fairer growne;and angerly calculates his coſt, and time, and tillage. Whom he dares not openly backbite, nor wound with a direct cenſure,he ſtrikes ſmoothly with an ouer-cold praiſe; and when he ſees that he muſt either maliciouſly oppugne the iuſt praiſe of another, (which were vnſafe) or approue it by aſſent, he yeeldeth; but ſhewes withall that his meanes were ſuch, both by nature and education,that he could not,without much neglect,be leſſe commendable: ſo his happineſſe ſhall be made the colour of detraction. When an wholſome law is propounded, he croſſeth it, either by open,or cloſe oppoſition; not for any incommodity or inexpedience,but becauſe it proceeded from any mouth beſides his owne. And it muſt be a cauſe rarely plauſible, that will not admit ſome probable contradiction. When his equall ſhould riſe to honour, he ſtriues againſt it vnſeene; aud rather with much coſt ſuborneth great aduerſaries; and when he ſees his reſiſtance vaine, he can giue an hollow gratulation in preſence; but in ſecret,diſparages that aduancement; either the man is vnfit for the place, or the place for the man: or if fit, yet leſſe gainfull, or more common than opinion: whereto he addes, that himſelfe might haue had the ſame dignitie vpon better termes,and refuſed it. He is wittie in deuiſing ſuggeſtions, to bring his Riuall out of loue, into ſuſpition. If he be courteous, he is ſeditiouſly popular; if bountifull, he bindes ouer his clients to a faction; if ſucceſſefull in warre,he is dangerous in peace; if wealthy, he layes vp for a day; if powerfull, nothing wants but opportunity of rebellion. His ſubmiſſion is ambitious hypocriſie; his religion, politike inſinuation; no action is ſafe from a iealous conſtruction. When he receiues a good report of him whom he emulates, he ſaith, Fame is partiall, and is wont to blanch miſchiefes; and pleaſeth himſelfe with hope to finde it worſe;and if Ill-will haue diſperſed any more ſpightful narration,he laies hold on that,againſt all witneſſes,and brocheth that rumour for trueſt,becauſe worſt: and when he ſees him perfectly miſerable,he can at once pitie him, and reioyce. What himſelfe cannot doe, others ſhall not: hee hath gained well, if he haue hindred the ſucceſſe of what hee would haue done, and could not. He conceales his beſt skill, not ſo as it may not be knowne that he knowes it, but ſo as it may not be learned; becauſe he would haue the world miſſe him. He attained to a ſoueraigne medicine, by the ſecret Legacy of a dying Empericke, whereof he will leaue no heire, leſt the praiſe ſhould be diuided. Finally, he is an enemie to Gods fauours, if they fall beſide himſelfe; the beſt nurſe of ill Fame; a man of the worſt diet; for he conſumes himſelfe; and delights in pining; a thorne-hedge couered with nettles; a peeuiſh Interpreter of good things, and no other than a leane and pale carkaſe quickned with a Fiend.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, AND HOPEFVLL LORD,

ROBERT, EARLE OF ESSEX,

my ſingular good Lord, all increaſe of Grace and true Honour.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

Whileſt I deſired to congratulate your happy returne with ſome worthy preſent; I fell vpon this: which I dare not onely offer, but commend; the royalleſt Philoſopher and wiſeſt King, giuing you thoſe precepts, which the Spirit of God gaue him. The matter is all his: nothing is mine, but the method, which I doe willingly ſubmit to cenſure. In that, he could not erre: in this, I cannot but haue erred, either in Art, or application, or ſenſe, or diſorder, or defect: yet not wilfully. I haue meant it well, and faithfully to the Church of God, and to your Honour, as one of her great hopes. If any man ſhall cauill, that I haue gone about to correct Salomons order, or to controule Ezekias ſeruants: I complaine both of his charity, and wiſdome; and appeale to more lawfull iudgement. Let him as well ſay, that euery Concordance peruerts the Text. I haue only endeuoured to be the common place-booke of that great King, and to referre his Diuine rules to their heads, for more eaſe of finding,

for better memory, for readier vſe. See how that God, whoſe wiſdome thought good to bereaue mankinde of Salomons profound Commentaries of Nature, hath reſerued theſe his Diuine Morals, to out-liue the world; as knowing, that thoſe would but feed mans curioſitie, theſe would both direct his life, and iudge it. He hath not done this without expectation of our good, and glory to himſelfe: which if we anſwer, the gaine is ours. I know how little need there is, either to intreat your Lordſhips acceptation, or to aduiſe your vſe. It is enough to haue humbly preſented them to your hands, and through them to the Church: the deſire of whoſe good is my good; yea, my recompence and glory. The ſame God, whoſe hand hath led and returned you in ſafetie, from all forraine euils, guide your wayes at home, and graciouſly increaſe you in the ground of all true honour, Goodneſſe. My prayers ſhall euer follow you:

Who vow my ſelfe your Honours

Contrary whereto; There is a generation, whoſe eies are haughtie, and their eye-lids are lift vp; There is a generation, that are pure in their owne conceit, and yet are not waſhed from their filthineſſe. Yea, All the waies of a man are cleane in his owne eyes: but the Lord pondereth the ſpirits; and not ſo onely, but Many men will boaſt of their goodneſſe: but It is not good to eat much honey, ſo to ſearch their owne glory is not glory: Let another man praiſe thee, and not thine owne mouth; a ſtranger, and not thine owne lips. This ouer-weening is commonly incident to great men. The rich man is wiſe in his owne conceit, but the poore that hath vnderſtanding, can try him: Hence it is that he affects ſingularitie; According to his deſire, hee that ſeparates himſelfe, will ſeeke, and occupie himſelfe in all wiſdome: but ſeeſt thou a man thus wiſe in his owne conceit? there is more hope of a foole than of him: yea, he is a foole in this: In the mouth of the fooliſh is the rod of pride: I thought, I will be wiſe, but it went farre from mee; it is farre off, what may it bee? and that a wicked foole; A haughty looke, and a proud heart, which is the light of the wicked, is ſinne: If therefore thou haſt beene fooliſh in lifting vp thy ſelfe, and if thou haſt thought wickedly, lay thy hand vpon thy mouth, for God hateth an haughty eye; yea, he ſo hateth it, that all that are proud in heart, are an abomination to the Lord; and though hand ioine in hand, they ſhall not be vnpuniſhed; and what puniſhment ſhall he haue? The Lord will deſtroy the houſe of the proud man; and his very pride is an argument of his ruine: Before deſtruction the heart of a man is haughtie: Pride goeth before deſtruction, and an high minde before the fall: Before it? yea, with it: when pride commeth, then commeth ſhame. Now the height of pride is ſcornfulneſſe: Hee that is proud and haughtie, ſcornfull is his name, who worketh in the pride of his wrath: and this man deſpiſeth his neighbour, and therefore is deſtitute of vnderſtanding: when the wicked commeth, then commeth contempt; and with the vile man is reproach: but of all, him that reproues him: Hee that reproueth a ſcorner, purchaſeth to himſelfe ſhame; and hee that rebuketh the wicked, getteth himſelfe a blot: therefore Iudgements are prepared for the ſcorners, and ſtripes for the backe of fooles; ſo as others are hurt by his ſinne; for a ſcornfull man bringeth a whole City into a ſnare: ſo they ſhall be likewiſe bettered by his iudgement: when the ſcorner is puniſhed, the fooliſh is wiſe.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD, AND PATRON,

EDVVARD Lord DENNY, Baron of Waltham, All Grace and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

When I would haue withdrawne my hand from diuine Salomon, the Heauenly elegance of this his beſt Song drew me vnto it, and would not ſuffer me to take off mine eyes, or pen. Who can reade it with vnderſtanding, and not be tranſported from the world, from himſelfe? and be any otherwhere ſaue in Heauen, before his time? I had rather ſpend my time in admiration, than Apologie. Surely, here is nothing that ſauours not of extaſie, and ſpirituall rauiſhment; neither was there euer ſo high and paſſionate a ſpeculation deliuered by the Spirit of God, to mankind: which by how much more diuine it is, by ſo much more difficult. It is well, if theſe myſteries can bee found out by ſearching. Two things make the Scripture hard: Prophecies, Allegories; both are met in this: but the latter ſo ſenſibly to the weakeſt eyes, that this whole Paſtorall-marriage-ſong (for ſuch it is) is no other than one Allegory ſweetly continued: where the deepeſt things of God are ſpoken in Riddles, how can

Hall, J.

can there be but obſcurity and diuers conſtruction? All iudgements will not (I know) ſubſcribe to my ſenſes; yet I haue beene fearefull and ſpiritually nice, not often diſſenting from all Interpreters; alwaies, from the vnlikelieſt. It would bee too tedious to giue my account for euery line: let the learned ſcan and iudge. What-euer others cenſures be, your Honours was fauourable; and (as to all mine) full of loue and incouragement. That, therefore, which it pleaſed you to allow from my pen, vouchſafe to receiue from the Preſſe; more common, not leſſe deuoted to you. What is there of mine that doth not ioy in your name, and boaſt it ſelfe in ſeruing you? To whoſe ſoule and people, I haue long agone addicted my ſelfe, and my labours, and ſhall euer continue

Your Lordſhips, in all humble and vnfained dutie,

SALOMONS SONG OF SONGS PARAPHRASED.

CHAP. I.

Dialogue. The Church to CHRIST.

1. Let him kiſſe me with the kiſſes of his mouth; for thy loue is better than wine.

OH that he would beſtow vpon me the comfortable teſtimonies of his loue, and that he would vouchſafe me yet a neerer coniunction with himſelfe; as in glory hereafter, ſo for the mean time in his ſenſible graces! For thy loue, O my Sauiour, and theſe fruits of it, are more ſweet vnto me, than all earthly delicates can be to the bodily taſte.

2. Becauſe of the ſauour of thy good ointments, thy name is as an ointment powred out: therefore the Virgins loue thee.

Yea, ſo wonderfully pleaſant are the ſauours of thoſe graces that are in thee, wherewith I deſire to be endued, that all whom thou haſt bleſſed with the ſenſe thereof, make as high and deare account of thy Goſpell, whereby they are wrought, as of ſome precious oyntment, or perfume: the delight whereof is ſuch, that (hereupon) the pure and holy ſoules of the faithfull place their whole affection vpon thee.

3. Draw me, we will runne after thee: the King hath brought me into his chambers, wee will reioyce, and be glad in thee: we will remember thy loue, more than wine, the righteous doe loue thee.

Pull me therefore out from the bondage of my ſinnes: deliuer me from the world, and doe thou powerfully incline my will and affections toward thee: and in ſpight of all tentations, giue me ſtrength to cleaue vnto thee; and then both I, and all thoſe faithfull children thou haſt giuen me, ſhall all at once with ſpeed and earneſtneſſe walk to thee, and with thee: yea, when once my Royall and glorious Huſband hath brought me both into theſe lower roomes of his ſpirituall treaſures on earth, and into his heauenly chambers of glory, then will we reioyce and be glad in none, but thee, which ſhalt be all in all to vs: then will we celebrate and magnifie thy loue aboue all the pleaſures we found vpon earth; for all of vs thy righteous ones, both Angels and Saints, are inflamed with the loue of thee.

4. I am blacke, O daughters of Ieruſalem, but comely: If I be as the tents of Kedar, yet I am as the curtaines of Salomon.

Neuer vpbraid me (O yee forraine congregations) that I ſeeme in outward appearance diſcoloured by my infirmities, and duskiſh with tribulations: for whatſoeuer I ſeeme to you, I am yet inwardly well-fauoured in the eyes of Him whom I ſeeke to pleaſe; and though I be to you blacke, like the tents of the Arabian ſhepheards; yet to him, and in him, I am glorious and beautifull, like the Curtaines of Salomon.

5. Regard yee me not, becauſe I am blacke: for the Sunne hath looked vpon me; the ſonnes of my mother were angry againſt me: they made me keeper of the vines; but I kept not mine owne vine.

Looke not therefore diſdainfully vpon me, becauſe I am blackiſh, and darke of hiew: for this colour is not ſo much naturall to mee, as cauſed by that continuall heat of afflictions wherewith I haue beene vſually ſcorched: neither this, ſo much vpon my owne iuſt deſert, as vpon the rage and enuie of my falſe brethren, the world: who would needs force vpon me the obſeruation of their idolatrous religions, and ſuperſtitious impieties; through whoſe wicked importunitie, and my owne weakneſſe, I haue not ſo entirely kept the ſincere truth of God committed to me, as I ought.

6. Shew me, O thou whom my ſoule loueth, where thou feedeſt, where thou lieſt at noone: for why ſhould I be as ſhee that turneth aſide to the flockes of thy companions?

Now therefore that I am ſome little ſtarted aſide from thee, O thou whom my ſoule notwithſtanding dearely loueth, ſhew me, I beſeech thee, where, and in what wholeſome and diuine paſtures thou (like a good ſhepheard) feedeſt and reſteſt thy flockes with comfortable refreſhings, in the extremitie of theſe hot perſecutions: for how can it ſtand with thy glory, that I ſhould, through thy neglect, thus ſuſpiciouſly wander vp and downe, amongſt the congregations of them that both command and practiſe the worſhip of falſe gods?

CHRIST, to the Church.

7. If thou know not, O thou the faireſt among women, get thee forth by the ſteps of the flock, and feed thy Kids aboue the tents of the ſhepheards.

IF thou know not, O thou my Church, whom I both eſteeme and haue made moſt beautifull by my merits, and thy ſanctification, ſtray not amongſt theſe falſe worſhippers, but follow the holy ſteps of thoſe bleſſed Patriarkes, Prophets, Apoſtles, which haue beene my true and ancient flocke, who haue both knowne my voice, and followed me; and feed thou my weake and tender ones with this their ſpirituall food of life, farre aboue the carnall reach of thoſe other falſe teachers.

8. I haue compared thee, O my loue, to the troupes of horſes in the chariots of Pharaoh.

Such is mine eſtimation of thee, O my Loue, that ſo farre as the choiſeſt Egyptian horſes of Pharaoh, for comely ſhape, for honourable ſeruice, for ſtrength and ſpeed, exceed all other, ſo farre thou excelleſt all that may be compared with thee.

9. Thy cheekes are comely with rowes of ſtones, and thy necke with chaines.

Thoſe parts of thee, which both are the ſeats of beauty, and moſt conſpicuous to the eie, are glorioſly adorned with the graces of my ſanctification; which are for their worth as ſo many precious borders of the goodlieſt ſtones, or chaines of pearle.

10. We will make thee borders of gold, with ſtuds of ſiluer.

And though thou be already thus ſet forth; yet I and my Father haue purpoſed a further ornament vnto thee, in the more plentifull effuſion of our Spirit vpon thee: which ſhall be to thy former deckings, in ſtead of pure gold curiouſly wrought with ſpeckes of ſiluer.

The Church.

11. While the King was at his repaſt, my ſpikenard gaue the ſmell thereof.

BEhold (O ye daughters) euen now, whiles my Lord and King ſeemes farre diſtant from me, and ſits in the Throne of heauen amongſt the companies of Angels (who attend around vpon him) yet now doe I finde him preſent with me in ſpirit: euen now the ſweet influence of his graces, like to ſome precious oyntment, ſpreads it ſelfe ouer my ſoule, and returnes a pleaſant ſauour into his owne noſthrils.

12. My welbeloued is as a bundle of myrrh vnto me, lying betweene my breſts.

And though I be thus delightfull to my Sauiour, yet nothing ſo much as he is vnto me: for loe, as ſome fragrant pomander of myrrh, laid betweene the breſts, ſends vp a moſt comfortable ſent; ſo his loue, laid cloſe vnto my heart, doth ſtill giue me continuall and vnſpeakable refreſhings.

13. My welbeloued is as a cluſter of Cypers vnto me among the vines of Engeddy.

Or if any thing can be of more excellent vertue, ſuch ſmell as the cluſters of Cypers berries, within the fruitfulſt, pleaſantſt, and richeſt vineyards and gardens of Iudæa, yeeld vnto the paſſengers; ſuch and more delectable do I finde the ſauour of his grace to me.

CHRIST.

14. My Loue, behold, thou art faire, thine eyes are like the Doues.

NEither doeſt thou on my part loſe any of thy loue, O my deare Church: for behold, in mine eyes, thus clothed as thou art with my righteouſneſſe, oh how faire and glorious thou art! how aboue all compariſon glorious and faire! Thine eyes, which are thy ſeers, (Prophets, Apoſtles, Miniſters) and thoſe inward eyes, whereby thou ſeeſt him that is inuiſible, are full of grace, chaſtitie, ſimplicitie.

The Church.

15. My welbeloued, behold, thou art faire and pleaſant: alſo our bed is greene.

NAy then (O my ſweet Sauiour and Spouſe) thou alone art that faire and pleaſant one indeed, from whoſe fulneſſe I confeſſe to haue receiued all this little meaſure of my ſpirituall beautie: and behold, from this our mutuall delight, and heauenly coniunction, there ariſeth a plentifull and flouriſhing increaſe of thy faithfull ones in all places, and through all times.

16. The beames of our houſe are Cedars, our galleries are of Firre.

And behold, the congregations of Saints, the places where we doe ſweetly conuerſe and walke together, are both firme and during (like Cedars amongſt the trees) not ſubiect, through thy protecting grace, to vtter corruption; and through thy fauourable acceptation and word (like to galleries of ſweet wood) full of pleaſure and contentment.

CHAP. II.

CHRIST.

1. I am the Roſe of the field, and the Lilly of the valleyes.

THou haſt not without iuſt cauſe magnified me, O my Church: for, as the faireſt and ſweeteſt of all flowers which the earth yeeldeth, the Roſe and Lilly of the valleyes, excell for beauty, for pleaſure, for vſe, the moſt baſe and odious weeds that grow; ſo doth my grace, to all them that haue felt the ſweetneſſe thereof, ſurpaſſe all worldly contentments.

2. Like a Lilly among the thornes, ſo is my Loue among the daughters.

Neither is this my dignitie alone: but thou, O my Spouſe (that thou maiſt be a fit match for me) art thus excellent aboue the world, that no Lilly can be more in goodly ſhew beyond the naked thorne, than thou in thy glory thou receiueſt from me, ouerlookeſt all the aſſemblies of aliens and vnregenerates.

3. Like the Apple-tree among the trees of the foreſt, ſo is my welbeloued among the ſonnes of men: vnder his ſhadow had I delight, and ſate downe; and his fruit was ſweet vnto my mouth.

AND (to returne thine owne praiſes) as ſome fruitfull and well-growne Apple-tree, in compariſon of all the barren trees of the wilde foreſt, ſo art thou (O my beloued Sauiour) to me, in compariſon of all men, and Angels; vnder thy comfortable ſhadow alone, haue I euer wont to finde ſafe ſhelter againſt all mine aſflictions, all my tentations and infirmities, againſt all the curſes of the Law, and dangers of iudgement, and to coole my ſelfe after all the ſcorching beames of thy Fathers diſpleaſure, and (beſides) to feed and ſatisfie my ſoule with the ſoueraigne fruit of thy holy Word, vnto eternall life.

4. He brought me into the wine-cellar, and loue was his banner ouer me.

He hath graciouſly led me by his Spirit, into the midſt of the myſteries of godlineſſe; and hath plentifully broached vnto mee the ſweet wines of his Scriptures and Sacraments. And looke how ſouldiers are drawne by their colours from place to place, and cleaue faſt to their enſigne: ſo his loue, which he ſpred forth in my heart, was my onely banner, whereby I was both drawne to him, directed by him, and faſtened vpon him.

5. Stay me with flagons, and comfort me with apples: for I am ſicke of loue.

And now, O yee faithfull Euangeliſts, Apoſtles, Teachers, apply vnto mee with all care and diligence, all the cordiall promiſes of the Goſpell: theſe are the full Flagons of that ſpirituall wine, which only can cheere vp my ſoule; theſe are the Apples of that Tree of life, in the middeſt of the Garden, which can feed me to immortality. Oh come and apply theſe vnto my heart: for I am euen ouercome with a longing expectation and deſire of my delayed glory.

6. His left hand be vnder my head: and let his right hand embrace me.

And whiles I am thus ſpiritually languiſhing in this agonie of deſire, let my Sauiour imploy both his hands to releeue mine infirmitie: let him comfort my head and my heart, my iudgement and affections, (which both complaine of weakneſſe) with the liuely heat of his gracious embracements: and ſo let vs ſweetly reſt together.

7. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, by the Roes and by the Hindes of the field, that yee ſtirre not vp, nor waken my Loue, vntill he pleaſe.

In the meane time, I charge you (O all yee that profeſſe any friendſhip or affinitie with me) I charge you, by whatſoeuer is comely, deare and pleaſant vnto you, as you will auoid my vttermoſt cenſures, take heed how you vex and diſquiet my mercifull Sauiour, and grieue his Spirit, and wrong his name, with your vaine and lewd conuerſation; and doe not dare, by the leaſt prouocation of your ſinne, to interrupt his peace.

8. It is the voice of my welbeloued: behold, he commeth leaping by the mountaines, and skipping by the hills.

Loe, I haue no ſooner called, but he heares and anſwers me with his louing voice: neither doth he only ſpeake to me afarre, but he comes to me with much willingneſſe and celeritie; ſo willingly, that no humane reſiſtance can hinder him, neither the hillockes of my leſſer infirmities, nor the mountaines of my groſſer ſinnes (once repented of) can ſtay his mercifull paſe towards me.

9. My welbeloued is like a Roe, or a young Hart: loe, he ſtandeth behinde our wall, looking forth of the windowes, ſhewing himſelfe thorow the grates.

So ſwiftly, that no Roe or Hinde can fully reſemble him in this his ſpeed and nimbleneſſe: and loe, euen now, before I can ſpeake it, is he come neere vnto me, cloſe to the doore and wall of my heart. And though this wall of my fleſh hinder my full fruition of him, yet loe, I ſee him by the eye of faith, looking vpon me; I ſee him as in a glaſſe; I ſee him ſhining gloriouſly, thorow the gates and windowes of his Word and Sacraments, vpon my ſoule.

10. My welbeloued ſpake, and ſaid vnto me, Ariſe, my loue, my faire one, and come thy way.

And now, me thinkes, I heare him ſpeake to mee in a gracious inuitation, and ſay, Ariſe, (O my Church) riſe vp, whether from thy ſecuritie, or feare: hide not thy head any longer, O my beautifull Spouſe, for danger of thine enemies, neither ſuffer thy ſelfe to be preſſed with the dulneſſe of thy nature, or the careleſſe ſleepe of thy ſinnes; but come forth into the comfortable light of my preſence, and ſhew thy ſelfe cheerefull in mee.

11. For behold, winter is paſt, the raine is changed and gone away.

For behold, all the cloudy winter of thy afflictions is paſſed, all the tempeſts of tentations are blowne ouer; the heauen is cleare, and now there is nothing that may not giue thee cauſe of delight.

12. The flowers appeare in the earth: the time of the ſinging of birds is come, and the voice of the Turtle is heard in our land.

Euery thing now reſembles the face of a ſpirituall Spring; all the ſweet flowers and bloſſomes of holy profeſſion put forth, and ſhew themſelues in their opportunities: now is the time of that heauenly melodie, which the cheerefull Saints and Angells make in mine eares, while they ſing ſongs of deliuerance, and praiſe mee with their Alleluiahs, and ſay, Glory to God on high, in earth peace, good will towards men.

13. The Fig-tree hath brought forth her young Figs, and the Vines with their ſmall Grapes haue caſt a ſauour: ariſe, my loue, my faire one, and come away.

What ſpeake I of bloſſomes? behold, thoſe fruitfull Vines, and Fig-trees of my faithfull ones, whom my husbandry hath carefully tended and dreſſed, yeeld forth both pleaſant (though tender) fruits of obedience, and the wholſome and comfortable ſauours of better deſires: wherefore now, O my deare Church, ſhake off all that dull ſecuritie, wherewith thou haſt beene held, and come forth and enioy me.

14. My Doue, thou art in the holes of the rocke, in the ſecret places of the cliſts: ſhew mee thy ſight, let me heare thy voice: for thy voice is ſweet, and thy ſight comely.

O my beautifull, pure, and chaſte Spouſe, which like vnto ſome ſolitarie Doue, haſt long hid thine head in the ſecret and inacceſſible cliſts of the rockes, out of the reach and knowledge of thy perſecutors; how-euer thou art concealed from others, ſhew thy ſelfe in thy workes and righteouſneſſe, vnto mee: and let mee bee euer plied with thy words of imploration, and thankſgiuing: for thy voice (though it be in mourning) and thy face (though it be ſad and blubbered) are exceedingly pleaſing vnto me.

15. Take vs the Foxes, the little Foxes which deſtroy the Vines: for our Vines haue ſmall grapes.

And in the meane time (O all yee that wiſh well to my name and Church) doe your vtmoſt endeuour to deliuer her from her ſecret enemies (not ſparing the leaſt) who either by hereticall doctrine, or prophane conuerſation, hinder the courſe of the Goſpell, and peruert the faith of many, eſpecially of thoſe that haue newly giuen vp their names to me, and are but newly entred into the profeſſion of godlineſſe.

16. My Well-beloued is mine, and I am his: he feedeth among the Lilies.

My beloued Sauiour is mine, through my faith; and I am his through his loue: and we both are one, by vertue of that bleſſed vnion on both parts; whereby wee mutually enioy each other with all ſufficient contentment. And how worthily is my loue placed vpon him, who leadeth me forth into pleaſant paſtures, and at whoſe right hand there is the fulneſſe of ioy for euermore!

17. Vntill the day breake, and the ſhadowes flee away, returne, my Well-beloued, and be like a Roe or a young Hart vpon the mountaines of Bether.

Come therefore (O my Sauiour) and vntill the day of thy glorious appearance ſhall ſhine forth to the world, wherein our ſpirituall mariage ſhall be conſummate, and vntill all theſe ſhadowes of ignorance, of infidelity, of troubles of conſcience, and of outward tribulations be vtterly diſperſed, and chaſed away, come and turne thee to mee againe, thou which to the carnall eyes of the world ſeemeſt abſent, come quickly, and delay not; but for the ſpeed of thy returne, be like vnto ſome ſwift Roe, or Hinde, vpon thoſe ſmooth hills of Gilead, which Iordan ſeuers from the other part of Iury.

CHAP. III.

1. In my bed by night I ſought him whom my ſoule loued: I ſought him, but I found him not.

MY ſecuritie told me that my Sauiour was neere vnto my ſoule, yea with it, and in it: but when by ſerious and ſilent meditation I ſearched my owne heart, I found that (for ought my owne ſenſe could diſcerne) he was farre off from me.

2. I will riſe therefore now, and goe about in the Citie by the ſtreets, and by the open places, and will ſeeke him that my ſoule loueth: I ſought him, but I found him not.

Then thought I with my ſelfe, Shall I lie ſtill contented with this want? No, I will ſtirre vp my ſelfe; and the helpe I cannot finde in my ſelfe, I will ſeeke in others: Of all that haue beene experienced in all kinde of difficulties, of all deepe Philoſophers, of the wiſeſt and honeſteſt worldlings, I will diligently enquire for my Sauiour: amongſt them I ſought him, yet could receiue no anſwer to my ſatisfaction.

3. The watchmen that went about the Citie, found me: to whom I ſaid, Haue you ſeene him whom my ſoule loueth?

Miſſing him there, I ran to thoſe wiſe and carefull Teachers, whom God hath ſet as ſo many watch-men vpon the walls of his Ieruſalem, who ſooner found me than I could aske after them; to whom I ſaid (as thinking no man could be ignorant of my Loue) Can you giue me no direction where I might finde him whom my ſoule loueth?

4. When I had paſt a little from them, then I found him whom my ſoule loueth: I tooke hold on him, and left him not, till I had brought him vnto my mothers houſe, into the chamber of her that conceiued me.

Of whom when I had almoſt left hoping for comfort, that gracious Sauiour who would not ſuffer me tempted aboue my meaſure, preſented himſelfe to my ſoule: Loe then, by a new act of faith, I laid faſt hold vpon him, and will not let him any more part from my ioyfull embracements, vntill both I haue brought him home fully into the ſeat of my conſcience, and haue wonne him to a perpetuall cohabitation with me, and a full accompliſhment of my loue, in that Ieruſalem which is aboue, which is the mother of vs all.

CHRIST.

5. I charge yee O daughters of Ieruſalem, by the Roes, and by the Hindes of the field, that yee ſtirre not vp nor waken my Loue vntill ſhe pleaſe.

NOw that my diſtreſſed Church hath beene all the night long of my ſeeming abſence, toiled in ſeeking me, I charge you, (O all that profeſſe any friendſhip with me) I charge you by whatſoeuer is comely, deare, and pleaſant vnto you, that (as you will anſwer it) you trouble not her peace with any vniuſt or vnſeaſonable ſuggeſtions, with vncharitable contentions, with any Nouelties of doctrine, but ſuffer her to reſt ſweetly in that diuine truth, which ſhee hath receiued, and this true apprehenſion of me wherein ſhe reioyceth.

6. Who is ſhee that commeth vp out of the wilderneſſe, like pillars of ſmoake perfumed with Myrrh and Incenſe, and with all the chiefe of ſpices.

Oh who is this? how admirable? how louely? who but my Church, that aſcendeth thus glorioully out of the wilderneſſe of the world, wherein ſhee hath thus long wandered; into the bleſſed manſions of my Fathers houſe, all perfumed with the graces of perfect ſanctification, mounting right vpward into her glory, like ſome ſtraight pillar of ſmoake, that ariſeth from the moſt rich and pleaſant compoſition of odours that can be deuiſed.

The Church.

7. Behold his bed better than Salomons: threeſcore ſtrong men are round about it, of the valiant men of Iſrael.

I Am aſcended; and loe how glorious is this place where I ſhall eternally enioy the preſence and loue of my Sauiour! how farre doth it exceed the earthly magnificence of Salomon? about his bed doe attend a Guard of threeſcore choiſeſt men of Iſrael.

8. They all handle the ſword, and are expert in warre: euery one hath his ſword vpon his thigh, for the feare by night.

All ſtout Warriers, able and expert to handle the ſword; which for more readineſſe each of them weares hanging vpon his thigh, ſo as it may be haſtily drawne vpon any ſudden danger: but about this heauenly pauilion of my Sauiour, attend millions of Angels, ſpirituall Souldiers, mightie in power, readie to bee commanded ſeruice by him.

9. King Salomon made himſelfe a bed of the trees of Lebanon.

The Bride-bed that Salomon made (ſo much admired of the world) was but of the Cedars of Lebanon.

10. He made the pillars thereof of ſiluer, and the ſted thereof of gold, the hangings thereof of purple, whoſe midſt was in-laid with the loue of the daughters of Ieruſalem.

The Pillars but of ſiluer, and the Bed-ſted of gold; the Teſter or Canopie, but of purple; the couerlet wrought with the curious and painfull needle-worke of the maids of Ieruſalem: but this celeſtiall reſting place of my God is not made with hands, nor of any corruptible metall, but is full of incomprehenſible light, ſhining euermore with the glorious preſence of God.

11. Come forth, yee daughters of Sion, and behold the King Salomon with the crowne wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his mariage, and in the day of the gladneſſe of his heart.

And as the outward ſtate, ſo the maieſty of his perſon is aboue all compariſon. Come forth forth (O yee daughters of Sion) lay aſide all priuate and earthly affections, looke vpon King Salomon as hee ſits ſolemnly crowned in the day of his greateſt royaltie and triumph, and compare his higheſt pompe, with the diuine magnificence of my Sauiour, in that day when his bleſſed mariage ſhall be fully perfected aboue, to the eternall reioycing of himſelfe and his Church; and ſee whether there be any portion betwixt them.

Hall, J.

CHAP. IV.

CHRIST.

1. Behold thou art faire, my Loue, behold thou art faire, thine eyes are like the Doues within thy lockes: thine haire is like a flocke of Goats which looke downe from the mountaines of Gilead.

OH how faire thou art and comely, my deare Spouſe! how inwardly faire with the gifts of my Spirit! how faire outwardly in thy comely adminiſtration and gouernment! Thy ſpirituall eyes of vnderſtanding and iudgement, are full of puritie, chaſtitie, ſimplicitie; not wantonly caſt forth, but modeſtly ſhining amidſt thy locks: all thy gracious profeſſion and all thy appendances, and ornaments of expedient ceremonies, are ſo comely to behold, as is to ſee a flocke of well-fed Goats grazing vpon the fruitfull hills of Gilead.

2. Thy teeth like a flocke of ſheepe in good order, which goe vp from the waſhing: which euery one bring out twins, and none is barren among them.

Thoſe that chew and prepare the heauenly food for thy ſoule, are both of gracious ſimplicitie, and of ſweet accordance one with another; hauing all one heart and one tongue: and both themſelues are ſanctified and purged from their vncleanneſſe, and are fruitfull in their holy labours vnto others; ſo that their doctrine is neuer in vaine, but is ſtill anſwered with plentifull increaſe of ſoules added to the Church.

3. Thy lips are like a threed of ſcarlet, and thy talke is comely: thy temples are within thy lockes as a peece of a Pomegranate.

Thy ſpeech (eſpecially in the mouth of thy Teachers) is both gracious in it ſelfe, and ſuch as adminiſters grace to the hearers; full of zeale and feruent charitie, full of grauitie and diſcretion: and that part of thy countenance, which thou wilt haue ſeene (though dimly and ſparingly) is full of holy modeſty and baſhfulneſſe; ſo bluſhing, that it ſeemeth like the colour of a broken peece of Pomegranate.

4. Thy necke is as the tower of Dauid built for defence: a thouſand ſhields hang therein, and all the targets of the ſtrong men.

Thoſe who by their holy authoritie ſuſtaine thy gouernment (which are as ſome ſtraight and ſtrong necke to beare vp the head) are like vnto Dauids high Tower of defence, furniſhed with a rich armorie; which affords infinite wayes of ſafe protection, and infinite monuments of victorie.

5. Thy two breſts are as two young Kids that are twins, feeding among the Lillies.

Thy two Teſtaments (which are thy two full and faire breſts, whereby thou nurſeſt all thy faithfull children) are as two twins of Kids: twins, for their excellent and perfect agreement one with another, in all reſemblances: of Kids, that are daintily fed among the ſweet flowers, for the pleaſant nouriſhment which they yeeld to all that ſucke thereof.

6. Vntill the day breake, and the ſhadowes fly away, I will goe into the mountaines of Myrrh, and to the Mountaines of Incenſe.

Vntill the day of my gracious appearance ſhall ſhine forth, and vntill all theſe ſhadowes of ignorance, infidelitie, afflictions, be vtterly and ſuddenly diſperſed, O my Spouſe, I will retire my ſelfe (in regard of my bodily preſence) into my delightfull and glorious reſt of heauen.

7. Thou art all faire, my Loue, and there is no ſpot in thee.

Thou art exceeding beautifull, O my Church, in all the parts of thee: for all thy ſinnes are done away, and thine iniquitie is couered, and loe, I preſent thee to my Father without ſpot, or wrinkle, or any ſuch deformitie.

8. Come with me from Lebanon, my Spouſe, euen with me from Lebanon, and looke from the top of Amanah, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the dens of the Lions, and from the mountaines of the Leopards.

And now (O thou which I profeſſe to haue maried to my ſelfe in truth and righteouſneſſe) thou ſhalt be gathered to me from all parts of the world; not only from the confines of Iudea, where I planted and found thee, but from the remoteſt and moſt ſauage places of the Nations; out of the company of Infidels, of cruell and bloudy perſecutors, who like Lions and Leopards haue tyrannized ouer thee, and mercileſly torne thee in peeces.

9. My ſiſter, my Spouſe, thou haſt wounded my heart with one of thine eyes: and with a chaine of thy necke.

Thou haſt vtterly rauiſht me from my ſelfe (O my ſiſter and Spouſe; for ſo thou art, both ioyned to me in that ſpirituall vnion, and coheire with me of the ſame inheritance and glory) thou haſt quite rauiſht my heart with thy loue: euen one caſt of one of thine eyes of faith, and one of the ornaments of thy ſanctification wherewith thou art decked by my Spirit, haue thus ſtricken me with loue: how much more, when I ſhall haue a full ſight of thee, and all thy graces, ſhall I be affected towards thee!

10. My ſiſter, my Spouſe, how faire is thy loue! how much better is thy loue than wine, and the ſauour of thine ointments than all ſpices?

O how excellent, how precious, how delectable are thoſe loues of thine, O my ſiſter, my Spouſe! how farre ſurpaſſing all earthly delicates! and the ſauour of thoſe diuine vertues, wherewith thou art endued, more pleaſing to my ſent, than all the perfumes in the world!

11. Thy lips, my Spouſe, drop as Hony-combes: Hony and milke are vnder thy tongue, and the ſauour of thy garments is as the ſauour of Lebanon.

The gracious ſpeeches that proceed from thee, are as ſo many drops of the Hony-combe that fall from thy lips: and whether thou exhort, or confeſſe, or pray, or comfort, thy words are both ſweet and nouriſhing; and the ſauour of thy good works, and outward conuerſation, is to me as the ſmel of the wood of Lebanon to the ſenſe of man.

12. My ſiſter, my Spouſe, is as a garden incloſed, as a Spring ſhut vp, and a Fountaine ſealed vp.

My ſiſter, my Spouſe, is as a Garden or Orchard full of all varietie of the heauenly Trees and flowers of grace; not lying careleſly open, either to the loue of ſtrangers, or to the rage of enemies, which like the wilde Boare out of the wood, might root vp and deſtroy her choice plants: but ſafely hedged and walled about, by my protection, and reſerued for my delight alone; ſhe is a Spring & Well of wholſome waters, from whom flow forth the pure ſtreames of my Word; but, both incloſed and ſealed vp; partly, that ſhee may the better (by this cloſeneſſe) preſerue her owne naturall taſte and vigour, from the corruptions of the world; and partly, that ſhe may not be defiled and mudded by the prophane feet of the wicked.

13. Thy plants are as an Orchard of Pomegranats with ſweet fruits: as Cypers, Spikenard, euen Spikenard and Saffron, Calamus and Cinamon, with all the trees of Incenſe, Myrrh and Aloes, with all the chiefe ſpices.

Thou art an Orchard, yea a Paradiſe, whoſe plants (which are thy faithfull children that grow vp in thee) are as Pomegranate Trees; the Apples whereof are eſteemed, for the largeneſſe, colour and taſte, aboue all other: or (if I would feed my other ſenſes) the plentifull fruits of thy holy obedience (which thou yeeldeſt vnto me) are for their ſmell, as ſome compoſition of Cypreſſe, Spikenard, Saffron, ſweet Cane, Cinamon, Incenſe, Myrrh, Aloes, and whatſoeuer elſe may be deuiſed, vnto the moſt perfect ſent.

14. O fountaine of the gardens, O well of liuing waters, and the ſprings of Lebanon.

Thou art ſo a Spring in my Garden, that the ſtreames which are deriued from thee, water all the gardens of my particular congregations, all the world ouer: thou art that Fountaine, from whoſe pure head iſſue all thoſe liuing waters, which who ſo drinketh, ſhall neuer thirſt againe; euen ſuch cleare currents, as flow from the hill of Libanus, which like vnto another Iordan, water all the Iſrael of God.

The Church.

15. Ariſe, O North, and come, O South, and blow on my garden, that the ſpices thereof may flow out: let my Well-beloued come to his garden, and eat his pleaſant fruit.

IF I be a garden, as thou ſayeſt (O my Sauiour) then ariſe, O all yee ſoueraigne winds of the Spirit of God, and breath vpon this garden of my ſoule, that the ſweet odours of theſe my plants may both be increaſed, and may alſo be diſperſed afarre, and carried into the noſtrills of my Well-beloued: and ſo let him come into his owne garden (which his owne hand hath digged, planted, watred) and accept of the fruit of that ſeruice and praiſe, which he ſhall inable me to bring forth to his Name.

CHAP. V.

CHRIST.

1. I am come into my garden, my ſiſter, my Spouſe: I gathered my Myrrh with my ſpice; I ate my Hony with my Hony-combe, I dranke my wine with my milke: eat, O my friends: drinke, and make you merry, O Well-beloued.

BEhold, according to thy deſire, I am come into my garden, O my ſiſter, my Spouſe; I haue receiued thoſe fruits of thine obedience which thou offeredſt vnto me, with much ioy and pleaſure. I haue accepted not only of thy good works, but thy endeuours and purpoſes of holineſſe, both which are as pleaſant to me, as the Hony and the Hony-combe. I haue allowed of the cheerefulneſſe of thy ſeruice, and the wholeſomeneſſe of thy doctrine. And ye, O my friends, whether bleſſed Angels, or faithfull men, partake with me in this ioy ariſing from the faithfulneſſe of my Church: cheere vp and fill your ſelues, O my beloued, with the ſame Spirituall dainties wherewith I am refreſhed.

The Church.

2. I ſleepe, but my heart waketh: it is the voice of my Well-beloued that knocketh, ſaying,

Open vnto me, my ſiſter, my Loue, my Doue, my vndefiled: for mine head is full of dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.

WHen the world had caſt me into a ſecure ſleep, or ſlumber rather (for my heart was not vtterly bereaued of a true faith in my Sauiour) euen in this darkneſſe of my minde, it pleaſed my gracious Redeemer not to neglect me; he came to me, and knocked oft, and called importunately at the doore of my heart, by his word and chaſtiſements, and ſaid, Open the doore of thy ſoule, O my ſiſter, my deare, chaſte, comely, vnſpotted Church: let me come in, and lodge and dwell with thee, in my graces; ſhut out the world, and receiue me with a more liuely act, and renouation of thy faith. For loe, I haue long waited patiently for this effect of thy loue, and haue endured all the iniuries both of the night, and weather of thy prouocations, that I might at laſt enioy thee.

3. I haue put off my coat: how ſhall I put it on? I haue waſhed my feet: how ſhall I defile them?

I anſwered him againe, pleading excuſes for my delay; Alas, Lord, I haue now, ſince I left my forward profeſſion of thee, auoided a great number of cares and ſorrowes: muſt I take them vp againe to follow thee? I haue liued cleane from the ſoile of theſe euils: and ſhall I now thruſt my ſelfe into danger of them?

4. My Well-beloued put his hand from the hole of the doore; and my bowels yearned toward him.

When my Sauiour heard this vnkind anſwer of delay, hee let his hand fall from the key-hole, which he had thus before without ſucceſſe laboured about; and withdrew himſelfe from ſoliciting me any more: whereupon my heart and bowels yearned within me for him, and for the remorſe of my ſo long foreſlowing his admittance vnto me.

5. I roſe vp to open to my well-beloued, and my hands did drop downe Myrrh, and my fingers pure Myrrh vpon the handles of the Barres.

And now I rouzed vp my drouſie heart (what I could) that I might in ſome cheerefull manner deſire to receiue ſo gracious a Sauiour: which when I but endeuoured, I found that he had left behinde him ſuch a plentifull bleſſing (as the monument of his late preſence) vpon the firſt motions of my heart, as that with the very touch of them I was both exceedingly refreſhed, and moued to further indignation at my ſelfe for delaying him.

6. I opened to my Well-beloued: but my Well-beloued was gone and paſt; mine heart was gone when he did ſpeake: I ſought him, but I could not finde him; I called him, but he anſwered me not.

I opened to my beloued Sauiour: but my Sauiour had now (in my feeling) withdrawne himſelfe, and hid his countenance from me, holding me ſhort of thoſe gracious offers and meanes which I had refuſed; and now I was almoſt paſt my ſelfe with deſpaire, to remember that ſweet inuitation of his, which I neglected: I ſought him therefore in my thoughts, in the outward vſe of his ordinances, and of my earneſt prayers; but he would not as yet be found of me, or let me find that I was heard of him.

7. The watchmen that went about the City found me, they ſmote me, and wounded me: the watch-men of the walls tooke away my vaile from me.

Thoſe which ſhould haue regarded mee, and by their vigilancy haue ſecured mee from danger, proued mine aduerſaries: in ſtead of comforting me, they fell vpon me, and wounded me with their falſe doctrines, drawing me on into further errors, ſpoiling me of that purity and ſincerity of profeſſion, wherewith, as with ſome rich and modeſt vaile, I was formerly adorned, and couered.

8. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, if you finde my Well-beloued, that you tell him I am ſicke of loue.

I aduiſe you ſolemnly, O all ye that wiſh well to me (for I care not who knowes the vehemency of my paſſion) if you ſhall finde my Sauiours preſence in your ſelues before me, pray for the recouery of his loue to me; and bemoaning my eſtate to him, tell him how I languiſh with the impatient deſire of his loue, and preſence to bee reſtored vnto me.

9. O the faireſt among women, what is thy Well-beloued, more than another Well-beloued? what is thy Well-beloued more than another louer, that thou doſt ſo charge vs?

O thou which art the moſt happy, moſt gracious, and moſt glorious of all creatures, the choſen of the liuing God; what is thy Well-beloued whom thou ſeekeſt, aboue all other the ſonnes of men? what ſuch eminency is there in him aboue all Saints and Angels, that thou art both ſo farre gone in affection to him? and doſt ſo vehemently adiure vs to ſpeake vnto him for thee?

10. My Well-beloued is white and ruddy, the Standard-bearer of ten thouſand.

My Well-beloued (if you know not) is of perfect beautie; in whoſe face is an exact mixture of the colours of the pureſt and healthfulleſt complexion of holineſſe: for he hath not receiued the ſpirit by meaſure; and in him the Godhead dwels bodily; he is infinitely fairer than all the ſonnes of men; and for goodlineſſe of perſon may beare the Standard of comelineſſe and grace amongſt ten thouſand.

11. His head is as fine Gold, his locks curled, and blacke as a Rauen.

The Deitie which dwelleth in him, is moſt pure and glorious: and that fulneſſe of grace which is communicated to his humane nature, is wondrouſly beautifull, and ſo ſets it forth, as the blacke curled locks doe a freſh and well-ſauoured countenance.

12. His eyes are like Doues vpon the riuers of waters, which are waſht with Milke, and remaine in their fulneſſe.

His iudgement of all things, and his reſpect to his Church (which are as his eies) are full of loue, and full of pietie, ſhining like vnto Doues waſhed in water, yea, in Milke, ſo as there is no ſpot, or blemiſh to be found in them: and they are withall ſo fully placed, as is both moſt comely and moſt expedient for the perfect ſight of the eſtate, and neceſſities of his ſeruants.

13 His cheekes are as a bed of ſpices, and as ſweet Flowers, and his lips like Lillies dropping downe pure Myrrh.

The maniſeſtation of himſelfe to vs in his Word, is ſweet to our ſpirituall feeling, as an heap of ſpice, or thoſe flowers that are vſed to make the beſt perfuming ointments, are to the other ſenſes: his heauenly inſtructions and promiſes of his Goſpell are vnſpeakably comfortable, and plenteous, in the grace that is wrought by them.

14. His hands as Rings of Gold ſet with the Chryſolite; his belly like white Iuory couered with Saphyres.

His actions, and his inſtruments (which are his hands) are ſet forth with much port and maieſtie, as ſome precious ſtone beautifies the Ring wherein it is ſet: the ſecret counſels of his breſt, and the myſteries of his will, are moſt pure and holy, and full of excellent glory.

15. His legs are as pillars of Marble, ſet vpon ſockets of fine gold: his countenance, as Lebanon, excellent as the Cedars.

All his proceedings are firme and ſtable; and withall, as Pillars of Marble ſet in ſockets of tried gold; ſo as they are neither ſubiect to wauering, nor to any danger of infirmity and corruption: the ſhew and cariage of his whole perſon, whereby hee makes himſelfe knowne to his choſen, is exceeding goodly and vpright, like to the ſtraight and lofty Cedars of Lebanon.

16. His mouth is as ſweet things, and he is wholly delectable: this is my Wel-beloued, and this is my Louer, O daughters of Ieruſalem.

His mouth, out of which proceedeth innumerable bleſſings and comfortable promiſes, is to my ſoule euen ſweetneſſe it ſelfe; yea (what ſpeake I of any one part?) as you haue heard in theſe particulars; he is all ſweets: there is nothing but comfort in him; and there is no comfort but in him; and this (if he would know) is my Well-beloued; of ſo incomparble glory and worthineſſe, that ye may eaſily diſcerne him from all others.

Forraine Congregations.

17. O the faireſt among women, whither is thy Well-beloued gone? whither is thy Well-beloued turned aſide, that we might ſeeke him with thee?

Since thy Well-beloued is ſo glorious, and amiable, (O thou which art for thy beautie worthy to be the Spouſe of ſuch an huſband) tell vs (for thou onely knoweſt it; and to ſeeke Chriſt without the Church, we know is vaine) tell vs where this Sauiour of thine is to be ſought; that we (rauiſhed alſo with the report of his beautie) may ioyne with thee, in the ſame holy ſtudy of ſeeking after him.

CHAP. VI.

1. My Well-beloued is gone downe into his Garden to the beds of ſpices, to feed in the Gardens, and to gather Lillies.

My Wel-beloued Sauiour (if you would know this alſo) is to be ſought and found in the particular aſſemblies of his people, which are his Garden of Pleaſure, wherein are varieties of all the beds of renued ſoules; which both he hath planted, and dreſſed by his continuall care, and wherein he walketh for his delight; feeding and ſolacing himſelfe with thoſe fruits of righteouſneſſe and new obedience, which they are able to bring forth vnto him.

2. I am my Well-beloueds, and my Well-beloued is mine, who feedeth among the Lillies.

And now loe, whatſoeuer hath happened croſſe to me, in my ſenſible fruition of him; in ſpight of all tentations, my beloued Sauiour is mine through faith; and I am his through his loue; and both of vs are by an inſeparable vnion knit together; whoſe coniunction and loue is moſt ſweet and happy: for all that are his he feedeth continually with heauenly repaſt.

CHRIST.

3. Thou art beautifull, my loue, as Tirzah, comely as Ieruſalem, terrible as an Armie with Banners.

Notwithſtanding this thy late blemiſh of neglecting me, O my Church: yet ſtill in mine eies, through my grace, vpon this thy repentance, thou art beautifull, like vnto that neat and elegant Citie Tirzah, and that orderly building of Ieruſalem,

Hall, J.

Ieruſalem, the glory of the world: and with this thy louelineſſe, thou art awfull vnto thine aduerſaries, through the power of thy cenſures, and the maieſtie of him that dwelleth in thee.

4. Turne away thine eyes from mee, for they ouercome mee: thine haire is like a flocke of Goats which looke downe from Gilead.

Yea, ſuch beautie is in thee, that I am ouercome with the vehemencie of my affection to thee: turne away thine eyes a while from beholding me; for the ſtrength of that faith, whereby they are fixed vpon me, rauiſheth me from my ſelfe with ioy. I do therefore againe renew thy former praiſe; that thy gracious profeſſion, and all thy appendances and ornaments of expedient ceremonies are ſo comely to behold, as it is to ſee a flocke of well-fed Goats grazing vpon the fruitfull hils of Gilead.

5. Thy teeth are like a flocke of ſheepe which goe vp from the waſhing, which euery one bring out twins and none is barren among them.

Thy Teachers, that chew and prepare the heauenly food of thy ſoule, are of ſweet accordance one with another, hauing all one heart, and one tongue; and both themſelues are ſanctified and purged from their vncleanneſſe, and are fruitfull in their holy labours vnto others: ſo that their doctrine is neuer in vaine, but is ſtill anſwered with plentifull increaſe of ſoules to the Church.

6. Thy Temples are within thy lockes as a peece of a Pomegranate.

That part of thy countenance which thou wilt haue ſeene; (though dimly and ſparingly) is full of holy modeſtie and baſhfulneſſe: ſo bluſhing that it ſeemeth like the colour of a broken peece of Pomegranate.

7. There are threeſcore Queenes and foureſcore Concubines, and of the Damſels, without number.

Let there be neuer ſo great a number of people and nations, of Churches and aſſemblies, which challenge my Name and Loue, and perhaps by their outward proſperity, may ſeeme to plead much intereſt in me, and much worth in themſelues.

8. But my Loue is alone, and my vndefiled, ſhe is the only daughter of her mother, and ſhee is deare to her that bare her: The Daughters haue ſeene her and counted her bleſſed, euen the Queenes and Concubines, and they haue praiſed her.

Yet thou only art alone my true and chaſte Spouſe, pure and vndefiled in the truth of thy doctrine, and the imputation of my holineſſe: thou art ſhe whom that Ieruſalem which is aboue, (the mother of vs all) acknowledgeth for her only true, and deare daughter. And this is not my commendation alone: but all thoſe forraine aſſemblies, which might ſeeme to be Riuals with thee of this praiſe, doe applaud and bleſſe thee in this thine eſtate, and ſay; Bleſſed is this people, whoſe God is the Lord.

9. Who is ſhee that looketh forth as the morning, faire as the Moone, pure as the Sunne, terrible as an armie with banners.

And admiring thy goodlineſſe, ſhall ſay; Who is this that lookes out ſo freſhly as the morning new riſen; which from theſe weak beginnings is growne to ſuch high perfection, that now ſhe is as bright, and glorious, as the Sunne in his full ſtrength, and the Moone in a cleare skie; and withall is ſo dreadfull through the maieſtie of her countenance, and power of her cenſures, as ſome terrible armie, with enſignes diſplayed, is to a weake aduerſary.

10. I went downe to the dreſſed Orchard, to ſee the fruits of the valley, to ſee if the Vine budded, and if the Pomegranates flouriſhed.

Thou cōplainedſt of my abſence, (O my Church:) there was no cauſe; I meant not to forſake thee; I did but only walke downe into the well dreſſed Orchard of thine aſſemblies, to recreate and ioy my ſelſe with the view of their forwardneſſe, to ſee the happy progreſſe of the humble in ſpirit, and the gracious beginnings of thoſe tender ſoules, which are newly conuerted vnto me.

11. I knew nothing, my ſoule ſet me as the chariots of my noble people.

So earneſtly did I long to reuiſit thee, and to reſtore comfort vnto thee, that I haſted I knew not which way: and with inſenſible ſpeed I am come backe, as it were vpon the ſwifteſt chariots, or the wings of the wind.

12. Returne, returne, O Shulamite: returne, returne, that I may behold thee: what ſhall you ſee in the Shulamite, but as the company of an armie?

Now therefore returne (O my Spouſe, the true daughter of Ieruſalem) returne to me, returne to thy ſelfe, and to thy former feeling of my grace: returne, that both my ſelfe, and all the company of Angels, may ſee and reioyce in thee: and what ſhall yee ſee (O all yee hoſts of heauen) what ſhall yee ſee in my Church? Euen ſuch an awfull grace and maieſtie, as is in a well-marſhalled armie, readie to meet with the enemie.

CHAP. VII.

1. How beautifull are thy goings with ſhooes, O Princes daughter? the compaſſe of thy hips like iewels: the worke of the hand of a cunning workman.

How beautifull are thy feet, O daughter of the Higheſt; being ſhod with the preparation of the Goſpell of peace, and readily addreſſed to runne the way of the commandements of thy God! thou art compaſſed about thy loynes with the girdle of verity; which is both precious for the matter of it, and cunningly framed by the skill of the Spirit of truth.

2. Thy nauell is as a round cup, that wanteth not liquor: thy belly is as an heape of wheat, compaſſed about with Lillies.

The nauell, whereby all thy ſpirituall conceptions receiue their nouriſhment, is full of all fruitfull ſupply, and neuer wants meanes of ſuſtenance, to feed them in thy wombe: which alſo is ſo plenteous in thy bleſſed increaſe, that it is as an heape of wheat, conſiſting of infinite pure graines, which conſort together with much ſweetneſſe and pleaſure.

3. Thy two breſts are as two young Kids that are twins.

Thy two Teſtaments (which are thy two full and comely breſts, by whoſe wholeſome milke thou nouriſheſt all thy faithfull children, once borne into the light) are for their excellent and perfect agreement, and their amiable proportion, like two twins of Kids.

4. Thy necke is like a Tower of Iuory: thine eyes are like artificiall pooles in a frequented gate: thy noſe is as the Tower of Lebanon, that looketh toward Damaſcus.

Thoſe, who by their holy authoritie ſupport thy gouernment (which are as ſome ſtraight and ſtrong necke to beare vp thy head) are for their height and defence, like a Tower; for their order, pureneſſe and dignity, like a Tower of Iuory: thy Teachers and Miniſters (which are thine eies) are like vnto ſome cleare and artificiall ponds of water, in a place of greateſt reſort: wherin all commers may ſee the faces of their conſciences; and whence they may plentifully draw the Waters of life. Thy noſe, by which all ſpirituall ſents are conueyed to thee, is perfectly compoſed, and featured like ſome curious

Chap. VII.

1. How beautiſull are thy goings with ſhooes, O Princes daughter? the compaſſe of thy hips like iewels: the worke of the hand of a cunning workman.

HOw beautifull are thy feet, O daughter of the Higheſt; being ſhod with the preparation of the Goſpell of peace, and readily addreſſed to runne the way of the commandements of thy God! thou art compaſſed about thy loynes with the girdle of verity; which is both precious for the matter of it, and cunningly framed by the skill of the Spirit of truth.

Thy noſe, by which all ſpirituall ſents are conueyed to thee, is perfectly compoſed, and featured like ſome curious Turret of that goodly houſe in Lebanon; ſo as thy iudgement, and power of diſcerning the ſpirits, is admirable for the order and excellencie thereof.

5. Thine head vpon thee is as ſcarlet, and the buſh of thine head like purple: the King is tied in thy beames.

The whole tyre of thine head (which are the ceremonies vſed by thee) are very gracefull, and of high eſtimation and price to all the beholders: and as for me, I am ſo enamoured of thee, that I am euen tied by my owne deſire, to a perpetuall preſence in thine holy aſſemblies.

6. How faire art thou, and how pleaſant art thou, O my Loue, in pleaſures!

Oh how beautifull and louely art thou therefore (O my Church) in all thy parts and ornaments! how ſweet and pleaſant art thou (O my Loue) in whatſoeuer might giue me true contentment!

7. This thy ſtature is like a Palme-tree, and thy breſts like cluſters.

Thy whole frame is, for goodlineſſe and ſtraight growth, like vnto ſome tall Palme-tree; which the more it is depreſſed by the violence of perſecutions, riſeth the more; and the two breſts of thy Teſtaments are like two full iuicie cluſters, which yeeld comfortable and abundant refreſhing.

8. I ſaid, I will goe vp into the Palme-tree; I will take hold of her boughes: thy breſts ſhall now be like the cluſters of the Vines, and the ſauour of thy noſe like Apples.

Seeing then thou art my Palme-tree, I haue reſolued in my ſelfe to adioyne my ſelfe to thee; to enioy thee, to gather thoſe ſweet fruits of thy graces, which thou yeeldeſt; and by my preſence alſo will cauſe thee to be more plentifull in all good workes, and doctrine; ſo as thou ſhalt afford abundance of heauenly liquor vnto all the thirſtie ſoules of thy children, and an acceptable verdure of holineſſe and obedience vnto me.

9. And the roofe of thy mouth like good wine, which goeth ſtraight vp to my Well-beloued, and cauſeth the lips of him that is aſleepe, to ſpeake.

And the deliuery of my Word, by the mouthes of my Miniſters, ſhall be as ſome excellent wine, which ſparkleth right vpward: being well accepted of that God, in whoſe name it is taught, and looketh moſt pleaſantly in the glaſſe, being no leſſe highly eſteemed of the receiuers: which is of ſuch wonderfull power, that it is able to put words both of repentance, and praiſe, into the lips of him that lies aſleepe in his ſinnes.

The Church.

10. I am my Wel-beloueds, and his deſire is toward me.

BEhold, ſuch as I am, I am not my owne; much leſſe am I any others: I am wholly my Sauiours: and now I ſee, and feele, whatſoeuer I had deſerued, that he is mine alſo in all intire affection; who hath both choſen me, and giuen himſelfe for mee.

11. Come, my Wel-beloued, let vs goe into the fields, let vs lodge in the villages.

Come therefore, O my deare Sauiour, let vs ioyne together in our naturall care: let thy Spirit and my ſeruice be intent vpon thy Congregations here below on earth; and let vs ſtay in the place where our ſpirituall Huſbandrie lieth.

12. Let vs goe vp early in the morning to the Vines, and ſee if the Vine flouriſh, whether it hath diſcloſed the firſt Grapes, or whether the Pomegranats bloſſome: there will I giue thee my loue.

Let vs with all haſte and cheerefulneſſe viſit the fruitfull vines of our beleeuing children; and to our mutuall comfort, be witneſſes and partakers of all the ſignes and fruits of grace, of all thoſe good workes, and thankſgiuings, of thoſe holy endeuours and worthy practices, which they yeeld forth vnto vs: let vs iudge of their forwardneſſe, and commend it: whereupon it will eaſily appeare, that the conſummation of our happie mariage draweth neere, in which there ſhall be a perfect vnion betwixt vs.

13. The Mandrakes haue giuen a ſmell, and in our gates are all ſweet things new and old; my Well-beloued, I haue kept them for thee.

Behold: thy godly ſeruants, which not only beare fruit themſelues, but are powerfull in the prouocation of others, preſent their beſt ſeruices vnto thee; and euen at our doores (not farre to ſeeke, not hard to procure) is offer made vnto thee, of all varietie of fruit; whether from thy young Conuerts, or thy more ſetled Profeſſors: and all theſe I ſpend not lauiſhly; but in my louing care, duely reſerue them for thee, and for the ſolemne day of our full mariage.

CHAP. VIII.

The Iewiſh Church.

1. Oh that thou wereſt as my brother that ſucked the breſt of my mother! I would finde thee without; I would kiſſe thee, then they ſhould not deſpiſe me.

OH that I might ſee thee (my Sauiour) clothed in fleſh! Oh that thou which art my euerlaſting Husband, mighteſt alſo be my Brother, in partaking the ſame humane nature with me; that ſo I finding thee below vpon earth, might familiarly entertaine thee, and conuerſe with thee, without reproach of the world; yea, might be exalted in thy glory!

2. I will lead thee, and bring thee into my mothers houſe; there thou ſhalt teach mee: I will cauſe thee to drinke ſpiced wine, and new of the Pomegranats.

Then would I (though I be now pent vp in the limits of Iudæa) bring thee forth into the light and knowledge of the vniuerſall Church, whoſe daughter I am: and then and there, thou ſhouldeſt teach me how perfectly to ſerue and worſhip thee, and I ſhall gladly entertaine thee with a royall feaſt of the beſt graces that are in my holieſt ſeruants; which I know thou wilt account better cheere, than all the ſpiced cups, and Pomegranate wines in the world.

3. His left hand ſhall be vnder my head, and his right hand ſhall embrace me.

Then ſhall I attaine to a nearer communion with him; and both his hands ſhall be employed to ſuſtaine, and releeue me: yea, hee ſhall comfort my head and my heart (my iudgement, and affections) with the liuely heat of his gracious embracements.

4. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, that you ſtirre not vp, nor waken my Loue, vntill he pleaſe.

I charge you (O all yee that profeſſe any friendſhip to me) I charge you deepely, as yee will auoid my vttermoſt cenſures; take heed how yee vex and diſquiet my mercifull Sauiour, and grieue his Spirit: and doe not dare, by the leaſt prouocation of him, to interrupt his peace.

CHRIST.

5. Who is this that commeth out of the Wilderneſſe, leaning vpon her Well-beloued? I raiſed ſed thee vp vnder an Apple-tree: there thy mother conceiued thee: there ſhe conceiued that bare thee.

WHo is this, that from the comfortleſſe deſerts of ignorance, of infidelity, of tribulations, aſcendeth thus vp into the glorious light and libertie of my choſen? relying her ſelfe wholly vpon her Sauiour, and ſolacing her ſelfe in him? Is it not my Church? It is ſhee, whom I haue loued, and acknowledged of old: for euen vnder the tree of offence, the forbidden fruit which thou taſtedſt to thy deſtruction, I raiſed thee vp againe from death; Euen there, thy firſt mother conceiued thee; while by faith ſhe laid hold on that bleſſed promiſe of the Goſpell, whereby ſhe and her beleeuing ſeed were reſtored.

The Iewiſh Church.

6. Set me as a ſeale on thy heart, and as a ſignet on thine arme: for loue is ſtrong as death; Iealouſie is cruell as the Graue: the coales thereof are fiery coales, and a vehement flame.

ANd ſo haue thou mee ſtill (O my Sauiour) in a perpetuall and deare remembrance: keepe me ſure in thine heart, yea in thine armes, as that which thou holdeſt moſt precious: and let me neuer be remoued from thy loue; the leaſt ſhew and danger whereof I cannot endure: for this my ſpirituall loue is exceeding powerfull, and can no more be reſiſted than death it ſelfe: and the iealous zeale which I haue for thee and thy glory, conſumes me, euen like the Graue, and burnes me vp like vnto the coales of ſome moſt vehement and extreme fire.

7. Much water cannot quench loue, neither can the flouds drowne it: if a man ſhould giue all the ſubſtance of his houſe for loue, they would greatly contemne it.

Yea, more than any fire; for any flame yet may be quenched with water: but all the water of afflictions and terrors (yea, whole ſtreames of perſecutions) cannot quench this loue: and for all tempting offers of wealth, of pleaſures and honour, how eaſily are they all contemned for the loue of my Sauiour!

8. We haue a little ſiſter, and ſhe hath no breſts: what ſhall we doe for our ſiſter when ſhe ſhall be ſpoken for?

We haue a ſiſter (as thou knoweſt, O Sauiour) ordained through thy mercy, to the ſame grace with me: the vncalled Church of the Gentiles; ſmall (as yet) of growth through the rareneſſe of her Conuerts, and deſtitute of the helpe of any outward miniſterie, whereby ſhee might either beare, or nouriſh children vnto thee: when ſhee growes vnto her maturity; and the myſtery of calling her vniuerſally to thee, ſhall be reuealed to the world, and her ſelfe: what courſe will it pleaſe thee to take with her?

CHRIST.

9. If ſhee be a wall, wee will build vpon her a ſiluer Palace: and if ſhee be a doore, wee will keepe her in with boords of Cedar.

IF ſhee ſhall continue firme and conſtant, in the expectation of her promiſes, and the profeſſion of that truth which ſhall be reuealed; we will beautifie and ſtrengthen her with further grace, and make her a pure and coſtly Palace, fit to entertaine my ſpirit: and if ſhe will giue free paſſage and good entrance, to my word and grace, we will make her ſure and ſafe from corruption, and reſerue her to immortalitie.

The Iewiſh Church.

10. I am a wall, and my breſts are towers: then was I in his eyes as one that findeth peace.

BEhold: that condition which thou requireſt in the Church of the Gentiles, thou findeſt in me; I am thus firme and conſtant in my expectation, in my profeſſion:

and that want thou findeſt in her of ability to nouriſh her Children, by the breſt of thy Word, is not in me; who haue abundance both of nouriſhment and defence: vpon which my confeſſion and plea, I found grace and peace in the eyes of my Sauiour; and receiued from him aſſurance of his euerlaſting loue to me.

CHRIST.

11. Salomon had a Vine in Baalhamon: he gaue the Vineyard vnto keepers: euery one bringeth for the fruit thereof a thouſand peeces of ſiluer.

MY Church is my Vine, and I am the Owner and Huſbandman: our thrift and profit thereof farre exceedeth the good huſbandry of Salomon: he hath a rich Vineyard indeed in a moſt fruitfull ſoyle; but he lets it forth to the hands of others, as not being able to keepe and dreſſe it himſelfe: and therefore he is faine to be content with the greateſt part of the increaſe, not expecting the whole.

12. But my Vineyard which is mine, is before me: to thee O Salomon appertaineth a thouſand peeces of ſiluer, and two hundred to them that keepe the fruit thereof.

But my Vine is euer before me, I am with it to the end of the world, I reſerue it in mine owne hands, and dreſſe it with mine owne labour: and therefore if thou (O Salomon) canſt receiue from thine, to the proportion of a thouſand, thy workmen and farmers will looke for the fiſt part to come vnto their ſhare; whereas the gaine of my Vineyard ariſeth wholly, and only vnto my ſelfe.

13. O thou that dwelleſt in the gardens, the companions hearken vnto thy voice, cauſe me to heare it.

Sith therefore ſuch is my care of thee, and ioy in thee (O my Church, which conſiſteſt of the particular aſſemblies of men profeſſing my Name) ſee thou be diligent in declaring my will, and giuing holy counſels to all thy fellow-members: ſpeake forth my praiſe in the great congregations (which all attend willingly vpon thee) and let me heare the voice of thy conſtant and faithfull confeſſion of me before the world.

The Church.

14. Oh my Well-beloued, flee away and be like vnto the Roe, or to the young Hart vpon the Mountaine of ſpices.

I Will moſt gladly doe what thou commandeſt, O my Sauiour: but that I may performe it accordingly, be thou (which art, according to thy bodily preſence, in the higheſt heauens) euer preſent with me by thy Spirit, and haſten thy glorious comming, to my full Redemption.

TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY PRINCE,
HENRY, PRINCE OF GREAT BRITAINE, Sonne and Heire Apparant to our Soueraigne Lord, IAMES, King of GREAT BRITAINE, &c.
All glory in either world.

MOſt Gracious Prince:

I*T is not from any conceit of ſuch worth in my labours, that they durſt looke ſo high. A lower patronage would haue ſerued an higher worke. It were well if ought of mine could bee worthy of popular eyes; Or if I could wring ought from my ſelfe not vnworthy of a iudicious Reader. I know your Highneſſe wants neither preſents, nor counſells: preſents from ſtrangers, counſells from your Teachers; neither of them matchable by my weakneſſe: onely duty herein excuſeth me from preſumption. For, I thought it iniuſtice to deuote the fruit of my labours to any other hand beſide my Maſters: which alſo I knew to be as gracious, as mine is faithfull. Yet (ſince euen good affections cannot warrant too much vileneſſe in gifts to Princes) leſt, while my modeſty diſparages my worke, I ſhould hazard the acceptation, here ſhall your Grace finde variety, not without profit. I hate a Diuine that would but pleaſe; and, withall, thinke it impoſsible for a man to profit, that pleaſeth not. And if, while my ſtile fixeth it ſelfe vpon others, any ſpirituall profit ſhall reflect* vpon your Highneſſe, how happy am I! who ſhall euer thinke, I haue liued to purpoſe, (if by the beſt of my ſtudies) I ſhall haue done any good office to your ſoule. Further, (which theſe times account not the leaſt praiſe) your Grace ſhall herein perceiue a new faſhion of diſcourſe, by Epiſtles; new to our language, vſuall to others: and (as Nouelty is neuer without plea of vſe) more free, more familiar. Thus, we doe but talke with our friends by our pen, and expreſſe our ſelues no whit leſſe eaſily; ſomewhat more digeſtedly.

Whatſoeuer it is, as it cannot bee good enough to deſerue that countenance; ſo, the countenance of ſuch Patronage ſhall make it worthy of reſpect from others. The God of Princes protect your perſon, perfect your graces, and giue you as much fauour in Heauen, as you haue honour on earth.

Your Graces

humbly-deuoted ſeruant,

Epist. I. Expoſtulating for his departure, and perſwading his returne.

HOw vnhappily is my ſtyle changed! Alas, that to a friend, to a brother, I muſt write as to an Apoſtate, to an aduerſary! Doth this ſeeme harſh? You haue turned it, by being turned your ſelfe. Once the ſame wals held vs in one louing Society; the ſame Dioceſſe, in one honourable function: Now, not one land, and (which I lament) not one Church. You are gone, we ſtand and wonder. For a ſheepe, to ſtray through ſimplicity, is both ordinary and lamentable: but, for a Shepheard, is more rare, more ſcandalous. I dare not preſume ouer-much, vpon an appeale to a blinded conſcience. Thoſe that are newly come from a bright candle into a darke roome, are ſo much more blinde, as their light was greater; and the pureſt yuory turneth with fire into the deepeſt blacke. Tell vs yet by your old ingenuity, and by thoſe ſparkes of good which yet (I hope) lie couered vnder your cold aſhes, tell vs, what diuided you? Your motiues ſhall once be ſcanned before an higher barre. Shame not to haue the weake eyes of the world ſee that, which once your vndeceiueable Iudge ſhall ſee and cenſure. What ſaw you, what heard you anew, that might offer violence to a reſolued minde, and make it either to alter, or ſuſpend? If your reaſons be inuincible, informe vs, that we may follow you: but if (as they are) ſlight and feeble, returne you to vs: returne, and thinke it no ſhame to haue erred, iuſt ſhame to continue erring. What ſuch goodly beauty ſaw you in that painted, but ill-fauoured Strumpet, that ſhould thus bewitch you, ſo to forget your ſelfe, and contemne the chaſte loue of the Spouſe of your Sauiour? I ſaw her at the ſame time in her gayeſt dreſſe: Let my ſoule neuer proſper, if I could ſee any thing worthy to command affection. I ſaw, and ſcorned: you ſaw, and adored. Would God your adoration were as farre from ſuperſtition, as my ſcorne from impietie. That God iudge betwixt vs, whether herein erred: yea, let men iudge, that are not drunke with thoſe Babyloniſh dregs! How long might an indifferent eye looke vpon the comicall and mimicke actions in thoſe your myſteries that ſhould be ſacred, (your magicall exorciſmes, your clericall ſhauings, your vncleanly vnctions, your croſſings, creepings, cenſings, ſprinklings, your coozning miracles, gariſh proceſſions, burning of noone-day, chriſtning of bels, marting of pardons, toſſing of beads, your ſuperſtitious hallowing of candies, wax, aſhes, palmes, chriſme, garments, roſes, ſwords, water, ſalt, the Pontificall ſolemnities of your great Maſter, and whateuer your new mother hath, beſides, plauſible) before he ſhould ſee ought, in all theſe, worthy of any other entertainmemt, than contempt! Who can but diſdaine, that theſe things ſhould procure any wiſe proſelyte? Cannot your owne memory recount thoſe truly religious ſpirits, which hauing ſought Rome as reſolued Papiſts, haue left the world as holy Martyrs; dying for the deteſtation of that which they came to adore? Whence this? They heard and magnified that, which they now ſaw and abhorred. Their fire of zeale brought them to the flames of Martyrdome. Their innocent hopes promiſed them Religion: they found nothing but a pretence; promiſed deuotion, and behold, idolatry, they ſaw, hated, ſuffered, and now reigne; whiles you wilfully and vnbidden, will loſe your ſoule, where others meant to loſe, and haue found it. Your zeale dies, where theirs began to liue: you like to liue, where they would but die. They ſhall comfort vs, for you : they ſhall once ſtand vp againſt you : While they would rather die in the heat of that fire, than liue in the darkneſſe of their errors ; you rather die in the Egyptian darkneſſe of errors than liue in the pleaſant light of Truth : yea, I feare, rather in another fire, than this Light.

Alas ! what ſhall we looke for of you ? Too late repentance, or obſtinate error ? Both miſerable. A Spira, or a Staphylus ? Your friends, your ſelfe, ſhall wiſh you rather vnborne, than either.

O thou, which art the great Shepheard, great in power, great in mercy, which leaueſt the ninety and nine to reduce one, fetch home (if thy will bee) this thy forlorne charge : fetch him home, driue him home to thy Fold, though by ſhame, though by death. Let him once recouer thy Church, thou him, it is enough. Our common Mother I know not whether more pitties your loſſe, or diſdaines thus to be robb'd of a ſon : not for the need of you ; but her owne piety, her owne loue. For, how many troops of better informed ſoules hath ſhe euery day returning into her lap ; now breathing from their late Antichriſtianiſme, and embracing her knees vpon their owne ? She laments you, not for that ſhe feares ſhe ſhall miſſe you, but for that ſhe knowes you ſhall want her. See you her teares, and doe but pitty your ſelfe as much as ſhe you. And from your Mother, to deſcend to your Nurſe : Is this the fruit of ſuch education ? Was not your youth ſpent in a ſociety of ſuch comely order, ſtrict gouernment, wiſe lawes, religious care (it was ours ; yet let me praiſe it, to your ſhame) as may iuſtly challenge (after all bragges) either RHEMES or DOVVAY, or if your Ieſuits haue any other denne more cleanly, and more worthy of oſtentation ? And could you come out, freſh and vnſeaſoned, from the middeſt of thoſe ſalt waues ? Could all thoſe heauenly ſhowers fall beſides you ; while you, like a Gedeons fleece, want moiſture ? Shall none of thoſe diuine principles, which your youth ſeemed to drinke in, check you in your new errors ? Alas ! how vnlike are you to your ſelfe, to your name ? Iacob wreſtled with an Angell, and preuailed : you grapple but with a Ieſuit, and yeeld. Iacob ſupplanted his brother : and Eſau hath ſupplanted you. Iacob changed his name for a better by a valiant reſiſtance : you, by your cowardly yeelding, haue loſt your owne. Iacob ſtroue with God, for a bleſſing : I feare to ſay it, you againſt him, for a curſe ; for, no common meaſure of hatred, or ordinary oppoſition, can ſerue a reuolter. Either you muſt bee deſperately violent, or ſuſpected. The mighty One of Iſrael (for hee can doe it) raiſe you fallen, returne you wandred, and giue you grace at laſt to ſhame the Deuill, to forſake your ſtepmother, to acknowledge your true Parent, to ſatisfie the world, to ſaue your owne ſoule. If otherwiſe, I will ſay of you, as Ieremy of his Iſraelites (if not rather with more indignation) My ſoule ſhall weepe in ſecret for your reuolt, and mine eyes ſhall drop downe teares, becauſe one of the Lords flocke is caried away captiue.

Emanuel Colledge in Cambridge.

To my Lord and Patrone, the Lord DENNY Baron of Waltham.

EPIST. II. Of the contempt of the world.

MY Lord : my tongue, my pen, & my heart, are all your ſeruants : when you cannot heare me through diſtance, you muſt ſee me in my Letters. You are now in the Senate of the Kingdome, or in the concourſe of the city, or perhaps (though more rarely) in the royall face of the Court. All of them, places fit for your place. From all theſe, let me call off your minde to her home aboue ; and, in the middeſt of buſineſſe, ſhew you reſt: If I may not rather commend, then admoniſh, and before-hand confeſſe my counſell ſuperfluous, becauſe your holy forwardneſſe hath preuented it. You can afford theſe, but halfe of your ſelfe: The better part is better beſtowed: Your ſoule is ſtill retired, and reſerued. You haue learned to vouchſafe theſe worldly things, vſe, without affection; and know to diſtinguiſh wiſely, betwixt a Stoicall dulneſſe, and a Chriſtian contempt: and haue long made the world, not your God, but your ſlaue. And in truth (that I may looſe my ſelfe into a bold and free diſcourſe) what other reſpect is it worthy of? I would adore it on my face, if I could ſee any Maieſty that might command veneration. Perhaps it loues me not ſo much, as to ſhew me his beſt. I haue ſought it enough: and haue ſeene what others haue doated on, and wondered at their madneſſe. So may I looke to ſee better things aboue, as I neuer could ſee ought here, but vanitie and vileneſſe.

What is fame, but ſmoake? and metall, but droſſe? and pleaſure, but a pill in ſugar? Let ſome Gallants condemne this, as the voice of a Melancholike Scholler: I ſpeake that which they ſhall feele, and ſhall confeſſe. Though I neuer was ſo, I haue ſeen ſome as happy as the world could make them: and yet I neuer ſaw any more diſcontented. Their life hath bin neither longer, nor ſweeter, nor their heart lighter, nor their meales heartier, nor their nights quieter, nor their cares fewer, nor their complaints. Yea, we haue knowne ſome, that haue loſt their mirth when they haue found wealth; and at once haue ceaſed to be merry and poore. All theſe earthly delights, if they were ſound, yet how ſhort they are! and if they could bee long, yet how vnſound! If they were ſound, they are but as a good day betweene two agues, or a ſunne ſhine betwixt two tempeſts. And if they were long, their honie is exceeded by their gall. This ground beares none but maples, hollow and fruitleſſe; or, like the banks of the dead Sea, a faire apple, which vnder a red ſide containes nothing but duſt. Euery flower in this garden either pricks, or ſmels ill. If it be ſweet, it hath thornes: and if it haue no thornes, it annoyes vs with an ill ſent. Goe then, ye wiſe idolatrous Paraſites, and erect ſhrines, and offer ſacrifices to your God, the World, and ſeek to pleaſe him with your baſe and ſeruile deuotions: it ſhall be long enough ere ſuch religion ſhall make you happy. You ſhall at laſt forſake thoſe altars, emptie and ſorrowfull. How eaſie is it for vs Chriſtians, thus to inſult ouer the worldling, that thinkes himſelfe worthy of enuie? How eaſie to turne off the world with a ſcornfull repulſe; and when it makes vs the Deuils proffer, All theſe will I giue thee, to returne Peters anſwer, Thy ſiluer and thy gold periſh with thee? How eaſie to account none ſo miſerable, as thoſe that are rich with iniurie, and grow great by being conſcious of ſecret euils? Wealth and honor, when it comes vpon the beſt tearmes, is but vaine; but, when vpon ill conditions, burdenſome. When they are at the beſt, they are ſcarce friends: but, when at the worſt, tormentors. Alas, how ill agrees a gay coat, and a feſtered heart? What auailes an high title, with an hell in the ſoule? I admire the faith of Moſes: but, preſuppoſing his faith, I wonder not at his choice. He preferred the afflictions of Iſrael, to the pleaſures of Ægypt; and choſe rather to eat the Lamb, with ſowre herbs, than all their fleſh-pots: for how much better is it to be miſerable than guilty? and what compariſon is there betwixt ſorrow and ſinne? If it were poſſible, let me rather be in hell without ſinne, than on earth wickedly glorious. But how much are we bound to God, that allowes vs earthly fauours without this oppoſition! That God hath made you at once honourable and iuſt, and your life pleaſant and holy, and hath giuen you an high eſtate with a good heart; are fauours, that looke for thanks. Theſe muſt be acknowledged, not reſted in: They are yet higher thoughts that muſt perfect your contentment.

What God hath giuen you, is nothing to that he meanes to giue: He hath bin liberall, but he will be munificent. This is not ſo much as the taſte of a full cup. Faſten your eyes vpon your future glory, and ſee how meanly you ſhall eſteeme theſe earthly graces. Here, you command but a little pittance of mould (great indeed to vs, little to the whole;) there, whole heauen ſhall be yours. Here you command, but as a ſubiect; there you ſhall reigne as a King. Here, you are obſerued; but ſometimes with your iuſt diſtaſte: there, you ſhall reigne with peace, and ioy. Here, you are noble among men; there, glorious amongſt Angels. Here, you want not honour; but you want not croſſes: there is nothing but felicity. Here, you haue ſome ſhort ioyes: there, is nothing but eternity. You are a ſtranger, here; there, at home. Here, Satan tempts you, and men vex you: there, Saints and Angels ſhall applaud you; and God ſhall fill you with himſelfe. In a word, you are onely bleſſed here, for that you ſhall be.

Theſe are thoughts worthy of greatneſſe: which if we ſuffer either imployments or pleaſures to thruſt out of our doores, we doe wilfully make our ſelues comfortleſſe. Let theſe ſtill ſeaſon your mirth, and ſweeten your ſorrowes, and euer interpoſe themſelues betwixt you and the world. Theſe onely can make your life happy, and your death welcome.

To my Lord HAY, H. and P.

EPIST. III. Of true Honour.

MY Lord, it is ſafe to complaine of Nature where Grace is; and to magnifie Grace, where it is at once had, and affected. It is a fault of Nature, and not the leaſt, that as ſhe hath dimme eyes, ſo they are miſ-placed. She lookes ſtill, either forward or downeward; forward to the obiect ſhe deſires, or downeward to the meanes: neuer turnes her eyes either backward, to ſee what ſhee was; or vpward, to the cauſe of her good: whence, it is iuſt with God to with-hold what he would giue, or to curſe that which he beſtowes; and to beſot carnall minds with outward things, in their value, in their deſire, in their vſe: whereas true wiſdome hath cleare eyes, and right ſet; and therefore ſees an inuiſible hand in all ſenſible euents, effecting all things, directing all things to their due end; ſees on whom to depend, whom to thanke. Earth is too low and too baſe, to giue bounds vnto a ſpirituall ſight. No man then can truly know what belongs to wealth, or honour, but the gracious; either how to compaſſe them, or how to prize them, or how to vſe them. I care not how many thouſand wayes there are to ſeeming-honour, beſides this of vertue: they all (if more) ſtill lead to ſhame: or what plots are deuiſed to improue it; if they were as deepe as hell, yet their end is loſſe. As there is no counſell againſt God, ſo there is no honour without him. Hee inclines the hearts of Princes to fauour; the hearts of inferiours to applauſe. Without him, the hand cannot moue, to ſucceſſe; nor the tongue, to praiſe: And what is honour without theſe? In vaine doth the world frowne vpon the man, whom hee meanes to honour; or ſmile, where hee would diſgrace. Let mee then tell your Lordſhip, who are fauourites in the Court of heauen; euen whiles they wander on earth; yea, let the great King himſelfe tell you, Thoſe that honour mee, I will honour. That men haue the grace to giue honour to God, is an high fauour: but becauſe men giue honour to God (as their dutie) that therefore God ſhould giue honour to men, is to giue, becauſe hee hath giuen. It is a fauour of God, that man is honoured of man like himſelfe: but that God alloweth of our endeuours as honour to himſelfe, is a greater fauour than that wherewith hee requites it.

This is the goodneſſe of our God; The man that ſerues him, honours him and whoſoeuer honours him with his ſeruice, is crowned with honour. I challenge all times, places, perſons: Who euer honoured God, and was neglected? Who hath wilfully diſhonoured him, and proſpered? Turne ouer all Records, and ſee how ſucceſſe euer bleſſed the iuſt, after many dangers, after many ſtormes of reſiſtance, and left their concluſion glorious; how all godleſſe plots, in their looſe, haue at once deceiued, ſhamed, puniſhed their Author. I goe no further: Your owne breſt knowes, that your happie experience can herein iuſtifie God. The world hath noted you, for a follower of vertue; and hath ſeene how faſt Honour followed you: Whiles you ſought fauour with the God of heauen, he hath giuen you fauour with his Deputy on earth.

Gods former actions are patternes of his future: He teacheth you what he will doe, by what he hath done. Vnleſſe your hand be weary of offering ſeruice, he cannot either pull in his hand from rewarding, or hold it out empty. Honour him ſtill, and God pawnes his honour, on not failing you. You cannot diſtruſt him, whom your proofe hath found faithfull. And, whiles you ſettle your heart in this right courſe of true glory, laugh, in ſecret ſcorne, at the idle endeuours of thoſe men, whoſe policies would out-reach God, and ſeize vpon honour without his leaue. (God laughes at them in heauen, it is a ſafe and holy laughter that followes his.) And pitie the prepoſterous courſes of them, which make religion but a foot-ſtoole to the ſeat of aduancement; which care for all things but heauen; which make the world their ſtanding marke, and doe not ſo much as roue at God. Many had ſped well, if they had begun well, and proceeded orderly.

A falſe method is the bane of many hopefull endeuours. God bids vs ſeeke firſt his Kingdome; and earthly things ſhall finde vs vnſought. Fooliſh nature firſt ſeekes the world: and if ſhe light on God by the way, it is more than ſhe expects, deſires, cares for; and therefore failes of both, becauſe ſhee ſeekes neither aright. Many had beene great, if they had cared to be good; which now are croſſed in what they would, becauſe they willed not what they ought. If Salomon had made wealth his firſt ſuit, I doubt he had beene both poore and fooliſh: now, hee asked wiſdome, and gained greatneſſe: Becauſe he choſe well, he receiued what he asked not. O the bountie and fidelitie of our God! becauſe we would haue the beſt, he giues vs all: Earth ſhall wait vpon vs, becauſe we attend vpon heauen.

Goe on, my Lord, goe on happily, to loue religion, to practiſe it: let God alone with the reſt. Bee you a patterne of vertue; hee ſhall make you a Precedent of glory. Neuer man loſt ought by giuing it to God: that liberall hand returnes our gifts, with aduantage. Let men, let God ſee that you honour him; and they ſhall heare him proclaime before you, Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom the King will honour.

Epist. IV. Of Gratulation, for the hopes of our Prince; with an aduiſing apprecation.

SIR, God hath called you to a great and happy charge: You haue the cuſtody of our common Treaſure: Neither is there any ſeruice comparable to this of yours; whether we regard God, or the world. Our labours oft-times beſtowed vpon many, ſcarce profit one: yours, beſtowed vpon one, redounds to the profit of many millions. This is a ſummary way of obliging all the world to you. I encourage you not in your care: you haue more comfort in the ſucceſſe of it, than all worlds can giue you. The very ſubiect of your pains would giue an hart to him that hath none. I rather congratulate with you our common happineſſe, and the hopes of poſterity, in that royall and bleſſed iſſue. You haue beſt cauſe to be the witneſſe of the rare forwardneſſe of our gracious Maſter:

and I haue ſeene enough, to make me thinke I can neuer be enough thankfull to God for him. That Princes are fruitfull, is a great bleſſing; but, that their children are fruitfull in grace, & not more eminent in place than vertue, is the greateſt fauour God can doe to a State. The goodneſſe of a priuate man is his owne; of a Prince, the whole worlds. Their words are Maximes, their actions examples, their examples rules. When I compare them with their royall Father, (as I doe oft and chearfully) I cannot ſay whether he be more happy in himſelfe, or in them. I ſee both in him, and them; I ſee and wonder, that God diſtributes to naturall Princes gifts proportionable to their greatneſſe. The wiſe Moderator of the world knowes what vſe is of their parts: he knowes that the head muſt haue all the ſenſes that pertaine to the whole body: and how neceſſary it is, that inferiours ſhould admire them no leſſe for the excellency of their graces, than for the ſway of their authority. Whereupon it is, that he giues heroicall qualities to Princes; and as he hath beſtowed vpon them his owne name, ſo alſo hee giues them ſpeciall ſtamps of his owne glorious Image. Amongſt all other vertues, what a comfort is it to ſee thoſe yeares, and thoſe ſpirits ſtoope ſo willingly to deuotion? Religion is growne too ſeuere a Miſtreſſe for young and high courages to attend. Very rare is that Nobility of bloud, that doth not challenge libertie; and that libertie, that ends not in looſeneſſe. Loe, this example teacheth our Gallants, how well euen Maieſtie can ſtand with homage; Maieſtie to men, with homage to God.

Farre be it from me, to doe that which my next clauſe ſhall condemne: but I thinke it ſafe to ſay, that ſeldome euer thoſe yeares haue promiſed, ſeldome haue performed ſo much. Only God keepe two miſchiefes euer from within the ſmoake of his Court; Flattery and Treachery: The iniquitie of times may make vs feare theſe; not his inclination.

For, whether as Engliſh or as men, it hath beene euer familiar to vs, to fawne vpon Princes: Though, what doe I beſtow two names vpon one vice, but attired in two ſundry ſuits of euill? For, Flattery is no other than gilded treaſon; nothing elſe but poiſon in gold: This euill is more tame; not leſſe dangerous. It had beene better for many great ones not to haue been, than to haue been in their conceits more than men. This, Flattery hath done; and what can it not? That other, Treachery, ſpils the bloud; this, the vertues of Princes. That takes them from others: this bereaues them of themſelues. That, in ſpight of the actors, doth but change their Crowne: this ſteales it from them for euer. Who can but wonder, that reads of ſome not vnwiſe Princes, ſo bewitched with the inchantments of their Paraſites, that they haue thought themſelues Gods immortal, & haue ſuffered themſelues ſo ſtiled, ſo adored? Neither Temples nor Statues, nor Sacrifices haue ſeemed too much glory to the greatneſſe of their ſelf-loue. Now none of all their actions could be either euill, or vnbeſeeming; nothing could proceed from them worthy of cenſure, vnworthy of admiration: Their very ſpots haue beene beauty, their humours iuſtice, their errours witty, their Paradoxes diuine, their exceſſes heroicall. O the damnable ſeruility of falſe mindes! which perſwade others of that which themſelues laugh to ſee beleeued. O the dangerous credulitie of ſelfe-loue! which entertaines all aduantages if neuer ſo euill, neuer ſo impoſſible. How happy a ſeruice ſhall you doe to this whole world of ours, if you ſhall ſtill ſettle in that Princely minde a true apprehenſion of himſelfe; and ſhall teach him to take his owne height aright; and euen from his childhood to hate a Paraſite, as the worſt Traitor: To breake thoſe falſe glaſſes, that would preſent him a face, not his owne: To applaud plaine truth, and bend his browes vpon exceſſiue praiſes. Thus affected, he may bid Vice doe her worſt. Thus ſhall he ſtriue with Vertue, whether ſhall more honour each other. Thus ſincere and ſolid glory ſhall euery where follow, and crowne him. Thus, when he hath but his due, he ſhall haue ſo much, that he ſhall ſcorne to borrow the falſe colours of adulation. Goe on happily in this worthy and noble employment. The worke cannot but ſucceed, that is furthered with ſo many prayers.

To Sir Thomas Challoner.

Epist. V. A report of ſome Obſeruations in my Trauell.

SIR, beſides my hopes, not my deſires, I trauelled of late; for knowledge partly, and partly for health. There was nothing that made not my iourney pleaſant, ſaue the labour of the way: which yet was ſo ſweetly deceiued, by the ſocietie of Sir Edmund Bacon, (a Gentleman truly honourable, beyond all titles) that I found ſmall cauſe to complaine. The Sea brookt not me, nor I it; an vnquiet element, made only for wonder and vſe, not for pleaſure. Alighted once from that woodden conueyance, and vneuen way, I bethought my ſelfe how fondly our life is committed to an vnſteadie and reeling peece of wood, fickle winds, reſtleſſe waters; while wee may ſet foot on ſtedfaſt and conſtant earth. Loe, then euery thing taught me, euery thing delighted me; ſo ready are we to be affected with thoſe forraine pleaſures, which at home we ſhould ouer-looke. I ſaw much, as one might in ſuch a ſpan of earth, in ſo few moneths. The time fauoured me: for, now newly had the key of peace opened thoſe parts which warre had before cloſed; cloſed (I ſay) to all Engliſh, ſaue either fugitiues or captiues. All ciuill occurrences (as what faire Cities, what ſtrange faſhions, entertainments, dangers, delights we found) are fit for other eares, and winter euenings. What I noted, as a Diuine within the ſphere of my profeſſion, my paper ſhall not ſpare in ſome part to report; and that to your ſelfe, which haue paſſed a longer way, with more happy fruit of obſeruation. Euen little ſtreames emptie themſelues into great Riuers, and they againe into the Sea. Neither do I deſire to tell you what you know not: it ſhall be ſufficient that I relate ought which others ſhall thinke memorable.

Along our way, how many Churches ſaw we demoliſhed! Nothing left, but rude heapes, to tell the paſſenger, there hath beene both deuotion and hoſtilitie. O the miſerable foot-ſteps of warre, beſides bloudſhed, ruine, and deſolation! Fury hath done that there, which Couetouſneſſe would doe with vs; would doe, but ſhall not: The truth within, ſhall ſaue the walls without. And, to ſpeake truly (what-euer the vulgar exclaime) Idolatry pull'd downe thoſe walls; not rage. If there had beene no Hollander to raze them, they ſhould haue fallen alone, rather than hide ſo much impietie vnder their guiltie roofe. Theſe are ſpectacles, not ſo much of crueltie, as iuſtice. Crueltie of man, Iuſtice of God. But (which I wondred at) Churches fall, and Ieſuits Colleges riſe, euery where. There is no Citie, where thoſe are not either rearing or built. Whence commeth this? Is it, for that deuotion is not ſo neceſſary as policy? Thoſe men (as we ſay of the Fox) fare beſt, when they are moſt curſed. None ſo much ſpighted of their owne; none ſo hated of all; none ſo oppoſed by ours: and yet theſe ill weeds grow. Whoſoeuer liues long, ſhall ſee them feared of their owne, which now hate them; ſhall ſee theſe ſeuen leane kine deuoure all the fat beaſts that feed on the medowes of Tyber. I prophecie as Pharaoh dreamed: The euent ſhall iuſtifie my confidence.

At Bruxelles I ſay ſome Engliſh-women profeſſe themſelues Veſtals; with a thouſand rites, I know not whether more ridiculous, or magicall. Poore ſoules! they could not be fooles enough at home. It would haue made you to pity, laugh, diſdaine (I know not which more) to ſee by what cunning ſleights and faire pretences that weake ſex was fetcht into a wilfull bondage; and (if thoſe two can agree) willingly conſtrained to ſerue a maſter whom they muſt and cannot obey: whom they neither may forſake for their vow, nor can pleaſe for their frailtie. What followes hence? Late ſorrow, ſecret miſchiefe, miſery irremediable. Their forwardneſſe, for will-worſhip, ſhall condemne our coldneſſe for truth.

12637c Hall, J.

I talked there (in more boldneſſe perhaps than wiſdome) with Coſterus a famous Ieſuit; an old man, more teaſty than ſubtile, and more able to wrangle than ſatisfie. Our diſcourſe was long and roauing, and on his part full both of words and vehemencie. He ſpake as at home; I as a ſtranger: yet ſo, as he ſaw me modeſtly peremptory. The particulars would ſwell my Letter too much: It is enough, that the Truth loſt leſſe than I gained. At Gaunt (a Citie that commands reuerence for age, and wonder for the greatneſſe) we fell vpon a Cappucine nouice, which wept bitterly, becauſe he was not allowed to be miſerable. His head had now felt the razor, his backe the rod: all that Laconicall diſcipline pleaſed him well; which another, being condemned to, would iuſtly account a torment. What hindred then? Piety to his mother, would not permit this which he thought pietie to God: He could not be a willing begger, vnleſſe his mother muſt beg vnwillingly. He was the only heire of his father, the only ſtay of his mother: the comfort of her widowhood depended on this her orphane; who now naked muſt enter into the world of the Cappucines, as he came firſt into this; leauing his goods to the diuiſion of the fraternitie: the leaſt part whereof ſhould haue beene hers, whoſe he wiſhed all: Hence thoſe teares, that repulſe. I pitied his ill beſtowed zeale; and rather wiſhed, than durſt teach him more wiſdome. Theſe men for deuout, the Ieſuits for learned and pragmaticall, haue ingroſſed all opinion from other Orders. O hypocriſie! No Cappucine may take or touch ſiluer: for theſe are (you know) the quinteſſence of Franciſcan ſpirits. This metall is as very an Anathema to theſe, as the wedge of gold to Achan; at the offer whereof he ſtarts backe, as Moſes from the Serpent: yet he carries a boy with him, that takes and carries it; and neuer complaines of either metall or meaſure. I ſaw and laughed at it; and by this open tricke of hypocriſie, ſuſpected more, more cloſe. How could I chuſe? while commonly the leaſt appeares of that which is; eſpecially of that which is loathſome in appearance, much more in nature. At Namurs, on a pleaſant and ſteepe hill-top, we found one that was termed a maried Hermite; approuing his wiſdome aboue his fellowes, that could make choice of ſo chearefull and ſociable a ſolitarineſſe. Whence, after a delightfull paſſage vp the ſweet Riuer Moſa, we viſited the populous and rich Clergie of Leodium. That great Citie might well be dichotomized into Cloyſters and Hoſpitals. If I might aduenture, I could here play the Criticke, after all the ruines of my neglected Philologie. Old monuments, and after them our Lipſius, call this people Eburones: I doubt whether it ſhould not rather be written Ebriones; yet without ſearch of any other Records, ſaue my owne eyes: while yet I would thoſe ſtreets were more moiſt with wine, than with bloud; wherein no day, no night is not diſmall to ſome. No law, no Magiſtrate, layes hold on the knowne murderer, if himſelfe liſt: for three dayes after his fact, the gates are open, and iuſtice ſhut: priuate violence may purſue him, publike iuſtice cannot: whence, ſome of more hot temper carue themſelues of reuenge; others take vp with a ſmall pecuniary ſatisfaction. O ENGLAND, thought I, happie for iuſtice, happy for ſecuritie! There you ſhall finde in euery corner a Maumet; at euery doore a Begger; in euery diſh a Prieſt. From thence we paſſed to the Spa, a village famous for her medicinall and minerall waters, compounded of Iron and Copperice; the vertue whereof yet the ſimple inhabitant aſcribes to their beneficiall Saint, whoſe heauie foot hath made an ill-ſhaped impreſſion in a ſtone of his * Sauenir: A water more wholeſome than pleaſant, and yet more famous than wholeſome. The wilde deſerts (on which it borders) are haunted with three kinds of ill cattell; Freebooters, Wolues, Witches: although theſe two laſt are oft-times one. For that ſauage Ardenna is reputed to yeeld many of thoſe monſters, whom the Greekes call λυκανθρώπους; they, Lougarous; we (if you will) Witch-wolues; Witches that haue put on the ſhape of thoſe cruell beaſts. We ſaw a boy there, whoſe halfe-face was deuoured by one of them neere the village: yet ſo, as that the eare was rather cut than bitten off. Not many dayes before our comming, at Limburgh was executed one of thoſe miſcreants, who confeſſed on the wheele to haue deuoured two and fortie children in that forme. It would aske a large volume, to ſcan this probleme of Lycanthropie. The reaſons, wherewith their relation furniſht me on both parts, would make an Epiſtle tedious. This in ſhort I reſolued; a ſubſtantiall change, is aboue the reach of all infernall powers, proper to the ſame hand that created the ſubſtance of both: Herein the Deuill playes the double Sophiſter; yea, the Sorcerer with Sorcerers. He both deludes the Witches conceit, and the beholders eyes.

* The name of the vpper Well of the Spa.

One thing I may not omit, without ſinfull ouer-ſight; A ſhort, but memorable Storie, which the Grephier of that towne (though of different religion) reported to more eares than ours. When the laſt Inquiſition tyrannized in thoſe parts, and helpt to ſpend the Faggots of Ardenna; one of the reſt, a confident Confeſſour, being led farre to his ſtake, ſung Pſalms along the way, in a heauenly courage and victorious triumph: the cruell Officer enuying his laſt mirth, and grieuing to ſee him merrier than his tormentors, commanded him ſilence: He ſings ſtill, as deſirous to improue his laſt breath to the beſt. The view of his approaching glory, bred his ioy; his ioy breakes forth into a chearefull confeſſion: The enraged Sheriffe cauſes his tongue, drawne forth to the length, to be cut off neere the roots. Bloudy wretch! It had beene good muſicke to haue heard his ſhreekes: but, to heare his muſicke was torment. The poore Martyr dies in ſilence, reſts in peace. Not many moneths after, our butcherly Officer hath a ſonne borne with his tongue hanging downe vpon his chinne, like a Deere after long chaſe; which neuer could be gathered vp within the bounds of his lips. O the diuine hand, full of iuſtice, full of reuenge! Goe now, Lipſius, and write the new miracles of thy Goddeſſe; and confirme ſuperſtition by ſtrange euents. Iudge you that haue ſeene, if euer the Chappell of Halle or Zichem haue yeelded ought more notable. We meet euery where Pilgrimes to thoſe his Ladies: two Ladies ſhall I call them, or one Lady in two ſhrines? If two, why doe they worſhip but one? If but one, why doth ſhe that cure at Zichem, which at Halle ſhe could not? O what pitie it is, that ſo high a wit ſhould in the laſt act be ſubiect to dotage! All the maſculine brood of that braine we cheriſhed, and (if need were) admired: but theſe his ſilly Virgins, the feeble iſſue of diſtempered age, who can abide? One of his darlings, at Louan, told me from his owne mouth, that the elder of theſe two daughters was by him in ten dayes got, conceiued, borne, chriſtned. I beleeued, and wondred not. Theſe acts of ſuperſtition haue an inuiſible father, and mid-wife: beſides that it is not for an Elephant to goe three yeares with a Mouſe. It was told me in the ſhop of his Moretus, not without ſome indignation, that our King, when he had well viewed the booke, and read ſome paſſages, threw it to the ground, with this cenſure; Damnation to him that made it, and to him that beleeues it. Whether a true ſtory, or one of their Legends, I enquire not: I am ſure, that ſentence did not ſo much diſcontent them, as it ioyed me. Let me tell you yet, ere I take off my pen, two wonders more, which I ſaw in that wonder of Cities, Antwerp; one, a ſolemne Maſſe in a ſhambles, and that on Gods day; while the houſe was full of meat, of butchers, of buyers; ſome kneeling, others bargaining, moſt talking, all buſie. It was ſtrange to ſee one houſe ſacred to God, and the belly; and how thoſe two ſeruices agreed: The Prieſt did eat fleſh, the butchers ſold fleſh, in one roofe, at one inſtant. The butcher killed, and ſold it by peeces; the Prieſt did ſacrifice, and orally deuoure it whole: whether was the more butcher? The like we might haue ſeene at Malines. The other, an Engliſh-man, ſo madly deuout, that he had wilfully mur'd vp himſelfe as an Anachoret; the worſt of all priſoners. There ſate he pent vp, for his further merit, halfe hunger-ſtarued for the charity of the citizens. It was worth ſeeing, how manly he could bite-in his ſecret want, and diſſemble his ouer-late repentance. I cannot commend his mortification, if he wiſh to be in heauen, yea in purgatory, to be deliuered from thence: I durſt not pitie him; becauſe his durance was willing, and (as he hoped) meritorious: but, ſuch incouragement as he had from me, ſuch thanke ſhall he haue from God; who in ſtead of an Euge, which he lookes for, ſhall angerly challenge him, with Who required this? I leaue him now, in his owne fetters; you, to your worthy and honourable employments.

TO SIR DAVID MVRRAY.

EPIST. VI. Concerning the Miracles of our time.

INdeed the world abounds with miracles. Theſe, while they fill the mouths of many, ſway the faith of ſome, and make all men wonder. Our nature is greedy of newes; which it will rather ſaine than want. Certainly, ere long, miracles will be no wonders, for their frequence. I had thought, our age had had too many gray haires, and with time experience, and with experience craſt, to haue deſcried a Iuggler: but now I ſee by the ſimplicitie, it declines to its ſecond childhood. The two Lipſian Ladies, the charmes of Bluntſtones boy, and Garnets ſtraw, what a noiſe haue they made! I onely wonder how Faux and Catesby eſcaped the honour of Saints, and priuilege of miracles. Herein you aske my ſentence; more ſeaſonably than you hoped. For I meant to haue wrote a iuſt volume of this ſubiect, and furniſht my ſelſe accordingly in that Region of wonders; but that I feared to ſurcharge the nice ſtomacke of our time, with too much. Neither would my length haue ought auailed you; whoſe thoughts are ſo taken vp with ſo high and ſeruiceable cares, that they can giue no leiſure to an ouer-long diſcourſe. May it pleaſe you therefore to receiue in ſhort, what I haue deliberately reſolued in my ſelſe, and thinke I can make good to others.

I haue noted foure rankes of commonly-named miracles: from which, if you make a iuſt ſubduction, how few of our wonders ſhall remaine either to beleeſe or admiration? The firſt meerely reported, not ſeene to be done; the next ſeeming to be done, but counterfeited; the third, truly done, but not true miracles; the laſt, truly miraculous, but by Satan. The firſt of theſe are bred of lies, and nouriſhed by credulity: The mouth of Fame is full of ſuch blaſts. For theſe, if I liſted a while to rake in the Legends and booke of Conformities, an ingenuous Papiſt could not but bluſh, an indifferent Reader could not but lay his hand on his ſpleene, and wonder as much that any man could be ſo impudent to broach ſuch reports, or any ſo ſimple to beleeue them; as the credulous multitude wonders that any ſhould be ſo powerfull to effect them. But I ſeeke neither their ſhame, nor others laughter. I dare ſay, not the Talmud, not the Alcoran, hath more impoſſible tales, more ridiculous lies. Yea, to this head, Canus himſelfe (a famous Papiſt) dares referre many of thoſe ancient miracles reported and (by all likelihood) beleeued of Bede and Gregory. The next are bred of fraud and cozenage, nouriſhed by ſuperſtition. Who knowes not, how the famous Kentiſh Idoll moued her eyes, and hands, by thoſe ſecret gimmers, which now euery Puppet-play can imitate? How Saint Wilfreds needle opened to the penitent, and cloſed it ſelſe to the guilty? How our Lady ſheds the teares of a bleeding Vine? and doth many of her daily feats, as Bel did of old eat vp his banquet, or as Picens the Eremite faſted forty daies. But theſe two euery honeſt Papiſt will confeſſe, with voluntary ſhame and griefe; and grant that it may grow a diſputable queſtion whether Mountebanks or Prieſts are the greater cozeners. Viues, beyond his wont, vehemently, termes them execrable and Satanicall impoſtors. The third are true workes of God vnder a falſe title: God giues them their being, men their name: vniuſt, becauſe aboue their nature; wherein the Philoſopher and the ſuperſtitiouſly-ignorant, are contrarily extreme: while the one ſeekes out naturall cauſes of Gods immediate and metaphyſicall workes; the other aſcribes ordinary effects to ſupernaturall cauſes. If the violence of a diſeaſe ceaſe, after a vow made to our Lady; if a ſouldier, armed with this vow ſcape gun-ſhot; a captiue priſon; a woman trauelling, death; the vulgar (and I would they alone) cry out, A miracle. One Load-ſtone hath more wonder in it, than a thouſand ſuch euents. Euery thing drawes a baſe minde to admiration. Franceſco del Campo (one of the Arch-Dukes Quiryes) told vs not without importunate deuotion, that in that fatall field of Newport, his vow to their Virgin helpt him to ſwim ouer a large water, when the oars of his arms had neuer before tried any waues. A dogge hath done more, without acknowledgement of any Saint. Feare giues ſudden inſtincts of skill, euen without precept. Their owne Coſterus durſt ſay, that the cure of a diſeaſe is no miracle: His reaſon; becauſe it may be done by the power of Nature, albe in a longer time. * Yeeld this, and what haue Lipſius his two Ladies done? wherefore ſerues all this clamor, from the two hils? I aſſented not; neither will be herein thus much their enemy: For, as well the manner of doing, as the matter, makes a miracle. If Peters handkerchiefe, or ſhadow, heale a diſeaſe, it is miraculous, though it might haue been done by a potion. Many of their recoueries (doubtleſſe) haue beene wrought through the ſtrength of Nature in the Patient; not of vertue in the Saint. How many ſick men haue mended, with their phyſicke in their pocket? Though many other alſo (I doubt not) of thoſe cures haue fallen into the fourth head; which indeed is more knotty, and require a deeper diſcourſe. Wherein, if I ſhall euince theſe two things, I ſhall (I hope) ſatisfie my Reader, and cleare the Truth: One, that miracles are wrought by Satan; the other, that thoſe which the Romiſh Church boaſteth, are of this nature, of this author. I contend not of words: we take miracles in Auguſtines large ſenſe; wherein is little difference betwixt a thing maruellous and miraculous; ſuch as the Spirit of God in either inſtrument cals θαυμάσια and נפלאות. Perhaps it would be more proper to ſay, that God workes theſe miracles by Satan: for, as in the naturall and voluntary motions of wicked men; ſo in the ſupernaturall acts of euill ſpirits (as they are acts) there is more than a meere permiſſion. Satan, by his tempeſt, bereaues Iob of his children; yet Iob, looking higher, ſaith, The Lord hath taken. No ſophiſtry can elude this proofe of Moſes; that a Prophet or dreamer may giue a true ſigne or wonder, and yet ſay, Let vs goe after ſtrange gods: nor that of our Sauiour, who foretels of falſe chriſts, falſe prophets that ſhall giue σημεῖα μεγάλα ϗ τέρατα; ſignes and wonders, and thoſe great. There are ſome too great, I grant, for the hand of all infernall powers; by which, our Sauiour inuincibly proues the truth of his Deity: Theſe neuer graced falſhood, neither admit any precedent from our times. As to the reſt ſo frequent and common; for me, I could not beleeue the Church of Rome were Antichriſtian, if it had not boaſted of theſe wonders. All the knot lies then in the application of this to Rome, and our imaginary Lady: How ſhall it appeare, that their miracles are of this kinde? Ludouicus Viues giues ſix notes to diſtinguiſh Gods miracles from Satans: Lipſius three: Both of them too many, as might eaſily be diſcouered by diſcuſſing of particulars. It is not ſo much the greatneſſe of the worke, nor the beleefe of witneſſes, nor the quality nor manner of the action, nor truth of eſſence, that can deſcry the immediate hand which worketh in our miracles. That alone is the true and golden rule, which Iuſtin Martyr (if at leaſt that booke be his) preſcribes in his Queſtions and Anſwers; How ſhall it be knowne that our miracles are better than the Heathens, although the euent countenance both alike? Reſp. Ex fide & cultu veri Dei: Miracles muſt be iudged by the doctrine which they confirme; not the doctrine by the miracles. The Dreamer, or Prophet muſt be eſteemed, not by the euent of his wonder, but by the ſubſtance and ſcope of his teaching. The Romaniſts argue prepoſterouſly, while they would proue the truth of their Church by miracles; wheras they ſhold proue their miracles by the truth. To ſay nothing of the faſhion of their cures, that one is preſcribed to come to our Lady rather on a Friday, as * Henry Loyez; another, to waſh nine daies in the water of MONTAGV, as Leonard Stocquean; another to eat a peece of the Oake where the image ſtood, as * Magdaleine the widow of Bruxelles. All which, if they ſauour not ſtrong of magicall receits, let the indifferent iudge. Surely, either there is no ſorcery, or this is it. All ſhall be plaine, if the doctrine confirmed by their miracles be once diſcuſſed: for, if that be diuine truth, we doe vniuſtly impugne theſe workes as diabolicall; if falſhood, they doe blaſphemouſly proclaime them for diuine. Theſe workes tend all chiefly to this double doctrine; that the bleſſed Virgin is to be inuoked, for her mediation; That God and Saints are to be adored in and by images; Poſitions that would require a volume, and ſuch as are liberally diſputed by others: whereof one is againſt Scripture; the other (which in theſe caſes values no leſſe) beſides it. One deifies the Virgin; the other a ſtocke or ſtone. It matters not what ſubtile diſtinctions their learned Doctors make betwixt mediation of Redemption, and Interceſſion, Δουλεία and Λατρεία the Saint and the Image: We know, their common people, whoſe deuotion enriches thoſe ſhrines (by confeſſion of their owne Writers) climbe the hill of Zichem with this conceit, that Mary is their Sauioreſſe; that the ſtocke is their Goddeſſe: which vnleſſe it be true, how doe their wonders teach them lies! and therefore how from God? But, to take the firſt at beſt (for the ſecond is ſo groſſe, that were not the ſecond Commandement by Papiſts purpoſely razed out of their Primiers, children and carters would condemne it) it cannot be denyed, that all the ſubſtance of prayer is in the heart; the vocall ſound is but a complement, and as an outward caſe wherein our thoughts are ſheathed. That power cannot know the prayer, which knowes not the heart: either then the Virgin is God, for that ſhe knowes the heart; or to know the heart is not proper to God: or to know the heart, and ſo our prayers, is falſely aſcribed to the Virgin: and therefore theſe wonders, which teach men thus to honour her, are Doctors of lies; ſo, not of God. There cannot be any diſcourſe wherein it is more eaſie to be tedious. To end; If prayers were but in words, and Saints did meddle with all particularities of earthly things, yet bleſſed Mary ſhould be a God, if ſhe could at once attend all her ſuters. One ſollicites her at Halle, another at Scherpenheuuel, another at Luca, at our Walſingham another; one in Europe, another in Aſia; or perhaps another is one of her new Clients in America. Ten thouſand deuout Suppliants are at once proſtrate before her ſeuerall ſhrines. If ſhe cannot heare all, why pray they? If ſhe can, what can God doe more? Certainly (as the matter is vſed) there cannot be greater wrong offered to thoſe heauenly ſpirits, than by our importunate ſuperſtitions to be thruſt into Gods Throne; and to haue forced vpon them the honours of their Maker. There is no contradiction in heauen: a Saint cannot allow that an Angell forbids. See thou doe it not, was the voice of an Angell: if all the miraculous blockes in the world ſhall ſpeake contrary, we know whom to beleeue. The old rule was, * Μαρίαν μηδεὶς προσκυνείτω: Either that rule is deuilliſh, or this practice. And if this practice be ill, God deliuer me from the immediate author of theſe miracles. Change but one Idoll for another, and what differ the wonders of Apollos Temples, from thoſe of theſe Chappels? We reuerence (as we ought) the memory of that holy and happy Virgin: We hate thoſe that diſhonour her; we hate thoſe that deifie her. Curſed be all honour that is ſtolne from God.

Examen Pacifique de la doctrine des Huguenots.
O ſauuereſſe ſauue moy. Manuel of French prayers, printed at Liege by approbation and authoritie of Anton. Ghenart. Inquiſitor, &c.

* Let no man worſhip the Virgin Mary.

This ſhort ſatisfaction I giue, in a long queſtion; ſuch as I dare reſt in; and reſolue that all popiſh miracles are either falſly reported, or falſly done, or falſly miraculous, or falſly aſcribed to heauen.

TO Mr. WILLIAM BEDELL at Venice.

EP. VII. Lamenting the death of our late Diuines and exciting to their imitation.

WE haue heard, how full of trouble, and danger, the Alpes were to you; and did at once both pity your difficulties, and reioyce in your ſafety. Since your departure from vs, Reynolds is departed from the world. Alas, how many worthy Lights haue our eies ſeene ſhining and extinguiſht? How many loſſes haue we liued to ſee the Church ſuſtaine, and lament; of her children, of her pillars; our owne, and forraine; I ſpeake not of thoſe, which (being excellent) would needs bee obſcure: whom nothing but their owne ſecrecy depriued of the honour of our teares. There are, beſides, too many whom the world noted and admired; euen ſince the time that our common mother acknowledged vs for her ſonnes. Our Fulke led the way; that profound, ready, and reſolute Doctor, the hammer of hereticks, The champion of Truth; whom your younger times haue heard oft diſputing acutely and powerfully. Next him, followed that honour of our Schooles, and Angell of our Church, learned Whitakers; than whom our age ſaw nothing more memorable: what clearneſſe of iudgement, what ſweetneſſe of ſtyle, what grauity of perſon, what grace of cariage was in that man? Who euer ſaw him without reuerence? or heard him without wonder? Soone after, left the world that famous and illuminate Doctor, Francis Iunius, the glory of Leiden, the other hope of the Church, the Oracle of Textuall and Schoole-Diuinity, rich in languages, ſubtile in diſtinguiſhing, and in argument inuincible: and his companion in labours, Lu. Trelcatius, would needs be his companion in ioyes; who had doubled our ſorrow and loſſe, but that he recompenced it with a ſonne like himſelfe. Soone after, fell old reuerend Beza; a long fixed ſtarre in this firmament of the Church: who, after many excellent monuments of learning and fidelity, liued to proue vpon his aduerſaries, that hee was not dead at their day. Neither may I, without iniury, omit that worthy payre of our late Diuines, Greenham and Perkins: whereof the one excelled in experimentall diuinitie, & knew well how to ſtay a weake conſcience, how to raiſe a fallen, how to ſtrike a remorſleſſe: The other, in a diſtinct iudgement, and a rare dexterity in clearing the obſcure ſubtleties of the Schoole, and eaſie explication of the moſt perplex diſcourſes. Doctor Reynolds is the laſt; not in worth, but in the time of his loſſe. He alone was a well furniſht librarie, full of all faculties, of all ſtudies, of all learning: the memory, the reading of that man were neere to a miracle. Theſe are gone, amongſt many more, whom the Church mournes for in ſecret: would God her loſſe could be as eaſily ſupplied, as lamented. Her ſorrow is for thoſe that are paſt; her remainder of ioy in thoſe that remaine; her hope in the next age. I pray God the cauſes of her hope, and ioy, may bee equiualent to thoſe of her griefe.

What ſhould this worke in vs, but an imitation, yea (that word is not too bigge for you) an emulation of their worthineſſe? It is no pride, for a man to wiſh himſelfe ſpiritually better than he dare hope to reach: nay, I am deceiued, if it be not true humility. For what doth this argue him, but low in his conceit, high in his deſires onely? Or if ſo; happy is the ambition of grace, and power of ſincere ſeruiceableneſſe to God. Let vs wiſh and affect this, while the world layes plots for greatneſſe: Let me not proſper, if I beſtow enuy on them. He is great, that is good: and no man, me thinkes, is happy on earth, to him that hath grace for ſubſtance, and learning for ornament. If you know it not, the Church (our mother) lookes for much at your hands: ſhe knowes how rich our common father hath left you: ſhe notes your graces, your opportunities, your imployments: ſhe thinks you are gone ſo farre, like a good Merchant, for no ſmall gaine; and lookes you ſhall come home well laded. And for vent of your preſent commodities (tho our chiefe hope of ſucceſſe be cut off with that vnhoped peace) yet what can hinder your priuate trafficke for God? I hope (and who doth not?) that this blow will leaue in your noble Venetians a perpetuall feare; and that their late irreſolution ſhall make them euer capable of all better counſell; and haue his worke (like ſome great Eclipſe) many yeares after. How happy were it for Venice, if as ſhe is euery yeare married to the Sea, ſo ſhe were once throughly eſpouſed to Chriſt! In the meane time, let me perſwade you to gratifie vs at home with the publication of that your exquiſite Polemicall diſcourſe, whereto our conference with M. Alablaſter gaue ſo happy an occaſion: You ſhall hereby cleare many truths, and ſatiſfie all Readers: yea, I doubt not, but an aduerſary (if not too peruerſe) ſhall acknowledge the Truths victory and yours. It was wholſome counſell of a Father, that in the time of an hereſie euery man ſhould write. Perhaps, you complaine of the inundations of Francford: How many haue been diſcouraged raged from benefiting the world, be this conceit of multitude! Indeed we all write; and while we write, cry out of number. How well might many be ſpared, euen of thoſe that complaine of too many? whoſe importunate babling cloyes the world, without vſe.

* * *

To my Lord, the Earle of Eſſex.

Epist. VIII. Aduice for his Trauels.

MY Lord, both my dutie and promiſe make my Letters your debt; and, if neither of theſe, my thirſt of your good. You ſhall neuer but need good counſell; moſt in trauell: Then are both our dangers greater, and our hopes.

I need not to tell you the eyes of the world are much vpon you, for your owne ſake, for your fathers: only let your eyes be vpon it againe, to obſerue it, to ſatisfie it, and in ſome caſes to contemn it. As your graces, ſo your weakneſſes, will be the ſooner ſpied, by how much you are more noted. The higher any building is, the more it requires exquiſit proportion: which in ſome low and rude piles, is needleſſe. If your vertues ſhall be eminent like your fathers, you cannot ſo hide your ſelfe, but the world will ſee you, and force vpon you applauſe & admiration, in ſpight of modeſty: but if you ſhall come ſhort in theſe, your fathers perfection ſhall be your blemiſh. Thinke, now, that more eyes are vpon you, than at home; of forrainers, of your owne; theirs to obſerue, ours to expect. For, now we account you in the Schoole of wiſedome: whence if you returne not better, you ſhall worſe, with the loſſe of your time, of our hopes. For, I know not how naturall it is to vs to looke for alteration in trauell; and, with the change of aire and land, to preſuppoſe a change in the perſon. Now you are (through both your yeeres and trauell) in the forge of your hopes. We all looke (not without deſire and apprecation) in what ſhape you will come forth. Thinke it not enough, that you ſee, or can ſay you haue ſeene ſtrange things of nature, or euent: it is a vaine and dead trauell, that reſts in the eye, or the tongue. All is but loſt, vnleſſe your buſie minde ſhall from the body that it ſees, draw forth ſome quinteſſence of obſeruation, wherewith to informe, & inrich it ſelfe. There is nothing can quite the coſt and labour of trauell, but the gaine of wiſdome. How many haue we ſeene and pittied, which haue brought nothing frō forrain countries, but miſhapen clothes, or exoticall geſtures, or new games, or affected liſpings, or the diſeaſes of the place, or (which is worſt) the vices? Theſe men haue at once wandered from their countrie, and from themſelues: and ſome of them (too eaſie to inſtance) haue left God behind them; or perhaps, in ſtead of him, haue after a looſe and filthy life, brought home ſome idle Puppet in a box, whereon to ſpend their deuotion. Let their wracke warne you: and let their follies be entertained by you, with more deteſtation than pittie. I know your honour too well to feare you: your young yeares haue beene ſo graciouſly preuented with ſoueraigne antidotes of truth and holy inſtruction, that this infection deſpaires of preuailing. Your very blood giues you argument of ſafety: yet good counſell is not vnſeaſonable, euen where danger is not ſuſpected. For Gods ſake, my Lord, whatſoeuer you gaine, loſe nothing of the truth; remit nothing of your loue and pietie to God; of your fauour and zeale to religion. As ſure as there is a God, you were trained vp in the true knowledge of him. If either Angell, or Deuill, or Ieſuit ſhould ſuggeſt the contrary, ſend him away with defiance. There you ſee and heare euery day, the true mother and the fained, ſtriuing and pleading for the liuing child. The true Prince of peace hath paſt ſentence from heauen, on our ſide. Doe not you ſtoope ſo much as to a doubt, or to motion of irreſolution.

Abandon thoſe from your table and ſalt, whom your owne and others experience ſhall deſcry dangerous: Thoſe Serpents are full of inſinuations: But, of all, thoſe of your owne country; which are ſo much the more pernicious, by how much they haue more colour of priuilege of intireneſſe. Religion is the greateſt care: aduices for cariage, and improuement of trauell, challenge the next place. I need not counſell you to keepe your ſtate with affability; and ſo to menage your ſelfe, as that your courteſie may be more viſible than your greatneſſe. Nature hath taught you this; and hath ſecretly propagated it from your father: who by his ſweetneſſe of diſpoſition; wonne as many hearts, as by his valour and munificence. I rather tell you, that a good nature hath betrayed many; who looking for that in others, which they found in themſelues, haue at laſt complained of their owne credulity, and others deceit. Truſt not ſtrangers too much, with your counſell, with your perſon: and in your greateſt familiarities, haue an eye to their common diſpoſition, and infirmities. Thoſe natures wherewith you conuerſe, are ſubiect to diſpleaſure, and violent in purſuit of ſmall indignities. Yeſterday heard I named, from no vnfaithfull report, a French Courtier, that in ſingle combat hath ſent eighteene ſoules from the field to their place: yet he euer as the patient in the quarell; and for this mentioned with more than excuſe: I cenſure not how iuſtly. This is others care: Only hence I argue the riſeneſſe of vnkindneſſe taken, and purſued. You ſhall ſee, that the ſoyle is not ſo diuers, as the inclination of perſons; who in all Climates, though they differ in particulars, yet ſtill agree too well in common faults. The Italian deepe, cloſe, and craftie; the French raſh; the German dull. One not forward to offer wrongs, but apprehenſiue of a ſmall wrong offered: another, prone either to take, or giue them; but not vneaſie to remit: another, long in conceiuing, long in retaining. What doe I exemplifie? There are long Catalogues of peculiar vices, that haunt ſpeciall places; which, if they were not notoriouſly infamous, my charity would ſerue me to particularize. It were pitie there ſhould be fewer vertues, locall and proper. There are good vſes to be made of others enormities; if no more, by them to correct our owne: who loaths vice in another is in good forwardneſſe to leaue it in himſelfe. The view of the publike calamities, and diſorders of other Churches, ſhall beſt teach you thankfulneſſe for the better ſtate of ours: But better vſe of their vertues; by how much it is more excellent to know what we ſhould doe, than what ſhould not. You muſt now looke vpon all things, not with the eye of a ſtranger only, but of a Philoſopher, but of a Chriſtian; which accounts all loſſe, that is not reduced to practice. It is a great praiſe, that you are wiſer by the contemplation of forraine things; but much greater, that you re better.

That you haue ſeene Cities, and Courts, and Alpes, and Riuers, can neuer yeeld you ſo ſound comfort, as that you haue lookt ſeriouſly into your ſelfe. In-vaine doe we affect all forraine knowledge, if we be not throughly acquainted at home. Thinke much, and ſay little, eſpecially in occaſions of diſpraiſe: wherein, both a little is enough, and oft-times any thing is too much. You cannot inquire too much: that which in vs inferiours would be cenſured for dangerous curioſity; in your Greatneſſe ſhall be conſtrued as a commendable deſire of knowledge. Ask ſtill after men of greateſt parts and reputation: and where you finde Fame no lyer, note and reſpect them. Make choice of thoſe for conuerſation, which either in preſent, or in hope are eminent: and when you meet with excellencies in any facultie, leaue not without ſome gaine of knowledge. What are others graces to you, if you only admire them; not imitate, not appropriate them? Loe, your equals in time grow vp happily in the College (ſo I may terme it) of our young and hopefull Court, which you haue left; and aboue all, that gratious Preſident of worthineſſe and perfection: whom while in all other things you ſerue, you may without reproofe emulate for learning, vertue, piety. My ſelfe am witneſſe of their progreſſe; which I doe ioyfully gratulate to the ſucceeding age. Beware, leſt their diligence ſhall out-ſtrip you, and vpbraid you with that ancient checke of going far and faring worſe. I am bold and buſie in counſelling: you abound with better monitors; and the beſt you cary about, I hope, in your owne boſome. Though theſe ſhould be needleſſe, yet they argue my humble affection, and diſcharge my dutie. My prayers are better than my counſells; both of them heartie and vnfained for your good. God guide and returne you ſafe, from a iourney not more happie and proſperous than I wiſh it.

To Sir Robert Drvry, and his Lady.

Epist. IX. Concerning my remouall from them.

With how vnwilling a heart I leaue you, hee knowes that ſearches the heart: Neither durſt I goe, but that I ſenſibly ſee his hand pulling mee from you. Indeed, deſire of competencie betrayed me, at firſt; and drew mine eyes to looke aſide: but, when I bent them vpon the place, and ſaw the number and the need of the people, together with their hunger and applauſe, meeting with the circumſtances of Gods ſtrange conueyance of this offer to me; I ſaw, that was but as the Fowlers feather, to make me ſtoope: and, contemning that reſpect of my ſelfe, I ſincerely acknowledged higher motiues of my yeelding; and reſolued I might not reſiſt. You are deare to me, as a charge to a Paſtor; If my paines to you haue not proued it, ſuſpect me: Yet I leaue you. God calls me to a greater worke: I muſt follow him. It were more eaſe to me, to liue ſecretly hidden in that quiet obſcurity, as Saul amongſt the ſtuffe, than to be drawne out to the eye of the world, to act ſo high a part before a thouſand witneſſes. In this point, if I ſeeme to neglect you, blame me not; I muſt neglect and forget my ſelfe. I can but labour, whereſoeuer I am. God knowes how willingly I doe that, whether there or here. I ſhall digge, and delue, and plant, in what ground ſoeuer my Maſter ſets me. If he take me to a larger field, complaine you not of loſſe, while the Church may gaine. But, you are mine owne Charge; No wiſe father neglects his owne, in compaſſion of the greater need of others: yet conſider, that euen carefull Parents, when the Prince commands, leaue their families, and goe to warfare. What if God hath called me to heauen; would you haue grudged my departure? Imagine I am there, where I ſhall be; although the caſe be not to you altogether ſo hopeleſſe: for, now I may heare of you, viſit you, renue my holy counſels, and be mutually comforted from you; there, none of theſe. He, that will once tranſpoſe me from earth to heauen, hath now choſen to tranſpoſe me from one peece of earth to another: what is here worthy of your ſorrow, worthy of complaint? That ſhould be for my owne good: this ſhall be for the good of many. If your experience haue taught you that my labours doe promiſe profit; obtaine of your ſelfe to deny your ſelfe ſo much, as to reioyce that the loſſe of a few ſhould be the aduantage of many ſoules. Tho, why doe I ſpeake of loſſe? I ſpeake that as your feare, not my owne: and your affection cauſeth that feare, rather than the occaſion.

The God of the Harueſt ſhall ſend you a Labourer, more able, as carefull: That is my prayer, and hope, and ſhall be my ioy. I dare not leaue but in this expectation, this aſſurance. What-euer become of me, it ſhall be my greateſt comfort to heare you commend your change; and to ſee your happie progreſſe in thoſe wayes I haue both ſhewed you, and beaten. So ſhall we meet in the end, and neuer part.

EPIST. X. Againſt the feare of Death.

YOu complaine, that you feare death: He is no man that doth not. Beſides the paine, Nature ſhrinkes at the thought of parting. If you would learne the remedie, know the cauſe; for that ſhe is ignorant and faithleſſe. Shee would not be cowardly, if ſhee were not fooliſh. Our feare is from doubt, and our doubt is from vnbeleefe: and whence is our vnbeleefe, but chiefly from ignorance? She knowes not what good is elſewhere: ſhee beleeues not her part in it. Get once true knowledge and true faith, your feare ſhall vaniſh alone. Aſſurance of heauenly things, makes vs willing to part with earthly. He cannot contemne this life, that knowes not the other. If you would deſpiſe earth therefore, thinke of heauen. If you would haue death eaſie, thinke of that glorious life that followes it. Certainly, if we can endure paine, for health; much more ſhould wee abide a few pangs for glory. Thinke how fondly we feare a vanquiſht enemie. Loe, Chriſt hath triumpht ouer Death: he bleedeth and gaſpeth vnder vs: and yet we tremble. It is enough to vs, that Chriſt died: neither would he haue died, but that we might die with ſafetie and pleaſure.

Thinke that death is neceſſarily annexed to nature: We are for a time, on condition that we ſhall not be; we receiue life, but vpon the termes of re-deliuery. Neceſſitie makes ſome things eaſie; as it vſually makes eaſie things difficult. It is a fond iniuſtice to embrace the couenant, and ſhrinke at the condition.

Thinke, there is but one common rode to all fleſh: There are no by-paths of any fairer or nearer way; no, not for Princes. Euen company abateth miſeries: and the commonneſſe of an euill makes it leſſe fearefull. What worlds of men are gone before vs; yea, how many thouſands out of one field? How many Crownes and Scepters lie piled vp at the gates of Death, which their owners haue left there, as ſpoiles to the conquerour? Haue we beene at ſo many graues, and ſo oft ſeene our ſelues die in our friends; and doe we ſhrinke when our courſe commeth? Imagine you alone were exempted from the common law of mankind, or were condemned to Methuſalahs age; aſſure your ſelfe, death is not now ſo fearefull, as your life would then be wearisome.

Thinke not ſo much what Death is, as from whom he comes, and for what. We receiue euen homely meſſengers from great perſons; not without reſpect to their maſters: And what matters it who he be, ſo he bring vs good newes? What newes can be better than this, That God ſends for you, to take poſſeſſion of a Kingdome? Let them feare Death, which know him but as a purſuiuant ſent from hell; whom their conſcience accuſeth of a life wilfully filthy; and bindes-ouer ſecretly to condemnation: We know whither we are going, and whom we haue beleeued: Let vs paſſe on cheerefully, thorow theſe blacke gates vnto our glory.

Laſtly, know that our improuidence only addes terrour vnto death. Thinke of death, and you ſhall not feare it. Doe you not ſee, that euen Beares and Tygres ſeeme not terrible to thoſe that liue with them? How haue wee ſeene their Keepers ſport with them, when the beholders durſt ſcarce truſt their chaine? Be acquainted with Death: though he looke grimme vpon you at firſt, you ſhall finde him (yea, you ſhall make him) a good companion. Familiaritie cannot ſtand with feare. Theſe are receits enow. Too much ſtore doth rather ouer-whelme than ſatisfie. Take but theſe, and I dare promiſe you ſecuritie.

THE SECOND DECAD.

To Sir ROBERT DARCY.

Ep. I. The eſtate of a true, but weake Chriſtian.

IF you aske how I fare: Sometimes, no man better; and, if the fault were not mine owne, Alwaies. Not that I can command health, and bid the world ſmile when I liſt. How poſſible is it for a man to be happy without theſe; yea, in ſpight of them? Theſe things can neither augment, nor impaire thoſe comforts that come from aboue. What vſe, what ſight is there of the ſtarres, when the Sunne ſhines? Then onely can I finde my ſelfe happy, when (ouer-looking theſe earthly things) I can fetch my ioy from heauen. I tell him that knowes it, the contentments that earth can afford her beſt Fauourites are weake, imperfect, changeable, momentany; and ſuch, as euer end in complaint. Wee ſorrow that wee had them; and, while wee haue them, we dare not truſt them: Thoſe from aboue are full, and conſtant. What an heauen doe I feele in my ſelfe, when (after many trauerſes of meditation) I find in my heart a feeling poſſeſſion of my God! When I can walke, and conuerſe with the God of heauen, not without an openneſſe of heart and familiarity: When my ſoule hath caught faſt, and ſenſible hold of my Sauiour; and either pulls him downe to it ſelfe, or rather lifts vp it ſelfe to him; and can and dare ſecretly auouch, I know whom I haue beleeued: When I can looke vpon all this inferior creation, with the eyes of a ſtranger, & am tranſported to my home in my thoughts; ſolacing my ſelfe in the view & meditation of my future glory, and that preſent of the Saints: When I ſee wherefore I was made, and my conſcience tells me I haue done that for which I came; done it, not ſo as I can boaſt, but ſo as it is accepted; while my weakneſſes are pardoned, and my acts meaſured by my deſires, and my deſires by their ſincerity: Laſtly, when I can finde my ſelfe (vpon holy reſolution) made firme and ſquare, fit to entertaine all euents; the good with moderate regard, the euill with courage and patience, both with thankes; ſtrongly ſetled to good purpoſes, conſtant and cheerefull in deuotion; and, in a word, ready for God, yea full of God. Sometimes I can be thus, and pity the poore and miſerable proſperity of the godleſſe; and laugh at their moneths of vanity, and ſorrow at my owne: But then againe (for why ſhould I ſhame to confeſſe it?) the world thruſts it ſelfe betwixt me and heauen; and, by his darke and indigeſted parts, eclipſeth that light which ſhined to my ſoule. Now, a ſenſleſſe dulneſſe ouertakes me, and beſots me; my luſt to deuotion is little, my ioy none at all: Gods face is hid, and I am troubled. Then I begin to compare my ſelfe with others, and thinke, Are all men thus blockiſh and earthen? or am I alone

worſe than the reſt,and ſingular in my wretchedneſſe? Now I carry my carcaſſe vp and downe careleſly,and(as dead bodies are rubbed,without heat) I doe in vaine force vpon my ſelfe delights,which others laugh at: I endeuour my wonted worke,but without an heart; there is nothing is not tedious to me,no not my ſelfe.

Thus I am, till I ſingle my ſelfe out alone,to him that alone can reuiue me: I reaſon with my ſelfe,and confer with him; I chide my ſelfe, and intreat him: and after ſome ſpirituall ſpeeches interchanged, I renue my familiarity with him; and he the tokens of his loue to me. Lo,then I liue againe,and applaud my ſelfe in this happineſſe, and wiſh it might euer continue,and thinke baſely of the world in compariſon of it. Thus I hold on, riſing and falling; neither know, whether I ſhould more praiſe God for thus much fruition of him,or blame my ſelfe for my inconſtancy in good;more reioyce,that ſomtimes I am well,or grieue that I am not ſo alwaies. I ſtriue,and wiſh,rather than hope, for better. This is our warfare; we may not looke to triumph alwaies; we muſt ſmart ſometimes,and complaine;and then againe reioyce that we can complaine;and grieue that we can reioyce no more, and that we can grieue no more. Our hope is, if we bee patient, we ſhall once be conſtant.

To Sir EDMVND BACON.

EPIST. II. Of the benefit of retiredneſſe and ſecrecy.

SVſpect(if you can)that,becauſe now many cold windes blow betwixt vs,my affection can be cooler to you. True loue is like a ſtrong ſtreame,which the further it is from the head,runs with more violence. The thoughts of thoſe pleaſures I was wont to find in your preſence,were neuer ſo delightful,as now when I am barred from renuing them. I wiſh me with you; yea (if I could or might wiſh to change) I ſhould wiſh me your ſelfe. To liue hidden, was neuer but ſafe, and pleaſant; but now, ſo much better,as the world is worſe. It is a happines,not to be a witneſſe of the miſchiefe of the times; which it is hard to ſee,and be guiltleſſe. Your philoſophicall Cell is a ſafe ſhelter from tumults,from vices,from diſcontentments.Beſides that liuely,honeſt,and manly pleaſure, which ariſes from the gaine of knowledge in the deepe myſteries of Nature; how eaſie is it in that place to liue free from the common cares, from the infection of common euils! Whether the Spaniard gaine or ſaue by his peace, and how he keepes it; and whether it were ſafer for the States to lay downe armes, and be at once ſtill and free;Whether the Emperors truce with the Turke were honourable and ſeaſonable; and whether Venice haue won or loſt by her late iarres; are thoughts that dare not looke in at thoſe doores. Who is enuied,and who pitied at Court;Who buies hopes and kindneſſe deareſt; who laies ſecret mines to blow vp another, that himſelfe may ſucceed,can neuer trouble you: Theſe cares dare not enter into that Sanctuary of peace.Thence you can ſee how all that liue publike are toſſed in theſe waues, and pity them. For, great places haue ſeldome ſafe and eaſie entrances: and (which is worſt) great charges can hardly be plauſibly weilded, without ſome indirect policies. Alas! their priuileges cannot counteruaile their toile. Weary daies, and reſtleſſe nights, ſhort liſes and long cares, weake bodies and vnquiet mindes,attend lightly on greatneſſe. Either Clients breake their ſleepe in the morning,or the intention of their minde driues it off from the firſt watch. Either ſuits or complaints thruſt themſelues into their recreations; and packets of Letters interrupt their meales. It is euer Terme with them, without Vacation. Their buſineſſes admit no night, no holiday. Loe, your priuacy frees you from all this,and what euer other glorious miſery. There you may ſleepe, and eat, and honeſtly diſport, and enioy your ſelfe, and command both your praiſes and others. And whiles you are happy, you liue out of the reach of enuy; vnleſſe my ſelfe ſend that gueſt thither: which I ſhould iuſtly condemne as the fault of my loue. No man offers to vndermine you, none to diſgrace you: you could not want theſe inconueniences abroad. Yea, let a man liue in the open world, but as a looker on, he ſhall be ſure not to want abundance of vexations. An ill minde holds it an eaſie torment, to liue in continuall ſight of euill; if not rather a pleaſure: but, to the well-diſpoſed, it is next to Hell. Certainly, to liue among Toads and Serpents, is a Paradiſe to this. One ieſts pleaſantly with his Maker: another makes himſelfe ſport with Scripture. One fills his mouth with oathes of ſound: another ſcoffes at the religious. One ſpeakes villany; another laughes at it; a third defends it. One makes himſelfe a Swine, another a Deuill: Who (that is not all earth) can endure this? who cannot wiſh himſelfe rather a deſolate Hermite, or a cloſe priſoner? Euery euill we ſee, doth either vex, or infect vs. Your retiredneſſe auoids this; yet ſo, as it equally eſcapes all the euills of ſolitarineſſe. You are full of friends; whoſe ſociety, intermixed with your cloſeneſſe, makes you to want little of publike. The Deſert is too wilde, the Citie too populous: the Country is only fit for reſt. I know, there want not ſome obſcure corners, ſo haunted with dulneſſe, that as they yeeld no outward vnquietneſſe, ſo no inward contentment. Yours is none of thoſe; but ſuch as ſtriues rather with the pleaſure of it, to requite the ſolitarineſſe. The Court is for honour, the Citie for gaine, the Countrey for quietneſſe; a bleſſing that need not (in the iudgement of the wiſeſt) yeeld to the other two. Yea, how many haue we knowne, that hauing nothing but a coat of thatch to hide them from heauen, yet haue pitied the carefull pompe of the mightie? how much more may thoſe which haue full hands and quiet hearts, pitie them both? I doe not ſo much praiſe you in this, as wonder at you. I know many vpon whom the conſcience of their wants forces a neceſſary obſcuritie; who if they can ſteale a vertue out of neceſſitie, it is well: but, I no where know ſo excellent parts ſhrouded in ſuch willing ſecrecie. The world knowes you, and wants you; and yet you are voluntarily hid. Loue your ſelfe ſtill; and make much of this ſhadow, vntill our common mother call you forth to her neceſſary ſeruice, and charge you to neglect your ſelfe, to pleaſure her. Which once done, you know where to finde peace. Whether others applaud you, I am ſure, you ſhall your ſelfe: and I ſhall ſtill magnifie you, and (what I can) imitate you.

EPIST. III. An Apologeticall diſcourſe of the mariage of Eccleſiaſticall perſons.

I Know not whether this quarell be worthy of an anſwer, or rather of a ſilent ſcorne; or if an anſwer, whether merry or ſerious. I doe not willingly ſuffer my pen to wade into queſtions: yet this argument ſeemes ſhallow enough for an Epiſtle. If I free not this truth, let me be puniſhed with a diuorce. Some idle table-talke cals vs to plead for our wiues. Perhaps ſome Gallants grudge vs one, who can be content to allow themſelues more. If they thought wiues curſes, they would afford them vs. Our mariage is cenſured (I ſpeake boldly) of none but them which neuer knew to liue chaſtly in mariage; who neuer knew that * Canoniſts true diſtinction of Virginity. What care we for their cenſure, where God approues? But ſome perhaps maintaine it out of iudgement: Bid them make much of that which Paul tels them, is a doctrine of deuills.

Were it not ſor this opinion, the Church of Rome would want one euident brand of her Antichriſtianiſme. Let their ſhauelings ſpeake for themſelues; vpon whom their vnlawfull Vow hath forced a wilfull and impoſſible neceſſitie. I leaue them to ſcanne the old rule of In turpi voto muta decretum; if they had not rather, Cautè ſi non caſtè. Euen moderate Papiſts will grant vs free, becauſe not bound by Vow; no, not ſo farre as thoſe old Germans, pro poſſe & noſſe. Or what care we, if they grant it not? while we hold vs firme to that ſure rule of Baſil the great; * He that forbids what God inioynes, or inioynes what God forbids, let him be accurſed. I paſſe not what I heare men, or Angells ſay, while I heare God ſay, Let him be the husband of one wife. That one word ſhall confirme me againſt the barking of all impure mouthes. He that made mariage, ſayes, it is honourable: what care we for the diſhonour of thoſe that corrupt it? yea, that which nature noteth wich ſhame, God mentions with honour, [a] τίμιος ἡ κοίτη; [b] Gregory with the title of opus caſtum; Paphnutius, of σωφροσύνη, chaſtitie. But if God ſhould be Iudge of this controuerſie, it were ſoone at an end; who in the time euen of that legall ſtrictneſſe, allowed wedlocke to the Miniſters of his Sanctuary. Let Cardinall Panormitan be heard ſpeake. [c] Continency (ſaith he) in Clergie-men, is neither of the ſubſtance of their order, nor appointed by any law of God. And Gratian, out of Auguſtine, yet more. [d] Their mariage (ſaith he) is neither forbidden by Legall, nor Euangelicall, nor Apoſtolike authoritie.

God neuer impoſed this law of Continence: who then? [e] The Church. As if a good ſpouſe would gain-ſay what her husband willeth. But how well? Heare, O ye Papiſts, the iudgement of your owne Cardinall; and confeſſe your mouthes ſtopped. [f] But I beleeue (ſaith he) it were for the good and ſafetie of many ſoules, and would be an wholeſome law, that thoſe which would, might marry; for that, as experience teacheth vs, a contrary effect followes vpon that law of Continencie; ſince at this day they liue not ſpiritually, neither are cleane, but are defiled with vnlawfull copulation, to their great ſinne: where as with their owne wife it might be chaſtitie. Is this a Cardinall, thinke you, or a Huguenot? But if this red hat be not worthy of reſpect; let a Pope himſelfe ſpeake out of Peters chaire. Pius the ſecond, as learned as hath ſit in that roome this thouſand yeares; [g] Mariage (ſaith he) vpon great reaſon was taken from the Clergie; but vpon greater reaſon is to be reſtored. What need we other Iudge? How iuſt this law is, you ſee; ſee now how ancient: For ſome doctrines haue nothing to plead for them, but Time. Age hath beene an old refuge for falſhood. Tertullians rule is true; That which is firſt, is trueſt. What the ancient Iewiſh Prelates did, Moſes is cleare. What did the Apoſtles? Doth not [h] Paul tell vs, that both the reſt of the Apoſtles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas, had wiues, and (which is more) carried them ſtill along in their trauels? For that childiſh eluſion of [i] ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα who can abide, but to laugh at? Doth not [k] Clemens of Alexandria (a Father not of more antiquitie, than credit) tell vs, that Peter, Philip, and Paul himſelfe, were maried? And this laſt (though vnlikeſt) how is it confirmed by Ignatius, in his Epiſtle to the Philadelphians? Yea, their owne Cardinall, learned [l] Caietane, doth both auouch and euince it. This was their practice: what was their Conſtitution? Look in theſe Canons which the Romiſh Church fathers vpon the Apoſtles, and Franciſcus Turrian their Ieſuit ſweats to defend it in a whole Volume: There you finde, Canon. 5. enacted, that [m] no Biſhop, Presbyter, Deacon, ſhall forſake his wife (προφάσει εὐλαβείας) in pretenſe of Religion, vpon paine of depoſition. It would moue laughter, to ſee how the Ieſuits gnaw vpon this bone, and ſucke-in nothing but the bloud of their owne iawes; [n] while the ſixt generall Councell auerres and proclaimes this ſenſe truly Apoſtolical, in ſpight of all contradiction.

Follow the times now, and deſcend lower; what did the ages ſucceeding? Search Records: What-euer ſome palpably foiſted Epiſtles of Popes inſinuate, they maried without ſcruple of any contrary iniunction. Many of thoſe Ancients admired Virginitie, but impoſed it not. Amongſt the reſt, [o] Origen (though himſelfe a wilfull Eunuch) is faine to perſwade the ſonnes of Clergy men, not to be proud of their parentage. After this, when the Fathers of the Nicene Councell went about to enact a law of Continency, Socrates the Hiſtorian expreſſes it thus: [p] It ſeemeth good (ſaith he) to the Biſhops to bring in a new law into the Church. It was then new, and they but would haue brought it in; therefore before, it was not: where we know how Paphnutius, himſelfe a Virgin, famous for holines, famous for miracles, riſing (ἐβόα μακρὰ) cryed aloud, that they ought not to lay this (βαρὺν ζυγὸν) heauy yoke, vpon men of the Church. His arguments wanne aſſent. He ſpake and preuailed. So this liberty was ſtill continued and affirmed. If this be not plaine enough, [q] holy Athanaſius, a witneſſe paſt exception, ſhall ſerue for a thouſand hiſtories till his Age.

[r] Many Biſhops (ſaith he) haue not maried; and contrarily Monkes haue beene fathers of children: as contrarily, you ſee Biſhops the Fathers of children, and Monkes that haue not ſought poſterity. Would you yet haue inſtances of the former, and the next Age? Here you haue [s] Numidicus the Martyr, a maried Presbyter; [t] Cheremon of Nilus, a maried Biſhop; [u] Demetrianus Biſhop of Antioch, whoſe ſonne Domnus ſucceeded Paulus Samoſatenus; Philoromus and Phileas BB. of the Thmuites; Gabinius brother of Eutichianus BB. of Rome; the father of Nazianzene, Baſil, and the other [x] Gregory, Hilarius, and that good Spiridion Biſhop of Cyprus, of whom Sozomen giues ſo direct teſtimony. To omit others, what ſhould I ſpeake of many Biſhops of Rome, whoſe ſonnes not ſpurious, as now-adaies, but (as Pope Vrban himſelfe witneſſes) [z] lawfully begot in wedlock, followed their fathers in the Pontificiall chaire. [a] The reaſon whereof, that Pope himſelfe ingenuouſly rendreth; for that mariage was euery where lawfull to the Clergy before the prohibition (which muſt needs be late) & in the Eaſterne Church to this day is allowed. What need we more teſtimonies, or more examples? What euer [b] Heliodorus, B. of Trica (a man fitter for a wanton loue-ſtory than a Church controuerſie) brought into the Church of Theſſalia, Socrates thus flatly writes of thoſe Biſhops of his time: [c] For many of them in the place and function of Biſhops, beget children of their lawfull wiues. This was practiſed: See what was decreed in that ſixt general [d] Councel of Conſtantinople, to this purpoſe, to the confuſion of all replyers. If any Proteſtant Church in Chriſtendome can make a more peremptory, more full and abſolute, more cautelous decree, for the mariage of Eccleſiaſticall perſons, let me be condemned as faithleſſe: A place, I grant, miſerably handled by our Aduerſaries; & becauſe they cannot blemiſh it enough, indignly torne out of the Councels. What dare not impudency doe? [*] Againſt all euidences of Greeke Copies, againſt their own Gratian, againſt pleas of antiquity. This is the readieſt way; Whom they cannot anſwer, to burne; what they cannot ſhift off, to blot out; and to cut the knot which they cannot vntie. The Romaniſts of the next age were ſomewhat more equall: who, ſeeing themſelues preſſed with ſo flat a Decree, confirmed by authority of Emperours, as would abide no denyall, began to diſtinguiſh vpon the point; limiting this liberty onely to the Eaſterne Church, and granting that all the Clergy of the Eaſt might marry, not theirs. So Pope Steuen the ſecond freely confeſſes:

[e] The tradition (ſaith he) of the Eaſterne Churches is otherwiſe than that of the Romane Church. For,their Prieſts, Deacons, or Subdeacons are maried; but in this Church or the Weſterne,no one of the Clergy,from the Subdeacon to the Biſhop,haue leaue to marry.

Liberally; but not enough: and if he yeeld this, why not more? Shall that bee lawfull in the Eaſt which in the Weſt is not? Doe the Goſpels, or lawes of equity alter according to the foure corners of the world? Doth God make difference betwixt Greece and England? If it be lawfull, why not euery where? If vnlawfull, why is it done any where? So then you ſee, we differ not from the Church in this; but from the Romiſh Church:But this ſacred Councel doth not only vniuerſally approue this practice(with paine of depoſition to the gaine-ſayers)but auouches it for a Decree Apoſtolical.Iudge now whether this one authority be not enough to weigh down an hundred petty conuenticles,and many legions(if there had beene many)of priuate contradictions. Thus, for ſeuen hundred yeeres,you find nothing but open freedome: All the ſcuffling aroſe in the eight Age; wherein yet this violent impoſition found many and learned Aduerſaries, and durſt not be obtruded at once. Loe,euen then, Gregory the third, writing to the Biſhops of Bauaria, giues this disjunct charge; [f] Let none keepe an harlot or a concubine:but either let him liue chaſtely, or marry a wife, whom it ſhall not bee lawfull for him to forſake: According to that rule of Clerkes, cited from [g] Iſidore, and renewed in the [h] Councell of Mentz, to the perpetuall ſhame of our iugling aduerſaries.Nothing can argue guiltineſſe ſo much,as vniuſt expurgations. [i] Iſidore ſaith, Let them containe, or let them marry but one: They cite him, Let them containe; and leaue out the reſt: ſomewhat worſe than the Deuill cited Scripture. But,I might haue ſpared all this labour of writing, could I perſwade whoſoeuer either doubts, or denies this, to reade ouer that one Epiſtle which [k] Huldericus BB. of Auſpurge wrote learnedly, and vehemently, to Pope Nicolas the firſt, in this ſubiect: which if it doe not anſwer all cauils, and ſatisfie all Readers,and conuince all (not wilfull) aduerſaries, let me be caſt, in ſo iuſt a cauſe. There you ſhall ſee,how iuſt,how expedient,how ancient this liberty is; together with the feeble and iniurious grounds of forced Continency: Reade it, and ſee whether you can deſire a better Aduocate. After him (ſo ſtrongly did he plead, and ſo happily) for two hundred yeeres more, this feedome ſtill bleſſed thoſe parts; yet, not without extreme oppoſition. Hiſtories are witneſſes of the buſie, and not vnlearned combats of thoſe times, in this Argument. But now,when the body of Antichriſtianiſme began to be compleat,and to ſtand vp in his abſolute ſhape,after a thouſand yeeres from Chriſt; this liberty which before wauered vnder Nicolas 1. now by the hands of Leo 9. Nicolas 2. and that brand of hell, Gregory 7. was vtterly ruined, wiues debarred, ſingle life vrged: [l] A good turne for whoremaſters (ſaith Auentine) who now for one wife might haue ſix hundred Bed-fellowes.

But,how approued of the better ſort appeares (beſides that the Churches did ring of him each where for Antichriſt) in that at the [m] Councell of Wormes the French and German Biſhops depoſed this Gregory, in this name (amongſt other quarels) for [n] ſeparating man and wife. Violence did this; not reaſon: neither was Gods will here queſtioned, but the Popes wilfulneſſe. What broiles hereon enſued, let [o] Auentine witneſſe.

The bickerings of our Engliſh Clergy, with their Dunſtanes,about this time,are memorable in our owne Hiſtories,which teach vs how late,how repiningly,how vniuſtly, they ſtooped vnder this yoake. I had rather ſend my Reader to Bale and Fox, than abride their Monuments, to inlarge mine owne.

I haue (I hope) fetcht this truth farre enough; and deduced it low enough through many Ages,to the midſt of the rage of Antichriſtian tyranny. There left our liberty; there began their bondage.Our liberty is happily renewed with the Goſpel:what God, [e] Aliter ſe Orientalium habet traditio Eccleſiarũ:aliter hujus ſanctæ Romanæ Eccleſiæ. Nam eorum ſacerdotes, diaconi, aut ſubdiaconi, matrimonio copulãtur: Iſtius autẽ Eccleſiæ vel occidentaliũ nullus ſacredotum à ſubdiacono vſq; ad epiſcopum, licentiam habet conjugiũ ſortiendi. diſt. 31.

EPIST. IV. Of the ſorrow not to be repented of.

IT is ſeldome ſeen, that a ſilent grieſe ſpeeds well: for either a man muſt haue ſtrong hands of reſolution to ſtrangle it in his boſome; or elſe it driues him to ſome ſecret miſchieſe: whereas ſorrow reuealed is halfe remedied, & euer abates in the vttering. Your grieſe was wiſely diſcloſed; and ſhall be as ſtrangely anſwered. I am glad of your ſorrow; and ſhould weepe for you, if you did not thus mourne. Your ſorrow is, that you cannot enough grieue for your ſinnes. Let me tell you, that the Angels themſelues ſing at this lamentation; neither doth the earth afford any ſo ſweet muſicke in the eares of God. This heauineſſe is the way to ioy. Worldly ſorrow is worthy of pity, becauſe it leadeth to death: but this deſerues nothing but enuy and gratulation. If thoſe teares were common, hell would not ſo enlarge it ſelſe. Neuer ſinne, repented of, was puniſhed: and neuer any thus mourned, and repented not. Loe, you haue done that, which you grieue you haue not done. That good God, whoſe act is his will, accounts of out will as our deed. If he required ſorrow proportionable to the hainouſneſſe of our ſins, there were no end of mourning. Now his mercy regards not ſo much the meaſure, as the truth of it; and accounts vs to haue that which we complaine to want. I neuer knew any truly penitēt, which in the depth of his remorſe, was afraid of ſorrowing too much; nor any vnrepentant, which wiſht to ſorrow more. Yea, let me tell you, that this ſorrow is better, and more, than that deepe heauineſſe for ſinne, which you deſire. Many haue beene vexed with an extreme remorſe for ſome ſinne, from the gripes of a galled conſcience, which yet neuer came where true repentance grew; in whom the conſcience playes at once the accuſer, witneſſe, Iudge, tormentor: but an earneſt grieſe, for the want of grieſe, was neuer found in any but a gracious heart. You are happy, and complaine. Tell me, I beſeech you; This ſorrow which you mourne to want, is it a grace of the ſpirit of God, or not? If not, why doe you ſorrow to want it? If it be, oh how happy is it to grieue for want of grace! The God of all truth and bleſſedneſſe hath ſaid, Bleſſed are thoſe that hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſſe; and with the ſame breath, Bleſſed are they that mourne: for, they ſhall be comforted. You ſay, you mourne; Chriſt ſaith, you are bleſſed: you ſay, you mourne; Chriſt ſaith, you ſhall be comforted. Either now diſtruſt your Sauiour, or elſe confeſſe your happineſſe, & with patience expect his promiſed conſolation. What doe you feare? you ſee others ſtand like ſtrong Oakes, vnſhaken, vnremoued: you are but a reed, a feeble plant, toſſed and bowed with euery wind, and with much agitation bruiſed; Loe, you are in tender and fauourable hands, that neuer brake any, whom their ſinnes bruiſed; neuer bruiſed any, whom temptations haue bowed. You are but flax; and your beſt is not a flame, but an obſcure ſmoake of grace: Loe, here his ſpirit is as a ſoft wind, not as cold water; he will kindle, will neuer quench you. The ſorrow you want, is his gift: Take heed leſt while you vex your ſelſe with diſlike of the meaſure, you grudge at the giuer. Beggers may not chuſe. This portion he hath vouchſafed to giue you; if you haue any, it is more than he was bound to beſtow: yet you ſay, What, no more? as if you tooke it vnkindly, that hee is no more liberall. Euen theſe holy diſcontentments are dangerous. Deſire more (ſo much as you can) but repine not, when you doe not attaine. Deſire, but ſo as you be free from impatience, free from vnthankfulneſſe. Thoſe that haue tryed, can ſay how difficult it is to complaine, with due reſeruation of thanks. Neither know I whether is worſe, To long for good things impatiently, or not at all to deſire them. The fault of your ſorrow is rather in your conceit, than in it ſelfe. And, if indeed you mourne not enough, ſtay but Gods leiſure, and your eyes ſhall runne ouer with teares. How many doe you ſee ſport with their ſinnes, yea brag of them? how many that ſhould die for want of paſtime, if they might not ſin freely, and more freely talke of it? What a Saint are you to theſe, that can droop vnder the memory of the frailty of youth, and neuer thinke you haue ſpent enow teares! Yet ſo I encourage you in what you haue, as one that perſwades you not to deſiſt from ſuing for more. It is good to be couetous of grace, and to haue our deſires herein enlarged with our receits. Weepe ſtill, and ſtill deſire to weepe: but let your teares be as the raine in a ſunne-ſhine; comfortable and hopefull: and let not your longing ſauour of murmur, or diſtruſt. Theſe teares are reſerued; this hunger ſhall be ſatisfied; this ſorrow ſhall be comforted: There is nothing betwixt God and you, but time. Preſcribe not to his wiſdome: haſten not his mercy. His grace is enough for you: his glory ſhall be more than enough.

Ep. V. Concerning the Metaphraſe of the Pſalmes.

FEare not my immoderate ſtudies. I haue a body that controls me enough in theſe courſes; my friends need not. There is nothing whereof I could ſooner ſurfet, if I durſt neglect my body to ſatisfie my minde: but whiles I affect knowledge, my weakneſſe checks me, & ſaies, Better a little learning than no health. I yeeld, and patiently abide my ſelfe debarred of my choſen felicity. The little I can get, I am no niggard of: neither am I more deſirous to gather, than willing to impart. The full handed are commonly moſt ſparing. We veſſels, that haue any empty roome, anſwer the leaſt knocke, with a hollow noyſe: you, that are full, ſound not. If we pardon your cloſeneſſe, you may wel beare with our profuſiō. If there be any wrong, it is to our ſelues, that we vtter what we ſhould lay vp. It is a pardonable fault, to doe leſſe good to our ſelues, that we may doe more to others. Amongſt other endeuours, I haue boldly vndertaken the holy Metres of Dauid; how happily, iudge you by what you ſee. There is none of all my labours ſo open to all cenſures; none whereof I would ſo willingly heare the verdit of the wiſe and iudicious. Perhaps ſome thinke the verſe harſh; whoſe nice eare regards roundneſſe more than ſenſe. I embrace ſmoothneſſe, but affect it not. This is the leaſt good qualitie of a verſe; that intends any thing but muſicall delight. Others may blame the difficulty of the tunes: whoſe humour cannnot be pleaſed without a greater offence. For, to ſay truth; I neuer could ſee good verſe written in the wonted meaſures. I euer thought them moſt eaſie, and leaſt Poeticall. This fault (if any) will light vpon the negligence of our people; which endure not to take paines for any fit variety. The French and Dutch haue giuen vs worthy examples of diligence, and exquiſitneſſe in this kind. Neither our eares nor voyces are leſſe tunable. Here is nothing wanting, but will to learne. What is this, but to eat the corne out of the eare, becauſe we will not abide the labour to grinde, and knead it? If the queſtion bee, whether our verſe muſt deſcend to them; or they aſcend to it; wiſe moderation I thinke would determine it moſt equall, that each part ſhould remit ſomewhat, and both meet in the midſt. Thus I haue endeuoured to doe, with ſincere intent of their good, rather than my own applauſe. For it had beene eaſie to haue reached to an higher ſtraine: but I durſt not; whether for the graue Maieſty of the ſubiect, or benefit of the ſimpleſt reader. You ſhal ſtill note, that I haue laboured to keepe Dauids entire ſenſe, with numbers neither lofty nor ſlubbered: which mean is ſo much more difficult to find, as the buſineſſe is more ſacred, and the liberty leſſe. Many great wits haue vndertaken this task; which yet haue either not effected it, or haue ſmothered it in their priuate deskes, and denied it the common light. Amongſt the reſt, were thoſe two rare ſpirits of the Sidnyes; to whom, Poeſie was as naturall as it is affected of others: and our worthy friend M. Syluester, hath ſhewed me, how happily he hath ſometimes turned from his Bartas, to the ſweet ſinger of Iſrael. It could not be, that in ſuch abundant plenty of Poeſie, this work ſhould haue paſt vnattempted: would God I might liue to ſee it perfected; either by my owne hand, or a better. In the meane time, let me expect your impartiall ſentence, both concerning the forme, and ſenſe. Lay aſide your loue, for a while; which too oft blindes iudgement. And as it vſes to be done in moſt equall proceedings of iuſtice, ſhut me out of doores while my verſe is diſcuſſed: yea, let me receiue not your cenſure onely, but others by you: this once (as you loue me) play both the Informer and the Iudge. Whether you allow it, you ſhall incourage me; or correct, you ſhall amend me. Either your ſtarres, or your ſpits, (that I may vſe Origens notes) ſhall be welcome to my margent. It ſhall be happy for vs, if God ſhall make our poore labours any way ſeruiceable to his Name and Church.

Ep. VI. A Preface to his Relation of the Ruſsian affaires.

TRauell perfiteth wiſdome; and obſeruation giues perfection to trauell: without which a man may pleaſe his eyes, not feed his brain; and after much earth meaſured, ſhall returne with a weary body, & an empty minde. Home is more ſafe, more pleaſant, but leſſe fruitfull of experience: But to a minde not working and diſcurſiue, all heauens, all earths are alike. And, as the end of trauell is obſeruation; ſo the end of obſeruation is the informing of others: for, what is our knowledge if ſmothered in our ſelues, ſo as it is not known to more? Such ſecret delight can content none but an enuious nature. You haue breathed many & cold ayres, gone farre, ſeene much, heard more, obſerued all. Theſe two yeares you haue ſpent in imitation of Nabuchadnezzars ſeuen; conuerſing with ſuch creatures as Paul fought with at Epheſus. Alas! what a face, yea what a backe of a Church haue you ſeene? what manners? what people? Amongſt whom ignorant ſuperſtition ſtriues with cloſe Atheiſme, treachery with crueltie, one Deuill with another; while Truth and Vertue doe not ſo much as giue any challenge of reſiſtance. Returning once to our England after this experience, I imagine you doubted whether you were on earth, or in heauen. Now then (if you will heare me, whom you were wont) as you haue obſerued what you haue ſeene; and written what you haue obſerued; ſo, publiſh what you haue written: It ſhall be a gratefull labour, to vs, to poſterity. I am deceiued, if the fickleneſſe of the Ruſsian ſtate, haue not yeelded more memorable matter of hiſtory than any other in our age, or perhaps many centuries of our predeceſſors. How ſhall I think, but that God ſent you thither before theſe broiles, to be the witneſſe, the regiſter of ſo famous mutations? He loues to haue thoſe iuſt euils which hee doth in one part of the world, knowne to the whole, and thoſe euils, which men doe in the night of their ſecrecy, brought forth into the Theater of the World; that the euill of mens ſinne being compared with the euill of his puniſhment; may iuſtifie his proceedings, and condemne theirs. Your worke ſhall thus honor him, beſides your ſecond ſeruice, in the benefit of the Church. For, whiles you diſcourſe of the open tyranny of that Ruſſian Nero Iohn Baſilius; the more ſecret, no leſſe bloody plots of Boris; the ill ſucceſſe of a ſtolne Crowne, tho ſet vpon the head of an harmeleſſe Sonne; the bold attempts and miſerable end of a falſe, yet aſpiring challenge; the perfidiouſneſſe of a ſeruile people, vnworthy of better gouernors; the miſcariage of wicked gouernors, vnworthy of better ſubiects; the vniuſt vſurpations of men, iuſt (tho late) reuenges of God, cruelty rewarded with blood, wrong claimes with ouerthrow, treacherie with bondage; the Reader, with ſome ſecret horror, ſhall draw-in delight, and with delight inſtruction: Neither know I any Relation whence he ſhall take out a more eaſie leſſon of iuſtice, of loyalty, of thankfulneſſe.

But aboue all, let the world ſee and commiſerate the hard eſtate of that worthy and noble Secretary, Buchinski. Poore gentleman! his diſtreſſe recalls euer to my thoughts Æſops Storke, taken amongſt the Cranes: He now nouriſhes his haire, vnder the diſpleaſure of a forraine Prince; At once in durance and baniſhment. He ſerued an ill maſter; but, with an honeſt heart, with cleane hands. The maſters iniuſtice doth no more infect a good ſeruant, than the truth of the ſeruant can iuſtifie his ill maſter. A bad worke-man may vſe a good inſtrument: and oft-times a cleane napkin wipeth a foule mouth. It ioyes me yet to thinke, that his piety, as it euer held friendſhip in heauen, ſo now it wins him friends in this our other world: Lo, euen from our Iland vnexpected deliuerance takes a long flight, and bleſſeth him beyond hope; yea rather, from heauen, by vs. That God, whom he ſerues, will be knowne to thoſe rude and ſcarce humane Chriſtians, for a protector of innocence, a fauourer of truth, a rewarder of piety: The mercy of our gratious King, the compaſſion of an honourable Councellor, the loue of a true friend, and (which wrought all, and ſet all on worke) the grace of our good God, ſhall now looſe thoſe bonds, and giue a glad welcome to his liberty, and a willing farwell to his diſtreſſe. He ſhall (I hope) liue to acknowledge this; in the meane time, I doe for him. Thoſe Ruſſian affaires are not more worthy of your records, than your loue to this friend is worthy of mine. For neither could this large ſea drowne or quench it, nor time and abſence (which are wont to breed a lingring conſumption of friendſhip) abate the heat of that affection which his kindneſſe bred, religion nouriſhed. Both rareneſſe, and worth ſhall commend this true-loue; which (to ſay true) hath been now long out of faſhion. Neuer times yeelded more loue; but, not more ſubtle. For, euery man loues himſelfe in another, loues the eſtate in the perſon: Hope of aduantage is the loadſtone that drawes the iron hearts of men; not vertue, not deſert. No age afforded more paraſites, fewer friends: The moſt are friendly in ſight, ſeruiceable in expectation, hollow in loue, truſtleſſe in experience. Yet now, Buchinski, ſee and confeſſe thou haſt found one friend, which hath made thee many: on whom while thou beſtowedſt much fauour, thou haſt loſt none. I cannot but thinke how welcome, Liberty (which tho late, yet now at laſt hath lookt backe vpon him) ſhall be to the Cell of his affliction; when ſmiling vpon him, ſhe ſhall leade him by the hand, and (like another Angell) open the iron gates of his miſerable captiuity, and (from thoſe hard Preſtaues and ſauage Chriſtians) cary him by the hayre of the head, into this paradiſe of God. In the meane time, I haue written to him as I could, in a knowne language, with an vnknowne hand; that my poore Letters of gratulation might ſerue as humble attendants to greater.

For your worke, I wiſh it but ſuch glad entertainement, as the profit, yea the delight of it deſerues; and feare nothing, but that this long delay of publication will make it ſcarce newes. We are all growne Athenians, and account a ſtrange report like to a fiſh and a gueſt. Thoſe eyes and hands ſtaid it, which might doe it beſt. I cannot blame you, if you thinke it more honoured by the ſtay of his gracious peruſall, than it could be by the earthly acceptation of the world. Euen the caſt garments of Princes are precious. Others haue in part preuented you; whoſe labours, to yours, are but as an Eccho to a long period: by whom, we heare the laſt ſound of theſe ſtirres, ignorant of the beginning. They giue vs but a taſte in their hand: you lead vs to the open fountaine. Let the Reader giue you but as much thanke, as you giue him ſatisfaction; you ſhall deſire no more.

Finally, God giue vs as much good vſe, as knowledge of his iudgements; the world, helpe of your labours; your ſelfe, incouragement; Buchinski, libertie.

To Staniſlaus Buchinski, late Secretary to Demetrius Emp. of Ruſſia.

Epist. VII. Of the comfort of Impriſonment.

THe knowledge, that the eye giues of the face alone, is ſhallow, vncertaine, imperfect. For what is it, to ſee the vtmoſt skin, or fauour of the viſage; changeable with diſeaſe, changeable with paſſion? The eare (mee thinks) doth both moſt clearly diſcloſe the minds of others, and knit them faſter to ours: which, as it is the ſenſe of diſcipline, ſo of friendſhip, commanding it euen to the abſent, and in the preſent cheriſhing it. This thing wee haue lately proued in your ſelfe, moſt noble Staniſlaus: neerer examples we might haue had; better we could not. How many, how excellent things haue wee heard of you, from our common friend, though moſt yours, which haue eaſily won our beleefe, our affections! How oft, how honourable mention hath he made of your name! How frequently, how feruently haue we wiſht you, both ſafetie and libertie! And now, loe where ſhe comes, as the Greekes ſay, ἀπὸ μηχανῆς, and viſits her forlorne Client. Although I would not doubt to ſay, that this outward durance of the body, hath ſeemed more harſh to the beholders, than to your ſelfe, a wiſe man, (which is more) a Chriſtian; whoſe free ſoule, in the greateſt ſtraits of the outward man, flies ouer Seas and Lands whither it liſteth; neither can, by any diſtance of place, nor ſwelling of waues, nor height of mountaines, nor violence of enemies, nor ſtrong bars, nor wals, nor guards, be reſtrained from what place it ſelfe hath choſen. Loe, that enioyes God, enioyes it ſelfe and his friends; and ſo feeds it ſelfe with the pleaſure of enioying them, that it eaſily either forgets or contemnes all other things. It is no Paradox, to ſay, that A wiſe Chriſtian cannot be impriſoned, cannot be baniſhed: He is euer at home, euer free. For, both his libertie is within him, and his home is vniuerſall. And what is it, I beſeech you (for you haue tried) that makes a priſon? Is it ſtraitneſſe of walls? Then you haue as many fellowes, as there are men. For, how is the ſoule of euery man pent within theſe clay walls of the body, more cloſe, more obſcure! whence ſhe may looke oft, thorow the grates of her buſie thoughts; but, is neuer releaſed in ſubſtance, till that God, who gaue vs our Mittimus into this Gaole, giue vs our Deliuery, with Returne yee ſonnes of Adam: Thus either all men are priſoners, or you are none. Is it reſtraint? How many (eſpecially of that other ſex in thoſe your Eaſterne parts) chamber vp themſelues, for ſtate; ſo as they neither ſee the Sunne, nor others them? How many ſuperſtitious men, for deuotion; how many obſcure Aglai, for eaſe and careleſneſſe, keepe themſelues in their owne cottage, in their owne village; and neuer walke forth ſo much as to the neighbour townes? And what is your Ruſſia to all her inhabitants, but a large priſon, a wide Galley? yea, what other is the world to vs? How can hee complaine of ſtraitneſſe, or reſtraint, that roues ouer all the world, and beyond it? Tyrannie may part the ſoule from the body, [illegible] confine it to the body. That which others doe for eaſe, deuotion, ſtate, y[illegible] for neceſſitie: why not as willingly, ſince you muſt doe it? Doe but imagine the other cauſe; and your caſe is the ſame with theirs which both haue choſen, and delight to keepe cloſe; yet hating the name of priſoners, while they embrace the condition. But, why doe I perſwade you, not to miſlike that, which I pray you may forſake? I had rather you ſhould be no priſoner at all, than to be a cheerefull priſoner vpon neceſſitie. If the doores be open, my perſwaſion ſhall not hold you in. Rather our praiers ſhall open thoſe doores, and fetch you forth into this common libertie of men; which alſo hath not a little (though an inferiour) contentment. For, how pleaſant is it to theſe ſenſes, by which we men are wont to be led, to ſee and be ſeene, to ſpeake to our friends, and heare them ſpeake to vs; to touch and kiſſe the deare hands of our Parents, and with them at laſt to haue our eyes cloſed? Either this ſhall befall you; or what hopes, what paines (I adde no more) hath this your carefull friend loſt? and we, what wiſhes, what conſultations? It ſhall be; I dare hope, yea beleeue it: Only thou our good God giue ſuch end, as thou haſt done entrance into this buſineſſe; and ſo diſpoſe of theſe likely endeuours, that whom we loue and honour abſent, wee may at laſt in preſent ſee and embrace.

12637c

To my father in law, M. G. Wenyſſe.

Ep. VIII. Exciting to Christian cheerefulneſſe.

YOu complaine of dulneſſe; a common diſeaſe, and incident to the beſt minds, and ſuch as can moſt contemne vanities. For, the true Worldling [illegible] nothing but mirth; neither cares how lawleſſe his ſport be, ſo it be pleaſant: hee faines to himſelfe falſe delights, when he wants: and if he can paſſe the time, and chaſe away Melancholie, he thinkes his day ſpent happily. And thus it muſt needs be; while the world is his god, his deuotion can be but his pleaſure: whereas the mortified ſoule, hath learned to ſcorne theſe friuolous and ſinfull ioyes; and affects either ſolid delights, or none; and had rather be dull for want of mirth, than tranſported with wanton pleaſures. When the world, like an importunt Minſtrell, thruſts it ſelfe into his chamber, and offers him muſicke, vnſought; if he vouchſafe it the hearing, it is the higheſt fauour he dare, or can yeeld: He rewards it not, he commends it not: Yea, he ſecretly lothes thoſe harſh and iarring notes, and reiects them. For, he finds a better conſort within, betwixt God and himſelfe, when he hath a little tuned his heart with meditation. To ſpeake fully, the World is like an ill foole in a Play: the Chriſtian is a iudicious ſpectator, which thinkes thoſe ieſts too groſſe to be laught at; and therefore entertaines that with ſcorne, which others with applauſe. Yet in truth, we ſinne, if we reioyce not: there is not more error in falſe mirth, than in vniuſt heauineſſe. If worldlings offend, that they laugh, when they ſhould mourne; we ſhall offend no leſſe, if we droope in cauſe of cheerefulneſſe. Shall wee enuie, or ſcorne, to ſee one ioy in red and white droſſe, another in a vaine title; one in a daintie diſh, another in a ieſt; one in a booke, another in a friend; one in a Kite, another in a Dogge; whiles we enioy the God of Heauen, and are ſorrowfull? What dull metall is this we are made of? Wee haue the fountaine of ioy, and yet complaine of heauineſſe. Is there any ioy, without God?

Certainly, if ioy be good, and all goodneſſe bee from him ; whence ſhould ioy ariſe, but from him ? And if hee be the author of ioy ; how are we Chriſtians, and reioyce not? What? doe we freeze in the fire, and ſtarue at a feaſt? Haue we a good conſcience, and yet pine and hang downe the head? When God hath made vs happy, doe we make our ſelues miſerable ? When I aske my heart Dauids queſtion, I know not whether I bee more angry or aſhamed at the anſwer ; Why art thou ſad my ſoule ? My body, my purſe, my fame, my friends ; or perhaps none of theſe : onely I am ſad, becauſe I am. And what if all theſe ? what if more ? when I come to my betrer wits, Haue I a father, an aduocate, a comforter, a manſion in heauen ? If both earth and hell conſpired to afflict me, my ſorrow cannot counteruaile the cauſes of my ioy. Now I can challenge all aduerſaries ; and either defie all miſeries, or bid all croſſes, yea death it ſelfe, welcome. Yet God doth not abridge vs of theſe earthly ſolaces, which dare weigh with our diſcontentments, and ſometimes depreſſe the balance. His greater light doth not extinguiſh the leſſe. If God had not thought them bleſſings, hee had not beſtowed them: and how are they bleſſings, if they delight vs not? Bookes, friends, wine, oyle, health, reputation, competencie, may giue occaſions, but not bounds, to our reioycings. We may not make them Gods riualls, but his ſpokes-men. In themſelues they are nothing ; but in God worth our ioy. Theſe may be vſed; yet ſo as they may bee abſent without diſtraction. Let theſe goe; ſo God alone be preſent with vs, it is enough. He were not God, if he were not All-ſufficient. We haue him, I ſpeake boldly; Wee haue him in feeling, in faith, in pledges, and earneſt; yea, in poſſeſſion. Why doe we not enioy him ? why doe we not ſhake-off that ſenſeleſſe drowſineſſe, which makes our liues vnpleaſant ; and leaue ouer all heauineſſe to thoſe that want God ; to thoſe that either know him not, or know him diſpleaſed ?

To M. W. R. Dedic. to M. Thomas Burlz.

Ep. IX. Conſolations of immoderate griefe for the death of friends.

While the ſtream of ſorrow runs ful, I know how vaine it is to oppoſe counſell. Paſſions muſt haue leaſure to digeſt. Wiſdome doth not more moderate them, than time. At firſt, it was beſt to mourne with you, & to mitigate your ſorrow, by bearing part; wherein, would God my burden could be your eaſe. Euery thing elſe is leſſe, when it is diuided; And then is beſt, after teares, to giue counſell: yet, in theſe thoughts I am not a little ſtraited. Before you haue digeſted griefe, aduice comes too early; too late, when you haue digeſted it. Before, it was vnſeaſonable; after, would be ſuperfluous: Before, it could not benefit you: after, it may hurt you, by rubbing-vp a skinned ſore a freſh. It is as hard to chooſe the ſeaſon for counſell, as to giue it: and that ſeaſon is, after the firſt digeſtion of ſorrow ; before the laſt. If my Letters then meet with the beſt opportunitie, they ſhall pleaſe me, and profit you: If not, yet I deſerue pardon, that I wiſhed ſo. You had but two Iewels, which you held precious; a Wife, and a Sonne: One was your ſelfe diuided ; the other, your ſelfe multiplied : You haue loſt both, and well-neere at once. The loſſe of one cauſed the other, and both of them your iuſt griefe. Such loſſes, when they come ſingle, afflict vs; but, when double, aſtoniſh vs; and tho they giue aduantage of reſpite, would almoſt ouer-whelme the beſt patient. Lo, now is the tryall of our man-hood, yea, of our Chriſtianitie: You are now in the liſts, ſet vpon by two of Gods fierce afflictions ; ſhew now what patience you haue, what fortitude. Wherefore haue you gathered, and laid vp all this time,

time, but for this brunt ? Now bring forth all your holy ſtore to light, and to vſe ; and approue to vs in this difficultie, that you haue all this while beene a Chriſtian in earneſt. I know, theſe euents haue not ſurpriſed you on a ſudden ; you haue ſuſpected they might come ; you haue put-caſes if they ſhould come. Things that are hazardous, may be donbted : but certaine things are, and muſt be expected. Prouidence abates griefe, and diſcountenances a croſſe. Or, if your affection were ſo ſtrong, that you durſt not fore-thinke your loſſe ; take it equally but as it falls. A wiſe man and a Chriſtian knowes death ſo fatall to Nature, ſo ordinary in euent, ſo gainefull in the iſſue, that I wonder he can for this either feare or grieue. Doth God onely lend vs one another, and doe we grudge when he calls for his owne ? So I haue ſeene ill debtors that borrow with prayers, keepe with thanks, repay with enmitie. We miſtake our tenure : we take that for gift, which God intends for loane ; Wee are tenants at will, and thinke our ſelues owners. Your wife and child are dead : Well, they haue done that for which they came.

If they could not haue dyed, it had beene worthy of wonder ; not at all, that they are dead. If this condition were proper onely to our families, and friends, or yet to our climate alone ; how vnhappie ſhould we ſeeme to our neighbours, to our ſelues ! Now it is common, let vs mourne that we are men. Loe, all Princes and Monarchs daunce with vs in the ſame ring : yea, what ſpeak I of earth ? The God of Nature, the Sauiour of men, hath trod the ſame ſteps of death ; And doe we think much to follow him ? How many ſeruants haue we knowne, that haue thruſt themſelues betwixt their Maſter and death ; which haue dyed, that their Maſter might not dye : and ſhall we repine to die with ours ? How truly may we ſay of this our Dauid, Thou art worth ten thouſand of vs ; yea, worth a world of Angels : yet he dyed, and dyed for vs. Who would liue, that knowes his Sauiour died ? who can be a Chriſtian, and would not be like him ? Who can be like him, that would not die after him ? Thinke of this, and iudge whether all the world can hire vs not to die. I need not aske you whether you loued thoſe whom you haue loſt : Could you loue them, and not wiſh they might be happy ? Could they be happy, and not dye ? In truth, nature knowes what ſhee would haue ; Wee can neither abide our friends miſerable in their ſtay, nor happie in their departure : We loue our ſelues ſo well, that we cannot be content they ſhould gaine by our loſſe. The excuſe of your ſorrow is, that you mourne for your ſelfe. True : but compare theſe two, and ſee whether your loſſe or their gaine be greater. For, if their aduantage exceed your loſſe ; take heed, leſt while you bewray your loue in mourning for them, it appeare that you loue but your ſelfe in them. They are gone to their preferment, and you lament : your loue is iniurious. If they were vaniſhed to nothing, I could not blame you, tho you tooke vp Rachels lamentation : But now, you know they are in ſurer hands than your owne : you know, that he hath taken them, which hath vndertaken to keepe them, to bring them againe : You know it is but aſleepe, which is miſcalled Death ; and that they ſhall, they muſt awake, as ſure as they lie downe ; and wake more freſh, more glorious, than when you ſhut their eyes. What doe we with Chriſtianitie, if we beleeue not this ? and if we doe beleeue it, why doe we mourne as the hopeleſſe ? But the matter, perhaps, is not ſo heauy as the circumſtance : Your croſſes came ſudden, and thicke ; You could not breathe from your firſt loſſe, ere you felt a worſe. As if he knew not this, that ſent both : As if he did it not on purpoſe. His proceedings ſeeme harſh ; are moſt wiſe, moſt iuſt. It is our fault, that they ſeeme otherwiſe than they are. Doe we thinke, wee could carue better for our ſelues ? O the mad inſolence of Nature, that dares controll, where ſhee ſhould wonder ! Preſumptuous clay ! that will be checking the Potter. Is his wiſdome, himſelfe ? Is he, in himſelfe, infinite ? Is his Decree out of his wiſdome ; and doe we murmur ? Doe wee, fooliſh wormes, turne againe when he treads vpon vs ? What ? doe you repine at that which was good for you, yea beſt ? That is beſt for vs which God ſeeth beſt : and that he ſeeth beſt, which he doth. This is Gods doing. Kiſſe his rod in ſilence, and giue glory to the hand that rules it. His will is the rule of his actions ; and his goodneſſe, of his will. Things are good to vs, becauſe he wils them: He wils them, becauſe they are good to himſelfe. It is your glory that he intends, in your ſo great affliction. It is no praiſe to wade ouer a ſhallow Ford, but to cut the ſwelling waues of the Deepe, commends both our ſtrength and skill. It is no victory, to conquer an eaſie and weake croſſe. Theſe maine euils haue crownes anſwerable to their difficultie: Wreſtle once and goe away with a bleſſing. Bee patient in this loſſe, and you ſhall once triumph in your gaine. Let God haue them with cheerefulneſſe, and you ſhall enioy God with them in glory.

To Mr. J. A. Merchant.

Ep. X. Againſt ſorrow for worldly loſſes.

IT is fitter for me to beginne with chiding, than with aduice: what meanes this weake diſtruſt? Goe on, and I ſhall doubt whether I write to a Chriſtian. You haue loſt your heart, together with your wealth; How can I but feare, leſt this Mammon was your God? Hence was Gods iealouſie in remouing it; and hence your immoderate teares for loſing it. If thus; God had not loued you, if he had not made you poore. To ſome, it is an aduantage to leeſe: you could not haue been at once thus rich, and good. Now, heauen is open to you, which was ſhut before, and could neuer haue giuen you entrance, with that load of iniquitie. If you be wiſe in menaging your affliction, you haue changed the world for God, a little droſſe for heauen. Let me euer loſe thus, and ſmart when I complaine.

But you might haue at once retained both. The ſtomach, that is purged, muſt be content to part with ſome good nouriſhment, that it may deliuer it ſelfe of more euill humors. God ſaw (that knowes it) you could not hold him ſo ſtrongly, while one of your hands was ſo faſtned vpon the world. You ſee, many make themſelues wilfully poore: why cannot you be content God ſhould impoueriſh you? If God had willed their pouertie, he would haue commanded it: if he had not willed yours, he would not haue effected it. It is a ſhame for a Chriſtian, to ſee an Heathen Philoſopher laugh at his owne ſhipwracke; while himſelfe howles out, as if all his felicity were imbarked with his ſubſtance. How ſhould wee ſcorne, to thinke that an heathen man ſhould laugh either at our ignorance, or impotence? ignorance, if wee thought too highly of earthly things; impotence, if we ouer-loued them. The feare of ſome euills is worſe than the ſenſe. To ſpeake ingenuouſly; I could neuer ſee, wherein pouertie deſerued ſo hard a conceit. It takes away the delicacie of fare, ſoftneſſe of lodging, gayneſſe of attire, and perhaps brings with it contempt: this is the worſt, and all. View it now on the better ſide: Lo, their quiet ſecurity, ſound ſleepes, ſharp appetite, free meriment; no feares, no cares, no ſuſpition, no diſtempers of exceſſe, no diſcontentment. If I were Iudge, my tongue ſhould be vniuſt, if pouertie went away weeping. I cannot ſee, how the euils it brings, can compare with thoſe which it remoues; how the diſcommodities ſhould match the bleſſings of a meane eſtate. What are thoſe you haue loſt, but falſe friends, miſerable comforters? Elſe they had not left you. Oh ſlight & fickle ſtay, that winds could bereaue you of! If your care could goe with them, here were no damage: and, if it goe not with them, it is your fault. Grieue more for your fault, than for your loſſe. If your negligence, your riotous miſ-ſpence had empaired your eſtate, then Satan had impoueriſht you; now would I haue added to your griefe, for your ſinne, not for your affliction: But now, ſince windes and waters haue done it as the officers of their Maker; why ſhould you not ſay with mee, as I with Iob, The Lord hath taken: Vſe your loſſe well, and you ſhall finde that God hath croſſed you with a bleſſing. And if it were worſe than the world eſteemes it, yet thinke not what you feele, but what you deſerue: You are a ſtranger to your ſelfe, if you confeſſe not, that God fauours you in this whip. If he had ſtripped you of better things, and ſcourged you with worſe, you ſhould ſtill haue acknowledged a mercifull iuſtice: If you now repine at an eaſie correction, you are worthy of ſeuerity. Beware the next, if you grudge aud ſwell at this. It is next to nothing which you ſuffer: what can bee further from vs, than theſe goods of outward eſtate? You need not abate either health, or mirth for their ſakes. If you doe now draw the affliction neerer than he which ſent it, and make a forren euill domeſticall; if while God viſits your eſtate, you fetch it home, to your body, to your minde; thanke your ſelfe that you will needs be miſerable: But if you loue not to fare ill; take croſſes as they are ſent, and goe lightly away with an eaſie burden.

Ep. I. Setting forth their iniurie done to the Church, the iniuſtice of their cauſe, and fearefulneſſe of their offence: Cenſuring and aduiſing them.

WE heare of your ſeparation, and mourne ; yet not ſo much for you, as for your wrong : you could not doe a greater iniurie to your mother, than to flie from her. Say ſhee were poore, ragged, weake ; ſay ſhe were deformed ; yet ſhee is not infectious : Or if ſhee were, yet ſhe is yours. This were cauſe enough for you, to lament her, to pray for her, to labour for her redreſſe, not to auoid her: This vnnaturalneſſe is ſhamefull ; and more hainous in you, who are reported not parties in this euill, but authors. Your flight is not ſo much, as your miſ-guidance. Plead not: this fault is paſt excuſe. If wee all ſhould follow you, this were the way, of a Church (as you plead) imperfect, to make no Church ; and of a remedie, to make a diſeaſe. Still the fruit of our charitie to you, is, beſides our griefe, pitie. Your zeale of truth hath miſ-led you, and you others : A zeale, if honeſt, yet blind-folded, and led by ſelfe-will. O that you loued Peace, but halfe ſo well as Truth : then, this breach had neuer beene : and you that are yet brethren, had beene ſtill companions. Goe out of Babylon, you ſay ; The voice not of Schiſme, but of holineſſe. Know you where you are ? Looke about you, I beſeech you, looke behinde you ; and ſee if wee haue not left it vpon our backs. Shee her ſelfe feeles, and ſees that ſhee is abandoned : and complaines to all the world, that wee haue not only forſaken, but ſpoiled her ; and yet you ſay, Come out of Babylon. And except you will be willingly blinde, you may ſee the heapes of her Altars, the aſhes of her Idols, the ruines of her monuments, the condemnation of her errours, the reuenge of her abominations. And are wee yet in Babylon ? Is Babylon yet amongſt vs ? Where are the maine buildings of that accurſed Citie ; thoſe high and proud Towers of their vniuerſall Hierarchie, infallible iudgement, diſpenſation with the Lawes of God, and ſinnes of men ; diſpoſition of Kingdomes, depoſition of Princes, parting ſtakes with God in our conuerſion, through freedome of will ; in our ſaluation, through the merit of our works ? Where are thoſe rotten heapes (rotten, not through age, but corruption) of tranſubſtantiating of bread, adoring of Images, multitude of Sacraments, power of Indulgences, neceſſitie of Confeſſions, profit of Pilgrimages, conſtrained and approued Ignorance, vnknowne

Hall, J.

deuotions? Where are thoſe deepe vaults (if not mynes) of Penances and Purgatories, and whatſoeuer hath beene deuiſed by thoſe Popelings, whether profitable or glorious, againſt the Lord and his Chriſt? Are they not all raced, and buried in the duſt? Hath not the Maieſtie of her Gods, like as was done to Mithra, and Serapis, beene long agone offered to the publique laughter of the vulgar? What is this but to goe, yea to runne (if not to flie) out of Babylon? But (as euery man is an hearty Patron of his owne actions, and it is a deſperate cauſe that hath no plea) you alledge our conſorting in Ceremonies, and ſay ſtill wee tarry in the ſuburbs. Grant that theſe were as ill, as an enemy can make them, or can pretend them: You are deceiued, if you thinke the walls of Babylon ſtand vpon Ceremonies. Subſtantiall errors are both her foundation, and frame. Theſe rituall obſeruations are not ſo much as Tile and Reed, rather like to ſome Fane vpon the roofe; for ornament, more than vſe: Not parts of the building, but not neceſſary appendances. If you take them otherwiſe, you wrong the Church; if thus, and yet depart, you wrong it and your ſelfe: As if you would haue perſwaded righteous Lot not to ſtay in Zoar, becauſe it was ſo neere Sodome. I feare, if you had ſeene the money-changers in the Temple, how euer you would haue prayed, or taught there: Chriſt did it, not forſaking the place, but ſcourging the offenders: And this is the valour of Chriſtian teachers: To oppoſe abuſes, not to runne away from them: Where ſhall you not thus finde Babylon? Would you haue runne away from Geneua, becauſe of her wafers? Or from Corinth, for her diſordered loue-feaſts? Either runne out of the world, or your flight is in vaine. If experience of change teach you not, that you ſhall finde your Babylon euery where, returne not. Compare the place you haue left, with that you haue choſen; let not feare of ſeeming to repent ouer-ſoone, make you partiall. Loe, there a common harbour of all opinions, of all hereſies; if not a mixture. Here you drew in the free and cleare aire of the Goſpell, without that odious compoſition of Iudaiſme, Arrianiſme, Anabaptiſme: There you liue in the ſtench of theſe and more. You are vnworthy of pitie, if you will approue your miſerie. Say if you can, that the Church of England (if ſhe were not yours) is not an heauen to Amſterdam. How is it then, that our gnats are harder to ſwallow, than their camels? and that whiles all Chriſtendome magnifies our happineſſe, and applauds it; your handfull alone, ſo deteſts our enormities, that you deſpiſe our graces? See whether in this you make not God a loſer. The thanke of all his fauours is loſt, becauſe you want more: and in the meane time, who gaines by this ſequeſtration, but Rome and Hell? How doe they inſult in this aduantage, that our mothers owne children condemne her for vncleane, that wee are daily weakned by our diuiſions, that the rude multitude hath ſo palpable a motiue to diſtruſt vs? Sure, you intended it not: but, if you had beene their hired Agent, you could not haue done our enemies greater ſeruice. The God of heauen open your eyes, that you may ſee the vniuſtice of that zeale which hath tranſported you; and turne your heart to an endeuour of all Chriſtian ſatisfaction: Otherwiſe, your ſoules ſhall finde too late, that it had beene a thouſand times better to ſwallow a Ceremonie, than to rend a Church: yea, that euen whoredomes and murders ſhall abide an eaſier anſwer than ſeparation. I haue done, if onely I haue aduiſed you of that fearfull threatning of the Wiſe-man: The eye that mocketh his father, and deſpiſeth the gouernment of his mother, the Rauens of the valley ſhall picke it out, and the young Eagles eat it.

To Sir Andrew Asteley.

Ep. II. A diſcourſe of our due preparation for death, and the meanes to ſweeten it to vs.

Since I ſaw you, I ſaw my father die: How boldly and merrily did he paſſe thorow the gates of death, as if they had had no terrour, but much pleaſure! Oh that I could as eaſily imitate, as not forget him! We know we muſt tread the ſame way; how happy, if with the ſame minde? Our life, as it giues way to death, ſo muſt make way for it: It will be, though we will not: it will not bee happy, without our will, without our preparation. It is the beſt and longeſt leſſon, to learne how to die; and of ſureſt vſe: which alone if we take not out, it were better not to haue liued. Oh vaine ſtudies of men, how to walke thorow Rome ſtreets all day in the ſhade, how to ſquare circles, how to ſalue vp the celeſtiall motions, how to correct miſ-written copies, to fetch vp old words from forgetfulneſſe, and a thouſand other like points of idle ſkill; whiles the maine care of life and death is neglected! There is an Art of this, infallible, eternall both in truth, and vſe: for though the meanes bee diuers, yet the laſt act is ſtill the ſame, and the diſpoſition of the ſoule need not be other: it is all one whether a feuer bring it, or a ſword; wherein yet, after long profeſſion of other ſciences, I am ſtill (why ſhould I ſhame to confeſſe?) a learner; and ſhall be (I hope) whileſt I am: yet it ſhall not repent vs, as diligent ſchollers repeat their parts vnto each other, to be more perfect, ſo mutually to recall ſome of our rules of well-dying: The firſt whereof is a conſcionable life: The next a right apprehenſion of life, and death: I tread in the beaten path; doe you follow me. To liue holily, is the way to die ſafely, happily. If death be terrible, yet innocence is bold, and will neither feare it ſelfe, nor let vs feare; where contrariwiſe wickedneſſe is cowardly, and cannot abide either any glimpſe of light, or ſhew of danger. Hope doth not more draw our eies forward, than conſcience turnes them backward, and forces vs to looke behinde vs; affrighting vs euen with our paſt euils. Beſides the paine of death, euery ſinne is a new Fury to torment the ſoule, and to make it loth to part. How can it chuſe, when it ſees on the one ſide, what euill it hath done; on the other, what euill it muſt ſuffer? It was a cleare heart (what elſe could doe it?) that gaue ſo bold a forehead to that holy Biſhop, who durſt on his death-bed profeſſe, I haue ſo liued, as I neither feare to die, nor ſhame to liue. What care we when we be found, if well-doing? What care we how ſuddenly, when our preparation is perpetuall? What care we how violently, when ſo many inward friends (ſuch are our good actions) giue vs ſecret comfort? There is no good Steward, but is glad of his Audit; his ſtraight accounts deſire nothing more than a diſcharge: onely the doubtfull and vntruſty feares of his reckoning. Neither onely doth the want of integritie make vs timorous, but of wiſdome, in that our ignorance cannot equally value, either the life which we leaue, or the death we expect. We haue long conuerſed with this life, and yet are vnacquainted: how ſhould we then know that death we neuer ſaw? or that life which followes that death?

Theſe cottages haue beene ruinous, and we haue not thought of their fall: our way hath beene deepe, and we haue not looked for our reſt. Shew me euer any man that knew what life was, and was loth to leaue it. I will ſhew you a priſoner that would dwell in his Goale, a ſlaue that likes to be chained to his Galley. What is there here, but darkneſſe of ignorance, diſcomfort of euents, impotencie of body, vexation of conſcience, diſtemper of paſſions, complaint of eſtate, feares and ſenſe of euil, hopes and doubts of good, ambitious rackings, couetous toyles, enuious vnderminings, irkeſome diſappointments, wearie ſacieties, reſtleſſe deſires, and many worlds of diſcontentments in this one? What wonder is it that we would liue? We laugh at their choice that are in loue with the deformed; and what a face is this wee dote vpon? See if ſinnes, and cares, and croſſes haue not (like a filthy Morphew) ouer-ſpread it, and made it loathſome to all iudicious eyes. I maruell then, that any wiſe men could be other but Stoicks, and could haue any conceit of life, but contemptuous; not more for the miſery of it, while it laſteth, than for the not laſting: wee may loue it, wee cannot hold it. What a ſhadow of a ſmoake, what a dreame of a ſhadow is this, wee affect? Wiſe Salomon ſayes, there is a time to be borne, and a time to die: you doe not heare him ſay, a time to liue. What is more flitting than time? Yet life is not long enough to be worthy of the title of time. Death borders vpon our birth, and our cradle ſtands in our graue. We lament the loſſe of our parents: how ſoone ſhall our ſonnes bewaile ours? Loe, I that write this, and you that reade it, how long are wee here? It were well, if the world were as our tent, yea as our Inne; if not to lodge, yet to bait in: but now it is onely our thorow-fare, one generation paſſeth, another commeth; none ſtayeth. If this earth were a Paradiſe, and this which we call our life were ſweet as the ioyes aboue, yet how ſhould this fickleneſſe of it coole our delight? Grant it abſolute, who can eſteeme a vaniſhing pleaſure? How much more now, when the drammes of our honey, are loſt in pounds of gall; when our contentments are as farre from ſinceritie as continuance? Yet the true apprehenſion of life (though ioyned with contempt) is not enough to ſettle vs, if either we be ignorant of death, or ill perſwaded: for if life haue not worth enough to allure vs, yet death hath horror enough to affright vs. Hee that would die cheerefully, muſt know death his friend: what is hee but the faithfull officer of our Maker, who euer ſmiles or frownes with his Maſter; neither can either ſhew or nouriſh enmity, where God fauours: when he comes fiercely, and puls a man by the throat, and ſummons him to Hell, who can but tremble? The meſſenger is terrible; but the meſſage worſe: hence haue riſen the miſerable deſpaires, and furious rauing of the ill conſcience, that findes no peace within, leſſe without. But when he comes ſweetly, not as an executioner, but as a guide to glory, and profers his ſeruice, and ſhewes our happineſſe, and opens the doore to our heauen; how worthy is hee of entertainment? how worthy of gratulation? But his ſalutation is painfull, if courteous, what then? The Phyſician heales vs, not without paine; and yet wee reward him. It is vnthankfulneſſe to complaine, where the anſwer of profit is exceſſiue. Death paineth: how long? how much? with what proportion to the ſequell of ioy? O death, if thy pangs be grieuous; yet thy reſt is ſweet. The conſtant expectation that hath poſſeſſed that reſt, hath already ſwallowed thoſe pangs, and makes the Chriſtian at once wholly dead to his paine, wholly aliue to his glory. The ſoule hath not leiſure to care for her ſuffering, that beholds her crowne; which if ſhe were conioyned to fetch thorow the flames of hell, her faith would not ſticke at the condition.

Thus in briefe, he that liues Chriſtianly, ſhall die boldly; he that findes his life ſhort and miſerable, ſhall die willingly; hee that knowes death, and fore-ſees glory, ſhall die cheerfully and deſirouſly.

To M. Samuel Burton, Arch-deacon of Glocester.

Ep. III. A diſcourſe of the tryall and choice of the true Religion.

Sir: This diſcourſe inioyned by you, I ſend to your cenſure, to your diſpoſing; but to the vſe of others. Vpon your charge I haue written it for the wauering. If it ſeeme worthy, communicate it; elſe it is but a daſh of your pen. I feare onely the breuity: a Volume were too little for this Subiect. It is not more yours, than the Author. Farewell.

WE doe not more affect varietie in all other things, then we abhorre it in Religion. Euen thoſe which haue held the greateſt falſhoods, hold that there is but one truth. I neuer read of more than one Hereticke, that held all Hereſies true; neither did his opinion ſeeme more incredible, than the relation of it. God can neither be multiplied, nor Chriſt diuided: if his coat might be parted, his body was intire. For that then all ſides challenge Truth, and but one can poſſeſſe it; let vs ſee who haue found it, who enioy it.

There are not many Religions that ſtriue for it, tho many opinions. Euery Hereſie, albeit fundamentall, makes not a Religion. We ſay not, The Religion of Arrians, Neſtorians, Sabellians, Macedonians, but the ſect or hereſie. No opinion challenges this name in our vſuall ſpeech, (for I diſcuſſe not the proprietie) but that which, ariſing from many differences, hath ſetled it ſelfe in the world, vpon her owne principles, not without an vniuerſall diuiſion. Such may ſoone be counted: Though it is true, there are by ſo much too many, as there are more than one. Fiue religions then there are by this rule, vpon earth; which ſtand in competition for truth, Iewiſh, Turkiſh, Greekiſh, Popiſh, Reformed; whereof each pleads for it ſelfe, with diſgrace of the other. The plaine Reader doubts, how he may ſit Iudge in ſo high a plea: God hath put this perſon vpon him; while he chargeth him to trie the ſpirits; to retaine the good, reiect the euill: If ſtill he plead with Moſes, inſufficiencie; let him but attend, God ſhall decide the caſe in his ſilence, without difficulty. The Iew hath little to ſay for himſelfe, but impudent denials of our Chriſt, of their Prophecies: whoſe very refuſall of him, more ſttongly proues him the true Meſſias; neither could he be iuſtified to be that Sauiour, if they reiected him not; ſince the Prophets fore-ſaw and fore-told, not their repelling of him onely, but their reuiling. If there were no more arguments, God hath ſo mightily confuted them from heauen, by the voice of his iudgement, that al the world hiſſeth at their conuiction. Loe their very ſinne is capitally written in their deſolation, and contempt. One of their owne late Doctors ſeriouſly expoſtulates in a relenting Letter to another of his fellow Rabbins, what might be the cauſe of ſo long and deſperate a ruine of their Iſrael; & comparing their former captiuities with their former ſinnes, argues (and yet feares to conclude) that this continuing puniſhment, muſt needs be ſent for ſome ſinne ſo much greater than Idolatry, Oppreſſion, Sabbath-breaking; by how much this plague is more grieuous than all the other: Which, his feare tels him (and he may beleeue it) can be no other, but the murder, and refuſall of their true Meſſias. Let now all the Doctors of thoſe obſtinate Synagogues, anſwer this doubt of their owne obiecting: But how, paſt all contradiction, is the ancient witneſſe of all the holy Prophets, anſwered and confirmed by their euents? whoſe foreſayings verified in all particular iſſues, are more than demonſtratiue. No Art can deſcribe a thing paſt, with more exactneſſe, than they did this Chriſt to come. What circumſtance is there, that hath not his prediction ? Haue they not fore-written who ſhould be his mother, A Virgin: Of what Tribe, of Iuda: Of what houſe, of Dauid: What place, Bethleem: What time, when the ſcepter ſhould be taken from Iudah: Or after ſixtie nine weekes: What name, Ieſus, Immanuel: What habitation, Nazareth: What harbinger, Iohn, the ſecond Elias: What his buſineſſe; to preach, ſaue, deliuer: What entertainment, reiection: What death, the Croſſe: What manner, piercing the body, not breaking the bones: What company, amidſt two wicked ones: Where, at Ieruſalem: Where abouts, without the Gates: With what words, of imploration: What draught, of Vineger and Gall: Who was his Traitor, and with what ſucceſſe ? If all the Synagogues of the Circumciſion, all the Gates of Hell, can obſcure theſe euidences, let me be a Proſelyte. My labour herein is ſo much leſſe, as there is leſſe danger of Iudaiſme. Our Church is well rid of that accurſed Nation, whom yet Rome harbours, and, in a faſhion, graces; whiles in ſtead of ſpitting at, or that their Neapolitan correction whereof Gratian ſpeakes, the Pope ſolemnly receiues at their hands, that Bible, which they at once approue, and ouerthrow. But would God there were no more Iewes than appeare. Euen in this ſenſe alſo he is a Iew, that is one within: plainly, whoſe heart doth not ſincerely confeſſe his Redeemer. Tho a Chriſtian Iew, is no other than an Atheiſt; and therefore muſt be ſcourged elſe-where. The Iew thus anſwered: The Turke ſtands out for his Mahomet, that cozening Arabian, whoſe Religion (if it deſerue that name) ſtands vpon nothing but rude ignorance and palpable Impoſture. Yet loe here a ſubtill Deuill in a groſſe religion: For when he ſaw that he could not by ſingle twiſts of Hereſie pull downe the well built walls of the Church; hee windes them all vp in one Cable, to ſee if his cord of ſo many folds might happily preuaile: raiſing vp wicked Mahomet, to deny with Sabellius the diſtinction of perſons, with Arrius Chriſts diuinity, with Macedonius the Deity of the Holy Ghoſt, with Sergius two wils in Chriſt, with Marcion Chriſts ſuffering: And theſe policies ſeconded with violence, how haue they waſted Chriſtendome ? O damnable mixture, miſerably ſucceſſefull! which yet could not haue beene, but that it meets with ſottiſh Clients, and ſooths vp nature, and debars both all knowledge, and contraction. What is their Alcoran but a fardle of fooliſh impoſſibilities? Whoſoeuer ſhall heare me relate the ſtories of Angell Adriels death, Seraphuels trumpet, Gabriels bridge, Horroth and Marroths hanging, the Moones deſcending into Mahomets ſleeue, the Litter wherin he ſaw God carried by eight Angels, their ridiculous & ſwiniſh Paradiſe, and thouſands of the ſame bran; would ſay, that Mahomet hoped to meet either with beaſts, or mad-men. Beſides theſe barbarous fictions, behold their lawes, full of licence, full of impietie: in which, reuenge is incouraged, multitude of wiues allowed, theft tolerated; and the frame of their opinions ſuch, as well bewrayes their whole religion to be but the mungrell iſſue of an Arrian, Iew, Neſtorian, and Arabian: A monſter of many ſeeds, and all accurſed; In both which regards, Nature her ſelfe, in whoſe breaſt God hath written his royall Law (though in part, by her defaced) hath light enough to condemne a Turke, as the worſt Pagan. Let no man looke for further diſproofe. Theſe follies, a wiſe Chriſtian will ſcorne to confute, and ſcarce vouchſafe to laugh at.

The Greekiſh Church (ſo the Ruſſes tearme themſelues) put in the next claime, but with no better ſucceſſe; whoſe infinite Clergie affords not a man that can giue either reaſon or account of their owne doctrine. Theſe are the baſeſt dregs of all Chriſtians, ſo we fauourably tearme them; tho they perhaps in more ſimplicity than wilfulneſſe, would admit none of all the other Chriſtian world to their font, but thoſe, who in a ſolemne renunciation, ſpit at, and abiure their former God, Religion, Baptiſme; yet peraduenture we might more iuſtly tearme them Nicolaitans, for that obſcure Saint (if a Saint, if honeſt) by an vnequall diuiſion, findes more homage from them than his maſter. Theſe are as ignorant as Turkes, as idolatrous as Heathens, as obſtinate as Iews, and more ſuperſtitious than Papiſts. To ſpeak ingenuouſly from that I haue heard and reade; if the worſt of the Romiſh religion, and the beſt of the Moſcouitiſh bee compared, the choice will be hard whether ſhould be leſſe ill. I labour the leſſe in all theſe, whoſe remoteneſſe and abſurditie ſecure vs from infection, and whoſe only name is their confutation. I deſcend to that maine riuall of Truth, which creepes into her boſome, and is not leſſe neere than ſubtle, the religion (if not rather the faction) of Papiſme, whoſe plea is importunate, and ſo much more dangerous, as it caries fairer probability. Since then of all religions the Chriſtian obtaineth, let vs ſee of thoſe that are called Chriſtian, which ſhould command aſſent and profeſſion. Euery religion beares in her lineaments the image of her parent: the true Religion therefore is ſpirituall, and lookes like God in her puritie: all falſe religions are carnall, and carie the face of Nature, their mother, and of him whoſe illuſion begot them, Satan. In ſumme, Nature neuer conceiued any which did not fauour her, nor the ſpirit any which did not oppugne her. Let this then be the Lydian ſtone of this tryall; we need no more. Whether Religion ſoeuer doth more plauſibly content Nature, is falſe; whether giues more ſincere glory to God, is his Truth. Lay aſide preiudice: Whither I beſeech you tendeth all popery, but to make Nature either vainely proud, or careleſly wanton? What can more aduance her pride, than to tell her, that ſhe hath in her own hands freedome enough of will (with a little preuention) to prepare her ſelfe to her iuſtification; that ſhe hath (whereof to reioyce) ſomewhat, which ſhe hath not receiued; that if God pleaſe but to vnfetter her, ſhe can walke alone? She is inſolent enough of her ſelfe; this flatterie is enough to make her mad of conceit. After this; That if God will but beare halfe the charges by his cooperation, ſhe may vndertake to merit her owne glory, and braue God in the proofe of his moſt accurate iudgement; to fulfill the whole royall Law; and that from the ſuperfluitie of her owne ſatisfactions, ſhee may bee abundantly beneficiall to her neighbours; that naturally without faith a man may doe ſome good workes; that we may repoſe confidence in our merits. Neither is our good onely by this flatterie extolled, but our ill alſo diminiſhed; our euils are our ſinnes; ſome of them (they ſay) are in their nature veniall, and not worthy of death; more, that our originall ſinne is but the want of our firſt iuſtice; no guilt of our firſt fathers offence; no inherent ill diſpoſition; and that by Baptiſmall water is taken away what euer hath the nature of ſinne; that a meere man (let mee not wrong Saint Peters ſucceſſor, in ſo tearming him) hath power to remit both puniſhment and ſinne, paſt and future; that many haue ſuffered more than their ſinnes haue required; that the ſufferings of the Saints added to Chriſts paſſions, make vp the treaſure of the Church, that ſpirituall Exchequer; whereof their Biſhop muſt keepe the key, and make his friends. In all theſe the gaine of Nature (who ſees not?) is Gods loſſe: all her brauery is ſtolne from aboue: beſides thoſe other direct derogations from him; that his Scriptures are not ſufficient; that their originall fountaines are corrupted, and the ſtreames runne clearer; that there is a multitude (if a finite number) of Mediators. Turne your eyes now to vs, and ſee contrarily how we abaſe Nature, how we knead her in the duſt; ſpoiling her of her proud rags, loading her with reproches; and giuing glory to him, that ſayes, he will not giue it to another; whiles we teach, that we neither haue good, nor can doe good of our ſelues; that we are not ſicke or fettered, but dead in our ſinne; that we cannot moue to good, more than we are moued; that our beſt actions are faulty; our ſatisfactions debts; our deſerts damnation; that all our merit is his mercy that ſaues vs; that euery of our ſinnes is deadly; euery of our natures originally depraued, and corrupted; that no water can entirely waſh away the filthineſſe of our concupiſcence; that none but the blood of him that was God, can cleanſe vs; that all our poſſible ſufferings are below our offences; that Gods written word is all-ſufficient to informe vs, to make vs both wiſe and perfect; that Chriſts mediation is more than ſufficient to ſaue vs, his ſufferings to redeeme vs, his obedience to inrich vs. You haue ſeene how Papiſtry makes Nature proud; now ſee how it makes her lawleſſe and wanton: while it teacheth (yet this one, not ſo vniuerſally) that Chriſt dyed effectually for all; that in true contrition an expreſſe purpoſe of new life is not neceſſarie;

rie; that wicked men are true members of the Church; that a lewd miſ-creant or infidell in the buſineſſe of the Altar partakes of the true body and bloud of Chriſt, yea (which I ſhame to tell) a brute creature; that men may ſaue the labour of ſearching, for that it is both eaſie and ſafe (with that Catholike Collier) to beleeue with the Church, at a venture: more than ſo, that deuotion is the ſeed of ignorance; that there is infallibilitie annexed to a particular place and perſon; that the bare act of the Sacraments confers grace without faith; that the meere ſigne of the Croſſe made by a Iew or Infidell, is of force to driue away Deuils; that the ſacrifice of the Maſſe in the very worke wrought, auailes to obtaine pardon of our ſinnes, not in our life onely, but when we lye frying in purgatory; that we need not pray in faith to be heard, or in vnderſtanding; that almes giuen, merit heauen, diſpoſe to iuſtification, ſatisfie God for ſinne; that abſtinence from ſome meats and drinks is meritorious; that Indulgences may be granted to diſpence with all the penance of ſinnes afterward to bee committed; that theſe by a liuing man may be applyed to the dead; that one man may deliuer anothers ſoule out of his purging torments: and therefore, that hee who wants not either money or friends, need not feare the ſmart of his ſinnes. O religion, ſweet to the wealthy, to the needy deſperate! who will now care henceforth how ſound his deuotions be, how lewd his life, how hainous his ſinnes, that knowes theſe refuges? On the contrary, we curbe Nature, we reſtraine, we diſcourage, we threaten her, teaching her not to reſt in implicit faiths, or generall intentions, or externall actions of piety, or preſumptuous diſpenſations of men: but to ſtriue vnto ſincere faith, without which we haue no part in Chriſt, in his Church, no benefit by Sacraments, prayers, faſtings, beneficences: to ſet the heart on worke in all our deuotions, without which the hand and tongue are but hypocrites: to ſet the hands on worke in good actions, without which the preſuming heart is but an hypocrite: to expect no pardon for ſinne before we commit it, and from Chriſt alone when we haue committed it, and to repent before we expect it: to hope for no chaffering, no ranſome of our ſoules from below, no contrary change of eſtate after diſſolution: that life is the time of mercy, death of retribution. Now let me appeale to your ſoule, and to the iudgment of all the world, whether of theſe two religions is framed to the humour of Nature: yea let mee but know what action Poperie requires of any of her followers, which a meere Naturaliſt hath not done, cannot doe? See how I haue choſen to beat them with that rod wherewith they thinke we haue ſo often ſmarted: for what cauill hath beene more ordinary againſt vs, than this of eaſe and liberty, yea licence giuen and taken by our religion? together with the vpbraidings of their owne ſtrict and rigorous auſtereneſſe? Where are our penall workes, our faſtings, ſcourges, haire-cloth, weary pilgrimages, bluſhing confeſſions, ſolemne vowes of willing beggery and perpetuall continencie? To doe them right, we yeeld, in all the hard works of will-worſhip they goe beyond vs; but (leſt they ſhould inſult in the victory) not ſo much as the Prieſts of Baal went beyond them. I ſee their whips: ſhew me their kniues. Where did euer zealous Romaniſt lance and carue his fleſh in deuotion? The Baalites did it, and yet neuer the wiſer, neuer the holier. Either therefore this zeale, in workes of their owne deuiſing, makes them not better than we, or it makes the Baalites better than they: let them take their choiſe. Alas, theſe difficulties are but a colour to auoid greater: No, no, to worke our ſtubborne wils to ſubiection, to draw this vntoward fleſh to a ſincere cheerefulneſſe in Gods ſeruice: to reach vnto a ſound beleefe in the Lord Ieſus, to pray with a true heart, without diſtraction, without diſtruſt, without miſ-conceit: to keepe the heart in continuall awe of God: Theſe are the hard tasks of a Chriſtian, worthy of our ſweat, worthy of our reioycing: all which that Babyloniſh religion ſhifteth off with a careleſſe faſhionableneſſe, as if it had not to doe with the ſoule. Giue vs obedience: let them take ſacrifice. Doe you yet looke for more euidence? looke into particulars, and ſatisfie your ſelfe in Gods deciſion, as Optatus aduiſed of old. Since the goods of our father are in queſtion, whither ſhould we goe but to his will and Teſtament? My ſoule beare the danger of this bold aſſertion. If we erre, we erre with Chriſt and his Apoſtles. In a word, againſt all ſtaggering, our Sauiours rule is ſure and eternall: If any man will doe my Fathers will, he ſhall know of the doctrine whether it be of God.

To M. Edmund Sleigh.

Ep. IV. A diſcourſe of the hardneſſe of Chriſtianitie, and the abundant recompence of the pleaſures and commodities of that profeſſion.

HOw hard a thing it is (deare Vncle) to be a Chriſtian! perhaps others are leſſe dull and more quiet; more waxen to the impreſſions of grace, & leſſe troubleſome to themſelues; I accuſe none, but whom I dare, my ſelfe. Euen eaſie buſineſſes are hard to the weake: let others boaſt, I muſt complaine. To keepe our ſtation is hard; harder to moue forward. One while I ſcarce reſtraine my vnruly deſires, from euill: ofter, can find no luſt to good. My heart wil either be vaine, or ſullen: when I am wrought with much ſweat to deteſt ſin, & diſtaſte the world, yet who ſhall raiſe vp this droſſe to a ſpiritual ioy? Sometimes I purpoſe wel; & if thoſe thoughts (not mine) begin to lift me from my earth; loe, he that rules in the aire, ſtoopes vpon me with powerfull tentations, or the world puls me downe with a ſweet violence; ſo as I know not whether I be forced, or perſwaded to yeeld; I finde much weakneſſe in my ſelfe, but more treachery. How willing am I to be deceiued! How loth to be altered! Good duties ſeeme harſh, and can hardly eſcape the repulſe, or delay of excuſes; and not without much ſtrife grow to any relliſh of pleaſure; and when they are at beſt, cannot auoid the mixture of many infirmities: which doe at once diſquiet, and diſcourage the mind, not ſuffering it to reſt in what it would haue done, and could not. And if after many ſighs and teares, I haue attained to doe well, and reſolue better; yet this good eſtate is farre from conſtant, and eaſily inclining to change. And whiles I ſtriue, in ſpight of my naturall fickleneſſe, to hold my owne with ſome progreſſe and gaine; what difficulty doe I finde, what oppoſition? O God, what aduerſaries haſt thou prouided for vs weake men! what incounters! Malicious and ſubtill ſpirits, an alluring world, a ſerpentine and ſtubborne nature: Force and fraud doe their worſt to vs; ſometimes becauſe they are ſpirituall enemies, I ſee them not, and complaine to feele them too late: Other-whiles my ſpirituall eies ſee them with amazement, and I (like a cowardly Iſraelite) am ready to flee, and plead their meaſure, for my feare: Who is able to ſtand before the ſonnes of Anak? Some other times I ſtand ſtill, and (as I can) weakly reſiſt; but am foiled with indignation, and ſhame. Then againe I riſe vp, not without baſhfulneſſe and ſcorne: and with more hearty reſiſtance preuaile, and triumph, when ere long, ſurprized with a ſudden and vnwarned aſſault, I am caried away captiue, whither I would not: and mourning for my diſcomfiture, ſtudy for a feeble reuenge: My quarrell is good, but my ſtrength maintaines it not; It is now long ere I can recouer this ouerthrow, and finde my ſelfe whole of theſe wounds. Beſides ſuggeſtions, croſſes fall heauy, and worke no ſmall diſtemper in a minde faint and vnſetled, whoſe law is ſuch, that the more I grow, the more I beare; and not ſeldome, when God giues me reſpite, I afflict my ſelfe: either my feare faineth euils, or my vnruly paſſions raiſe tumults within me, which breed much trouble, whether in ſatisfying or ſuppreſſing: not to ſpeake, that ſinne is attended, beſides vnquietneſſe, with terror.

Now you ſay; Alas! Chriſtianitie is hard: I grant it; but gainfull and happy. I contemne the difficulty, when I reſpect the aduantage. The greateſt labours that haue anſwerable requitals, are leſſe than the leaſt that haue no regard. Beleeue me, when I looke to the reward, I would not haue the worke eaſier. It is a good Maſter whom we ſerue, who not onely paies, but giues; not after the proportion of our earnings, but of his owne mercy. If euery paine that we ſuffer were a death, and euery croſſe an hell, we haue amends enough. It were iniurious to complaine of the meaſure, when we acknowledge the recompence. Away with theſe weake diſlikes: though I ſhould buy it dearer, I would be a Chriſtian. Any thing may make me out of loue with my ſelfe, nothing with my profeſſion: I were vnworthy of this fauour if I could repent to haue endured: herein alone I am ſafe, herein I am bleſſed. I may be all other things, and yet with that dying Emperor, complaine, with my laſt breath, That I am no whit the better: let me be a Chriſtian, I am priuiledged from miſeries; hell cannot touch me, death cannot hurt me. No euill can arreſt me while I am vnder the protection of him, which ouer-rules all good and euill: yea ſo ſoone as it touches mee, it turnes good, and being ſent and ſuborned by my ſpirituall aduerſaries to betray me, now in an happy change it fights for me, and is driuen rather to rebell, than wrong me. It is a bold and ſtrange word: No price could buy of me the gaine of my ſinnes: That, which while I repented, I would haue expiated with bloud; now after my repentance I forgoe not for a world; the fruit of hauing ſinned (if not rather of hauing repented.) Beſides my freedome, how large is my poſſeſſion? All good things are mine, to challenge, to enioy. I cannot looke beyond my owne, nor beſides it; and the things that I cannot ſee, I dare claime no leſſe. The heauen that rowles ſo glorioufly aboue my head is mine, by this right: yea, thoſe celeſtiall ſpirits, the better part of that high creation, watch me in my bed, guard me in my wayes, ſhelter me in my dangers, comfort me in my troubles, and are ready to receiue that ſoule which they haue kept.

What ſpeake I of creatures? The God of ſpirits is mine: and by a ſweet and ſecret vnion, I am become an heire of his glory, yea (as it were) a limbe of himſelfe. O bleſſedneſſe! worthy of difficulty, worthy of paine. What thou wilt, Lord, ſo I may be thine, what thou wilt. When I haue done all, when I haue ſuffered all, thou exceedeſt more than I want. Follow me then, deare Vncle: or (if you will) lead me rather (as you haue done) in theſe ſteps; and from the rough way, looke to the end: Ouer-looke theſe trifling grieuances, and faſten your eies vpon the happy recompence; and ſee if you cannot ſcorne to complaine. Pity thoſe that take not your paines; and perſiſt with courage till you feele the weight of your Crowne.

To Mr. W. L.

Ep. V. Expoſtulating the cauſe of his vnſetledneſſe in religion, which is pleaded to be our diſſenſions: ſhewing the inſufficiencie of that Motiue, and comparing the ſtate of our Church herein, with the Romiſh.

I Would I knew where to finde you: then I could tell how to take a direct aime; whereas now I muſt roue and coniecture. To day you are in the tents of the Romaniſts; to morrow in ours; the next day betweene both, againſt both. Our aduerſaries thinke you ours, we theirs, your conſcience findes you with both, and neither. I flatter you not: this of yours is the worſt of all tempers: heat and cold haue their vſes; luke-warmneſſe is good for nothing, but to trouble the ſtomacke. Thoſe that are ſpiritually hot, finde acceptation; thoſe that are ſtarke cold, haue a leſſer reckoning; the meane between both, is ſo much worſe, as it comes neerer to good, and attaines it not.

How long will you halt in this indifferency? Reſolue one way, and know at laſt what you doe hold; what you ſhould. Caſt off either your wings or your teeth; and loathing this Bat-like nature, be either a bird or a beaſt. To die wauering and vncertaine, your ſelfe will grant fearefull. If you muſt ſettle, when begin you? If you muſt beginne, why not now? It is dangerous deferring that, whoſe want is deadly, and whoſe opportunity is doubtfull. God cryeth with Iehu, Who is on my ſide, who? Looke at laſt out of your window to him, and in a reſolute courage caſt down this Iezabel that hath bewitched you. Is there any impediment, which delay will abate? Is there any which a iuſt anſwer cannot remoue? If you had rather wauer, who can ſettle you? But if you loue not inconſtancy, tell vs why you ſtagger. Bee plaine, or elſe you will neuer bee firme: What hinders you? Is it our diuiſions: I ſee you ſhake your head at this, and by your ſilent geſture bewray this the cauſe of your diſtaſte: Would God I could either deny this with truth, or amend it with teares: But I grant it, with no leſſe ſorrow, than you with offence. This earth hath nothing more lamentable, than the ciuill jarres of one faith. What then? Muſt you defie your mother, becauſe you ſee your brethren fighting? Their diſſenſion is her griefe: Muſt ſhe loſe ſome ſonnes, becauſe ſome others quarrell? Doe not ſo wrong your ſelfe in afflicting her. Will you loue Chriſt the leſſe, becauſe his coat is diuided? Yea, let mee boldly ſay; The hemme is torne a little, the garment is whole; or rather it is fretted a little, not torn; or rather the fringe, not the hemme. Behold, here is one Chriſt, one Creed, one Baptiſme, one Heauen, one way to it; in ſumme, one religion, one foundation, and (take away the tumultuous ſpirits of ſome rigorous Lutherans) one heart: our differences are thoſe of Paul and Barnabas; not thoſe of Peter and Magus: if they be ſome, it is well they are no more; if many, that they are not capitall. Shew mee that Church, that hath not complained of diſtraction; yea that family, yea that fraternity, yea that man that alwayes agrees with himſelfe. See if the Spouſe of Chriſt, in that heauenly mariage ſong, doe not call him, a young Hart in the mountaines of diuiſion. Tell me then, whither will you goe for truth, if you will allow no truth, but where there is no diuiſion? To Rome perhaps, famous for vnitie, famous for peace. See now how happily you haue choſen, how well you haue ſped: Loe, there Cardinall Bellarmine himſelfe, a witneſſe aboue exception, vnder his owne hand acknowledgeth to the world, and reckons vp 237 contrarieties of doctrine among the Romiſh Diuines. What need we more euidence? O the perfect accordance of Peters See! worthy to be recorded for a badge of truth. Let now all our aduerſaries ſcrape together ſo many contradictions of opinions amongſt vs, as they confeſſe amongſt themſelues, and be you theirs. No, they are not more peaceable, but more ſubtle; they haue not leſſe diſſenſion, but more ſmothered. They fight cloſely within doores, without noyſe; all our frayes are in the field: would God wee had as much of their cunning, as they want of our peace; and no more of their policy, than they want of our truth. Our ſtrife is in ceremonies, theirs ſubſtance; ours in one or two points, theirs in all. Take it boldly from him that dares auouch it, there is not one point in all Diuinity (except thoſe wherein we accord with them) wherin they all ſpeake the ſame. If our Church diſpleaſe you for differences, theirs much more; vnleſſe you will be either wilfully incredulous, or wilfully partiall: vnleſſe you diſlike a miſchiefe the leſſe for the ſecrecy. What will you doe then? Will you be a Church alone? Alas, how full are you of contradictons to your ſelfe! how full of contrary purpoſes! how oft doe you chide with your ſelfe! how oft doe you fight with your ſelfe! I appeale to that boſome which is priuy to thoſe ſecret combats: beleeue me not, if euer you finde perfect vnity any where but aboue: either goe thither, and ſeeke it amongſt thoſe that triumph, or be content with what eſtate you finde in this warfaring number. Truth is in differences, as gold in droſſe, wheat in chaffe; will you caſt away the beſt metall, the beſt graine, becauſe it is mingled with this offall? Will you rather be poore and hungry, than beſtow labour on the fanne, or the furnace? Is there nothing worth your reſpect, but peace? I haue heard that the interlacing of diſcords graces the beſt muſick; and I know not whether the very euill ſpirits agree not with themſelues. If the body be ſound, what though the coat be torne? or if the garment be whole, what if the lace be vnript? Take you peace: let me haue truth, I cannot haue both. To conclude: Embrace thoſe truths that we all hold; and it greatly matters not what you hold in thoſe wherein we differ: and if you loue your ſafety, ſeeke rather grounds whereon to reſt, than excuſes for your vnreſt. If euer you looke to gaine by the truth, you muſt both chuſe it, and cleaue to it: Meere reſolution is not enough; except you will rather loſe your ſelfe than it.

To Sir Edmvnd Lvcy.

Epist. VI. Diſcourſing of the different degrees of heauenly glory; and of our mutuall knowledge of each other aboue.

AS thoſe which neuer were at home, now after much heare-ſay trauelling toward it, aske in the way, What manner of houſe it is, what ſeat, what frame, what ſoile; ſo doe we in the paſſage to our glory: we are all pilgrimes thither; yet ſo, as that ſome haue lookt into it afarre thorow the open windowes of the Scripture. Goe to then: whiles others are enquiring about worldly dignities, and earthly pleaſures, let vs two ſweetly conſult of the eſtate of our future happineſſe; yet without preſumption, without curioſitie. Amongſt this infinite choice of thoughts, it hath pleaſed you to limit our diſcourſe to two heads. You aske firſt, if the ioyes of the glorified Saints ſhall differ in degrees. I feare not to affirme it. There is one life of all, one felicity; but diuers meaſures. Our heauen beginnes here, and here varies in degrees. One Chriſtian enioyes God aboue another, according as his grace, as his faith is more: and heauen is ſtill like it ſelfe, not other aboue from that beneath. As our grace begins our glory, ſo it proportions it: Bleſſedneſſe ſtands in the perfect operation of the beſt faculties about the perfecteſt obiect; that is, in the viſion, in the fruition of God. All his Saints ſee him, but ſome more cleerly; as the ſame Sunne is ſeene of all eyes, not with equall ſtrength. Such as the eye of our faith was to ſee him that is inuiſible, ſuch is the eye of our preſent apprehenſion to ſee as we are ſeen. Who ſees not, that our rewards are according to our workes? not for them, as on merit (woe be to that ſoule which hath but what it earneth) but after them, as their rule of proportion: and theſe, how ſenſibly vnequall? One giues but a cup of cold water to a diſciple, another giues his blood for the maſter. Different workes haue different wages, not of deſert, but of mercy. Fiue talents well imployed, carry away more recompence than two; yet both approued, both rewarded with their Maſters ioy. Who can ſticke at this, that knowes thoſe heauenly ſpirits (to whom we ſhall be like) are marſhalled by their Maker into ſeuerall rankes? He that was rapt into their element, and ſaw their bleſſed orders, as from his owne knowledge, hath ſtiled them, Thrones, Principalities, Powers, Dominions. If in one part of this Celeſtiall Family, the great Houſholder hath thus ordered it, why not in the other? yea euen in this he hath inſtanced; You ſhall ſit on twelue Thrones, and iudge the twelue Tribes of Iſrael. If he meane not ſome preheminence to his Apoſtles, how doth he anſwer, how doth hee ſatisfie them? Yet more: Lazarus is in Abrahams boſome: therefore Abraham is more honoured than Lazarus. I ſhall need no more proofes, if from heauen you ſhall looke downe into the great Gulfe, and there ſee diuerſity of torments according to the value of ſinnes. Equality of offences, you acknowledge an idle Paradoxe of the Stoicks: to hold vnequall ſinnes equally puniſhed, were more abſurd, and more iniurious to Gods iuſtice: There is but one fire, which yet otherwiſe burnes the ſtraw, otherwiſe wood and iron. He that made and commands this dungeon, theſe tortures, tells vs that the wilfully diſobedient ſhall ſmart with moe ſtripes; the ignorant with fewer. Yet ſo conceiue of theſe heauenly degrees, that the leaſt is glorious. So doe theſe veſſels differ, that all are full: there is no want in any, no enuy. Let vs ſtriue for a place, not ſtriue for the order: how can we wiſh to be more than happy?

Your other queſtion is of our mutuall knowledge aboue; the hope whereof (you thinke) would giue much contentment to the neceſſitie of our parture: for both we are loth not to know thoſe whom we loue, and we are glad to thinke we ſhall know them happy: whereof (if it may comfort you) I am no leſſe confident. If I may not goe ſo farre, as with the beſt of the Fathers, to ſay we ſhall know one anothers thoughts, I dare ſay, our perſons we ſhall; our knowledge, our memory, are not there loſt, but perfected: yea, I feare not to ſay we ſhall know both our miſeries paſt, and the preſent ſufferings of the damned. It makes our happineſſe not a little the ſweeter, to know that we were miſerable, to know that others are and muſt be miſerable: we ſhall know them; not feele them. Take heed, that you clearly diſtinguiſh betwixt ſpeculation and experience. We are then farre out of the reach of euills. We may ſee them to comfort vs, not to affect vs. Who doubts that theſe eyes ſhall ſee, and know the glorious manhood of our bleſſed Sauiour, aduanced aboue all the powers of heauen? And if one bodie, why not more? And if our elder brother, why no more of our ſpirituall fraternity? Yea if the twelue thrones of thoſe Iudges of Iſrael ſhall be conſpicuous; how ſhall we not acknowledge them? And if theſe, who ſhall reſtraine vs from more? You will eaſily grant, that our loue can neuer faile: Faith and hope giue place to ſight, to preſent fruition; for theſe are of things not ſeene: but loue is perpetuall, not of God only, but his Saints: For nothing ceaſes, but our earthly parts, nothing but what ſauours of corruption. Chriſtian loue is a grace, and may well challenge a place in heauen: and what loue is there, of what we know not? More plainly; If the three Diſciples in Tabor knew Moſes and Elias, how much more ſhall we know them in Gods Sion? Laſtly, (for it is a letter, not a volume, that I intended in this not neceſſary, but likely diſcourſe) that famous parable can tell you, that thoſe which are in hell, may know ſingular and ſeuerall perſons, though diſtant in place. The rich Glutton knowes Lazarus and Abraham. I heare what you ſay; It is but a parable: neither will I preſſe you with the contrary authority of Ambroſe, Tertullian, Gregory, Hierome, or any Father; nor with that vniuerſall rule of Chryſoſtome, that thoſe only are parables, where examples are expreſſed, and names concealed: I yeeld it; yet all holy parables haue their truths, at leaſt their probabilities. Deny this, and you diſable their vſe, wrong their Author. Our Sauiour neuer ſaid ought was done, that cannot be: and ſhall then the damned retaine ought, which the glorified loſe? No man euer held that the ſoule was aduantaged by torment. Comfort you therefore in this; you ſhall know and be knowne. But farre be from hence all carnall and earthly thoughts; as if your affections ſhould be (as below) doubled to your wife or childe. Nature hath no place in glory: here is no reſpect of bloud, none of mariage. This groſſer acquaintance and pleaſure is for the Paradiſe of Turkes, not the Heauen of Chriſtians. Here is, as no mariage, (ſaue betwixt the Lambe and his Spouſe the Church) ſo no matrimoniall affections. You ſhall reioyce in your glorified childe; not as your childe, but as glorified. In briefe, let vs ſo enquire of our company, that aboue all things we ſtriue to be there our ſelues, where wee are ſure, if wee haue not what wee imagined, wee ſhall haue more than we could imagine.

EPIST. VII. Concerning the matter of Diuorce in caſe of apparant adultery, aduiſing the innocent partie of the fitteſt courſe in that behalfe.

ALL intermedling is attended with danger; and euer ſo much more, as the band of the parties contending, is nearer and ſtraiter: how can it then want perill, to iudge betwixt thoſe which are, or ſhould be one fleſh? yet great neceſſities require hazard. My profeſſion would iuſtly checke me, if I preferred not your conſcience to my owne loue. I pity and lament, that your owne boſome is falſe to you; that your ſelfe with ſhame, and with ſinne, are pulled from your ſelfe, and giuen to whom you would not: An iniury that cannot be parallelled vpon earth; and ſuch as may without our wonder, diſtract you: ſleight croſſes are digeſted with ſtudy, and reſolution; greater with time; the greateſt, not without ſtudy, time, counſell. There is no extreme euill, whoſe euaſions are not perplexed. I ſee here miſchiefe on either hand: I ſee you beſet, not with griefes only, but dangers. No man euer more truly held a Wolfe by the eare; which he can neither ſtay, nor let goe with ſafety. Gods ancient Law would haue made a quicke diſpatch, and haue determined the caſe, by the death of the offender, and the liberty of the innocent; and not it alone. How many Heathen Law-giuers haue ſubſcribed to Moſes? Arabians, Grecians, Romans, yea very Gothes, the dregs of Barbariſme, haue thought this wrong not expiable, but by bloud. With vs, the eaſineſſe of reuenge, as it yeelds frequence of offences, ſo multitude of doubts: Whether the wronged huſband ſhould conceale, or complaine: complaining, whether he ſhould retaine or diſmiſſe: diſmiſſing, whether he may marry, or muſt continue ſingle: not continuing ſingle, whether he may receiue his owne, or chuſe another: but your inquiries ſhall be my bounds. The fact (you ſay) is too euident. Let me aske you; To your ſelfe, or to the world. This point alone muſt vary our proceedings. Publike notice requires publike diſcharge. Priuate wrongs are in our own power: publike, in the hands of authority. The thoughts of our owne breſts, while they ſmother themſelues within vs, are at our command, whether for ſuppreſſing, or expreſſing; but if they once haue vented themſelues by words, vnto others eares, now (as common ſtrayes) they muſt ſtand to the hazard of cenſure: ſuch are our actions. Neither the ſword, nor the keyes meddle within doores, and what but they without? If fame haue laid hold on the wrong, proſecute it, cleere your name, cleere your houſe, yea Gods. Elſe you ſhall be reputed a Pandar to your owne bed: and the ſecond ſhame ſhall ſurpaſſe the firſt, ſo much as your owne fault can more blemiſh you, than anothers. If there were no more; he is cruelly mercifull, that neglects his owne fame. But what if the ſinne were ſhrouded in ſecrecy? The loathſomneſſe of vice conſiſts not in common knowledge. It is no leſſe hainous, if leſſe talked of. Report giues but ſhame: God and the good ſoule deteſt cloſe euils. Yet then I aske not of the offence, but of the offender; not of her crime, but her repentance. She hath ſinned againſt heauen, and you. But hath ſhee waſhed your polluted bed with her teares? Hath her true ſorrow beene no leſſe apparant than her ſinne? Hath ſhe peeced her old vow with new proteſtations of fidelity? Doe you find her at once humbled and changed? Why ſhould that eare be deafe to her prayers, that was open to her accuſation? why is there not yet place for mercy? Why doe we Chriſtians liue as vnder Martiall law, wherein we ſinne but once? Plead not authority: Ciuilians haue beene too rigorous: the mercifull ſentence of Diuinity, ſhal ſweetly temper humane ſeuereneſſe. How many haue we known the better for their ſinne? That Magdalene (her predeceſſour in filthineſſe) had neuer loued ſo much, if ſhee had not ſo much ſinned. How oft hath Gods Spouſe deſerued a diuorce? which yet ſtill her confeſſions, her teares haue reuerſed. How oft hath that ſcroll beene written, and ſigned; and yet againe cancelled, and torne, vpon ſubmiſſion? His actions, not his words onely, are our precepts: Why is man cruell, where God relents? The wrong is ours onely, for his ſake; without whoſe law, were no ſinne. If the Creditor pleaſe to remit the debt, doe ſtanders-by complaine? But if ſhe be at once filthy, and obſtinate, flie from her bed, as contagious. Now your beneuolence is adultery; you impart your body to her, ſhe her ſinne to you: A dangerous exchange; An honeſt body for an harlots ſinne: Herein you are in cauſe that ſhe hath more than one adulterer. I applaud the rigour of thoſe ancient Canons, which haue ſtill roughly cenſured euen this cloake of vice: As there is neceſſitie of charity in the former, ſo of iuſtice in this. If you can ſo loue your wife, that you deteſt not her ſinne, you are a better huſband than a Chriſtian, a better bawd than an huſband. I dare ſay no more vpon ſo generall a relation; good Phyſitians in dangerous diſeaſes dare not preſcribe on bare ſight of vrine, or vncertaine report, but will feele the pulſe, and ſee the ſymptomes, ere they reſolue on the receit. You ſee how no niggard I am of my counſels: would God I could as eaſily aſſwage your griefe, as ſatisfie your doubts.

To M^{r}. Robert Hay.

Epist. VIII. A Diſcourſe of the continuall exerciſe of a Chriſtian, how he may keepe his heart from hardneſſe, and his wayes from error.

To keepe the heart in vre with God, is the higheſt taske of a Chriſtian. Good motions are not frequent: but the conſtancy of good diſpoſition is rare and hard. This worke muſt be continuall, or elſe ſpeedeth not: like as the body from a ſetled and habituall diſtemper muſt be recouered by long diets; and ſo much the rather, for that we cannot intermit here without relapſes. If this field be not tilled euery day, it will runne out into thiſtles. The euening is fitteſt for this worke: when retired into our ſelues, we muſt cheerefully, and conſtantly, both looke vp to God, and into our hearts; as we haue to doe with both: to God in thankſgiuing firſt, then in requeſt. It ſhall be therefore expedient for the ſoule, duly to recount to it ſelfe all the ſpecialties of Gods fauours: a confuſed thankes ſauours of careleſneſſe, and neither doth affect vs, nor win acceptance aboue. Bethinke your ſelfe then of all theſe externall, inferiour, earthly graces: that your being, breathing, life, motion, reaſon, is from him; that he hath giuen you a more noble nature, than the reſt of the creatures, excellent faculties of the minde, perfection of ſenſes, ſoundneſſe of body, competency of eſtate, ſeemelineſſe of condition, fitneſſe of calling, preſeruation from dangers, reſcue out of miſeries, kindneſſe of friends, carefulneſſe of education, honeſty of reputation, libertie of recreations, quietneſſe of life, opportunitie of well-doing, protection of Angels. Then riſe higher to his ſpirituall fauours, though here on earth, and ſtriue to raiſe your affections with your thoughts: Bleſſe God that you were borne in the light of the Goſpell, for your profeſſion of the truth, for the honour of your vocation, for your incorporating into the Church, for the priuilege of the Sacraments, the free vſe of the Scriptures, the communion of Saints, the benefit of their prayers, the aid of their counſels, the pleaſure of their conuerſation; for the beginnings of regeneration, any foot-ſteps of faith, hope, loue, zeale, patience, peace, ioy, conſcionableneſſe, for any deſire of more. Then let

Hall, J.

let your ſoule mount higheſt of all, into her heauen, and acknowledge thoſe celeſtiall graces of her election to glory, redemption from ſhame and death, of the interceſſion of her Sauiour, of the preparation of her place; and there let her ſtay a while vpon the meditation of her future ioyes. This done, the way is made for your requeſt; Sue now to your God; as for grace to anſwer theſe mercies, ſo to ſee wherein you haue not anſwered them: From him therefore caſt your eyes downe vpon your ſelfe: and as ſome carefull Iuſticer doth a ſuſpected felon, ſo doe you ſtrictly examine your heart, of what you haue done that day; of what you ſhould haue done, enquire whether your thoughts haue beene ſequeſtred to God, ſtrangers from the world, fixed on heauen; whether iuſt, charitable, lowly, pure, Chriſtian; whether your ſenſes haue beene holily guided, neither to let in temptations, nor to let out ſinnes; whether your ſpeeches haue not beene offenſiue, vaine, raſh, indiſcreet, vnſauoury, vnedifying; whether your actions haue beene warrantable, expedient, comely, profitable. Thence, ſee if you haue beene negligent in watching your heart, expence of your time, exerciſes of deuotion, performance of good workes, reſiſtance of temptations, good vſe of good examples: and compare your preſent eſtate with the former: looke iealouſly, whether your ſoule hath gained or loſt; loſt ought of the heat of her loue, tenderneſſe of conſcience, feare to offend, ſtrength of vertue; gained, more increaſe of grace, more aſſurance of glory. And when you finde (alas! who can but finde?) either holineſſe decayed, or euill done, or good omitted, caſt downe your eyes, ſtrike your breſt, humble your ſoule, and ſigh to him whom you haue offended; ſue for pardon as for life, heartily, yearningly: inioyne your ſelfe carefull amendment, redouble your holy reſolutions, ſtrike hands with God in a new couenant: my ſoule for your ſafety. Much of this good counſell I confeſſe to haue learned from the Table of an vnknowne Author, at Antwerp. It contented me: and therefore I haue thus made it (by many alterations) my owne for forme, and yours for the vſe: Our practice ſhall both commend it, and make vs happie.

To Mr. I. F. one of the Company of the Turkiſh Merchants.

EPIST. IX. Diſcourſing of the lawfulneſſe of conuerſation and trade with Infidels and Heretikes, and ſhewing how farre and wherein it is allowable.

IN matter of ſin I dare not diſcommend much feare. Looſeneſſe is both a more ordinary fault, and more dangerous, than exceſſe of care: yet herein the minde may be vniuſtly tortured, and ſuffer without gaine. It is good to know our bounds, and keep them; that ſo we may neither be careleſly offenſiue, nor needleſly afflicted. How farre we may trauell to, and conuerſe with Infidels, with Heretikes, is a long demand, and cannot be anſwered at once. I ſee extremes on both hands, and a path of truth betwixt both, of no ſmall latitude. Firſt, I commend not this courſe to you; it is well, if I allow it. The earth is large, and truth hath ample Dominions; and thoſe not incommodious, not vnpleaſant. To neglect the maine bleſſings with competencie of the inferiour; for abundance of the inferiour, without the maine, were a choice vnwiſe and vnequall. While we are free, who would take ought but the beſt? Whither goe you? Haue we not as temperate a Sunne, as faire an Heauen, as fertile an Earth, as rich a Sea, as ſweet Companions? What ſtand I on equalitie? a firmer peace, a freer Goſpell, an happier gouernment than the world can ſhew you? yet you muſt goe: I giue you allowance; but limited, and full of cautions: like an inquiſitiue Officer, you muſt let me aske, who, how, when, whither, why, how long, and accordingly determine. To communicate with them in their falſe ſeruices, who will not ſpit at, as impious? We ſpeake of conuerſing with men, not with idolatries: ciuilly, not in Religion: not in workes of darkneſſe, but buſineſſe of commerce and common indifferencies. Fie on thoſe Rimmonites, that plead an vpright ſoule in a proſtrate body: Hypocrites, that pretend a Nathanael in the skin of a Nicodemus. God hates their ſecret halting, and will reuenge it. Let goe their vices, and ſpeake of their perſons: Thoſe may be conuerſed with; not with familiarity, not with intireneſſe; as men qualified, not as friends. Traffique is here allowed, not amity, not friendſhip, but peace. Paul will allow you to feaſt at their table, not to frequent it: yet not this to all. Chriſtianity hath all ſtatures in it, all ſtrengths: children, and men, weaklings, Giants. For a feeble vngrounded Chriſtian, this very company is dangerous: ſafe for the ſtrong and inſtructed. Turne a childe looſe into an Apothecaries ſhop, or an Idiot, that gally-pot which lookes faireſt, ſhall haue his firſt hand, tho full of poyſonous drugs: where the iudicious would chooſe the wholeſomeſt, led not by ſenſe, but skill. Setledneſſe in the truth wil cauſe vs to hate and ſcorne ridiculous impiety: and that hate will ſettle vs the more; where the vnſtayed may grow to leſſe diſlike, and indanger his owne infection. He had need bee a reſolute Caleb that ſhould goe to ſee the land of Canaan; yet not ſuch a one, vpon euery occaſion: meere pleaſure or curioſity I dare not allow in this aduenture. The command of authority, or neceſſity of traffique, I cannot reiect: Or if after ſufficient preuention, deſire to informe our ſelues thorowly in a foraine Religion, or ſtate (eſpecially for publike vſe) carry vs abroad, I cenſure not. In all matter of danger, a calling is a good warrant; and it cannot want perill to goe vnſent: Neither is there ſmall weight in the quality of the place, and continuance of the time. It is one caſe where the profeſſion of our religion is free, another where reſtrained; perhaps not without conſtraint to idolatry: where wee haue meanes for our ſoules, and allowed Miniſtery, the cauſe muſt needs differ from a place of neceſſary blindneſſe, of peeuiſh ſuperſtition. To paſſe thorow an infected place is one thing, to dwell in it another: Each of theſe giue a new ſtate to the cauſe, & look for a diuers anſwer. But as in al theſe outward actions, ſo here, moſt force (I confeſſe) lies in the intention; which is able to giue not toleration onely, to our trauell, but praiſe. To conuerſe with them without, but in a purpoſe of their conuerſion, and with endeuour to fetch them in, can be no other than an holy courſe: wherein that the Ieſuits haue been (by their owne ſaying) more ſeruiceable in their Indies and China; let them thanke (after their number and leiſure) their ſhelter of Spaine: the opportunity of whoſe patronage hath preferred them to vs; not their more forward deſires. In ſhort, companying with Infidels may not be ſimply condemned; who can hold ſo, that ſees Lot in Sodom, Iſrael with the Ægyptians, Abraham & Iſaac with their Abimelechs; Roſes among thornes, and pearles among much mud; and, for all, Chriſt among Publicans & Sinners? ſo we neither be infected by them, nor they further infected by our confirmation; nor the weake Chriſtian by vs infected with offence, nor the Goſpel infected with reproch, what danger can there be? If neither we, nor they, nor the weake, nor (which is higheſt) the name of God be wronged, who can complaine? You haue mine opinion; diſpoſe now of your ſelfe as you dare: The earth is the Lords, and you are his; whereſoeuer he ſhall finde you, be ſure you ſhall finde him euery where.

To the Gentlemen of his Higneſſe Court.

Ep. X. A deſcription of a good and faithfull Courtier.

WHiles I aduentured other Characters into the light, I reſerued one for you; whom I account no ſmall part of my ioy; The Character of What you are, of What you ſhould be: Not that I arrogate to my ſelfe, more than ordinary skill in theſe high points: I deſire not to deſcribe a Courtier; How ſhould I, that haue but ſeene and ſaluted the ſeat of Princes? Or why ſhould I, whoſe thoughts are ſequeſtred to the Court of heauen? But if I would decypher a good Courtier, who can herein controll my endeuour? Goodneſſe in all formes is but the iuſt ſubiect of our profeſſion: what my obſeruation could not, no leſſe certaine rule ſhall afford me. Our diſcourſe hath this freedom, that it may reach beyond our eies with beleefe. If your experience agree not with my ſpeculation, diſtruſt me. I care not for their barking, which condemne me, at firſt, of incongruity: as if theſe two tearmes were ſo diſſonant, that one ſentence could not hold them. The Poet ſlanders, that abandons all good men from Courts. Who knowes not that the Ægyptian Court had a Moſes; the Court of Samaria, an Obadiah; of Ieruſalem an Ebed-melech; of Damaſcus a Naaman; of Babylon a Daniel; of Æthiopia a good Treaſurer; and very Nero's Court in Pauls time, his Saints? That I may not tell, how the Courts of Chriſtian Princes haue beene likened by our Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorians, to ſome royall Colledges for their order, grauity, goodneſſe mixed with their Maieſty; and that I may willingly forbeare to compare (as, but for enuy, I durſt) yours with theirs; I ſpeake boldly, the Court is as nigh to heauen as the Cell, and doth no leſſe require and admit ſtrict holineſſe. I baniſh therefore hence all impiety, and dare preſage his ruine, whoſe foundation is not laid in goodneſſe. Our Courtier is no other than vertuous, and ſerues the God of heauen as his firſt Maker, and from him deriues his duty to theſe earthen gods; as one that knowes the thrones of heauen and earth are not contrary, but ſubordinate, & that beſt obedience ſprings from deuotion: his ability and will haue both conſpired to make him perfectly ſeruiceable, and his diligence waits but for an opportunity. In the factions of ſome great riuals of honour, he holds himſelfe in a free neutrality, accounting it ſafer in vniuſt frayes to looke on, than to ſtrike; and if neceſſity of occaſion will needs wind him into the quarrell, he chuſes not the ſtronger part, but the better; reſoluing rather to fall with innocence and truth, than to ſtand with powerfull iniuſtice. In the changes of fauours and frowns he changeth not; his ſincere honeſty beares him thorow all alterations, with wiſe boldneſſe, if not with ſucceſſe: and when hee ſpies clouds in the eyes of his Prince, (which of long he will not ſeeme to ſee) his cleare heart giues him a cleare face; and if he may be admitted, his loyall breath ſhall ſoone diſpell thoſe vapours of ill ſuggeſtion: but if after all attempts of wind and ſunne he ſees them ſetled, and the might of his accuſers will not let him ſeeme as he is; he giues way in ſilence, without ſtomach, and waits vpon Time. He is not ouer-haſtily intent vpon his owne promotion; as one that ſeeks his Prince, not himſelfe; and ſtudies more to deſerue than riſe, ſcorning either to grow great by his owne bribes, or rich by the bribes of others. His officious ſilence craues more than others words; and if that language be not heard, nor vnderſtood, hee opens his mouth, yet late and ſparingly; without baſhfulneſſe, without importunity; caring onely to motion, not caring to plead. He is affable and courteous; not vainly popular, abaſing his Princes fauour to wooe the worthleſſe applauſe of the vulgar; approuing by his actions that he ſeekes one, not many; if not rather one in many. His Alphabet is his Princes diſpoſition; which once learned, hee plies with diligent ſeruice, not with flattery; not commending euery action as good, nor the beſt too much, and in preſence. When he finds an apparant growth of fauour, hee dares not glory in it to others, leſt he ſhould ſolicite their enuy, and hazard the ſhame of his owne fall; but enioyes it in quiet thankfulneſſe: not neglecting it, nor drawing it on too faſt: Ouer-much forwardneſſe argues no perpetuity. How oft haue wee knowne the weake beginnings of a likely fire ſcattered with ouer-ſtrong a blaſt? And if another riſe higher, he enuieth not; onely emulating that mans merit, and ſuſpecting his owne. Neither the name of the Court, nor the grace of a Prince, nor applauſe of his inferiors, can lift him aboue himſelfe, or lead him to affect any other than a wiſe mediocrity. His owne ſincerity cannot make him ouer-credulous. They are few and well tried, whom hee dares vſe; or perhaps obliged by his owne fauours: ſo in all employments of friendſhip he is wary without ſuſpicion, and without credulity charitable. He is free as of heart, ſo of tongue, to ſpeake what he ought, not what he might: neuer but (what Princes eares are not alwaies inured to) meere Truth: yet that, tempered for the meaſure, and time, with honeſt diſcretion. But if he meet with ought that might be beneficiall to his Maſter, or the State, or whoſe concealement might proue preiudiciall to either, neither feare nor gaine can ſtop his mouth. He is not baſely querulous, not forward to ſpend his complaints on the diſgraced, not abiding to build his owne fauours vpon the vniuſt ruines of an oppreſſed fortune. The errours of his fellowes he reports with fauour; their vertues with aduantage. He is a good husband of his houres; equally deteſting idleneſſe and baſe diſports; and placing all his free time vpon ingenuous ſtudies, or generous delights; ſuch as may make either his body or minde, more fit for noble ſeruice. He liſteth not to come to councell vncalled, nor vnbidden to intermeddle with ſecrets, whether of perſon, or ſtate; which yet once impoſed, he manageth, with ſuch fidelity and wiſdome, as well argue him to haue refrained, not out of feare, but iudgement. He knowes how to repay an iniury with thankes, and a benefit with vſury; the one out of a wiſe patience without malicious cloſeneſſe; the other out of a bounteous thankfulneſſe. His life is his owne willing ſeruant, and his Princes free vaſſall; which he accounts lent to him, that he may giue it for his Maſter: the intercepting of whoſe harmes, he holds both his duty, and honour: and whether he be vſed as his ſword, or his ſhield, he doth both with cheerefulneſſe. He can ſo demeane himſelfe in his officious attendance, that he equally auoids ſatiety and obliuion; not needleſly lauiſh of himſelfe, to ſet out and ſhew his parts alwayes at the higheſt; nor wilfully concealed in great occaſions. He loues to deſerue and to haue friends, but to truſt rather to his owne vertue. Reaſon and honeſty (next vnder religion) are his Councellers: which he followes without care of the euent, not without foreſight. In a iudgement of vnkindneſſe and enuy, he neuer caſts the firſt ſtone, and hates to picke thankes by detraction. He vndertakes none but worthy ſutes, ſuch as are free from baſeneſſe and iniuſtice; ſuch as is neither ſhame to aske, nor diſhonour to grant; not ſuffering priuate affections to ouer-weigh publique equitie or conuenience; and better brooking a friends want, than an ill preſident; and thoſe which he yeeldeth to accept, hee loues not to linger in an afflicting hope: a preſent anſwer ſhall diſpatch the feares or deſires of his expecting client. His breſt is not a ciſterne to retaine, but as a conduit-pipe, to vent the reaſonable and honeſt petitions of his friend. Finally, he ſo liues, as one that accounts not Princes fauours hereditary; as one that will deſerue their perpetuity, but doubt their change; as one that knowes there is a wide world beſide the Court, and aboue this world an Heauen.

Hall, J.

Princes eares are not alwayes inured to pure Truth, yet that, tempered for the measure, and time, with honest discretion; But if the necessity urge that might be beneficiall to his Master, or the State, or whose concealment might prove prejudiciall to either, neither feare nor gaine can stop his mouth. He is not hasty in questions, nor forward to spend his complaints on the disgraced, nor [illegible] to [illegible] his owne favours upon the unjust ruines of an oppressed fortune. The carriers of his fellowes he covers with favour, their vertues with advantage. He is a good husband of his houres, equally detesting idlenesse and base disports; and placeth all his free time upon ingenious studies, or generous delights, such as may make either his body or minde more fit for noble service. He listeth not to come to counsell uncalled, nor is sudden to inter-meddle with secrets, whether of persons or states, which yet once imparted, he mana-geth with such fidelity and wisdome, as well argueth [illegible] out of [illegible] judgement. He knowes how to repay an injury with thankes, and a benefit with usury; the one out of a wise temperance, the other [illegible]

[illegible] which the account [illegible] to him that he [illegible] for his Master the [illegible]
[illegible] services, he holds both [illegible] and honour [illegible] whether he be [illegible]
[illegible] or unthriftily, he doth both with cheerefulnesse. He [illegible]
[illegible] attendance, that he [illegible] opinion; [illegible]
[illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] nor [illegible]
[illegible] occasions. He [illegible] his Friends, but to [illegible]

THE FOVRTH DECAD.

To Mr. Walter Fitzwilliams.

Ep. I. A diſcourſe of the true and lawfull vſe of pleaſures; how we may moderate them, how we may enioy them with ſafetie.

INdeed; wherein ſtands the vſe of wiſdome, if not in tempering our pleaſures and ſorrowes? and ſo diſpoſing our ſelues in ſpight of all occurrents, that the world may not blow vpon vs with an vnequall gale, neither tearing our ſailes, nor ſlackning them. Euents will varie; if we continue the ſame, it matters not: nothing can ouerturne him, that hath power ouer himſelfe. Of theſe two, I confeſſe it harder to manage proſperity, & to auoid hurt from good: ſtrong & cold winds do but make vs gather vp our cloake more round, more cloſe: but to keepe it about vs in a hot Sun-ſhine, to run and not ſweat; to ſweat and not faint; how difficult it is! I ſee ſome that auoid pleaſures for their danger, and which dare not but abandon lawfull delights, for feare of ſinne; who ſeeme to me like ſome ignorant Metalliſts, which caſt away the precious Ore, becauſe they cannot ſeparate the gold from the droſſe; or ſome ſimple Iew, that condemnes the pure ſtreames of Iordan, becauſe it falls into the dead ſea. Why doe not theſe men refuſe to eat, becauſe meat hath made many gluttons? Or how dare they couer themſelues, that know there is pride in rags? Theſe hard Tutors, if not Tyrants, to themſelues, whiles they pretend a mortified ſtrictneſſe, are iniurious to their owne libertie, to the liberalitie of their Maker: wherefore hath he created and giuen the choice commodities of this earth, if not for vſe? or why placed he Man in a Paradiſe, not in a Deſart? How can we more diſpleaſe a liberall friend, than to depart from his delicate feaſt wilfully hungry? They are deceiued that call this holineſſe; it is the diſeaſe of a minde ſullen, diſtruſtfull, impotent: There is nothing but euill, which is not from heauen; and he is none of Gods friends, that reiects his gifts for his owne abuſe. Heare me therefore, and true Philoſophie; There is a neerer way than this, and a fairer; if you will be a wiſe Christian, tread in it. Learne firſt by a iuſt ſuruey, to know the due and lawfull bounds of pleaſure; and then beware, either to goe beyond a knowne Mere, or in the licence of your owne deſires to remoue it. That God, that hath curb'd in the fury of that vnquiet and foaming element, and ſaid of old, Here ſhalt thou ſtay thy proud waues, hath done no leſſe for the rage of our appetite. Behold, our limits are not obſcure; which if wee once paſſe, our inundation is perillous and ſinfull. No iuſt delight wanteth either his warrant, or his tearmes. More plainly be acquainted both with the qualitie of pleaſures, and the meaſure: Many a ſoule hath loſt it ſelfe in a lawfull delight, through exceſſe: and not fewer haue periſhed in thoſe, whoſe nature is vicious, without reſpect of immoderation. Your care muſt auoid both. The taſte of the one is deadly; of the other, a full carouſe: and in truth, it is eaſier for a Chriſtian, not to taſte of that, than not to be drunke with this: The ill is more eaſily auoided, than the indifferent moderated. Pleaſure is of a winding and ſerpentine nature; admit the head, the body will aske no leaue: and ſooner may you ſtop the entrance, than ſtay the proceeding. Withall, her inſinuations are ſo cunning, that you ſhall not perceiue your exceſſe, till you be ſicke of a ſurfet. A little honey is ſweet; much, fulſome. For the attaining of this temper then, ſettle in your ſelfe a right eſtimation of that wherein you delight: reſolue euery thing into his firſt matter, and there will be more danger of contempt, than ouer-ioying. What are the goodly ſumptuous buildings we admire, but a little burnt and hardned earth? What is the ſtately and wondrous building of this humane body, whoſe beauty we doat vpon, but the ſame earth wee tread on, better tempered; but worſe, when it wants his gueſt? What are thoſe precious metals whom we worſhip, but veines of earth better coloured? What are coſtly robes, but ſuch as are giuen of wormes, and conſumed of moths? Then, from their beginning, looke to their end, and ſee laughter conclude in teares; ſee death, in this ſweet pot. Thy conſcience ſcourges thee with a long ſmart for a ſhort libertie; and for an imperfect delight, giues thee perfect torment: Alas, what an hard penyworth; ſo little pleaſure for ſo much repentance! Enioy it, if thou canſt: but if while the ſword hangs ouer thee in an horſes haire, ſtill threatning his fall and thine, thou canſt be ſecurely iocund; I wonder, but enuie not. Now I heare you recall me, and after all my diſcourſe (as no whit yet wiſer) inquire by what rule our pleaſures ſhall be iudged immoderate? We are all friends to our ſelues, and our indulgence will hardly call any fauour too much. I ſend you not (tho I might) to your body, to your calling, for this triall; while your delights exclude not the preſence, the fruition of God, you are ſafe: the loue of the medicine is no hinderance to the loue of health; let all your pleaſures haue reference to the higheſt good, and you cannot exceed. You ſee the Angels ſent about Gods meſſages to this earth; yet neuer out of their heauen, neuer without the viſion of their Maker. Theſe earthly things cauſe not diſtraction, if we reſt not in them, if we can looke thorow them, to their giuer. The minde that deſires them for their owne ſakes, and ſuffers it ſelfe taken vp with their ſweetneſſe as his maine end, is already drunken. It is not the vſe of pleaſure that offends, but the affectation. How many great Kings haue beene Saints? they could not haue beene Kings, without choice of earthly delights; they could not haue beene Saints, with earthly affections. If God haue mixed you a ſweet cup, drinke it cheerefully; commend the taſte, and be thankfull; but reioyce in it as his. Vſe pleaſures without dotage; as in God, from God, to God; you are as free from errour, as miſerie.

12637c

Ep. II. A diſcourſe of the bloudy vſe of ſingle combats; the iniuſtice of all pretences of their lawfulneſſe; ſetting forth the danger and ſinfulneſſe of this falſe and vnchriſtian manhood.

YOu haue receiued a proud challenge, and now hold your ſelfe bound vpon termes of honour, to accept it. Heare firſt the anſwer of a friend, before you giue an anſwer to your enemie; receiue the counſell of loue, ere you enter thoſe courſes of reuenge: Thinke not you may reiect me, becauſe my profeſſion is peace; I ſpeake from him, which is not only the Prince of Peace, but the God of Hoſts; of whom if you will not learne to manage your hand and your ſword, I ſhal grieue to ſee, that courage hath made you rebellious. Grant once that you are a Chriſtian, & this victory is mine, I ouercome, and you fight not? would God the fury of mens paſſions could be as eaſily conquered, as their iudgements conuinced; how many thouſands had beene free from bloud! This conceit of falſe fortitude hath coſt well-neere as many liues as lawfull warre, or as opinion of hereſie. Let me tell you with confidence, that all duells or ſingle combats are murderous: blanch them ouer (how you liſt) with names of honour, and honeſt pretences; their vſe is ſinfull, and their nature deuilliſh.

Let vs two, if you pleaſe, (before hand) enter into theſe liſts of words. Let reaſon (which is a more harmleſſe fight) conflict with reaſon: Take whom you will with you into this field; of all the Philoſophers, Ciuilians, Canoniſts; for Diuines (I hope) you ſhall finde none; and let the right of this truth be tried vpon a iuſt induction.

I onely premiſe this caution, (leſt we quarrell about the cauſe of this quarrell) that neceſſity muſt be excluded from theſe vnlawfull fights; which euer alters their quality, and remoues their euill: The defence of our life, the iniunction of a Magiſtrate, are euer excepted: voluntary combats are onely queſtioned; or whoſe neceſſity we doe not finde, but make. There are not many cauſes that can draw vs forth ſingle into the field, with colour of equity. Let the firſt be the tryall of ſome hidden right; whether of innocence vpon a falſe accuſation, or of title to inheritance, not determinable by courſe of Lawes; A proceeding not tolerable among Chriſtians, becauſe it wants both warrant and certainty. Where euer did God bid thee hazzard thy life for thy name? Where did he promiſe to ſecond thee? When thou art without thy commandement, without his promiſe, thou art without thy protection. He takes charge of thee, but when thou art in thy waies; yea in his. If this be Gods way, where did he chalke it out? If thou want his Word, looke not for his aid. Miſerable is that man, which in dangerous actions is left to his owne keeping; yea how plainly doth the euent ſhew Gods diſlike? How oft hath innocence lien bleeding in theſe combats, and guiltineſſe inſulted in the conqueſt? Thoſe very decretals (whom we oft cite not, often truſt not) report the inequalitie of this iſſue. Two men are brought to the barre, one accuſes the other of theft, without further euidence, either to cleare or conuince: The ſword is called for, both witneſſe, and Iudge: They meet and combat: The innocent party is ſlaine: The ſtollen goods are found after in other hands, and confeſſed. O the iniuſtice of humane ſentences! O wretched eſtate of the party miſcaried! his good name is loſt with his life, which he would haue redeemed with his valour: he both dies and ſinnes, while he ſtriues to ſeeme cleare of a ſinne. Therefore men ſay, he is guilty, becauſe he is dead, while the others wickedneſſe is rewarded with glory. I am deceiued, if in this caſe there were not three murderers; the Iudge, the aduerſary, himſelfe. Let no man challenge God for neglect of innocence, but rather magnifie him for reuenge of preſumption. What he enioynes, that he vndertakes, he maintaines: Who art thou, O vaine man, that dareſt expect him a party in thine owne brawles? But there is no other way of triall. Better none than this. Innocencie or land is queſtioned; and now we ſend two men into the liſts, to try whether is the better Fencer: what is the ſtrength or skill of the Champions, to the iuſtice of the cauſe? Wherefore ſerue our owne oathes? whereto witneſſe, records, lotteries, and other purgations? Or why put we not men as well to the old Saxon, or Liuonian, Ordalian trials of hot irons, or ſcalding liquors? It is farre better ſome truths ſhould be vnknowne, than vnlawfully ſearched. Another cauſe ſeemingly warrantable may bee the determining of warre, preuention of common bloudſhed: Two armies are ready to ioyne battell, the field is ſure to be bloudy on both ſides; either part chuſes a champion; they two fight for all: the life of one ſhall ranſome a thouſand. Our Philoſophers, our Lawyers ſhout for applauſe of this Monomachie, as a way neere, eaſie, ſafe: I dare not. Either the warre is iuſt, or vniuſt: if vniuſt, the hazzard of one is too much; if iuſt, too little. The cauſe of a iuſt warre muſt be, beſides true, important; the title commõn, wherein ſtill a whole ſtate is intereſſed; therefore may not, without raſhneſſe and tentation of God, be caſt vpon two hands. The holy ſtory neuer records any, but a barbarous Philiſtine, to make this offer, and that in the preſumption of his vnmatchableneſſe. Profane monuments report many, and ſome on this ground wiſely reiected. Tullus challenged Albanus, that the right of the two Hoſts might be decided by the two Captaines; he returned a graue reply, (which I neuer read noted of cowardize) That this honour ſtood not in them two, but in the two Cities of Alba and Rome.

12637c

All cauſes of publike right are Gods: when we put to our hand in Gods cauſe, then we may looke for his. In vaine we hope for ſucceſſe, if we doe not our vtmoſt; wherefore either warre muſt be determined without ſwords, or with many: why ſhould all the heads of the Common-wealth ſtand vpon the necke and ſhoulders of one champion? If he miſ-carry, it is iniury to loſe her; if he preuaile, yet it is iniury to hazard her: yet reſpecting the parties themſelues, I cannot but grant it neereſt to equity, and the beſt of combats, that ſome blood ſhould be hazarded, that more might be out of hazard. I deſcend to your caſe, which is yet further from likelihood of approofe; for what can you plead but your credit? others opinion? You fight, not ſo much againſt anothers life, as your owne reproach: you are wronged, and now if you challenge not; or you are challenged, and if you accept not, the world condemnes you for a coward: who would not rather hazard his life, than blemiſh his reputation? It were well, if this reſolution were as wiſe as gallant. If I ſpeake to a Chriſtian, this courage muſt be rectified. Tell me, what world is this, whoſe cenſure you feare? Is it not that which God hath branded long agoe with Poſitus in maligno? Is it not that which hath euer miſconſtrued, diſcouraged, diſgraced, perſecuted goodneſſe? that which reproached, condemned your Sauiour? What doe you vnder theſe colours, if you regard the fauour of that, whoſe amitie is enmitie with God? What care you for the cenſure of him, whom you ſhould both ſcorne and vanquiſh? Did euer wiſe Chriſtians, did euer your Maſter, allow either this manhood, or this feare? Was there euer any thing more ſtrictly, more fearefully forbidden of him, than reuenge in the challenge; than in the anſwer, paiment of euill; and murder in both? It is pitie, that euer the water of Baptiſme was ſpilt vpon his face, that cares more to diſcontent the world, than to wrong God: He ſaith, Vengeance is mine; and you ſteale it from him in a glorious theft, hazarding your ſoule more than your body. You are weary of your ſelfe, while you thruſt one part vpon the ſword of an enemie; the other, on Gods. Yet perhaps I haue yeelded too much. Let goe Chriſtians; The wiſer world of men (and who elſe are worth reſpect) will not paſſe this odious verdict vpon your refuſall: valiant men haue reiected challenges, with their honours vntainted. Auguſtus, when he receiued a defiance, and braue appointment of combat from Antonie, could anſwer him, That if Antonie were weary of liuing, there were wayes enow beſides to death. And that Scythian King returned no other reply to Iohn the Emperor of Conſtantinople. And Metellus challenged by Sertorius, durſt anſwer ſcornfully, with his pen, not with his ſword; That it was not for a Captaine to die a ſouldiers death. Was it not diſhonorable for theſe wiſe and noble Heathens to turne off theſe deſperate offers. What law hath made it ſo with vs? Shall I ſeriouſly tell you? Nothing but the meere opinion of ſome humorous Gallants, that haue more heart than braine; confirmed by a more idle cuſtome: Worthy grounds, whereon to ſpend both life and ſoule; whereon to neglect God, himſelfe, poſteritie. Goe now and take vp that ſword, of whoſe ſharpneſſe you haue boaſted, and haſten to the field; whether you die or kill, you haue murdered. If you ſuruiue, you are haunted with the conſcience of bloud; if you die, with the torments; and if neither of theſe, yet it is murder, that you would haue killed. See whether the fame of a braue fight can yeeld you a counteruailable redreſſe of theſe miſchiefes: how much more happily valiant had it been to maſter your ſelfe, to feare ſinne more than ſhame, to contemne the world, to pardon wrong, to preferre true Chriſtianitie before idle manhood, to liue and doe well.

To M. Mat. Milward.

Ep. III. A diſcourſe of the pleaſure of ſtudy and contemplation, with the varieties of ſcholar-like imployments, not without incitation of others thereunto; and a cenſure of their neglect.

I Can wonder at nothing more, than how a man can be idle; but of all other, a Scholar; in ſo many improuements of reaſon, in ſuch ſweetneſſe of knowledge, in ſuch variety of ſtudies, in ſuch importunity of thoughts. Other Artizans doe but practiſe, we ſtill learne; others runne ſtill in the ſame gyre, to wearineſſe, to ſatiety; our choice is infinite: other labours require recreations, our very labour recreates our ſports: wee can neuer want, either ſomewhat to doe, or ſomewhat that we would doe. How numberleſſe are thoſe volumes which men haue written of Arts, of Tongues!! How endleſſe is that volume which God hath written of the world! wherein euery creature is a Letter, euery day a new page: who can be weary of either of theſe? To finde wit in Poetry, in Philoſophy Profoundneſſe, in Mathematicks acuteneſſe, in Hiſtory wonder of euents, in Oratory ſweet eloquence, in Diuinity ſupernaturall light and holy deuotion; as ſo many rich metals in their proper mynes, whom would it not rauiſh with delight? After all theſe, let vs but open our eyes, we cannot looke beſide a leſſon, in this vniuerſall Booke of our Maker worth our ſtudy, worth taking out. What creature hath not his miracle? what euent doth not challenge his obſeruation? And if weary of foraine imployment, we liſt to looke home into our ſelues, there wee finde a more priuate world of thoughts, which ſet vs on worke a new, more buſily, not leſſe profitably; now, our ſilence is vocall, our ſolitarineſſe popular, and we are ſhut vp to doe good vnto many. And if once we be cloyed with our owne company, the doore of conference is open; here interchange of diſcourſe (beſides pleaſure) benefits vs: and hee is a weake companion, from whom we returne not wiſer. I could enuy, if I could beleeue that Anachoret, who ſecluded from the world, and pent vp in his voluntary priſon-wals, denied that hee thought the day long, whiles yet hee wanted learning to vary his thoughts. Not to be cloyed with the ſame conceit, is difficult aboue humane ſtrength; but to a man ſo furniſhed with all ſorts of knowledge, that according to his diſpoſitions he can change his ſtudies, I ſhould wonder, that euer the Sunne ſhould ſeeme to paſe ſlowly. How many buſie tongues chaſe away good houres in pleaſant chat, and complaine of the haſte of night! What ingenuous minde can be ſooner weary of talking with learned Authors, the moſt harmeleſſe and ſweeteſt of companions? What an heauen liues a Scholar in, that at once in one cloſe roome can dayly conuerſe with all the glorious Martyrs and Fathers? that can ſingle out, at pleaſure, either ſententious Tertullian, or graue Cyprian, or reſolute Hierome, or flowing Chryſoſtome, or diuine Ambroſe, or deuout Bernard, or (who alone is all theſe) heauenly Auguſtine, and talke with them, and heare their wiſe and holy counſels, verdicts, reſolutions: yea (to riſe higher) with courtly Eſay, with learned Paul, with all their fellow-Prophets, Apoſtles: yet more, like another Moſes, with God himſelfe, in them both? Let the world contemne vs: while we haue theſe delights, we cannot enuy them; wee cannot wiſh our ſelues other than we are. Beſides, the way to all other contentments is troubleſome; the onely recompence is in the end. To delue in the mynes, to ſcorch in the fire for the getting, for the fining of gold, is a ſlauiſh toyle; the comfort is in the wedge; to the owner, not the labourers; where our very ſearch of knowledge is delightſome. Study it ſelfe, is our life; from which we would not be barred for a world. How much ſweeter then is the fruit of ſtudy, the conſcience of knowledge? In compariſon whereof, the 12637c Hall, J.

ſoule that hath once taſted it, eaſily contemnes all humane comforts. Goe now yee worldlings, and inſult ouer our paleneſſe, our neediueſſe, our neglect. Yee could not be ſo iocund, if you were not ignorant; if you did not want knowledge, you could not ouer-looke him that hath it: For me, I am ſo farre from emulating you, that I profeſſe, I had as leiue be a brute beaſt, as an ignorant rich man. How is it then that thoſe Gallants which haue priuiledge of bloud and birth, and better education, doe ſo ſcornfully turne off theſe moſt manly, reaſonable, noble exerciſes of ſcholarſhip? An hawke becomes their fiſt better than a booke: No dogge but is a better companion: Any thing, or nothing, rather than what we ought. O minds brutiſhly ſenſuall! Doe they thinke that God made them for diſport? who euen in his Paradiſe would not allow pleaſure, without worke. And if for buſineſſe; either of body, or minde: Thoſe of the body are commonly ſeruile, like it ſelfe. The minde therefore, the mind onely, that honourable and diuine part, is fitteſt to bee imployed of thoſe which would reach to the higheſt perfection of men, and would be more than the moſt. And what worke is there of the minde, but the trade of a ſcholar, ſtudy? Let me therefore faſten this probleme on our Schoole-gates, and challenge all commers, in the defence of it; that, No Scholar cannot be truly noble. And if I make it not good, let me neuer be admitted further than to the ſubiect of our queſtion. Thus we doe well to congratulate, to our ſelues, our own happineſſe: if others will come to vs, it ſhall be our comfort, but more theirs; if not, it is enough that we can ioy in our ſelues, and in him, in whom we are that we are.

To Mr. J. P.

Ep. IV. A diſcourſe of the increaſe of Popery; of the Oath of Allegeance; and the iuſt ſufferings of thoſe which haue refuſed it.

YOu ſay, your religion dayly winneth. Bragge not of your gain: you neither need, nor can, if you conſider how it gets, and whom: How, but by cunning ſleights, falſe ſuggeſtions, impudent vntruths? Who cannot thus preuaile againſt a quiet and innocent aduerſary? Whom, but ſilly women, or men notoriouſly debauched? A ſpoile fit for ſuch a conqueſt, for ſuch Victors. We are the fewer, not the worſe: if all our licentious hypocrites were yours, we ſhould not complaine: and you might be the prouder, not the better. Glory you in this triumph, free from our enuy; who know we haue loſt none, but (by whom you ſaue nothing) either looſe or ſimple. It were pity that you ſhould not forgoe ſome in a better exchange. The ſea neuer incroacheth vpon our ſhore, but it loſeth elſe-where: ſome wee haue happily fetcht into the fold of our Church, out of your waſts; ſome others (though few, and ſcarce a number) wee haue ſent into their heauen. Among theſe, your late ſecond Garnet liu'd to proclaime himſelfe a Martyr; and by dying, perſwaded. Poore man, how happy were he, if he might be his owne Iudge. That which gaue him confidence, would giue him glory: you beleeue, and well-neere adore him. That fatall cord of his was too little for reliques, though diuided into Mathematicke quantities. Whither cannot conceit lead vs? whether for his Reſolution, or your credulity? His death was fearleſſe: I commend his ſtomacke, not his minde. How many malefactors haue we knowne that haue laughed vpon their executioner, and ieſted away their laſt wind? You might know. It is not long ſince our Norfolke Arrian leapt at his ſtake. How oft haue you learned, in martyrdome to regard not the death, but the cauſe? Elſe, there ſhould be no difference in guilt and innocence, error and truth. What then? Died he for Religion? This had beene but your owne meaſure: wee endured your flames, which theſe gibbets could not acquit. But dare impudencie it ſelfe affirme it? Not for meere ſhame, againſt the euidence of ſo many tongues, eares, records. Your proſperitie, your numbers argue enough, that a man may be a Papiſt in Britaine, and liue. If treaſon be your religion, who will wonder that it is capitall? Defie that Deuill which hath mockt you with this madde opinion, that treachery is holineſſe, deuotion cruelty and diſobedience. I foreſee your euaſion: Alas, it is eaſie for a ſpightfull conſtruction to fetch religion within this compaſſe; and to ſay the ſwelling of the Foxes forehead is a horne. Nay then, let vs fetch ſome honeſt Heathen to be Iudge betwixt vs: Meere nature in him ſhall ſpeake vnpartially of both. To hold and perſwade, that a Chriſtian King may, yea muſt at the Popes will be dethroaned, and murdered; is it the voice of treaſon, or religion? And if traiterous, whether flatly, or by miſ-inferring? Beſides his practiſes, for this he died; witneſſe your owne Catholicks. O God, if this be religion, what can be villany? Who euer dyed a Malefactor, if this be martyrdome? If this poſition be meritorious of heauen, hell is feared in vaine. O holy Scillæ, Marij, Catilines, Cades, Lopezes, Gowries, Vawxes, and who euer haue conſpired againſt lawfull Maieſtie! all Martyrs of Rome, all Saints of Beckets heauen. How well doe thoſe palmes of celeſtiall triumph become hands red with the ſacred bloud of Gods anointed? I am aſhamed to thinke, that humanity ſhould nouriſh ſuch monſters, whether of men, or opinions. But you defie this ſauage factiouſneſſe, this deuotion of deuils; and honeſtly with both God and Cæſar his owne. I praiſe your moderation: but if you be true, let me yet ſearch you: Can a man be a perfect Papiſt, without this opinion againſt it? If he may, then your Garnet and Drury died not for religion: if hee may not, then Popery is treaſon. Chuſe now whether you will leaue your Martyrs, or your Religion. What you hold of merit, free-will, tranſubſtantiation, inuocation of Saints, falſe adoration, ſupremacy of Rome, no man preſſes, no man inquires: your preſent inquiſition, your former examples would teach vs; mercy will not let vs learne. The onely queſtion is, Whether our King may liue and rule; whether you may refraine from his bloud, and not ſinne: Would you haue a man denie this and not die? Would you haue a man thus dying honoured? Dare you approue that religion, which defends the fact, canonizes the perſon? I heare your anſwer, from that your great Champion, which not many dayes ſince, with one blow hath driuen out three (not ſlight) wedges: That not Ciuill obedience is ſtood vpon, but Poſitiue doctrine: That you are ready to ſweare for the Kings ſafety, not againſt the Popes authority: King IAMES muſt liue and raigne; but Paulus Quintus muſt rule and be obeyed: and better were it for you to die, than your ſworne allegeance ſhould preiudice the Sea Apoſtolicke. An eluſion fit for children. What is to dally, if not this? As if he ſaid, The King ſhall liue, vnleſſe the Pope will not; That he ſhall not be diſcrowned, depoſed, maſſacred by your hands, vnleſſe your holy Father ſhould command. But (I aske, as who ſhould not) What if he doe command? What if your Paulus Quintus ſhould breathe out (like his predeceſſors) not threatnings, but ſtrong bellowings of Excommunications, of depoſition of Gods anointed? What if hee ſhall command (after that French faſhion) the throats of all Heretikes to bleed in a night? Pardon you in this: Now it is growne a point of doctrinall Diuinitie, to determine how farre the power of Peters ſucceſſor may extend: You may neither ſweare, nor ſay your hands ſhall not be ſteep't in the bloud of your true Soueraigne; and to die rather than ſweare it, is martyrdome. But what if heauen fall, ſay you? His Holineſſe (as you hope) will take none ſuch courſes. Woe were vs, if our ſafety depended vpon your hopes, or his mercies. Bleſſed be that God, which malgrè hath made and kept vs happy, and hath lift vs aboue our enemies. But what hope is there, that he who chargeth ſubiects not to ſweare allegeance, will neuer diſcharge them from allegeance; that thoſe who clamorouſly and ſhameleſſely complaine to the world of our cruelty, will forbeare to ſollicite others cruelty to vs? Your hopes to you; to vs our ſecurities. Is this the Religion you father vpon thoſe Chriſtian Patriarkes of the Primitiue Age? O bleſſed Ireney, Clemens, Cyprian, Baſil, Chryſoſtome, Auguſtine, Ierome, and thou the ſeuereſt exactor of iuſt cenſures, holy Ambroſe! how would you haue ſpet at ſuch a rebellious aſſertion! What ſpeake I of Fathers? whoſe very mention in ſuch a cauſe were iniury, were impiety. Which of thoſe curſed hereſies of ancient times (for to them I hold it fitter to appeale) haue euer been ſo deſperately ſhameleſſe, as to breed, to maintaine a conceit ſo palpably vnnaturall; vnleſſe perhaps thoſe old Antitactæ may vpon generall termes bee compelled to patronize it, while they held it piety to breake, the lawes of their Maker? For you, if you profeſſe not to loue willing errors, by this ſuſpect, and iudge the reſt: you ſee this defended with equall reſolution, and with no leſſe cheerefull expence of bloud. In the body, where you ſee one monſtrous deformitie, you cannot affect; if you can doe ſo in your religion, yet how dare you? ſince the greater halfe of it ſtands on no other ground. Onely God make you wiſe, and honeſt, you ſhall ſhake hands with this faction of Popery; and I with you, to giue you a cheerefull welcome into the boſome of the Church.

To my brother M. Sa. Hall.

Ep. V. A diſcourſe of the great charge of the miniſteriall function; together with particular directions for due preparation thereunto, and cariage therein.

IT is a great and holy purpoſe (deare Brother) that you haue entertained, of ſeruing God in his Church: for what higher, or more worthy imployment can there be, than to do theſe diuine duties, to ſuch a maſter, and ſuch a mother? wherin yet I ſhould little reioyce, if any neceſſity had caſt you vpon this refuge: for I hate and grieue to thinke that any deſperate minde ſhould make Diuinity but a ſhift, and diſhonour this Miſtreſſe by being forſaken of the world. This hath beene the drift of your education: to this you were born, and dedicated in a direct courſe. I doe willingly incourage you, but not without many cautions. Enter not into ſo great a ſeruice, without much fore-ſight. When your hand is at the plough, it is too late to looke backe. Bethinke your ſelfe ſeriouſly of the weight of this charge: and let your holy deſire be allayed with ſome trembling. It is a fooliſh raſhneſſe of young heads, when they are in Gods chaire, to wonder how they came thither, and to forget the awfulneſſe of that place, in the confidence of their owne ſtrength; which is euer ſo much leſſe, as it is more eſteemed. I commend not the waiward excuſes of Moſes, nor the peremptory vnwillingneſſe of Ammonius, and Frier Thomas, who maimed themſelues that they might be wilfully vncapable. Betwixt both theſe there is humble modeſty, and religious fearfulneſſe, eaſily to bee noted in thoſe whom the Church honours with the name of her fathers, worthy your imitation: wherein yet you ſhall need no preſidents, if you well conſider what worth of parts, what ſtrictneſſe of carriage, what weight of offices, God expects in this vocation. Know firſt, that in this place there will be more holineſſe required of you, than in the ordinary ſtation of a Chriſtian: for whereas before you were but as a common line, now God ſets you for a copie of ſanctification vnto others, wherein euery fault is both notable, and dangerous. Here is looked for a ſetled acquaintance with God, and experience both of the proceedings of grace, and of the offers and repulſes of tentations; which in vaine we ſhall hope to menage in other hearts, if we haue not found in our owne. To ſpeake by aime, or rote, of repentance, of contrition, of the degrees of regeneration, and faith, is both harſh, and ſeldome when, not vnprofitable. We truſt thoſe Phyſitians beſt, which haue tried the vertue of their drugs, eſteeming not of thoſe which haue onely borrowed of their bookes. Here will bee expected a free and abſolute gouernment of affections, that you can ſo ſtere your owne veſſell, as not to be tranſported with fury, with ſelfe-loue, with immoderation of pleaſures, of cares, of deſires, with exceſſe of paſſions; in all which, ſo muſt you demeane your ſelfe, as one that thinkes hee is no man of the world, but of God; as one too good (by his double calling) for that, which is either the felicity, or impotency of beaſts. Here muſt be continuall and inward exerciſe of mortification, and ſeuere Chriſtianity, whereby the heart is held in due awe, and the weake flames of the ſpirit quickned, the aſhes of our dulneſſe blowne off; a practice neceſſary in him, whoſe deuotion muſt ſet many hearts on fire: Here muſt be wiſdome, and inoffenſiueneſſe of cariage, as of one that goes euer vnder monitors, and that knows other mens indifferencies are his euils. No man had ſuch need to keep a ſtrict meane. Setting aſide contempt, euen in obſeruation, behold we are made a gazing ſtocke to the world, to Angels, to men. The very ſayle of your eſtate muſt be moderated; which if it beare too high (as ſeldome) it incurres the cenſure of profuſion and Epicuriſme; if too low, of a baſe and vnbeſeeming earthlineſſe; your hand may not be too cloſe for others need, nor too open for your owne; your conuerſation may not be rough and ſullen, nor ouer-familiar and fawning; whereof the one breeds a conceit of pride, and ſtrangeneſſe; the other, contempt; not looſely merry, nor Cynically vnſociable; not contentious in ſmall iniuries; in great, not hurtfully patient to the Church: your attire (for whither doe not cenſures reach?) not youthfully wanton; not, in theſe yeares affectedly ancient, but graue and comely, like the minde, like the behauiour of the wearer; your geſture like your habit, neither ſauouring of giddy lightneſſe, nor ouerly inſolence, nor wantonneſſe, nor dull neglect of your ſelfe; but ſuch as may beſeeme a mortified minde, full of worthy ſpirits: your ſpeech like your geſture, not ſcurrilous, not detracting, not idle, not boaſting, not rotten, not peremptory; but honeſt, milde, fruitfull, ſauourie, and ſuch as may both argue and worke grace: your deliberations mature, your reſolutions well grounded; your deuices ſage and holy. Wherein let me aduiſe you, to walke euer in the beaten road of the Church; not to runne out into ſingle paradoxes. And if you meet at any time with priuate conceits that ſeeme more probable, ſuſpect them and your ſelfe; and if they can win you to aſſent, yet ſmother them in your breſt, and doe not dare to vent them out, either by your hand or tongue, to trouble the common peace. It is a miſerable praiſe, to be a witty diſturber. Neither will it ſerue you to be thus good alone; but if God ſhall giue you the honour of this eſtate, the world will looke, you ſhould be the graue guide of a well-ordered family: for this is proper to vs, that the vices of our charge reflect vpon vs; the ſinnes of others are our reproach. If another mans children miſ-carry, the Parent is pitied; if a Miniſters, cenſured; yea, not our ſeruant is faulty without our blemiſh. In all theſe occaſions (a miſery incident to vs alone) our griefe is our ſhame. To deſcend neerer vnto the ſacred affaires of this heauenly trade; in a Miniſter Gods Church is accounted both his houſe to dwell in, and his field to worke in; wherein (vpon the penalty of a curſe) he faithfully, wiſely, diligently, deuoutly, deales with God for his people, with his people, for and from God. Whether he inſtruct, he muſt doe it with euidence of the ſpirit; or whether he reproue, with courage and zeale; or whether he exhort, with meekneſſe, and yet with power; or whether he confute, with demonſtration of truth, not with rage and perſonall maliciousneſſe, not with a wilfull heat of contradiction; or whether he admoniſh, with long ſuffering, and loue without preiudice, and partiality: in a word, all theſe he ſo doth, as he that deſires nothing but to honour God, and ſaue men. His wiſdome muſt diſcerne betwixt his ſheepe and wolues; in his ſheepe, betwixt the wholeſome and vnſound; in the vnſound, betwixt the weake and tainted; in the tainted, betwixt the natures, qualities, degrees of the diſeaſe and infection; and to all theſe he muſt know to adminiſter a word in ſeaſon. He hath Antidotes for all tentations, counſels for all doubts, euictions for all errors, for all languiſhings incouragements. No occaſion from any altered eſtate of the ſoule may finde him vnfurniſhed: he muſt aſcend to Gods Altar with much awe, with ſincere and cheerfull deuotion; ſo taking, celebrating, diſtributing his Sauiour, as thinking himſelfe at table in heauen with the bleſſed Angels. In the meane time, as he wants not a thankfull regard to the Maſter of the feaſt, ſo not care of the gueſts. The greatneſſe of an offender may not make him ſacrilegiouſly partiall, nor the obſcurity negligent. I haue ſaid little of any of our duties; and of ſome, nothing: yet enough, I think, to make you (if not timorous) carefull. Neither would I haue you hereupon to hide your ſelfe from this calling, but to prepare your ſelfe for it. Theſe times call for them that are faithfull: and if they may ſpare ſome learning; conſcience they cannot. Goe on happily: it argues a minde Chriſtianly noble, to be incouraged with the need of his labours, with the difficulties.

To Mrs. A. P.

Ep. VI. A diſcourſe of the ſignes and proofes of a true faith.

THere is no comfort in a ſecret felicitie. To be happy, and not know it, is little aboue miſerable. Such is your ſtate: only herein better than the common caſe of the moſt; that the well of life lies open before you: but your eyes (like Agars) are not open to ſee it; whiles they haue neither water, nor eyes. We doe not much more want that which we haue not, than that which we doe not know we haue. Let me ſell you ſome of that ſpirituall eye-ſalue which the Spirit commends to his Laodiceans; that you may clearely ſee how well you are. There is nothing but thoſe ſcales betwixt you and happineſſe. Thinke not much that I eſpy in you what your ſelfe ſees not. Too much neereneſſe oft-times hindreth ſight: and if for the ſpots of our own faces we truſt others eyes, why not for our perfections? You are in heauen, and know it not: He that beleeues, is already paſſed from death to life: You beleeue, whiles you complaine of vnbeleefe. If you complained not, I ſhould miſ-doubt you more, than you doe your ſelfe, becauſe you complaine. Secure and inſolent preſumption hath killed many, that breathes nothing but confidence and ſafety; and abandons all doubts, and condemnes them. That man neuer beleeued, that neuer doubted. This liquor of faith is neuer pure in theſe veſſels of clay, without theſe lees of diſtruſt. What then? Thinke not that I incourage you to doubt more; but perſwade you not to be diſcouraged with doubting. All vncertainty is comfortleſſe: thoſe that teach men to coniecture and forbid to reſolue, reade lectures of miſery. Thoſe doubts are but to make way for aſſurance; as the oft ſhaking of the tree, faſtens it more at the root. You are ſure of God, but you are afraid of your ſelfe. The doubt is not in his promiſe, but your application. Looke into your owne heart. How know you that you know any thing, that you beleeue, that you will, that you approue, that you affect any thing? If a man, like your ſelfe, promiſe you ought, you know whether you truſt him, whether you relye your ſelfe on his fidedelity. Why can you not know it in him that is God and man? The difference is not in the act, but the obiect. But if theſe habits (becauſe of their inward and ambiguous nature) ſeeme hard to be deſcried; turne your eyes to thoſe open markes that cannot beguile you. How many haue bragged of their Faith, when they haue embraced nothing but a vaine cloud of preſumption? Euery man repeats his Creed, few feele it, few practiſe it. Take two boughs in the dead of winter; how like is one wood to another? how hardly diſcerned? Afterwards, By their fruit you ſhall know them. That faith, whoſe nature was obſcure, is euident in his effects. What is faith, but the hand of the ſoule? What is the duty of the hand, but either to hold or worke? This hand then holds Chriſt, workes obedience and holineſſe: and if this act of apprehenſion be as ſecret, as the cauſe; ſince the cloſed hand hideth ſtill what it holdeth; ſee the hand of faith open; ſee what it worketh, and compare it with your owne proofe. Deny if you can (yet I had rather appeale to any Iudge, than your preiudiced ſelfe) that in all your needs you can ſtep boldly to the Throne of Heauen; and freely powre out your enlarged heart to your God, and craue of him, whether to receiue what you want, or that you may want what you haue, and would not. Be aſſured from God, this can be done by no power, but (that you feare to miſſe) of faith. God, as he is not, ſo he is not called a father without this. In vaine doth he pray, that cannot call God Father: No father without the ſpirit of adoption; no ſpirit, without faith: without this you may babble, you cannot pray. Aſſume you that you can pray, I dare conclude vpon my ſoule, You beleeue. As little as you loue your ſelfe, deny if you can, that you loue God. Say that your Sauiour from heauen ſhould aske you Peters queſtion, could your ſoule returne any other anſwer, than Lord thou knoweſt I loue thee? Why are you elſe in ſuch awe to offend, that a world cannot bribe you to ſinne? Why in ſuch deepe griefe when you haue ſinned, that no mirth can refreſh you? Why in ſuch feruent deſire of enioying his preſence? Why in ſuch agony when you enioy it not? neither doth God loue you, neither can you loue God without faith. Yet more: doe you willingly nouriſh any one ſin in your breſt; do you not repent of all? Doe you not hate all, though you cannot leaue all? Doe you not complaine that you hate them no more? Doe you not, as for life, wiſh for holineſſe, and endeuour it? Nothing but faith can thus cleanſe the heart; that like a good houſ-wife, ſweeps all the foule corners of the ſoule, and will not leaue ſo much as one webbe in this roomie houſe. Truſt to it, you cannot hate ſinne for it owne ſake, and forſake it for Gods ſake, without faith; the faithleſſe hath had ſome remorſe and feares, neuer repentance. Laſtly, doe you not loue a good man for goodneſſe, and delight in Gods Saints? Doth not your loue leade you to compaſſion; your compaſſion to releefe? An heart truly faithfull cannot but haue an hand chriſtianly bountifull: Charity and Faith make vp one perfect paire of Compaſſes, that can take the true latitude of a Chriſtian heart: Faith is the one foot, pitcht in the centre vnmoueably, while Charity walkes about in a perfect circle of beneficence: theſe two neuer did, neither can goe aſunder: Warrant you your loue, I dare warrant your faith: What need I ſay more? This heat of our affections, and this light of your workes, will euince againſt all the gates of hell, that you haue the fire of Faith: let your ſoule then warme it ſelfe with theſe ſweet and cordiall flames, againſt all thoſe cold deſpaires, whereto you are tempted: ſay, Lord, I beleeue; and I will giue you leaue ſtill to adde, Helpe my vnbeleefe.

To Mr. Ed. Alleyne.

Ep. VII. A direction how to conceiue of God in our deuotions and meditations.

YOu haue choſen and iudged well: How to conceiue of the Deity in our prayers, in our meditations, is both the deepeſt point of all Chriſtianity, & the moſt neceſſary: ſo deep, that if we wade into it, we may eaſily drown, neuer find the bottom: ſo neceſſary, that without it, our ſelues, our ſeruices, are profane, irreligious: we are all borne Idolaters, naturally prone to faſhion God to ſome forme of our own, whether of an humane bodie, or of an admirable light; or if our minde haue any other more likely, and pleaſing image. Firſt then, away with all theſe wicked thoughts, theſe groſſe deuotions; and with Iacob bury all your ſtrange gods vnder the oake of Shechem, ere you offer to ſet vp Gods Altar at Bethel: and without all mentall repreſentations, conceiue of your God purely, ſimply, ſpiritually; as of an abſolute being, without forme, without matter, without compoſition; yea, an infinite, without all limit of thoughts. Let your heart adore a ſpirituall Maieſtie, which it cannot comprehend, yet knowes to be; and as it were, loſe it ſelfe in his infiniteneſſe. Thinke of him, as not to be thought of; as one, whoſe wiſdome is his iuſtice, whoſe iuſtice is his power, whoſe power is his mercie; and whoſe wiſdome, iuſtice, power, mercy, is himſelfe; as without qualitie good, great without quantitie, euerlaſting without time, preſent euery where without place, containing all things without extent: and when your thoughts are come to the higheſt, ſtay there, and be content to wonder, in ſilence: and if you cannot reach to conceiue of him as he is, yet take heed you conceiue not of him as he is not. Neither will it ſuffice your Chriſtian minde, to haue this awfull and confuſed apprehenſion of the Deitie, without a more ſpeciall and inward conceit of three in this one; three perſons in this one eſſence, not diuided, but diſtinguiſhed; and not more mingled than diuided. There is nothing, wherein the want of words can wrong and grieue vs, but in this: Here alone, as we can adore, and not conceiue, ſo we can conceiue, and not vtter; yea, vtter our ſelues, and not be conceiued; yet as we may, Thinke here of one ſubſtance in three ſubſiſtences; one eſſence in three relations; one IEHOVAH begetting, begotten, proceeding; Father, Son, Spirit: yet ſo, as the Son is no other thing from the Father, but another perſon; or the Spirit, from the Son. Let your thoughts here walke warily, the path is narrow: the conceit either of three ſubſtances or but one ſubſiſtence, is damnable. Let me lead you yet higher, and further, in this intricate way, towards the Throne of grace: All this will not auaile you, if you take not your Mediator with you: if you apprehend not a true manhood, gloriouſly vnited to the Godhead, without change of either nature, without mixture of both; whoſe preſence, whoſe merits muſt giue paſſage, acceptance, vigour to your praiers.

Here muſt be therefore (as you ſee) thoughts holily mixed: of a Godhead and humanitie: one perſon in two natures: of the ſame Deitie, in diuers perſons, and one nature: wherein (if euer) heauenly wiſdome muſt beſtir it ſelfe, in directing vs, ſo to ſeuer theſe apprehenſions, that none be neglected; ſo to conioyne them, that they be not confounded. O the depth of diuine myſteries, more than can be wondred at! O the neceſſitie of this high knowledge, which who attaines not, may babble, but praieth not. Still you doubt, and aske if you may not direct your praiers to one perſon of three. Why not? Safely, and with comfort. What need we feare, while we haue our Sauiour for our patterne: O my Father (if poſſible) let this Cup paſſe: and Paul euery where both in thanks and requeſts: but with due care of worſhipping all in one. Exclude the other, while you fix your heart vpon one, your praier is ſinne; retaine all, and mention one, you offend not. None of them doth ought for vs, without all. It is a true rule of Diuines: All their externall works are common: To ſollicit one therefore, and not all, were iniurious. And if you ſtay your thoughts vpon the ſacred humanitie of Chriſt, with inſeparable adoration of the Godhead vnited, and thence climbe vp to the holy conceit of that bleſſed and dreadful Trinitie, I dare not cenſure, I dare not but commend your diuine method. Thus ſhould Chriſtians aſcend from earth to heauen, from one heauen to another. If I haue giuen your deuotions any light, it is well: the leaſt glimpſe of this knowledge is worth all the full gleames of humane and earthly skill. But I miſtake, if your owne heart wrought vpon with ſerious meditations (vnder that ſpirit of illumination) will not proue your beſt Maſter. After this weake direction, ſtudie to conceiue aright, that you may pray aright; and pray that you may conceiue; and meditate that you may doe both: and the God of heauen direct you, inable you, that you may doe all.

To M. Thomas Iames of Oxford.

Ep. VIII. A diſcourſe of the grounds of the Papiſts confidence in appealing to the Fathers; applauding his worthy offers and endeuours of diſcouering the falſifications and deprauations of antiquitie.

SIR, I know no man ſo like as you to make poſterity his debtor. I doe heartily congratulate vnto you ſo worthy labours, ſo noble a proiect. Our aduerſaries knowing of themſelues (that which Tertullian ſaith of all hereſies) that if appeale be made to the ſacred bench of Prophets and Apoſtles, they cannot ſtand; remoue the ſuit of religion craftily, into the Court of the Fathers. A reuerend triall as any vnder heauen; where it cannot be ſpoken, how confidently they triumph ere the conflict. Giue vs the Fathers for our Iudges (ſay Campian and Poſſeuine) the day is ours. And whence is this courage? Is antiquity our enemie, their aduocate? Certainly it cannot be truth that is new: We would renounce our Religion, if it could be ouer-lookt for time. Let goe equity, the older take both. There be two things then, that giue them heart in this prouocation: One, the baſtardy of falſe Fathers; the other, the corruption of the true. What a flouriſh doe they make with vſurped names? Whom would it not amaze to ſee the frequent citations of the Apoſtles owne Canons, Conſtitutions, Liturgies, Maſſes: of Clemens, Dennys the Areopagite, Linus, Hippolitus, Martiall of Burdeaux, Egeſippus: Donations of Conſtantine the great, and Lewis the godly: Of 50 Canons of Nice: of Dorotheus, Damaſus his Pontificall: Epiſtles decretall of Clemens, Euariſtus; Teleſphorus, and an hundred other Biſhops holy and ancient; of Euodius, Anaſtaſius, Simeon Metaphraſtes, and moe yet than a number moe; moſt whereof haue crept out of the Vatican or Cloiſters; and all cary in them manifeſt brands of falſhood, and ſuppoſition: that I may ſay nothing of thoſe infinite writings, which either ignorance, or wilfulneſſe, hath fathered vpon euery of the Fathers, not without ſhameleſſe importunity, and groſſe impoſſibilities: all which (as ſhe ſaid of Peter) their ſpeech bewrayeth; or (as Auſten ſaid of Cyprians ſtile) their face. This fraud is more eaſily auoided: For as in notorious burglaries, oft-times there is either an hat, or a gloue, or a weapon left behind, which deſcrieth the authors; ſo the God of truth hath beſotted theſe impoſtors to let fall ſome palpable error, (though but of falſe calculation) whereby, if not their names, yet their ages might appeare, to their conuiction. Moſt danger is in the ſecret corruption of the true and acknowledged iſſue of thoſe gracious parents; whom, through cloſe and crafty handling, they haue induced to belye thoſe that begot them; and to betray their Fathers, either with ſilence, or falſe euidence. Plainly, how are the honoured Volumes of faithfull antiquity, blurred, interlined, altered, depraued by ſubtile treacherie; and made to ſpeake what they meant not? Fie on this, not ſo much iniuſtice, as impiety, to raze the awfull monuments of the dead, and partially to blot and change the original Will of the deceaſed, inſert our owne Legacies. This is done by our guilty aduerſaries, to the iniurie not more of theſe Authors, than of the preſent and ſucceeding times. Hence thoſe Fathers are ſome-where not ours: What wonder? while they are not themſelues. Your induſtry hath offered (and that motion is liuely and heroicall) to challenge all their learned and elegant pages, from iniurie of corruption; to reſtore them to themſelues, and to vs: that which all the learned of our times haue but deſired to ſee done, you proffer to effect: your aſſay in Cyprian and Auguſtine is happy and iuſtly applauded. All our Libraries, whom your diligent hand hath ranſackt, offer their aid, in ſuch abundance of manuſcripts, as all Europe would enuy to ſee met in one Iland. After all this, for that the moſt ſpightfull imputation to our Truth is noueltie, you offer to deduce her pedegree from thoſe primitiue times, through the ſucceſſions of all ages; and to bring into the light of the world, many (as yet obſcure) but no leſſe certaine and authenticall Patrons, in a continued line of deſcence. You haue giuen proofe enough, that theſe are no glorious vaunts, but the zealous challenges of an able Champion. What wanteth then? Let me ſay for you: Not an heart, not an head, not an hand; but (which I almoſt ſcorne to name in ſuch a cauſe) a purſe. If this continue your hinderance, it will not be more our loſſe than ſhame. Heare me a little, ye great and wealthy: Hath God loaded you with ſo much ſubſtance; and will you not lend him a little of his owne? Shall your riot be fed with exceſſe; while Gods cauſe ſhall ſtarue for want? Shall our aduerſaries ſo inſultingly out-bid vs; and in the zeale of our profuſion laugh at our heartleſſe & cold niggardlineſſe? Shall heauenly truth lie in the duſt for want of a little ſtamped earth to raiſe her? How can you ſo much any way honour God, yea your ſelues, deſerue of poſterity, pleaſure the Church, and make you ſo good friends of your Mammon? Let not the next Age ſay, that ſhee had ſo vnkind predeceſſors. Fetch forth of your ſuperfluous ſtore, and caſt in your rich gifts into this treaſury of the Temple. The Lord and his Church haue need. For you, it angers me to ſee how that flattering Poſſeuinus ſmoothly intices you from vs with golden offers, vpon the aduantage of our neglect; as if he (meaſuring your mind by his owne) thought an Omnia dabo would bring you with himſelfe on your knees to worſhip the deuill, the beaſt, the image of both: as if we were not as able to encourage, to reward deſert. Hath Vertue no Patrons on this ſide the Alpes? Are thoſe hils onely the threſholds of honour? I plead not, becauſe I cannot feare you: But who ſees not how munificently our Church ſcattereth her bountifull fauours vpon leſſe merit. If your day be not yet come, expect it; God and the Church owe you a benefit; if their payment be long, it is ſure. Onely goe you on with courage, in thoſe your high endeauours; and in the meane time, thinke it great recompence to haue deſerued.

To Mr. E. A.

Ep. IX. A diſcourſe of fleeing or ſtay in the time of peſtilence; whether lawfull for Miniſter or people.

HOw many hath a ſeduced conſcience led vntimely to the graue? I ſpeak of this ſad occaſion of Peſtilence. The Angell of God followes you, and you doubt whether you ſhould flie. If a Lion out of the foreſt ſhould purſue you, you would make no queſtion: yet could he not doe it vnſent. What is the difference? Both inſtruments of diuine reuenge; both threaten death; one by ſpilling the bloud, the other by infecting it. Who knows whether he hath not appointed your Zoar out of the liſts of this deſtruction? You ſay it is Gods viſitation. What euill is not? If war haue waſted the confines of your Country, you ſaue your throats by flight: Why are you more fauourable to Gods immediate ſword of peſtilence? Very leproſie, by Gods law, requires a ſeparation; yet no mortall ſickneſſe. When you ſee a noted Leper proclaime his vncleanneſſe in the ſtreet, will you embrace him for his ſake that hath ſtricken him, or auoid him for his ſake that hath forbidden you? If you honour his rod, much more will you regard his precept. If you miſlike not the affliction becauſe he ſends it, then loue the life which you haue of his ſending; feare the iudgement which he will ſend, if you loue it not. He that bids vs flee when we are perſecuted, hath neither excepted Angell nor man; whether ſoeuer, I feare our guiltineſſe, if wilfully we flee not. But whither ſhall we flee from God? ſay you: where ſhall he not both finde and lead vs? whither ſhall not our deſtiny follow vs? Vaine men, we may runne from our home, not from our graue; Death is ſubtle, our time is ſet; we cannot, God will not alter it. Alas, how wiſe we are to wrong our ſelues! Becauſe Death will ouer-take vs, ſhall we runne and meet him? Becauſe Gods decree is ſure, ſhall we be deſperate? Shall we preſume, becauſe God changeth not? Why doe we not try euery knife and cord, ſince our time is neither capable of preuention nor delay: our end is ſet, not without our meanes. In matter of danger where the end is not knowne, the meanes muſt be ſuſpected; in matter of hope where the end is not knowne, meanes muſt be vſed. Vſe then freely the meanes of your flight, ſuſpect the danger of your ſtay; and ſince there is no particular neceſſity of your preſence, know that God bids you depart and liue. You vrge the inſtance of your Miniſter: How vnequally? There is not more lawfulneſſe in your flight, than ſin in ours: you are your owne; wee our peoples: you are charged with a body which you may not willingly leeſe, not hazard by ſtaying; wee with all their ſoules: which to hazard by abſence, is to loſe our owne: we muſt loue our liues; but not when they are riuals with our ſoules, or with others. How much better is it to be dead, than negligent, than faithleſſe! If ſome bodies be contagiouſly ſicke, ſhall all ſoules be wilfully neglected? There can be no time wherein good counſell is ſo ſeaſonable, ſo needfull. Euery threatning finds impreſſion, where the mind is prepared by ſenſible iudgements. When will the iron hearts of men bow, if not when they are heat in the flame of Gods affliction? now then to runne away from a neceſſary and publike good, to auoid a doubtfull and priuate euill, is to runne into a worſe euill than we would auoid. He that will thus runne from Niniue to Tharſis, ſhall find a tempeſt, and a whale in his way. Not that I dare be an author to any, of the priuate viſitation of infected beds: I dare not without better warrant. Who euer ſaid we were bound to cloſe vp the dying eyes of euery departing Chriſtian? and vpon what-euer conditions, to heare their laſt grones; If we had a word, I would not debate of the ſucceſſe. Then, that were cowardlineſſe, which now is wiſdome. Is it no ſeruice, that we publikely teach and exhort? that we priuately prepare men for death, and arme them againſt it? that our comfortable letters and meſſages ſtir vp their fainting hearts? that our loud voyces pierce their eares afarre; vnleſſe we feele their pulſes, and leane vpon their pillowes, and whiſper in their eares? Daniel is in the lyons den; Is it nothing that Darius ſpeakes comfort to him thorow the grate, vnleſſe he goe in to ſalute him among thoſe fierce companions? A good miniſter is the common goods: hee cannot make his life peculiar to one, without iniury to many. In the common cauſe of the Church, he muſt be no niggard of his life; in the priuate cauſe of a neighbours bodily ſickneſſe, he may ſoone be prodigall. A good father may not ſpend his ſubſtance on one child, and leaue the reſt beggers. If any man be reſolute in the contrary, I had rather praiſe his courage, than imitate his practice. I confeſſe, I feare; not ſo much death, as want of warrant for death.

To M. R. B.

Ep. X. A complaint of the iniquitie of the Times; with a preſcription of the meanes to redreſſe it.

WHiles I accuſed the Times, you vndertook their patronage. I cōmend your charity, not your cauſe. It is true: There was neuer any Age not complained of; neuer any that was not cenſured, as worſt. What is, we ſee; what was, we neither inquire nor care. That which is out of ſight and vſe, is ſoone out of mind, and ere long out of memory. Yet the iniquity of others, cannot excuſe ours. And if you will be but as iuſt as charitable, you ſhall confeſſe, that both ſome times exceed others in euill;

Hall, J.

and theſe, all. This earthly Moone the Church hath her fuls and wainings, and ſometimes her eclypſes; whiles the ſhadow of this ſinfull maſſe hides her beauty from the world. So long as ſhe wadeth in this planetary world, it ſhould be vaine to expect better: it is enough when ſhe is fixed aboue, to be free from all change. This you yeeld: but nothing can perſwade you, that ſhee is not now in the full of her glory. True: or elſe ſhe were not ſubiect to this darkning. There was neuer more light of knowledge; neuer more darkneſſe of impiety: and there could not be ſuch darkneſſe, if there were not ſuch light. Goodneſſe repulſed, giues height to ſin: therefore are we worſe than our predeceſſors, becauſe we might be better. By how much our meanes are greater, by ſo much are our defects. Turne ouer all records; and parallel ſuch helps, ſuch care, ſuch coſt, ſuch expectation, with ſuch fruit, I yeeld: We ſee but our owne times: There was neuer but one Noah (whom the Heathen celebrate vnder another name) that with two faces ſaw both before and behind him: But loe, that Ancient of dayes, to whom all times are preſent, hath told vs, that theſe laſt ſhal be worſt: Our experience iuſtifies him, with all but the wilfull. This cenſure (leſt you ſhould condemne my rigour, as vnnaturally partiall) is not confined to our ſeas; but, free and common, hath the ſame bounds with the earth. I ioy not in this large ſocietie. Would God we were euill alone. How few are thoſe, whoſe cariage doth not ſay, that profeſſion of any conſcience is puſillanimity? How few that care ſo much, as to ſhew well? And yet of thoſe few, how many care onely to ſeeme? whoſe words diſagree from their actions, and their hearts from their words? Where ſhall a man mew vp himſelfe, that he may not be a witneſſe of what he would not? What can he ſee, or heare, and not bee either ſad or guilty? Oathes ſtriue for number with words; ſcoffes with oathes, vaine ſpeeches with both. They are rare hands, that are free either from aſperſions of bloud, or ſpots of filthineſſe. Let mee bee at once (as I vſe) bold and plaine: Wanton exceſſe, exceſſiue pride, cloſe Atheiſme, impudent profaneneſſe, vnmercifull oppreſſion, ouer-mercifull conniuence, greedy couetouſneſſe, looſe prodigality, ſimoniacall ſacriledge, vnbrideled luxury, beaſtly drunkenneſſe, bloudy treachery, cunning fraud, ſlanderous detraction, enuious vnderminings, ſecret idolatry, hypocriticall faſhionableneſſe, haue ſpred themſelues all ouer the world. The Sunne of peace looking vpon our vncleane heaps, hath bred theſe monſters, and hath giuen light to this brood of darkneſſe. Looke about you, and ſee if three great Idols, Honour, Pleaſure, Gaine, haue not ſhared the earth amongſt them, and left him leaſt, whoſe all is. Your deniall driues mee to particulars. I vrge no further. If any aduerſary inſult in my confeſſion, tell him, that I account them the greateſt part of this euill; neither could thus complaine, if they were not. Who knowes not, that as the earth is the dregs of the world, ſo Italy is the dregs of the earth, Rome of Italy? It is no wonder to finde Satan in his Hell; but to finde him in Paradiſe, is vncouth, and grieuous. Let them alone that will die and hate to be cured. For vs: O that remedies were as eaſie as complaints! That we could be as ſoone cleared, as conuinced! That the taking of the medicine were but ſo difficult as the preſcription! And yet nothing hinders vs from health, but our will: neither Goſpell, nor Grace, nor Glory, are ſhut vp; onely our hearts are not open. Let me turne my ſtile from you, to the ſecure, to the peruerſe, though why do I hope they will heare me, that are deafe to God? they will regard words, that care not for iudgements? Let me tell them yet (if in vaine) they muſt breake, if they bow not: That if mercy may be refuſed, yet vengeance cannot be reſiſted: that God can ſerue himſelfe of them perforce, neither to their thanke nor eaſe: that the preſent plagues do but threaten worſe. Laſtly, that if they relent not, hell was not made for nothing. What ſhould be done then? Except we would faine ſmart, each man amend one, and we all liue. How commonly doe men complaine, and yet adde to this heape? Redreſſe ſtands not in words. Let euery man pull but one brand out of this fire, and the flame will goe out alone. What is a multitude, but an heape of vnities? The more we deduce, the fewer we leaue. O how happy were it then, if euery man would begin at home, and take his owne heart to task, and at once be his owne Accuſer, and Iudge; to condemne his priuate errors, yea to mulct them with death! Till then alas, what auailes it to talke? While euery man cenſures, and no man amends, what is it but buſie trifling? But though our care muſt begin at our ſelues, it may not end there. Who but a Caine is not his brothers keeper? Publike perſons are not ſo much their own, as others are theirs. Who ſits at the common ſtern, cannot diſtinguiſh betwixt the care of his owne ſafety, and his veſſels: both drowne at once, or at once ſalute the hauen. Ye Magiſtrates (for in you ſtand all our lower hopes) whom God hath on purpoſe, in a wiſe ſurrogation, ſet vpon earth to correct her diſorders, take to your ſelues firme fore-heads, couragious hearts, hands buſie, & not partiall; to diſcountenance ſhameleſſe wickedneſſe, to reſiſt the violent ſway of euils, to execute wholſome lawes, with ſtrictneſſe, with reſolution. The ſword of the ſpirit meets with ſuch iron hearts, that it both enters not, and is rebated. Loe, it appeales to your arme, to your aid. An earthen edge can beſt pierce this hardned earth: If iniquitie die not by your hands, we periſh. And ye ſonnes of Leui gather to your Moſes in the gate of the Campe; conſecrate your hands to God in this holy ſlaughter of vice: Let your voice be both a trumpet to incite, and a two-edged ſword to wound and kill. Cry downe ſinne in earneſt, and thunder out of that ſacred chaire of Moſes: and let your liues ſpeake yet louder. Neither may the common Chriſtian ſit ſtill and looke on in ſilence: I am deceiued, if in this cauſe God allow any man for priuate. Here muſt be all actors, no witneſſes. His diſcreet admonitions, ſeaſonable reproofes, and prayers neuer vnſeaſonable, beſides the power of honeſt example, are expected as his due tribute to the common health: What if we cannot turne the ſtreame? Yet wee muſt ſwim againſt it: euen without conqueſt, it is glorious to haue reſiſted: in this alone, they are enemies, that doe nothing. Thus, as one that delights more in amendment, than excuſe, I haue both cenſured and directed. The fauour of your ſentence proceeds (I know) from your owne innocent vprightneſſe: So iudge of my ſeuere taxation. It ſhall be happy for vs, if we can at once excuſe and diminiſh; accuſe and redreſſe iniquity. Let but the endeuour be ours, the ſucceſſe to GOD.

TO THE MOST HIGH AND EXCELLENT PRINCE, HENRY, PRINCE of WALES; All happineſſe.

MOſt Gracious Prince:

LEt me not (whiles I deſire to be dutifull) ſeeme importunate, in my dedications. I now bring to your Highneſſe theſe my laſt, and perhaps moſt materiall Letters: wherein, if I miſtake not, (as, how eaſily are wee deceiued in our owne?) the pleaſure of the varietie ſhall ſtriue with the importance of matter. There is no worldly thing, I confeſſe, whereof I am more ambitious, than of your Highneſſes contentment; which that you place in goodneſſe, is not more your glory, than our ioy. Doe ſo ſtill, and heauen and earth ſhall agree to bleſſe you, and vs in you. For me, after this my officious boldneſſe, I ſhall betake my ſelfe in ſilence, to ſome greater worke, wherein I may approue my ſeruice to the Church, and to your Highneſſe, as her ſecond ioy and care. My heart ſhall be alwaies, and vpon all opportunities, my tongue and pen ſhall no leſſe gladly be deuoted to my gracious Maſter, as one

Who reioyce to be your Highneſſes (though vnworthy, yet) faithfull and obſequious Seruant,

THE

THE FIFT DECAD.

To my Lord Biſhop of BATHE and WELLS.

Ep. I. Diſcourſing of the cauſes and meanes of the increaſe of Poperie.

BY what meanes the Romiſh Religion hath in theſe latter times preuailed ſo much ouer the world, (Right Reuerend and Honorable) is a conſideration both weighty and vſefull; for hence may we frame our ſelues either to preuent, or imitate them: to imitate them in what we may; or preuent them in what they ſhould not. I meddle not with the meanes of their firſt riſings: the munificence of Chriſtian Princes, the honeſt deuotions of well-meaning Contributers, the diuiſion of the Chriſtian world, the buſie endeuours of forward Princes, for the recouery of the Holy-land, with neglect of their owne, the ambitious inſinuations of that Sea, the fame and large dominion of thoſe ſeuen hills; the compacted indulgence and conniuence of ſome treacherous, of other timorous Rulers; the ſhameleſſe flatterie of Paraſites; the rude ignorance of Times; or if there be any other of this kinde: My thoughts and words ſhall be ſpent vpon the preſent, and lateſt Age. All the world knowes, how that pretended Chaire of Peter tottered, and cracked, ſome threeſcore yeeres agoe, threatning a ſpeedie ruine to her fearfull vſurper: How is it that ſtill it ſtands, & ſeemes now to boaſt of ſome ſetledneſſe? Certainly, if Hell had not contriued a new ſupport, the Angell had long ſince ſaid, It is fallen, it is fallen; and the Merchants, Alas, alas, the great Citie. The brood of that lame Loyola ſhall haue this miſerable honour, without our enuy; that if they had not beene, Rome had not beene. By what meanes, it reſts now to inquire.

It is not ſo much their zeale for falſhood; which yet wee acknowledge, and admire not. If Satan were not more buſie than they, wee had loſt nothing. Their deſperate attempts, bold intruſions, importunate ſollicitations, haue not returned empty; yet their policie hath done more than their force. That Popiſh world was then foule, and debauched, as in doctrine, ſo in life; and now began to be aſhamed of it ſelfe; When theſe holy Fathers, as ſome Saints dropt out of heauen, ſuddenly profeſſed an vnuſuall ſtrictneſſe, ſad pietie, reſolued mortification; and ſo drew the eyes and hearts of men after them, that poore ſoules began to thinke, it could not be other than diuine, which they taught; other than holy, which they touched. The very times (not ſeldome) giue as great aduantage, as our owne beſt ſtrength: and the vices of others giue glory to thoſe which either are, or appeare vertuous. They ſaw how ready the world was to bite at the bait; and now followed their ſucceſſe, with new helps. Plenty of pretended miracles muſt bleſſe, on all ſides, the endeuours of this new Sect; and cals for both approbation, and wonder. Thoſe things by the report of their owne pens (other witneſſes I ſee none) haue beene done by the ten Patriarks of the Ieſuitiſh Religion, both aliue and dead, which can hardly be matched of him, whoſe name they haue vſurped. And now the vulgar can ſay, If theſe men were not of God, they could doe nothing: How can a man that is a ſinner doe ſuch miracles? not diſtruſting either the fame, or the worke; but applauding the Authors, for what was ſaid to be done. But now leſt the enuy of the fact ſhould ſurpaſſe the wonder, they haue learned to caſt this glory vpon their wooden Ladies, and to communicate the gaine vnto the whole Religion: Two blockes at Hale and Scherpen heuuell, haue ſaid and done more for Poperie, than all Friers, euer ſince Francis wore his breeches on his head. But becauſe that praiſe is ſweet, which ariſes from the diſgrace of a riuall; therefore this holy ſocietie hath, beſides, euer wont to honour it ſelfe by the brokage of ſhameleſſe vntruths againſt the aduerſe part; not caring how probable any report is, but how odious. A iuſt volume would not containe thoſe willing lies, wherewith they haue purpoſely loaded religion, and vs; that the multitude might firſt hate vs, and then inquire: and theſe courſes are held not tolerable, but meritorious. So the end may be attained, all meanes are iuſt; all wayes ſtrait. Whom wee may, wee ſatisfie: but wounds once giuen are hardly healed without ſome ſcarres: and commonly accuſations are vocall, Apologies dumbe. How eaſie is it to make any cauſe good, if we may take libertie of tongue and conſcience? Yet leſt ſome glimpſe of our truth and innocence ſhould perhaps lighten the eyes of ſome more inquiſitiue Reader, they haue by ſtrict prohibitions, whether of bookes, or conference, reſtrained all poſſibilitie of true informations: Yea their owne writings, wherein our opinions are reported with confutation, are not allowed to the common view; leſt if it ſhould appeare what wee hold, our meere opinion ſhould preuaile more than their ſubtileſt anſwer. But aboue all, the reſtraint of Gods booke hath gained them moſt: If that might be in the hands of men, their religion could not be in their hearts; now, the concealement of Scriptures breeds ignorance, and ignorance ſuperſtition. But becauſe forbiddance doth but whet deſire, and worke a conceit of ſome ſecret excellence in things denied; therefore haue they deuiſed to affright this dangerous curioſitie, with that cruell, butcherly, helliſh Inquiſition; wherein yet there is not leſſe craft than violence. For ſince they haue perceiued the bloud of Martyrs to be but the ſeed of the Church, and that theſe perfumes are more diſperſed with beating; they haue now learned to murder without noiſe, and to bring forth (if at leaſt they liſt ſometimes to make the people priuy to ſome examples of terror) not men, but carcaſſes. Behold, the conſtant confeſſions of the dying Saints haue made them weary of publike executions: none but bare walls ſhall now teſtifie the courage and faith of our happy Martyrs. A diſguiſed corpſe is only brought forth to the multitude, either for laughter, or feare. Yet becauſe the very dead ſpeake for truth in a loud ſilence, theſe ſpectacles are rare; and the graues of heretikes are become as cloſe as their death.

Yet leſt (ſince neither liuing mouthes, nor faithfull pens may be ſuffered to inſinuate any truth) thoſe ſpeeches ſhould perhaps be receiued from the Ancients, which in vs were hereticall; the monuments of vnpartiall antiquitie muſt be depraued; all witneſſes that might ſpeake againſt them muſt be corrupted, with a fraudulent violence; and ſome of them purged to the death. So whiles ours are debarred, and the Ancients altered, poſteritie ſhall acknowledge no aduerſarie.

What ſhould I ſpeake of thoſe plauſible deuices, which they haue inuented, to make ſuperſtitious and fooliſh Proſelytes? Their proud vaunts of antiquitie, vniuerſalitie, ſucceſſion, and the name of their fore-fathers, doe not onely perſwade, but amaze and beſot an ignorant heart. The glorious ſhewes of their proceſſions, the gaudy ornaments of their Altars, the pompe and magnificence of the places, and manner of their Seruices, the triumphs of their great Feſtiuals, are enough to bewitch any childiſh, ſimple, or vaine beholders. Who knowes not that nature is moſt led by ſenſe? Sure, children and fooles (ſuch are all meere naturall men) cannot be of any other Religion.

Beſides all theſe, their perſonall vndertakings, what for cunning, what for boldneſſe, could promiſe nothing but ſucceſſe. They can transforme themſelues into all ſhapes, and in theſe falſe formes thruſt themſelues into all Courts, and companies ; not oftner changing their habit, than their name. They can take the beſt opportunities to worke vpon thoſe which are either moſt vnable to reſiſt, or moſt like to beſtead them. That I may not ſpeake of the wrongs of vnſeaſonable trauell ; wherein many vnſetled heads haue met dangers, and ſollicited errors, who like fond and idle Dinahs, going abroad to gaze, haue beene rauiſhed ere their returne. Neuer was any bird ſo laid for by the nets and calls of the fowler, as the great heire of ſome noble familie, or ſome fiery wit, is by theſe impoſtors. They know that greatneſſe is both lawleſſe, and commanding ; if not by precept, yet by example : their very ſilence is perſwaſorie, and imperious. But alas for that other ſex : Still the Deuill begins with Eue ; ſtill his aſſault is ſtrongeſt where is weakeſt reſiſtance. Simon Magus had his Helena, Nicolas the Deacon had his choros fœmineos, (as Hierome calls them) Marcion had his Factoreſſe at Rome ; Appelles his Philumena, Montanus his Priſca and Maximilla ; Arrius his Conſtantines ſiſter, Donatus his Lucilla, Elpidius his Agape ; Priſcillianus his Galla : and our Ieſuites haue their painted Ladies (not dead,but liuing) both for obiects and inſtruments. When they ſaw they could not blow vp religion with French powder into Heauen, they now trie by this Moabitiſh plot to ſinke it downe to Hell. Thoſe ſillie women, which are laden with ſinnes, and diuers luſts, muſt now be the ſtales of their ſpirituall fornications : But for that theſe enterpriſes want not danger,that both parts may ſecurely ſucceed, behold publique libertie of diſpenſations, whether for diſſembled religion, or not vnprofitable filthineſſe. Theſe meanes are (like the Authors) diſhoneſt, and godleſſe. Adde (if you pleaſe) hereto, thoſe which pretend more innocent policie : their common dependances vpon one Commander, their intelligences giuen, their charges receiued, their rewards and honours (perhaps of the Calender, perhaps of a red Hat) duly conferred. Neither may the leaſt helpe be aſcribed to the conference of ſtudies ; (the conioyned labours of whole Societies directed to one end, and ſhrouded vnder the title of one Author) to large maintenances,raiſed from the death-beds of ſome guilty benefactors : from whence flow both infinite numbers, and incomparable helps, of Students. Vnder which head, for the time paſt, not a few are moued by the remembrance of the bounteous hoſpitalitie of the religious ; who hauing ingroſſed the world to themſelues, ſeemed liberall in giuing ſome thing ; like vnto ſome vaine-glorious theeues, which hauing robbed wealthy Merchants, beſtow ſome pence vpon beggers. Further, the ſmothering, if not compoſing of their frequent ſtrifes, and confining of brawles within their owne threſholds ; with the nice menaging of their knowne oppoſitions, hath wonne many ignorant friends. Laſtly, the excellent correſpondence of their doctrines vnto nature, hath beene their beſt ſollicitor. We haue examined particulars in a former Epiſtle : wherein wee haue made it euident, that Poperie affects nothing but to make Nature either proud, or wanton : it offers difficulties, but carnall ; and ſuch as the greateſt louer of himſelfe would eaſily embrace for an aduantage. That we may therefore ſumme vp all ; I need not accuſe our careleſneſſe, indifferencie, idleneſſe, looſe carriage ; in all which, would God wee had not aided them, and wronged our ſelues ; nor yet their zeale and forwardneſſe, worſe meanes are guiltie of their gaine. In ſhort, the faire outſide which they ſet vpon Religion, which ſure is the beſt they haue, if not all ; their pretended miracles, wilfull vntruths, ſtrait prohibitions, bloudy and ſecret inquiſitions, deprauations of ancient witneſſes , expurgation of their owne, gay and gariſh ſights, glorious titles , crafty changes of names, ſhapes, habits, conditions ; inſinuations to the great , oppugnation of the weaker ſex ; falſhood of anſwers, and oathes , diſpenſations for ſinnes , vniting of forces, concealing of differences, largeneſſe of contributions, multitude of actors, and meanes, accordances to mens naturall diſpoſitions : Where we on the contrary care not to ſeeme, but to be, diſclaime miracles, dare not ſaue the life of Religion with a lie ; giue free ſcope to all pens, to all tongues, to all eyes : ſhed no bloud for Religion : ſuffer all Writers to ſpeake like themſelues; ſhew nothing but poore ſimplicitie in our deuotions; goe euer, and looke, as we are; teach the truth right-downe in an honeſt plainneſſe, take no vantage of imbecillitie; ſweare true, though wee die; giue no hope of indulgence for euill; ſtudy each retired to himſelfe, and the Muſes; publiſh our quarrels, and aggrauate them; anger nature, and conquer it. Such gaine ſhall be grauell in their throats: ſuch loſſes to vs (in our not daring to ſinne) ſhall be happy and victorious; in all other regards are both blame-worthy, and recouerable. What dulneſſe is this? Haue we ſuch a King, as in theſe liſts of Controuerſie, may dare to grapple with that great infallible Vicar, for his triple Crowne; ſuch Biſhops, as may iuſtly challenge the whole Conſiſtory of Rome; ſo many learned Doctors, and Diuines, as no Nation vnder heauen, more; ſo flouriſhing Vniuerſities, as Chriſtendome hath none; ſuch bleſſed opportunities, ſuch incouragements; and now when wee want nothing elſe, ſhall wee be wanting to our ſelues? Yea aboue all theſe, the God of heauen fauours vs; and doe wee languiſh? The cauſe is his, and in ſpight of the gates of hell ſhall ſucceed, though wee were not: our neglect may ſlacken the paſe of truth, cannot ſtay the paſſage. Why are wee not as buſie, as ſubtill, more reſolute? Such ſpirits, and ſuch hands as yours (Reuerend Lord) muſt put life into the cold breaſts of this frozen generation, and raiſe them vp to ſuch thoughts and endeuours, as may make the emulation of our aduerſaries equall to their enmitie.

To my Lord Biſhop of WORCESTER.

Ep. II. Shewing the differences of the preſent Church from the Apoſtolicall; and needleſneſſe of our conformitie thereto in all things.

I Feare not to ſay, thoſe men are but ſuperſtitiouſly curious (Right Reuerend, and Honourable) which would call backe all circumſtances to their firſt patternes. The Spouſe of Chriſt hath beene euer cloathed with her owne rites: and as apparell, ſo Religion hath her faſhions, variable according to ages and places. To reduce vs to the ſame obſeruations which were in Apoſtolicall vſe, were no better than to tie vs to the ſandals of the Diſciples, or ſeamleſſe coat of our Sauiour. In theſe caſes, they did what we need not; and we may, what they did not: God meant vs no bondage in their example: their Canons binde vs, whether for manners, or doctrine, not their Ceremonies. Neither Chriſt, nor his Apoſtles, did all things for imitation: I ſpeake not of miraculous acts. We need not be ſilent before a Iudge, as Chriſt was; we need not take a towell, and gird our ſelues, and waſh our ſeruants feet, as Chriſt did; wee need not make tents for our liuing, as Paul; nor goe armed, as Peter; nor carry about our wiues, as he, and the other Apoſtles. I acknowledge the ground not only of ſeparation, but Anabaptiſme, and wonder that theſe conceits doe not anſwer themſelues. Who can chuſe but ſee a manifeſt difference betwixt thoſe lawes, which Chriſt and his great Ambaſſadors made for eternall vſe, and thoſe rituall matters, which were confined to place and time? Euery Nation, euery perſon ſinnes that obſerues not thoſe; Theſe for the moſt part, are not kept of the moſt; and are as well left without ſinne by vs, as vſed without preſcription or neceſſitie by the Authors. Some of them we cannot doe: others wee need not: Which of vs can caſt out deuils by command? Who can cure the ſicke by ointment, and impoſition of hands? The Diſciples did it. All thoſe Acts which proceeded from ſupernaturall priuilege, ceaſed with their cauſe: who now dare vndertake to continue them? Vnleſſe perhaps ſome bold Papiſts, who haue brought in groſſe magick in ſtead of miraculous authoritie; and daube very carcaſes in ſtead of healing diſeaſes. There be more yet which we need not doe. What need we to chuſe Miniſters by lot? What need wee to diſclaime all peculiaritie in goods? What need wee to Chriſten in riuers; or to meet vpon their bankes? What need wee to receiue Gods Supper after our owne? What to leane in each others boſome while wee receiue it? What to abhorre leauen in that holy Bread? What to celebrate loue-feaſts vpon the receit? What to abſtaine from all ſtrangled and bloud? What to depend vpon a maintenance arbitrarie, and vncertaine? What to ſpend our dayes in a perpetuall pererration, as not onely the Apoſtles, but the Prophets and Euangeliſts ſome ages after Chriſt? Whoſoeuer would impoſe all theſe on vs, he ſhould ſurely make vs, not the ſonnes, but the ſlaues of the Apoſtles. Gods Church neuer her ſelfe in ſuch ſeruile tearmes; yea Chriſt himſelfe gaue at firſt ſome precepts of this nature, which he reuerſed ere long: when he ſent the Diſciples to preach, he charges: Take not gold, nor ſiluer, nor money in your girdles; afterwards Iudas carried the bagge. He charges, not to take ſo much as a ſtaffe; yet after behold two ſwords: ſhould the Diſciples haue held their Maſter to his owne rule? Is it neceſſary, that what he once commanded, ſhould be obſerued alwayes? The very next Age to theſe Chriſtian Patriarks, neither would nor durſt haue ſo much varied her rites, or augmented them; if it had found it ſelfe tied either to number, or kinde: As yet it was pure, chaſte, and (which was ground of all) perſecuted. The Church of Rome diſtributed the ſacramentall Bread: the Church of Alexandria permitted the people to take it: the Churches of Affricke and Rome, mixed their holy Wine with water; other colder Regions dranke it pure. Some kneeled in their praiers, others fell proſtrate; and ſome lifted vp eyes, hands, feet towards heauen: ſome kept their Eaſter according to the Iewiſh vſe, the fourteenth of March; the French (as Nicephorus) the eight of the Calends of Aprill, in a ſet ſolemnitie: the Church of Rome the Sunday after the fourteenth Moone; which yet (as Socrates truly writes) was neuer reſtrained by any Goſpell, by any Apoſtle. That Romiſh Victor ouercame the other world in this point, with too much rigour; whoſe cenſure therefore of the Aſian Churches was iuſtly cenſured by Irenæus. What ſhould I ſpeake of their difference of faſts? There can ſcarce be more varietie in dayes, or meats. It hath euer beene thus ſeene, according to our Anſelmes rule, that the multitude of different ceremonies in all Churches, hath iuſtly commended their vnitie in faith. The French Diuines preach couered; (vpon the ſame rule which required the Corinthians to be vncouered) wee bare: The Dutch ſit at the Sacrament, wee kneele; Geneua vſeth wafers, wee leauened bread; they common veſtures in Diuine Seruice, wee peculiar: each is free: no one doth either blame, or ouer-rule others. I cannot but commend thoſe very Nouatian Biſhops (though it is a wonder any precedent of peace ſhould fall from Schiſmaticks) who meeting in Councell together, enacted that Canon of indifferencie, when the Church was diſtracted with the differences of her Paſchall ſolemnities; concluding, how inſufficient this cauſe was to diſquiet the Church of Chriſt. Their owne iſſue (our Separatiſts) will needs be vnlike them in good; and ſtriue to a further diſtance from peace: whiles in a conceit not leſſe idle, than ſcrupulous, they preſſe vs to an vniforme conformitie in our faſhions to the Apoſtles. Their owne practice condemnes them: they call for ſome, and yet keepe not all: yet the ſame reaſon inforces all, that pleads for ſome: and that which warrants the forbearance of ſome, holds for all. Thoſe tooles which ſerue for the foundation, are not of vſe for the roofe. Yea the great maſter-builder choſe thoſe workmen for the firſt ſtones, which he meant not to imploy in the walls. Doe we not ſee all Chriſts firſt agents extraordinary; Apoſtles, Euangeliſts, Prophets, Propheteſſes? See wee not fiery and clouen tongues deſcending? What Church euer ſince boaſted of ſuch founders, of ſuch meanes? Why would God begin with thoſe which he meant not to continue; but to ſhew vs we may not alwayes looke for one face of things? The nurſe feeds and tends her childe at firſt; afterward he is vndertaken by the diſcipline of a Tutor: muſt he be alwayes vnder the ſpoone, and ferule, becauſe he began ſo? If he haue good breeding, it matters not by whoſe hands. Who can denie, that we haue the ſubſtance of all thoſe royall lawes, which Chriſt and his Apoſtles left to his Church; What doe we now thus importunately catching at ſhadowes? If there had beene a neceſſitie of hauing what we want, or wanting what we haue, let vs not ſo farre wrong the wiſdome and perfection of the Law-giuer, as to thinke he would not haue inioyned that, and forbidden this. His ſilence in both argues his indifferencie, and calls for ours; which while it is not peaceably entertained, there is clamour without profit, malice without cauſe, and ſtrife without end.

To my Lady Mary Denny.

Ep. III. Containing the deſcription of a Chriſtian, and his differences from the worldling.

MADAM:

IT is true, that worldly eyes can ſee no difference betwixt a Chriſtian and another man; the out-ſide of both is made of one clay, and caſt in one mould; both are inſpired with one common breath: Outward euents diſtinguiſh them not; thoſe, God neuer made for euidences of loue or hatred. So the ſenſes can perceiue no difference betwixt the reaſonable ſoule, and that which informes the beaſt: yet the ſoule knowes there is much more, than betwixt their bodies. The ſame holds in this: Faith ſees more inward difference, than the eye ſees outward reſemblance. This point is not more high than materiall: which that it may appeare, let me ſhew what it is to be a Chriſtian: You that haue felt it, can ſecond mee with your experience; and ſupply the defects of my diſcourſe. He is the liuing temple of the liuing God; where the Deitie is both reſident and worſhipped. The higheſt thing in a man is his owne ſpirit: but in a Chriſtian the ſpirit of God, which is the God of ſpirits. No grace is wanting in him; and thoſe which there are, want not ſtirring vp. Both his heart and his hands are cleane: All his outward puritie flowes from within; neither doth he frame his ſoule to counterfet good actions; but out of his holy diſpoſition commands and produces them, in the light of God. Let vs begin with his beginning, and fetch the Chriſtian out of his nature, as another Abraham from his Chaldea; whiles the worldling liues and dies, in nature, out of God. The true conuert therefore, after his wilde and ſecure courſes, puts himſelfe (through the motions of Gods Spirit) to ſchoole vnto the Law; there hee learnes what he ſhould haue done, what he could not doe, what he hath done, what he hath deſerued. Theſe leſſons coſt him many a ſtripe, and many a teare, and not more griefe than terror: for this ſharpe maſter makes him feele what ſinne is, and what hell is, and in regard of both, what himſelfe is. When he hath well ſmarted vnder the whip of this ſeuere vſher, and is made vile enough in himſelfe, then is he led vp into the higher ſchoole of Chriſt, and there taught the comfortable leſſons of grace; there hee learnes what belongs to a Sauiour, what one he is, what he hath done, and for whom, how he became ours, we his: and now finding himſelfe in a true ſtate of danger, of humilitie, of need, of deſire, of fitneſſe for Chriſt, he brings home to himſelfe all that he learnes, and what he knowes, he applies. His former Tutor he feared, this he loueth; that ſhewed him his wounds, yea made them; this binds and heales them: that killed him, this ſhewes him life, and leads him to it. Now at once he hates himſelfe, defies Satan, truſts to Chriſt, makes account both of pardon and glory. This is his moſt precious Faith, whereby he appropriates, yea ingroſſes Chriſt Ieſus to himſelfe: whence he is iuſtified from his ſinnes, purified from his corruptions, eſtabliſhed in his reſolutions, comforted in his doubts, defended againſt temptations, ouercomes all his enemies. Which vertue, as it is moſt imployed, and moſt oppoſed, ſo carries the moſt care from the Chriſtian heart, that it be ſound, liuely, growing: ſound, not rotten, not hollow, not preſumptuous:

ſound in the act; not a ſuperficiall conceit, but a true, deepe, and ſenſible apprehenſion: an apprehenſion, not of the braine, but of the heart; and of the heart not approuing, or aſſenting, but truſting and repoſing. Sound in the obiect, none but Chriſt: he knowes, that no friendſhip in heauen can doe him good, without this; The Angels cannot; God will not: Ye beleeue in the Father, beleeue alſo in me.

Liuely; for it cannot giue life, vnleſſe it haue life; the faith that is not fruitfull, is dead: the fruits of faith are good workes; whether inward, within the roote of the heart, as loue, awe, ſorrow, pietie, zeale, ioy, and the reſt; or outward towards God, or our brethren: obedience and ſeruice to the one; to the other reliefe and beneficence: Theſe he beares in his time; ſometimes all, but alwayes ſome.

Growing: true faith cannot ſtand ſtill; but as it is fruitfull in workes, ſo it increaſeth in degrees: from a little ſeed it proues a large plant, reaching from earth to heauen, and from one heauen to another: euery ſhower and euery Sun addes ſomething to it. Neither is this grace euer ſolitarie, but alwayes attended royally: for he that beleeues what a Sauiour he hath, cannot but loue him; and he that loues him, cannot but hate whatſoeuer may diſpleaſe him; cannot but reioyce in him, and hope to enioy him, and deſire to enioy his hope, and contemne all thoſe vanities which he once deſired and enioyed. His minde now ſcorneth to grouell vpon earth, but ſoareth vp to the things aboue, where Chriſt ſits at the right hand of God; and after it hath ſeene what is done in heauen, lookes ſtrangely vpon all worldly things. He dare truſt his faith aboue his reaſon, and ſenſe: and hath learned to weane his appetite from crauing much. He ſtands in awe of his owne conſcience, and dare no more offend it, than not diſpleaſe himſelfe. He feares not his enemies, yet neglects them not; equally auoiding ſecurity, and timorouſneſſe. He ſees him that is inuiſible; and walks with him awfully, familiarly. He knowes what he is borne to, and therefore digeſts the miſeries of his wardſhip, with patience: he findes more comfort in his afflictions, than any worldling in pleaſures. And as hee hath theſe graces to comfort him within, ſo hath he the Angels to attend him without; ſpirits better than his owne; more powerfull, more glorious: Theſe beare him in their armes, wake by his bed, keepe his ſoule while he hath it, and receiue it when it leaues him. Theſe are ſome preſent differences: the greateſt are future; which could not be ſo great, if themſelues were not witneſſes; no leſſe than betwixt heauen and hell, torment and glory, an incorruptible crowne, and fire vnquenchable. Whether Infidels beleeue theſe things or no, we know them: ſo ſhall they, but too late. What remaines but that we applaud our ſelues in this happineſſe, and walke on cheerily in this heauenly profeſſion? acknowledging that God could not doe more for vs; and that we cannot doe enough for him, Let others boaſt (as your Ladiſhip might with others) of ancient and Noble Houſes, large patrimonies, or dowries, honorable commands; others of famous names, high and enuied honours, or the fauours of the greateſt; others of valour or beauty, or ſome perhaps of eminent learning and wit; it ſhall be our pride that we are Chriſtians.

To my Lady HONORIA HAY.

EP. IV. Diſcourſing of the neceſſitie of baptiſme; and the eſtate of thoſe which neceſſarily want it.

MADAM:

ME thinks children are like teeth, troubleſome both in the breeding, and loſing, and oftentimes painfull while they ſtand: yet ſuch, as we neither would, nor can well be without. I goe not about to comfort you thus late, for your loſſe: I rather congratulate

gratulate your wiſe moderation and Chriſtian care of theſe firſt ſpirituall priuileges; deſiring onely to ſatisfie you in what you heard as a witneſſe; not in what you needed as a mother. Children are the bleſſings of Parents, and Baptiſme is the bleſſing of children, and parents: wherin there is not onely vſe, but neceſſitie; neceſſitie, not in reſpect ſo much of the end, as of the precept: God hath enioyned it, to the comfort of parents, and behooſe of children: which therefore, as it may not be ſuperſtitiouſly haſtened, ſo not negligently deferred. That the contempt of baptiſme damneth, is paſt all doubt; but that the conſtrained abſence thereof, ſhould ſend infants to hell, is a cruell raſhneſſe. It is not their ſinne to die early: death is a puniſhment, not an offence; an effect of ſinne, not a cauſe of torment; they want nothing but time; which they could not command. Becauſe they could not liue a while longer, that therefore they ſhould die euerlaſtingly, is the hard ſentence of a bloody religion. I am onely ſorie, that ſo harſh an opinion ſhould bee graced with the name of a Father; ſo reuerend, ſo diuine: whoſe ſentence yet let no man plead by halues. He who held it vnpoſſible for a childe to be ſaued vnleſſe the baptiſmall water were powred on his face, held it alſo as vnpoſſible, for the ſame Infant, vnleſſe the ſacramentall bread were receiued into his mouth. There is the ſame ground for both, the ſame error in both, a weakneſſe fit for forgetfulneſſe; ſee yet how ignorant, or ill-meaning poſterity, could ſingle out one halfe of the opinion for truth, and condemne the other of falſhood. In ſpight of whom, one part ſhall eaſily conuince the other; yea, without all force: ſince both cannot ſtand, both will fall together, for company. The ſame mouth, which ſaid, Vnleſſe ye be borne againe of water, and the Holy Ghoſt, ſaid alſo, Except yee eat the fleſh of the Sonne of Man, and drinke his blood: an equall neceſſitie of both. And leſt any ſhould plead different interpretations, the ſame S. Auſtin auerres this latter opinion alſo, concerning the neceſſary communicating of children, to haue been once the common iudgement of the Church of Rome; A ſentence ſo diſpleaſing, that you ſhall finde the memory of it noted with a blacke coale, and wip't out in that infamous bill of Expurgations. Had the ancient Church held this deſperate ſequele, what ſtrange, and yet wilfull cruelty had it beene in them, to deferre baptiſme a whole yeare long: till Eaſter, or that Sunday, which hath his name (I thinke) from the white robes of the baptiſed?

Yea what an aduenture was it in ſome, to adiourne it till their age (with Conſtantine) if being vnſure of their life, they had beene ſure the preuention of death would haue inferred damnation? Looke vnto that legall Sacrament of circumciſion, which (contrary to the fancies of our Anabaptiſts) directly anſwers this Euangelicall. Before the eight day, they could not be circumciſed: before the eight day they might die. If dying the ſeuenth day, they were neceſſarily condemned: either the want of a day is a ſinne, or God ſometimes condemneth not for ſinne: Neither of them poſſible, neither according with the iuſtice of the Law-giuer. Or if from this parallel, you pleaſe to looke either to reaſon or example, the caſe is cleere. Reaſon; no man that hath faith, can be condemned, for Chriſt dwels in our hearts by faith: and hee in whom Chriſt dwels, cannot be a reprobate. Now it is poſſible a man may haue a ſauing faith, before baptiſme: Abraham firſt beleeued to iuſtification: then after receiued the ſigne of circumciſion, as a ſeale of the righteouſnes of that faith, which he had when he was vncircumciſed: Therefore ſome dying before their baptiſme, may, yea muſt be ſaued. Neither was Abrahams caſe ſingular; he was the Father of all them alſo, which beleeue, not being circumciſed: theſe, as they are his Sonnes in faith, ſo in righteouſneſſe, ſo in ſaluation: vncircumciſion cannot hinder, where faith admitteth; Theſe following his ſteps of beleefe before the Sacrament, ſhall doubtleſſe reſt in his boſome, without the Sacrament; without it, as fatally abſent, not as willingly neglected. It is not the water, but the faith: not the putting away the filth of the fleſh (ſaith S. Peter) but the ſtipulation of a good conſcience; for who takes Baptiſme without a full faith (ſaith Hierom) takes the water, takes not the ſpirit; Whence is this ſo great vertue of the water, that it ſhould touch the body, and cleanſe the heart (ſaith Auſtin) vnleſſe by the power of the word, not ſpoken but beleeued? Thou ſeeſt water (ſaith Ambroſe,) euery water heales not, that water onely heales which hath the grace of God annexed; And if there bee any grace in the water (ſaith Baſil) it is not of the nature of the water, but of the preſence of the Spirit. Baptiſme is indeed, as Saint Ambroſe ſtiles it, the pawne and image of our reſurrection; yea (as Baſil) the power of God to reſurrection: but (as Ignatius expounds this phraſe aright) beleeuing in his death, we are by baptiſme made partakers of his reſurrection. Baptiſme therefore without faith cannot ſaue a man, and by faith doth ſaue him: and faith without baptiſme (where it cannot bee had; not where it may be had, and is contemned) may ſaue him: That ſpirit which works by meanes, will not be tyed to meanes.

Examples. Caſt your eyes vpon that good theefe; good in his death, though in his life abominable: he was neuer waſhed in Iordan, yet is receiued into Paradiſe; his ſoule was foule with rapines, and iniuſtice; yea bloody with murders: and yet being ſcoured onely with the blood of his Sauiour, not with water of baptiſme, it is preſented glorious to God. I ſay nothing of the ſoules of Traian, and Falconella, meere heathens, liuing and dying without Chriſt, without baptiſme: which yet their honeſt Legend reports to be deliuered from hell, tranſported to heauen, not ſo much as ſcorched in Purgatory: The one by the prayers of Gregory, the other of Tecla. What partiality is this, to deny that to the children of Chriſtians, which they grant to knowne Infidels? The promiſe is made to vs, and our ſeed: not to thoſe that are without the pale of the Church. Thoſe innocents which were maſſacred for Chriſt, are by them canonized for Saints, and make one day in their Kalendar (each yeare) both holy, and diſmall; whereof yet ſcarce any liued to know water, none to know baptiſme. Yea, all Martyrs are here priuiledged; who are Chriſtened in their owne blood, in ſtead of water: but where hath God ſaid, All that die without baptiſme, ſhall die for euer, except martyrs; why not, except beleeuers? It is faith that giues life to Martyrs; which if they ſhould want, their firſt death could not auoid the ſecond. Ambroſe doubted not to ſay, his Valentinian was baptiſed becauſe he deſired it; not becauſe he had it: he knew the mind of God; who accounts vs to haue what we vnfainedly wiſh. Children cannot liue to deſire baptiſme: if their Parents deſire it for them, why may not the deſire of others be theirs, as well as (according to Auſtins opinion) the faith of others beleeuing, and the mouth of others confeſſing? In theſe caſes therefore, of any ſoules but our owne, it is ſafe to ſuſpend, and dangerous to paſſe iudgment. Secret things to God: He that made all ſoules, knowes what to doe with them, neither will make vs of counſell: But if wee define either way, the errors of charitie are inoffenſiue. We muſt honor good meanes, and vſe them, and in their neceſſarie want depend vpon him, who can worke, beyond, without, againſt meanes.

Thus haue I endeuoured your Ladiſhips ſatisfaction in what you heard, not without ſome ſcruple. If any man ſhall blame my choice in troubling you with a thornie and ſcholaſticall diſcourſe, let him know that I haue learned this faſhion of Saint Hierome the Oracle of Antiquitie, who was wont to entertaine his Paula and Euſtochium, Marcella, Principia, Hedibia, and other deuout Ladies, with learned canuaſes of the deepe points of Diuinitie. This is not ſo perplexed, that it need to offend: nor ſo vnneceſſary, that it may be vnknowne.

To Sir RICHARD LEA, ſince deceaſed.

EP. V. Diſcourſing of the comfortable remedies of all afflictions.

WISE men ſeeke remedies before their diſeaſe: ſenſible patients, when they begin to complaine: fooles, too late. Afflictions are the common maladies of Chriſtians:

Hall, J. 12637c

ſtians: Theſe you feele, and vpon the firſt groanes ſeeke for eaſe. Wherefore ſerues the tongue of the learned, but to ſpeake words in ſeaſon? I am a Scholler of thoſe that can comfort you: If you ſhall, with me, take out my leſſons, neither of vs ſhall repent it. You ſmart and complaine: take heed leſt too much. There is no affliction not grieuous: the bone that was diſioynted, cannot bee ſet right without paine. No potion can cure vs, if it worke not: it workes not, except it make vs ſicke: we are contented with that ſickneſſe, which is the way to health. There is a vexation without hurt: ſuch is this: We are afflicted, not ouer-preſſed; needie, not deſperate; perſecuted, not forſaken; caſt downe, but periſh not. How ſhould we, when all the euill in a Citie comes from the prouidence of a good God; which can neither be impotent, nor vnmercifull? It is the Lord: let him doe what hee will. Woe were vs if euils could come by chance; or were let looſe to alight where they liſt: now they are ouer-ruled; we are ſafe. The deſtinie of our ſorrowes is written in heauen by a wiſe and eternall decree: Behold, he that hath ordained, moderates them. A faithfull God, that giues an iſſue with the tentation: An iſſue, both of their end, and their ſucceſſe. He chides not alwayes, much leſſe ſtriketh. Our light afflictions are but for a moment: not ſo long, in reſpect of our vacancy, and reſt. If we weepe ſometimes, our teares are precious; As they ſhall neuer be dry in his bottle, ſo they ſhall ſoone be dry vpon our cheekes. He that wrings them from vs, ſhall wipe them off: how ſweetly doth hee interchange our ſorrowes, and ioyes, that we may neither be vaine, nor miſerable? It is true; To be ſtrooke, once in anger, is fearfull: his diſpleaſure is more than his blow: In both, our God is a conſuming fire. Feare not, theſe ſtripes are the tokens of his loue: he is no Sonne, that is not beaten; yea till he ſmart, and cry; if not till he bleed: no Parent corrects anothers childe; and he is no good parent that corrects not his owne. Oh rod worthy to be kiſſed, that aſſures vs of his loue, of our adoption! What ſpeake I of no hurt? ſhort praiſes doe but diſcommend; I ſay more, theſe euils are good: looke to their effects. What is good, if not patience? affliction is the mother of it; tribulation bringeth forth patience. What can earth or heauen yeeld better than the aſſurance of Gods Spirit: Afflictions argue, yea ſeale this to vs. Wherein ſtands perfect happineſſe, if not in our neere reſemblance of Chriſt? Why was man created happy, but becauſe in Gods image? The glorie of Paradice, the beauty of his body, the duty of the creatures, could not giue him felicitie, without the likeneſſe to his Creator. Behold, what we loſt in our height, wee recouer in our miſerie; a conformitie to the image of the Sonne of God: he that is not like his elder brother, ſhall neuer be coheire with him. Loe, his ſide, temples, hands, feet, all bleeding: his face blubbred, ghaſtly, and ſpitted on: his skin all pearled with a bloudy ſweat, his head drouping, his ſoule heauy to the death: ſee you the worldling merry, ſoft, delicate, perfumed, neuer wrinkled with ſorrow, neuer humbled with afflictions? What reſemblance is here, yea what contrarietie? Eaſe ſlayeth the foole; it hath made him reſty, and leaues him miſerable. Be not deceiued; no man can follow Chriſt without his Croſſe, much leſſe reach him; and if none ſhall reigne with Chriſt, but thoſe that ſuffer with him, what ſhall become of theſe iolly ones? Goe now thou daintie worldling, and pleaſe thy ſelfe in thy happineſſe, laugh alwayes, and be euer applauded; It is a wofull felicitie that thou ſhalt finde in oppoſition to thy Redeemer: Hee hath ſaid, Woe to them that laugh; Beleeueſt thou, and doſt not weepe at thy laughter? and with Salomon, condemne it of madneſſe? And againe, with the ſame breath, Bleſſed are yee that weepe: who can beleeue this, and not reioyce in his owne teares, and not pitie the faint ſmiles of the godleſſe? Why bleſſed? For ye ſhall laugh: Behold, wee that weepe on earth, ſhall laugh in heauen: wee that now weepe with men, ſhall laugh with Angels; while the fleering worldling ſhall be gnaſhing, and howling with Deuils: wee that weepe for a time, ſhall laugh for euer: who would not be content to deferre his ioy a little, that it may be perpetuall, and infinite? What mad man would purchaſe this crackling of thornes (ſuch is the worldlings ioy) with eternall ſhrieking and torment? Hee that is the doore and the way, hath taught vs, that through many afflictions wee muſt enter into heauen. There is but one paſſage, and that a ſtrait one: If with much preſſure wee can get through, and leaue but our ſuperfluous ragges as torne from vs in the crowd, we are happy. He that made heauen, hath on purpoſe thus framed it; wide when wee are entred, and glorious: narrow and hard in the entrance: that after our paine, our glory might be ſweeter. And if before-hand you can climbe vp thither in your thoughts; looke about you, you ſhall ſee no more Palmes, than croſſes: you ſhall ſee none crowned, but thoſe that haue wreſtled with croſſes and ſorrowes, to ſweat, yea to blood; and haue ouercome. All runnes here to the ouer-commer: and ouercomming implyes both fighting and ſucceſſe. Gird vp your loynes therefore, and ſtrengthen your weake knees: reſolue to fight for heauen, to ſuffer fighting, to perſiſt in ſuffering; ſo perſiſting you ſhall ouercome, and ouercomming, you ſhall be crowned. Oh reward truly great, aboue deſert, yea aboue conceit! A crowne for a few groanes. An eternal crowne of life and glory, for a ſhort and momentany ſuffering: How iuſt is Saint Pauls account, that the afflictions of this preſent life are not worthy of the glory which ſhall be ſhewed vnto vs? O Lord let me ſmart that I may reigne; vphold thou me in ſmarting, that thou mayeſt hold me worthy of reigning. It is no matter how vile I be, ſo I may be glorious. What ſay you? would you not be afflicted.? Whether had you rather mourne for a while, or for euer? One muſt be choſen: the election is eaſie: Whether had you rather reioyce for one fit, or alwayes? You would doe both. Pardon me, it is a fond couetouſneſſe, and idle ſingularitie to affect it. What? that you alone may fare better than all Gods Saints? That God ſhould ſtrew Carpets for your nice feet onely, to walke into your heauen, and make that way ſmooth for you, which all Patriarkes, Prophets, Euangeliſts, Confeſſors, Chriſt himſelfe, haue found rugged and bloodie? Away with this ſelfe-loue; and come downe you ambitious ſonnes of Zebedee: and ere you thinke of ſitting neere the Throne, be content to be called vnto the Cup. Now is your triall: Let your Sauiour ſee how much of his bitter potion you can pledge; then ſhall you ſee how much of his glory he can afford you. Be content to drinke of his vineger and gall, and you ſhall drinke new wine with him in his kingdome.

To Mr. Peter Movlin, Preacher of the Church at Paris.

Ep. VI. Diſcourſing of the late French occurrents, and what vſe God expects to bee made of them.

Since your trauels here with vs, we haue not forgotten you; but ſince that, your wittie and learned trauels in the common affaires of Religion, haue made your memorie both freſh, and bleſſed. Behold, whiles your hand was happily buſie in the defence of our King, the heads and hands of traitors were buſie in the maſſacring of your owne. God doth no memorable and publike act, which hee would not haue talked of, read, conſtrued of all the world. How much more of neighbors, whom ſcarce a ſea ſeuereth from each other? how much yet more of brethren, whom neither land, nor ſea, can ſeuer? Your dangers, and feares, and griefes haue beene ours: All the ſalt water that runnes betwixt vs, cannot waſh off our intereſt in all your common cauſes: The deadly blow of that miſcreant (whoſe name is iuſtly ſentenced to forgetfulneſſe) pierced euen our ſides. Who hath not bled within himſelfe, to thinke that he, which had ſo victoriouſly out-liued the ſwords of enemies, ſhould fall by the knife of a villaine? and that hee ſhould die in the peaceable ſtreets, whom no fields could kill? that all thoſe honorable and happy triumphs ſhould end in ſo baſe a violence? But oh our idleneſſe and impietie, if we ſee not a diuine hand from aboue, ſtriking with this hand of diſloyaltie. Sparrowes fall not to the ground without him, much leſſe Kings. One dies by a tyle-ſheard, another by the ſplinters of a Launce, one by lice, another by a Fly, one by poyſon, another by a knife; What are all theſe but the executioners of that great God, which hath ſaid, Yee are Gods, but yee ſhall die like men? Perhaps God ſaw (that we may gueſſe modeſtly at the reaſons of his acts) you repoſed too much, in this arme of fleſh; or perhaps he ſaw this ſcourge would haue beene too early, to thoſe enemies, whoſe ſinne, though great, yet was not full: or perhaps hee ſaw, that if that great ſpirit had beene deliberately yeelded in his bed, you ſhould not haue ſlept in yours: Or perhaps the ancient conniuence at thoſe ſtreames of blood, from your too common Duels, was now called to reckoning; or, it may be, that weak reuolt from the truth. He whoſe the rod was, knowes why he ſtrooke: yet may it not paſſe without a note, that he fell by that religion, to which he fell. How many Ages might that great Monarch haue liued (whatſoeuer the ripe head of your more than mellow Cotton could imagine) ere his leaſt finger ſhould haue bled, by the hand of an Huguenot? All religions may haue ſome monſters: but bleſſed bee the God of heauen, ours ſhall neuer yeeld that good Ieſuite, either a Mariana to teach treaſon, or a Rauillac to act it. But what is that we heare? it is no maruell: that holy ſocietie is a fit Gardian for the hearts of Kings: I dare ſay, none more loues to ſee them: none takes more care to purchaſe them. How happy were that Chappell (thinke they) if it were full of ſuch ſhrines? I hope all Chriſtian Princes haue long, and well learned (ſo great is the courteſie of theſe good Fathers) that they ſhall neuer (by their wils) need bee troubled with the charge of their owne hearts. An heart of a King in a Ieſuites hand, is as proper, as a wafer in a Prieſts. Iuſtly was it written of old, vnder the picture of Ignatius Loyola, Cauete vobis Principes; Be wiſe O ye Princes, and learne to be the keepers of your owne hearts. Yea rather, O thou keeper of Iſrael, that neither ſlumbreſt nor ſleepeſt, keepe thou the hearts of all Chriſtian Kings, whether aliue or dead, from the keeping of this traiterous generation; whoſe very religion is holy rebellion, and whoſe merits bloody. Doubtleſſe, that murderer hoped to haue ſtabbed thouſands with that blow, and to haue let out the life of religion, at the ſide of her collapſed Patron: God did at once laugh and frowne at his proiect; and ſuffered him to liue to ſee himſelfe no leſſe a foole than a villaine. O the infinite goodneſſe of the wiſe and holy gouernour of the world! Who could haue looked for ſuch a calme in the middeſt of a tempeſt? who would haue thought that violence could beget peace? Who durſt haue conceiued that King Henry ſhould die alone? and that Religion ſhould loſe nothing but his perſon? This is the Lords doing, and it is maruellous in our eyes. You haue now parallel'd vs: Out of both our feares God hath fetched ſecuritie: Oh that out of our ſecuritie, wee could as eaſily fetch feare: not ſo much of euill, as of the Author of good; and yet truſt him in our feare; and in both magnifie him. Yea, you haue by this act gained ſome conuerts, againſt the hope of the agents: neither can I without many ioyfull congratulations, thinke of the eſtate of your Church; which euery day honours with the acceſſe of new clients; whoſe teares and ſad confeſſions make the Angels to reioyce in heauen, and the Saints on earth. We ſhould giue you example, if our peace were as plentifull of goodneſſe as of pleaſure. But how ſeldome hath the Church gained by eaſe? or loſt by reſtraint? Bleſſe you God for our proſperitie; and we ſhall praiſe him for your progreſſe.

TO M. THOMAS SVTTON.

Ep. VII. Exciting him, and (in him) all others to early and cheerefull beneficence: ſhewing the neceſsity and benefit of good workes.

SIR, I trouble you not with reaſons of my writing, or with excuſes: If I doe ill, no plea can warrant me; If well, I cannot be diſcouraged with any cenſures. I craue not your pardon, but your acceptation. It is no preſumption to giue good counſell; and preſents of loue feare not to be ill taken of ſtrangers. My pen and your ſubſtance are both giuen vs for one end, to doe good: Theſe are our talents; how happy are we, if we can improue them well! ſuffer me to doe you good with the one, that with the other you may doe good to many, and moſt to your ſelfe. You cannot but know, that your full hand and worthy purpoſes, haue poſſeſſed the world with much expectation: what ſpeake I of the world? whoſe honeſt and reaſonable claimes yet, cannot be contemned with honour, nor diſappointed with diſhonour. The God of heauen, which hath lent you this abundance, and giuen you theſe gracious thoughts of charitie, of pietie, lookes long for the iſſue of both; and will eaſily complaine either of too little, or too late. Your wealth and your will are both good: but the firſt is onely made good by the ſecond. For if your hand were full, and your heart empty, we who now applaud you, ſhould iuſtly pity you; you might haue riches, not goods, not bleſſings: your burthen ſhould be greater than your eſtate; and you ſhould be richer in ſorrowes, than in metalls. For (if we looke to no other world) what gaine is it to be the keeper of the beſt earth? That which is the common cofer of all the rich mynes, we doe but tread vpon; and account it vile, becauſe it doth but hold, and hide thoſe treaſures: Whereas the skilfull metalliſt, that findeth, and refineth thoſe precious veines, for publike vſe, is rewarded, is honoured. The very baſeſt Element yeelds gold; the ſauage Indian gets it, the ſeruile prentiſe workes it, the very Midianitiſh Camell may weare it, the miſerable worldling admires it, the couetous Iew ſwallowes it, the vnthrifty Ruffian ſpends it: what are all theſe the better for it? Onely good vſe giues praiſe to earthly poſſeſſions. Herein therefore you owe more to God, that he hath giuen you an heart to doe good: a will to be as rich in good workes, as great in riches. To bee a friend to this Mammon, is to be an enemie to God: but to make friends with it, is royall, and Chriſtian. His enemies may be wealthy: none but his friends, can either be good, or doe good. Da & accipe, ſaith the Wiſe-man. The Chriſtian, which muſt imitate the high patterne of his Creator, knowes his beſt riches to be bounty; God that hath all, giues all; reſerues nothing. And for himſelfe; he well conſiders, that God hath not made him an owner, but a ſeruant: and of ſeruants, a ſeruant not of his goods, but of the Giuer; not a Treaſurer, but a Steward: whoſe praiſe is more To lay out well, than to haue receiued much. The greateſt gaine therefore that he affects, is an euen reckoning, a cleare diſcharge: which ſince it is obtained by diſpoſing, not by keeping, he counts reſeruation loſſe, & iuſt expence his trade, and ioy; he knowes, that Well done faithfull ſeruant is a thouſand times more ſweet a note, than Soule take thine eaſe; for that is the voice of the maſter recompencing, this of the carnall heart preſuming: and what followes to the one, but his maſters ioy? what to the other, but the loſſe of his ſoule? Bleſſed be that God which hath giuen you an heart to fore-thinke this; and in this dry and dead Age, a will to honour him with his owne; and to credit his Goſpell, with your beneficence: Loe, we are vpbraided with barrenneſſe; your name hath beene publikely oppoſed to theſe challenges ; as in whom it ſhall be ſeene, that the truth hath friends that can giue. I neither diſtruſt, nor perſwade you ; whoſe reſolutions are happily fixed on purpoſes of good: onely giue me leaue to haſten your paſe a little, and to excite your Chriſtian forwardneſſe, to begin ſpeedily, what you haue long and conſtantly vowed. You would not but doe good ; why not now ? I ſpeake boldly, The more ſpeed, the more comfort : Neither the times are in our diſpoſing, nor our ſelues : if God had ſet vs a day, and made our wealth vnſeparable, there were no danger in delaying ; now our vncertainty either muſt quicken vs, or may deceiue vs. How many haue meant well, and done nothing, and loſt their crowne with lingring ? whoſe deſtinies haue preuented their deſires, and haue made their good motions the wards of their executors, not without miſerable ſucceſſe: to whom, that they would haue done good, is not ſo great a praiſe, as it is diſhonour that they might haue done it : their wracks are our warnings, we are equally mortall, equally fickle. Why haue you this reſpite of liuing, but to preuent the imperious neceſſity of death ? it is a wofull and remedileſſe complaint, that the end of our dayes hath ouer-run the beginning of our good workes. Early beneficence hath no danger, many ioyes : for the conſcience of good done, the prayers and bleſſings of the releeued, the gratulations of the Saints, are as ſo many perpetuall comforters, which can make our life pleaſant, and our death happy, our euill dayes good, and our good better. All theſe are loſt with delay : few and cold are the prayers for him that may giue : and in lieu, our good purpoſes fore-ſlowed are become our tormentors vpon our death-bed. Little difference is betwixt good deferred, and euill done : Good was meant ; who hindred it, will our conſcience ſay ? there was time enough, meanes enough, need enough, what hindred ? Did feare of enuy, diſtruſt of want ? Alas, what bugs are theſe to fright men from heauen ? As if the enuy of keeping, were leſſe than of beſtowing : As if God were not as good a debtor, as a giuer: he that giues to the poore, lends to God, ſaith wiſe Salomon. If he freely giue vs what we may lend, and grace to giue; will he not much more pay vs what we haue lent ; and giue vs becauſe we haue giuen ? That is his bounty, this his iuſtice. O happy is that man that may be a creditor to his Maker : Heauen and earth ſhall be empty before he ſhall want a royall payment. If wee dare not truſt God whiles we liue, how dare we truſt men when we are dead ? men that are ſtill deceitfull, and light vpon the balance, light of truth, heauy of ſelfe-loue. How many Executors haue proued the executioners of honeſt Wils ? how many haue our eies ſeene, that after moſt carefull choice of truſty guardians, haue had their children and goods ſo diſpoſed, as if the Parents ſoule could returne to ſee it, I doubt whether it could bee happy. How rare is that man that prefers not himſelfe to his dead friend ? profit to truth ? that will take no vantage of the impoſſibilitie of account ? What-euer therefore men either ſhew, or promiſe, happy is that man that may be his owne auditor, ſuperuiſor, executor. As you loue God and your ſelfe, be not afraid of being happy too ſoone. I am not worthy to giue ſo bold aduice ; let the wiſe man of Syrach ſpeake for me : Doe good before thou die, and according to thine ability ſtretch out thine hands, and giue : Defraud not thy ſelfe of thy good day ; and let not the portion of thy good deſires ouer-paſſe thee : Shalt thou not leaue thy trauels to another, and thy labours to them that will diuide thine heritage ? Or let a wiſer than he, Salomon : Say not, to morrow I will giue, if now thou haue it : for thou knoweſt not what a day will bring forth. It hath beene an old rule of liberality, He giues twice that giues quickly ; whereas ſlow benefits argue vncheerfulneſſe, and loſe their worth. Who lingers his receits, is condemned as vnthriftie : he that knoweth both, ſaith, It is better to giue than to receiue. If we be of the ſame ſpirit, why are wee haſty in the worſe, and ſlacke in the better ? Suffer you your ſelfe therefore, good Sir, for Gods ſake, for the Goſpels ſake, for the Churches ſake, for your ſoules ſake, to be ſtirred vp by theſe poore lines, to a reſolute and ſpeedy performing of your worthy intentions : and take this as a louing inuitation ſent from heauen, by an vnworthy meſſenger. You cannot deliberate long of fit obiects for your beneficence, except it be more for multitude, than want : the ſtreets, yea the world is full ; How doth Lazarus lie at euery doore ? how many ſonnes of the Prophets in their meanly-prouided Colledges may ſay, not, Mors in olla, but fames? how many Churches may iuſtly plead that which our Sauiour bade his Diſciples, The Lord hath need? And if this infinite ſtore hath made your choice doubtfull, how eaſie were it to ſhew you, wherein you might oblige the whole Church of God to you, and make your memoriall both eternall and bleſſed; or, if you had rather, the whole Common-wealth? But now I finde my ſelfe too bold and too buſie, in thus looking to particularities: God ſhall direct you; and if you follow him, ſhall crowne you: howſoeuer, if good be done, and that betimes; hee hath what hee deſired, and your ſoule ſhall haue more than you can deſire. The ſucceſſe of my weake, yet hearty counſell, ſhall make me as rich, as God hath made you with all your abundance. That God bleſſe it to you, and make both our reckonings cheerfull in the day of our common Audit.

To E. B. Dedicated to Sir George Goring.

EPIST. VIII. Remedies againſt dulneſſe and heartleſneſſe in our callings, and incouragements to cheerfulneſſe in labour.

IT falls out not ſeldome (if wee may meaſure all by one) that the minde ouer-layed with worke, growes dull and heauy: and now doth nothing, becauſe it hath done too much; ouer-lauiſh expence of ſpirits hath left it heartleſſe: as the beſt veſſell with much motion and vent, becomes flat, and dreggiſh. And not fewer (of more weake temper) diſcourage themſelues with the difficultie of what they muſt doe: ſome Trauellers haue more ſhrunke at the Map, than at the way. Betwixt both, how many ſit ſtill with their hands folded, and wiſh they knew how to be rid of time? If this euill be not cured, wee become miſerable loſers, both of good houres, and of good parts. In theſe mentall diſeaſes, Empiricks are the beſt Phyſitians. I preſcribe you nothing but out of feeling: If you will auoid the firſt, moderate your owne vehemencie; ſuffer not your ſelfe to doe all you could doe: Riſe euer from your deske, not without an appetite. The beſt horſe will tire ſooneſt, if the reines lie euer looſe in his necke: Reſtraints in theſe caſes are encouragements: obtaine therefore of your ſelfe to deferre, and take new dayes. How much better is it to refreſh your ſelfe with many competent meales, than to buy one dayes gluttonie, with the faſt of many? And if it be hard to call off the minde, in the midſt of a faire and likely flight; know that all our eaſe and ſafety begins at the command of our ſelues; he can neuer taske himſelfe well, that cannot fauour himſelfe. Perſwade your heart, that perfection comes by leiſure; and no excellent thing is done at once: the riſing and ſetting of many Sunnes (which you thinke ſlackens your worke) in truth ripens it. That gourd which came vp in a night, withered in a day; whereas thoſe plants which abide age, riſe ſlowly. Indeed, where the heart is vnwilling, prorogation hinders: what I liſt not to doe this day, I loathe the next; but where is no want of deſire, delay doth but ſharpen the ſtomack. That which we doe vnwillingly leaue, we long to vndertake: and the more our affection is, the greater our intention, and the better our performance. To take occaſion by the foretop, is no ſmall point of wiſdome; but to make time (which is wilde and fugitiue) tame and pliable to our purpoſes, is the greateſt improuement of a man: All times ſerue him, which hath the rule of himſelfe.

If the ſecond, thinke ſeriouſly of the condition of your being: It is that wee were made for; the Bird to flie, and Man to labour. What doe we here, if we repine at our worke? We had not beene, but that we might be ſtill buſie; if not in this taske we diſlike, yet in ſome other of no leſſe toyle: there is no act that hath not his labour, which varies in meaſure, according to the will of the doer. This which you complaine of, hath beene vndertaken by others, not with facilitie onely, but with pleaſure; and what you chuſe for eaſe, hath beene abhorred of others, as tedious. All difficultie is not ſo much in the worke, as in the Agent. To ſet the minde on the racke of a long meditation (you ſay) is a torment: to follow the ſwift foot of your hound all day long, hath no wearineſſe: what would you ſay of him that finds better game in his ſtudy, than you in the field, and would account your diſport his puniſhment? Such there are, though you doubt and wonder. Neuer thinke to detract from your buſineſſe, but adde to your will. It is the policie of our great enemy, to driue vs with theſe feares, from that he foreſees would grow profitable: like as ſome inhoſpitall Sauages make fearfull deluſions by ſorcerie vpon the ſhore, to fright ſtrangers from landing. Where you finde therefore motions of reſiſtance, awaken your courage the more, and know there is ſome good that appeares not; vaine endeuours finde no oppoſition. All croſſes imply a ſecret commoditie: reſolue then to will, becauſe you begin not to will: and either oppoſe your ſelfe, as Satan oppoſes you, or elſe you doe nothing. We pay no price to God for any good thing, but labour; if we higgle in that, we are worthy to loſe our bargaine. It is an inualuable gaine, that we may make in this traffique: for God is bountifull, as well as iuſt; and when he ſees true endeuour, doth not onely ſell, but giue: whereas idleneſſe neither gets nor ſaues; nothing is either more fruitleſſe of good, or more fruitfull of euill; for we doe ill whiles we doe nothing, and loſe whiles we gaine not. The ſluggard is ſenſleſſe; and ſo much more deſperate, becauſe he cannot complaine: but (though he feele it not) nothing is more precious than time, or that ſhall abide a reckning more ſtrict and fearfull: yea this is the meaſure of all our actions, which if it were not abuſed, our accounts could not be but euen with God: ſo God eſteemes it (what euer our price be) that he plagues the loſſe of a ſhort time, with a reuenge beyond all times. Houres haue wings, and euery moment flie vp to the Author of time, and carrie newes of our vſage: All our praiers cannot intreat one of them either to returne, or ſlacken his pace: the miſſpence of euery minute is a new record againſt vs in heauen. Sure, if we thought thus, we would diſmiſſe them with better reports, and not ſuffer them either to goe away empty, or laden with dangerous intelligence: how happy is it that euery houre ſhould conuey vp, not onely the meſſage, but the fruits of good, and ſtay with the Ancient of dayes, to ſpeake for vs before his glorious Throne? Know this, and I ſhall take no care for your paines, nor you for paſtime. None of our profitable labours ſhall be tranſient; but euen when wee haue forgotten them, ſhall welcome vs into ioy: wee thinke wee haue left them behinde vs; but they are forwarder than our ſoules, and expect vs where we would be. And if there were no crowne for theſe toiles, yet without future reſpects there is a tediousneſſe in doing nothing. To man eſpecially, motion is naturall: there is neither minde, nor eye, nor ioynt which moueth not: and as company makes a way ſhort, houres neuer goe away ſo merrily, as in the fellowſhip of worke. How did that induſtrious Heathen draw out water by night, and knowledge by day, and thought both ſhort; euer labouring, onely that he might labour? Certainly, if idleneſſe were enacted by authoritie, there would not want ſome, which would pay their mulct, that they might worke: and thoſe ſpirits are likeſt to heauen, which moues alwayes, and the freeſt from thoſe corruptions which are incident to nature. The running ſtreame cleanſeth it ſelfe, whereas ſtanding ponds breed weeds and mud. Theſe meditations muſt hearten vs to that we muſt doe: whiles we are cheerfull, our labours ſhall ſtriue whether to yeeld vs more comfort, or others more profit.

To Sir Iohn Harrington.

Epist. IX. Diſcuſſing this Queſtion:

Whether a man and wife after ſome yeares mutuall and louing fruition of each other, may vpon conſent, whether for ſecular, or religious cauſes, vow and performe a perpetuall ſeparation from each others bed, and abſolutely renounce all carnall knowledge of each other for euer.

I Wiſh not my ſelfe any other aduocate, nor you any other aduerſary, then S. Paul, who neuer gaue (I ſpeake boldly) a direct precept, if not in this: his expreſſe charge whereupon I inſiſted, is, Defraud not one another, except with conſent for a time, that you may giue your ſelues to faſting and prayer; and then againe come together, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency. Euery word (if you weigh it well) oppoſes your part, and pleads for mine. By conſent of all Diuines, ancient and moderne [defrauding] is refraining from matrimoniall conuerſation: ſee what a word the Spirit of God hath choſen for this abſtinence; neuer but taken in ill part. But there is no fraud in conſent, as Chryſoſtome, Athanaſius, Theophylaſt, expound it: true; therefore S. Paul addes (vnleſſe with conſent) that I may omit to ſay, that in ſaying (vnleſſe with conſent) he implies, both that there may be a defrauding without it, and with conſent a defrauding, but not vnlawfnll: but ſee what he addes, (for a time) conſent cannot make this defrauding lawfull, except it be temporary: No defrauding without conſent, no conſent for a perpetuity. How long then, and wherefore? Not for euery cauſe, not for any length of time, but onely for a while, and for deuotion (vt vacetis, &c.) Not that you may pray onely (as Chryſoſtome notes iuſtly) but that you might (giue your ſelues to prayer.) In our mariage ſociety (ſaith he, againſt that paradox of Hierome) we may pray, and woe to vs if we doe not; but we cannot (vacare orationi.) But wee are bidden to pray continually: Yet not I hope, euer to faſt and pray. Marke how the Apoſtle addes (that you may giue your ſelues to faſting and prayer.) It is ſolemne exerciſe, which the Apoſtle here intends, ſuch as is ioyned with faſting and externall humiliation; wherein all earthly comforts muſt be forborne. But what if a man liſt to taske himſelfe continually, and will be alwaies painfully deuote? may he then euer abſtaine? No: Let them meet together againe, ſaith the Apoſtle; not as a toleration, but as a charge. But what if they both can liue ſafely thus ſeuered? This is more than they can vndertake: there is danger, ſaith our Apoſtle, in this abſtinence (leſt Satan tempt you for your incontinency) what can be more plaine? Neither may the maried refraine this conuerſation without conſent: neither may they without conſent refraine it for euer. What can you now vrge vs with, but the examples, and ſentences of ſome Ancients? Let this ſtand euicted for the true and neceſſary ſenſe of the Apoſtle; and what is this, but to lay men in the balance with God? I ſee and confeſſe how much ſome of the Fathers admired Virginitie; ſo farre, that there wanted not ſome, which both deteſted mariage as vicious, and would force a ſingle life vpon mariage, as commendable: whoſe authority ſhould moue me, if I ſaw not ſome of them oppoſite to others, and others no leſſe to S. Paul himſelfe. How oft doth S. Auſtin redouble that rule, and importunately vrge it to his Ecdicia, in that ſerious Epiſtle, that without conſent the continence of the maried, cannot be warrantable; teaching her (from theſe words of S. Paul, which hee charges her, in the contrary practice not to haue read, heard, or marked) that if her husband ſhould containe, and ſhe would not, he were bound to pay her the debt of mariage beneuolence; and that God would impute it to him for continence notwithſtanding.

Hom. in 1 Cor. 7. ſtanding. Hence is that of Chryſoſtome, that the wife is both the ſeruant and the miſtris of her husband; a ſeruant to yeeld her body, a miſtris to haue power of his: who alſo in the ſame place determines it forbidden fraud, for the husband, or wife, to containe alone: according to that of the Paraphraſt; Let either both containe, or neither. Hierome contrarily, defines thus: But if one of the two (ſaith he) conſidering the reward of chaſtity, will containe, he ought not to aſſent to the other which containes not, &c. becauſe luſt ought rather to come to continency, than continency decline to luſt: concluding that a brother, or a ſiſter is not ſubiect in ſuch a caſe; and that God hath not called vs to vncleanneſſe, but to holineſſe. A ſtrange gloſſe to fall from the pen of a Father: which yet I durſt not ſay, if it were more boldneſſe for me to diſſent from him, than for him to diſſent from all others. He that cenſures S. Paul to argue groſly to his Galatians, may as well tax him of an vnfit direction to his Corinthians: It ſhall be no preſumption to ſay, that in this point all his writings bewray more zeale than truth: whether the conſcience of his former ſlip cauſed him to abhorre that ſex; or his admiration of Virginity tranſported him to a contempt of mariage. Antiquity will afford you many examples of holy men voluntarily ſequeſtred from their wiues: Precepts muſt be our guides, and not patternes. You may tell me of Sozomens Ammon, that famous Monke, who hauing perſwaded his bride the firſt day to continuance of Virginity, liued with her 18 yeares in a ſeuerall bed, and in a ſeuerall habitation, vpon the mountaine Nitria, 22 yeares: you may tell me of Ieromes Malchus, Auſtins Edicia, and ten thouſand others: I care not for their number, and ſuſpect their example: Doe but reconcile their practice with S. Pauls rule, I ſhall both magnifie and imitate them. I profeſſe before God and men, nothing ſhould hinder me but this law of the Apoſtle: whereto conſider, I beſeech you, what can be more oppoſite than this opinion, than this courſe of life.

The Apoſtle ſayes, Refraine not but with conſent for a time: your words, and their practice ſaith, Refraine with conſent for euer: he ſaith (meet together againe) you ſay, neuer more: he ſaith (meet leſt you be tempted) you ſay, meet not though you be tempted. I willingly grant with Athanaſius, that for ſome ſet time, eſpecially (as Anſelme interprets it) for ſome holy time, we may, and (in this latter caſe) we muſt forbeare all matrimoniall acts, end thoughts; not for that they are ſinfull, but vnſeaſonable. As mariage muſt be alwaies vſed chaſtly, and moderately: ſo ſometimes it muſt be forgotten. How many are drunke with their owne vines, and ſurfet of their owne fruits: either immodeſty, or immoderation in man or wife, is adulterous. If yet I ſhall further yeeld, that they may conditionally agree, to refraine from each other, ſo long till they be perplexed with temptations on either part: I ſhall goe as farre as the reach of my warrant, at leaſt; perhaps beyond it: ſince the Apoſtle chargeth, Meet againe leſt you be tempted; not, meet when you are tempted: But to ſay abſolutely, and for euer renounce (by conſent) the conuerſation of each other, what temptation ſo euer aſſault you, is directly, not beyond, but againſt Pauls diuinity, no leſſe than my aſſertion is againſt yours. The ground of all theſe errors in this head of Matrimonie, is an vnworthy conceit of ſome vnchriſtian filthineſſe in the mariage-bed: Euery man will not vtter, but too many hold that concluſion of Hierome: It is good for a man not to touch a woman, therefore to touch her, is euill; whom I doubt not, but S. Auſtin meant to oppoſe, while he writes, Bonum inquam ſunt nuptiæ, & contra omnes calum-
De bono coniug. cap. 16. nias poſſunt ſana ratione defendi: Mariage (I ſay) is a good thing, and may by ſound proofe be defended, againſt all ſlanders: well may man ſay, that it is good, which God ſaith is honourable; and both good and honourable muſt that needs be, which was inſtituted by the honourable author of goodneſſe, in the ſtate of mans perfect goodneſſe: Let vs take heed of caſting ſhame vpon the ordinance of our Maker. But there was no carnall knowledge in Paradiſe. But againe, in Paradiſe God ſaid, Increaſe and multiply: there ſhould haue beene, if there were not. Thoſe that were naked without ſhame ſhould haue beene conioyned without ſhame, becauſe without ſin. Meats and drinks, De bono coniug. cap. 9. & c. 16. and acts of mariage (ſaith Auſtin) for theſe he compares both in lawfulneſſe, and ne-ceſſity) are, as they are vſed, either lawfull, veniall, or damnable. Meats are for the preſeruation of man : mariage acts for the preſeruation of mankinde : neither of them without ſome carnall delight : which yet, if by the bridle of temperance it be held to the proper and naturall vſe, cannot be tearmed luſt. There is no ordinance of God which either is of more excellent vſe, or hath ſuffered more abuſe in all times : the fault is in men, not in mariage : let them rectifie themſelues, their bed ſhall be bleſſed. Here need no ſeparation from each other, but rather a ſeparation of brutiſhneſſe, and cloſe corruption from the ſoule; which whoſoeuer hath learned to remoue, ſhall finde the crowne of matrimoniall chaſtity, no leſſe glorious than that of ſingle continence.

To M. WILLIAM KNIGHT.

Ep. X. Incouraging him to perſiſt in the holy calling of the miniſtery ; which vpon conceit of his inſufficiencie, and want of affection, he ſeemed inclining to forſake and change.

I Am not more glad to heare from you, than ſorry to heare of your diſcontentment : whereof, as the cauſe is from your ſelfe, ſo muſt the remedy. We Schollers are the apteſt of all others to make our ſelues miſerable : you might be your owne beſt counſellor, were you but indifferent to your ſelfe. If I could but cure your preiudice, your thoughts would heale you : and indeed the ſame hand that wounded you, were fitteſt for this ſeruice. I need not tell you, that your calling is honourable : if you did not thinke ſo, you had not complained. It is your vnworthineſſe that troubles you. Let mee boldly tell you, I know you in this caſe better than yourſelfe : you are neuer the more vnſufficient, becauſe you thinke ſo : if we will be rigorous, Pauls queſtion (τίς ἱκανὸς) will appoſe vs all : but according to the gracious indulgence of him that calls things which are not as if they were, we are that we are, yea, that we ought; and muſt be thankfull for our any thing. There are none more fearefull than the able, none more bold than the vnworthy. How many haue you ſeene and heard, of weaker graces (your owne heart ſhall be the Iudge) which haue ſate without paleneſſe, or trembling, in that holy chaire, and ſpoken as if the words had beene their owne ; ſatisfying themſelues, if not the hearers? And doe you (whoſe gifts many haue enuied) ſtand quaking vpon the loweſt ſtaire ? Hath God giuen you that vnuſuall varietie of tongues, ſtill of Arts, a ſtile worth emulation, and (which is worth all) a faithfull and honeſt heart ; and doe you now ſhrinke backe, and ſay, Send him by whom thou ſhouldeſt ſend? Giue God but what you haue ; he expects no more : This is enough to honour him, and crowne you. Take heed while you complaine of want, leſt pride ſhroud it ſelfe vnder the skirts of modeſty : How many are thankfull for leſſe ? You haue more than the moſt ; yet this contents you not ; it is nothing vnleſſe you may equall the beſt, if not exceed ; yea, I feare how this may ſatisfie you, vnleſſe you may thinke your ſelfe ſuch as you would be. What is this but to grudge at the beſtower of graces ? I tell you without flattery, God hath great gaines by fewer talents : ſet your heart to employ theſe, and your aduantage ſhall be more than your maſters. Neither doe now repent you of the vnaduiſedneſſe of your entrance; God called you to it vpon an eternall deliberation, and meant to make vſe of your ſuddenneſſe, as a meanes to fetch you into his worke, whom more leiſure would haue found refractarie : Full little did the one Saul thinke of a kingdome, when he went to ſeeke his fathers ſtrayes in the land of Shaliſhah ; or the other Saul of an Apoſtleſhip, when he went with his Commiſſion to Damaſcus : God thought of both ; and effected what they meant not. Thus hath hee done to you : acknowledge this hand, and follow it. He found and gaue both faculty and opportunitie to enter: finde you but a will to proceed, I dare promiſe you abundance of comfort. How many of the Ancients, after a forceable ordination, became not profitable onely, but famous in the Church? But, as if you ſought ſhifts to diſcourage your ſelfe, when you ſee you cannot maintaine this hold of inſufficiencie, you flie to alienation of affection; in the truth whereof, none can controll you but your owne heart; in the iuſtice of it, we both may, and muſt. This plea is not for Chriſtians; we muſt affect what we ought, in ſpight of our ſelues: wherefore ſerues religion, if not to make vs Lords of our owne affections? If we muſt be ruled by our ſlaues, what good ſhould we doe? Can you more diſlike your ſtation, then we all naturally diſtaſte goodneſſe? Shall we neglect the purſuit of vertue, becauſe it pleaſes not; or rather diſpleaſe, and neglect our ſelues, till it may pleaſe vs? Let me not aske whether your affections be eſtranged, but wherefore? Diuinity is a miſtreſſe worthy your ſeruice: All other Arts are but drudges to her alone: Fooles may contemne her; who cannot iudge of true intellectuall beauty: but if they had our eyes, they could not but be rauiſhed with admiration. You haue learned (I hope) to contemne their contempt, and to pity iniurious ignorance. Shee hath choſen you as a worthy clyent, yea a fauorite; and hath honoured you with her commands, and her acceptations; who but you would plead ſtrangeneſſe of affection? How many thouſands ſue to her, and cannot be lookt vpon? You are happy in her fauours, and yet complaine; yea ſo farre, as that you haue not ſtucke to thinke of a change. No word could haue fallen from you more vnwelcome. This is Satans policie, to make vs out of loue with our callings, that our labours may be vnprofitable, and our ſtandings tedious. He knowes that all changes are fruitleſſe, and that while we affect to be other, wee muſt needs be weary of what we are: That there is no ſucceſſe in any endeuour without pleaſure; that there can be no pleaſure, where the minde longs after alterations. If you eſpie not this craft of the common enemie, you are not acquainted with your ſelfe. Vnder what forme ſoeuer it come, repell it; and abhorre the firſt motion of it, as you loue your peace, as you hope for your reward. It is the miſery of the moſt men, that they cannot ſee when they are happy; and whiles they ſee but the out-ſide of others conditions, preferre that which their experience teaches them afterwards to condemne, not without loſſe and teares. Far be this vnſtableneſſe from you, which haue beene ſo long taught of God. All vocations haue their inconueniencies; which if they cannot be auoided, muſt be digeſted. The more difficulties, the greater glory: Stand faſt therefore, and reſolue that this calling is the beſt, both in it ſelfe, and for you: and know that it cannot ſtand with your Chriſtian courage to runne away from theſe incident euils, but to encounter them. Your hand is at the plough: if you meet with ſome tough clods, that will not eaſily yeeld to the ſhare, lay on more ſtrength rather; ſeeke not remedie in your feet by flight, but in your hands by a conſtant endeuonr. Away with this weake timorouſneſſe, and wrongfull humilitie. Be cheerefull and couragious in this great worke of God; the end ſhall be glorious, your ſelfe happy, and many in you.

THE SIXT DECAD.

To my Lord DENNY.

EPIST. I. A particular account how our dayes are, or ſhould bee ſpent, both common and holy.

Every day is a little life; and our whole life is but a day repeated: whence it is that old Iacob numbers his life by daies, and Moſes deſires to bee taught this point of holy Arithmeticke, To number not his yeares, but his daies: Thoſe therefore that dare loſe a day, are dangerouſly prodigall; thoſe that dare miſ-ſpend it, deſperate. We can beſt teach others by our ſelues: let me tell your Lordſhip, how I would paſſe my dayes, whether common or ſacred; that you (or whoſoeuer others, ouer-hearing mee) may either approue my thriftineſſe, or correct my errors: To whom is the account of my houres either more due, or more knowne? All dayes are his, who gaue time a beginning, and continuance; yet ſome he hath made ours, not to command, but to vſe. In none may wee forget him: in ſome wee muſt forget all, beſides him. Firſt therefore, I deſire to awake at thoſe houres, not when I will, but when I muſt; pleaſure is not a fit rule for reſt, but health; neither doe I conſult ſo much with the Sunne, as mine owne neceſſity, whether of body, or in that, of the minde. If this vaſſall could well ſerue me waking, it ſhould neuer ſleepe: but now, it muſt be pleaſed, that it may be ſeruiceable. Now, when ſleepe is rather driuen away, than leaues mee; I would euer awake with God; my firſt thoughts are for him, who hath made the night for reſt, and the day for trauell: and as he giues, ſo bleſſes both. If my heart bee early ſeaſoned with his preſence, it will ſauour of him all day after. While my body is dreſſing, not with an effeminate curioſitie, nor yet with rude neglect; my minde addreſſes it ſelfe to her enſuing taske; bethinking what is to bee done, and in what order; and marſhalling (as it may) my houres with my worke: That done, after ſome whiles meditation, I walke vp to my maſters and companions, my bookes; and ſitting downe amongſt them, with the beſt contentment, I dare not reach forth my hand to ſalute any of them, till I haue firſt looked vp to heauen, and craued fauour of him to whom all my ſtudies are duly referred: without whom, I can neither profit, nor labour. After this, out of no ouer-great variety, I call forth thoſe, which may beſt fit my occaſions; wherein, I am not too ſcrupulous of age: Sometimes I put my ſelfe to ſchoole, to one of thoſe Ancients, whom the Church hath honoured with the name of Fathers; whoſe Volumes, I confeſſe not to open, without a ſecret reuerence of their holineſſe, and grauity: Sometimes to thoſe later Doctors, which want nothing but age to make them claſſicall: alwaies, to Gods Booke. That day is loſt, whereof ſome houres are not improued in thoſe Diuine Monuments: others I turne ouer out of choice; theſe out of duty. Ere I can haue ſate vnto wearineſſe, my family, hauing now ouercome all houſhold-diſtractions, inuites me to our common deuotions: not without ſome ſhort preparation. Theſe heartily performed, ſend me vp, with a more ſtrong and cheerefull appetite to my former worke, which I find made eaſie to me by intermiſſion, and varietie: Now therefore can I deceiue the houres with change of pleaſures, that is, of labours. One while mine eies are buſied, another while my hand, and ſometimes my minde takes the burden from them both: Wherein, I would imitate the skilfulleſt Cookes, which make the beſt diſhes with manifold mixtures: one houre is ſpent in Textuall Diuinity, another in Controuerſie: Hiſtories releeue them both. Now, when the minde is wearie of others labours, it beginnes to vndertake her owne: ſometimes it meditates and winds vp for future vſe; ſometimes it layes forth her conceits into preſent diſcourſe; ſometimes for it ſelfe, ofter for others. Neither know I whether it workes or playes in theſe thoughts: I am ſure no ſport hath more pleaſure, no worke more vſe: Onely the decay of a weake body, makes me thinke theſe delights inſenſibly laborious. Thus could I all day (as Ringers vſe) make my ſelfe Muſicke with changes, and complaine ſooner of the day for ſhortneſſe, than of the buſineſſe for toyle; were it not that this faint monitor interrupts me ſtill in the midſt of my buſie pleaſures, and inforces me both to reſpite and repaſt: I muſt yeeld to both; while my body and minde are ioyned together in theſe vnequall couples, the better muſt follow the weaker. Before my meales therefore, and after, I let my ſelfe looſe from all thoughts; and now, would forget that I euer ſtudied: A full minde takes away the bodies appetite, no leſſe than a full body makes a dull and vnweildy minde: Company, diſcourſe, recreations, are now ſeaſonable and welcome; Theſe prepare me for a diet, not gluttonous, but medicinall; The palate may not be pleaſed, but the ſtomacke; nor that for it owne ſake: Neither would I thinke any of theſe comforts worth reſpect in themſelues, but in their vſe, in their end; ſo farre, as they may inable me to better things. If I ſee any diſh to tempt my palate, I feare a Serpent in that Apple, and would pleaſe my ſelfe in a wilfull deniall: I riſe capable of more, not deſirous: not now immediately from my trencher, to my booke; but after ſome intermiſſion. Moderate ſpeed is a ſure helpe to all proceedings; where thoſe things which are proſecuted with violence of endeuour, or deſire, either ſucceed not, or continue not.

After my later meale, my thoughts are ſleight: onely my memory may be charged with her taske, of recalling what was committed to her cuſtody in the day; and my heart is buſie in examining my hands and mouth, and all other ſenſes, of that dayes behauiour: and now the euening is come, no Tradeſ-man doth more carefully take in his wares, cleare his ſhop-board, and ſhut his Windowes, than I would ſhut vp my thoughts, and cleare my minde. That Student ſhall liue miſerably, which like a Camell lies downe vnder his burden. All this done, calling together my family, wee end the day with God. Thus doe we rather driue away the time before vs, than follow it. I grant, neither is my practice worthy to be exemplary, neither are our callings proportionable. The liues of a Nobleman, of a Courtier, of a Scholler, of a Citizen, of a Countriman, differ no leſſe than their diſpoſitions: yet muſt all conſpire in honeſt labour. Sweat is the deſtiny of all trades, whether of the browes, or of the minde. God neuer allowed any man to doe nothing. How miſerable is the condition of thoſe men, which ſpend the time as if it were giuen them, and not lent: as if houres were waſte creatures, and ſuch as ſhould neuer be accounted for: as if God would take this for a good bill of reckoning; Item, ſpent vpon my pleaſures forty yeares. Theſe men ſhall once finde, that no bloud can priuilege idleneſſe; and that nothing is more precious to God, than that which they deſire to caſt away; Time. Such are my common dayes: but Gods day calls for another reſpect. The ſame Sunne ariſes on this day, and enlightens it; yet becauſe that Sunne of righteouſneſſe aroſe vpon it, and gaue a new life vnto the world in it, and drew the ſtrength of Gods morall precept vnto it, therefore iuſtly doe we ſing with the Pſalmiſt; This is the day which the Lord hath made. Now, I forget the world, and in a ſort my ſelfe; and deale with my wonted thoughts, as great men vſe, who at ſome times of their priuacie, forbid the acceſſe of all ſuters. Prayer, meditation, reading, hearing, preaching, ſinging, good conference, are the buſineſſes of this day; which I dare not beſtow on any worke, or pleaſure, but heauenly. I hate ſuperſtition on the one ſide, and looſeneſſe on the other; but I finde it hard to offend in too much deuotion, eaſie in prophaneneſſe. The whole weeke is ſanctified by this day: and according to my care of this, is my bleſſing on the reſt. I ſhew your Lordſhip what I would doe, and what I ought: I commit my deſires to the imitation of the weake; my actions to the cenſures of the Wiſe and Holy; my weakneſſes to the pardon and redreſſe of my mercifull God.

Ep. II. Diſcourſing how we may vſe the world without danger.

HOw to liue out of the danger of the World, is both a great and good care, and that which troubles too few. Some, that the world may not hurt them, run from it; and baniſh themſelues to the tops of ſolitary mountaines: changing the Cities for Deſarts, houſes for Caues, and the ſocietie of men for beaſts; and leſt their enemie might inſinuate himſelfe into their ſecrecie, haue abridged themſelues of dyet, cloathing, lodging, harbour, fit for reaſonable creatures; ſeeming to haue left off themſelues, no leſſe than companions.

As if the world were not euery where; as if we could hide our ſelues from the Deuill; as if ſolitarineſſe were priuileged from Temptations: as if we did not more violently affect reſtrained delights; as if theſe Ieromes did not finde Rome in their heart, when they had nothing but rocks and trees in their eye. Hence, theſe places of retiredneſſe, founded at firſt vpon neceſſity mixt with deuotion, haue proued infamouſly vncleane; Cels of luſt, not of pietie. This courſe is prepoſterous; if I were worthy to teach you a better way, learne to be an Hermite at home: Begin with your owne heart, eſtrange and weane it from the loue, not from the vſe of the world: Chriſtianity hath taught vs nothing, if we haue not learned this diſtinction; It is a great weakneſſe not to ſee, but we muſt be enamoured: Eliſha ſaw the ſecret ſtate of the Syrian Court, yet as an enemie: The bleſſed Angells ſee our earthly affaires, but as ſtrangers: Moſes his body was in the Court of Pharaoh, amongſt the delicate Egyptians, his heart was ſuffering with the afflicted Iſraelites. Lot tooke part of the faire medowes of Sodom, not of their ſinnes. Our bleſſed Sauiour ſaw the glory of all Kingdomes, and contemned them: and cannot the world looke vpon vs Chriſtians, but we are bewitched? Wee ſee the Sunne daily, and warme vs at his beames, yet make not an Idoll of it; doth any man hide his face, leſt he ſhould adore it? All our ſafety or danger therefore is from within. In vaine is the body an Anachoret, if the heart be a Ruffian: And if that bee retired in affections, the body is but a Cipher: Lo then the eyes will looke careleſly and ſtrangely on what they ſee, and the tongue will ſometimes anſwer to that was not asked. Wee eat and recreate, becauſe we muſt, not becauſe we would: and when we are pleaſed, we are ſuſpicious: Lawfull delights, wee neither refuſe nor dote vpon, and all contentments goe and come like ſtrangers. That all this may be done, take vp your heart with better thoughts; be ſure it will not be empty: if heauen haue fore-ſtalled all the roomes, the world is diſappointed, and either dares not offer, or is repulſed. Fix your ſelfe vpon the glory of that eternity, which abides you after this ſhort pilgrimage. You cannot but contemne what you finde, in compariſon of what you expect.

Hall, J.

Leaue not till you attaine to this, that you are willing to liue, becauſe you cannot as yet be diſſolued : Bee but one halfe vpon earth, let your better part conuerſe aboue whence it is, and enioy that whereto it was ordained. Thinke how little the World can doe for you, and what it doth, how deceitfully : what ſtings there are with this Honey, what Farewell ſucceeds this Welcome.

When this Iael brings you milke in the one hand, know ſhe hath a naile in the other. Aſke your heart what it is the better, what the merier, for all thoſe pleaſures wherewith it hath befriended you: let your owne tryall teach you contempt ; Thinke how ſincere, how glorious thoſe ioyes are, which abide you elſewhere, and a thouſand times more certaine (though future) than the preſent.

And let not theſe thoughts be flying, but fixed : In vaine doe we meditate, if wee reſolue not : when your heart is once thus ſetled, it ſhall command all things to aduantage. The world ſhall not betray, but ſerue it ; and that ſhall be fulfilled which God promiſes by his Salomon ; When the wayes of a man pleaſe the Lord, he will make his enemies alſo at peace with him.

Sir, this aduice my pouerty afforded long ſince to a weake friend ; I write it not to you any otherwiſe, than as Schollers are wont to ſay their part to their Maſters. The world hath long and iuſtly both noted and honoured you for eminence in wiſdome and learning, and I aboue the moſt ; I am ready with the awe of a Learner, to embrace all precepts from you : you ſhall expect nothing from me, but Teſtimonies of reſpect and thankfulneſſe.

To Sir George Fleetwood.

Ep. III. Of the remedies of ſinne, and motiues to auoid it.

THere is none, either more common or more troubleſome gueſt, than Sin. Troubleſome, both in the ſolicitation of it, and in the remorſe. Before the act, it wearies vs with a wicked importunity; after the act, it torments vs with feares, and the painfull gnawings of an accuſing Conſcience : Neither is it more irkſome to men, than odious to God ; who indeed neuer hated any thing but it ; and for it any thing. How happy were wee, if we could be rid of it? This muſt bee our deſire, but cannot bee our hope, ſo long as we carry this body of ſinne and death about vs : yet (which is our comfort) it ſhall not carry vs, though we carry it : It will dwell with vs, but with no command ; yea, with no peace : We grudge to giue it houſe-roome ; but wee hate to giue it ſeruice. This our Hagar will abide many ſtrokes, ere ſhe be turned out of doores : ſhe ſhall goe at laſt ; and the ſeed of promiſe ſhall inherit alone. There is no vnquietneſſe good, but this : and in this caſe, quietneſſe cannot ſtand with ſafety : neither did euer warre more truly beget peace, than in this ſtrife of the ſoule.

Reſiſtance is the way to victory ; and that, to an eternall peace and happineſſe. It is a bleſſed care then, how to reſiſt ſinne, how to auoid it : and ſuch as I am glad to teach and learne. As there are two grounds of all ſinne, ſo of the auoidance of ſinne ; Loue and Feare : Theſe if they be placed amiſſe, cauſe vs to offend : if right, are the remedies of euill. The loue muſt be of God ; Feare, of iudgement.

As he loues much, to whom much is forgiuen : ſo he that loues much, will not dare to doe that which may need forgiueneſſe. The heart that hath felt the ſweetneſſe of Gods mercies, will not abide the bitter relliſh of ſinne : This is both a ſtronger motiue than Feare, and more Noble ; None but a good heart is capable of this grace : which who ſo hath receiued, thus powerfully repels tentations.

Haue I found my God ſo gracious to me, that he hath denied me nothing, either in earth or heauen : and ſhall not I ſo much as deny my owne will for his ſake ? Hath my deare Sauiour bought my ſoule at ſuch a price, and ſhall he not haue it ? Was he crucified for my ſinnes, and ſhall I by my ſinnes crucifie him againe ? Am I his in ſo many bonds, and ſhall I ſerue the Deuill ? O God ! is this the fruit of thy beneficence to me, that I ſhould wilfully diſhonor thee ? Was thy blood ſo little worth, that I ſhould tread it vnder my feet ? Doth this become him that ſhall be once glorious with thee ? Haſt thou prepared heauen for me, and doe I thus prepare my ſelfe for heauen ? Shall I thus recompence thy loue, in doing that which thou hateſt ? Satan hath no Dart (I ſpeake confidently) that can pierce this ſhield : Chriſtians are indeed too oft ſurprized, ere they can hold it out : there is no ſmall policy in the ſuddenneſſe of temptation : but if they haue once ſetled it before their breſt, they are ſafe, and their enemie hopeleſſe. Vnder this head therefore, there is ſure remedy againſt ſinne, by looking vpwards, backwards, into our ſelues, forwards. Vpwards, at the glorious Maieſtie, and infinite goodneſſe of that God whom our ſinne would offend, and in whoſe face we ſinne : whoſe mercies, and whoſe holineſſe is ſuch, that if there were no hell, we would not offend. Backwards, at the manifold fauours, whereby we are obliged to obedience. Into our ſelues, at that honorable vocation, wherewith hee hath graced vs, that holy profeſſion we haue made of his calling, and grace, that ſolemne vow and couenant, whereby wee haue confirmed our profeſſion ; the gracious beginnings of that Spirit in vs, which is grieued by our ſinnes, yea quenched. Forwards, at the ioy which will follow vpon our forbearance, that peace of conſcience, that happy expectation of glory, compared with the momentarie and vnpleaſing delight of a preſent ſinne ; All theſe, out of loue ; Feare is a retentiue, as neceſſarie, not ſo ingenuous. It is better to be wonne, than to be frighted from ſinne : to be allured, than drawne. Both are little enough in our proneneſſe to euill : Euill is the onely obiect of feare. Herein therefore, we muſt terrifie our ſtubbornneſſe, with both euils; Of loſſe, and of ſenſe : that if it be poſſible, the horror of the euent may counteruaile the pleaſure of the tentation : Of loſſe ; remembring that now we are about to loſe a God ; to caſt away all the comforts and hopes of another world ; to rob our ſelues of all thoſe ſweet mercies we enioyed ; to thruſt his ſpirit out of doores (which cannot abide to dwell within the noiſome ſtench of ſinne,) to ſhut the doores of heauen againſt our ſelues. Of ſenſe ; That thus we giue Satan a right in vs ; power ouer vs ; aduantage againſt vs ; That we make God to frowne vpon vs in heauen ; That we arme all his good creatures againſt vs on earth ; That we doe as it were take Gods hand in ours : and ſcourge our ſelues with all temporall plagues, and force his curſes vpon vs, and ours : That we wound our owne conſciences with ſinnes, that they may wound vs with euerlaſting torments ; That we doe both make a hell in our breaſts beforehand, and open the gates of that bottomleſſe pit, to receiue vs afterwards: That we doe now caſt brimſtone into the fire ; and leſt we ſhould faile of tortures, make our ſelues our owne fiends : Theſe, and what euer other terrors of this kinde, muſt be laid to the ſoule : which, if they be throughly vrged to an heart, not altogether incredulous, well may a man aske himſelfe, how he dare ſinne? But if neither this Sun of mercies, nor the tempeſtuous windes of iudgment can make him caſt off Peters cloake of wickedneſſe ; he muſt be clad with confuſion, as with a cloake, according to the Pſalmiſt.

I tremble to thinke how many liue, as if they were neither beholden to God, nor afraid of him, neither in his debt, nor danger: As if their heauen and hell were both vpon earth; ſinning not onely without ſhame, but not without malice: It is their leaſt ill to doe euill : Behold they ſpeake for it, ioy in it, boaſt of it, inforce to it ; as if they would ſend challenges into heauen, and make loue to deſtruction : Their lewdneſſe cals for our ſorrow, and zealous obedience; that our God may haue as true ſeruants, as enemies. And as we ſee naturall qualities, increaſed with the reſiſtance of their contraries ; ſo muſt our grace with others ſinnes : wee ſhall redeeme ſomewhat of Gods diſhonour by ſinne, if we ſhall thence grow holy.

Ep. IV. Diſcourſing how farre, and wherein Popery deſtroyeth the foundation.

The meane in all things is not more ſafe than hard; whether to finde or keepe: and as in all other morality, it lyeth in a narrow roome; ſo moſt in the matter of our cenſure, eſpecially concerning Religion: wherein we are wont to be either careleſſe or too peremptory. How farre, and wherein Popery razeth the foundation, is worth our inquirie: I need not ſtay vpon words. By foundation, wee meane the neceſſary grounds of Chriſtian faith. This foundation Papiſtry defaces, by laying a new, by caſting downe the old. In theſe caſes, addition deſtroyes: he that obtrudes a new word, no leſſe ouerthrowes the Scripture, than he that denies the old; yea this very obtruſion denies: he that ſets vp a new Chriſt, reiects Chriſt: Two foundations cannot ſtand at once; the Arke and Dagon: Now Papiſtry layes a double new foundation: the one, a new rule of faith, that is, a new word; the other, a new Author, or guide of faith, that is, a new head beſides Chriſt. God neuer laid other foundation, than in the Prophets and Apoſtles: vpon their diuine writing, he meant to build his Church; which he therefore inſpired, that they might be (like himſelfe) perfect and eternall: Popery builds vpon an vnwritten word; the voice of old (but doubtfull) Traditions; the voice of the preſent Church, that is, as they interpret it, theirs; with no leſſe confidence and preſumption of certainty, than any thing euer written by the finger of God: If this be not a new foundation, the old was none. God neuer taught this holy Spouſe to know any other husband, than Chriſt; to acknowledge any other head; to follow any other Shepherd; to obey any other King: he alone may be enioyed without iealouſie, ſubmitted to without danger, without error beleeued, ſerued without ſcruple: Popery offers to impoſe on Gods Church a King, Shepherd, Head, Husband, beſides her own: A man; a man of ſinne. He muſt know all things, can erre in nothing: direct, informe, animate, command, both in earth and Purgatorie; expound Scriptures, canonize Saints, forgiue ſinnes, create new Articles of Faith; and in all theſe, is abſolute and infallible as his Maker: who ſees not, that if to attribute theſe things to the Son of God, be to make him the foundation of the Church; then to aſcribe them to another, is to contradict him that ſaid, other foundation can no man lay, than that which is laid, which is Ieſus Chriſt. To lay a new foundation, doth neceſſarily ſubuert the old: yet ſee this further actually done in particulars; wherein yet this diſtinction may cleare the way: The foundation is ouerthrown two wayes; either in flat tearmes, when a maine principle of faith is abſolutely denied, as the deity and conſubſtantialitie of the Son by Arrius, the Trinitie of perſons by Sabellius and Seruetus, the reſurrection of the body by Himeneus & Philetus, the laſt Iudgement by S. Peters mockers: Or ſecondly, by conſequent, when any opinion is maintained, which by iuſt ſequell ouer-turneth the truth of that principle, which the defendant profeſſes to hold; yet ſo, as he will not grant the neceſſitie of that deduction. So the ancient Minæi, of whom Ierome ſpeaketh, while they vrged Circumciſion, by conſequent, according to Pauls rule, reiected Chriſt: So the Pelagians, while they defended a full perfection of our righteouſnes in our ſelues, ouerthrew Chriſts iuſtification: and in effect ſaid, I beleeue in Chriſt, and in my ſelfe: So ſome Vbiquitaries, while they hold the poſſibilitie of conuerſion and ſaluation of reprobates, ouerthrow the doctrine of Gods eternall Decree, and immutabilitie. Poperie comes in this latter ranke, and may iuſtly bee tearmed Hereſie, by direct conſequent: though not in their grant, yet in neceſſarie proofe and inference. Thus it ouerthrowes the truth of Chriſts humanitie, while it holds his whole humane body locally circumſcribed in heauen, and at once (the ſame inſtant) wholly preſent in ten thouſand places on earth, without circumſcription: That whole Chriſt is in the formes of bread, with all his dimenſions, euery part hauing his owne place and figure; and yet ſo, as that hee is wholly in euery part of the bread. Our iuſtification, while it aſcribes it to our owne workes: The all-ſufficiencie of Chriſts owne ſacrifice, whiles they reiterate it daily by the hands of a Prieſt. Of his ſatisfaction, while they hold a paiment of our vtmoſt farthings, in a deuiſed Purgatory. Of his mediation, while they implore others to aid them, not onely by their interceſſion, but their merits; ſuing not onely for their prayers, but their gifts: The value of the Scriptures, whiles they hold them inſufficient, obſcure, in points eſſentiall to ſaluation, and binde them to an vncertaine dependance vpon the Church. Beſides hundreds of this kinde, there are Hereſies in actions, contrary to thoſe fundamentall practices which God requires of his: as prohibitions of Scriptures to the laitie: Preſcriptions of deuotion in vnknowne tongues: Tying the effect of Sacraments and Prayers to the externall worke; Adoration of Angels, Saints, Bread, Reliques, Croſſes, Images: All which, are ſo many reall vnderminings of the ſacred foundation, which is no leſſe actiue, than vocall. By this the ſimpleſt may ſee, what we muſt hold of Papiſts; neither as no Hereticks, nor yet ſo palpable as the worſt. If any man aske for their conuiction: In the ſimpler ſort, I grant this excuſe faire and tolerable; poore ſoules, they cannot be any otherwiſe informed, much leſſe perſwaded: Whiles in truth of heart, they hold the maine principles which they know; doubtleſſe the mercy of God may paſſe ouer their ignorant weakneſſe, in what they cannot know. For the other, I feare not to ſay, that many of their errors are wilfull. The light of truth hath ſhined out of heauen to them, and they loue darkneſſe more than light. In this ſtate of the Church, he ſhall ſpeake and hope idly, that ſhall call for a publique and vniuerſall euiction: How can that be, when they pretend to be Iudges in their owne cauſe? Vnleſſe they will not be aduerſaries to themſelues, or judge of vs, this courſe is but impoſſible. As the Deuill, ſo Antichriſt, will not yeeld: both ſhall bee ſubdued; neither will treat of peace: what remaines, but that the Lord ſhall conſume that wicked man (which is now clearely reuealed) with the breath of his mouth, and aboliſh him with the brightneſſe of his comming. Euen ſo, Lord Ieſus come quickly. This briefly is my conceit of Popery; which I willingly referre to your cleare and deepe iudgment; being not more deſirous to teach the ignorant what I know, than to learne of you what I ſhould teach, and know not: The Lord direct all our thoughts to his glory, and the behoofe of his Church.

Ep. V. Diſſwading from ſeparation, and ſhortly oppugning the grounds of that error.

IN my former Epiſtle (I confeſſe) I touched the late ſeparation with a light hand: onely ſetting downe the iniury of it (at the beſt) not diſcuſſing the grounds in common: now your danger drawes me on to this diſcourſe: it is not much leſſe thankeworthy to preuent a diſeaſe, than to cure it: you confeſſe that you doubt; I miſlike it not; doubting is not more the way to error, than to ſatisfaction; lay downe firſt, all pride and preiudice, and I cannot feare you: I neuer yet knew any man of this way, which hath not bewraid himſelfe far gone with ouer-weening: and therefore it hath been iuſt with God, to puniſh their ſelfe-loue with error; an humble ſpirit is a fit ſubiect for truth: prepare you your heart, and let me then anſwer, or rather God for mee; you doubt whether the notorious ſinne of one vnreformed, vncenſured, defile not the whole congregation ; ſo as we may not without ſinne communicate therewith : and why not the whole Church ? woe were vs, if wee ſhould thus liue in the danger of all men : haue we not ſinnes enow of our owne, but wee muſt borrow of others ? Each man ſhall beare his owne burden : is ours ſo light that wee call for more weight, and vndertake what God neuer impoſed ? It was enough for him that is God and Man, to beare others iniquities ; it is no taske for vs, which ſhrinke vnder the leaſt of our owne. But it is made ours, you ſay (though anothers) by our toleration and conniuence : indeed, if we conſent to them, incourage them, imitate, or accompany them in the ſame exceſſe of ryot; yet more, the publike perſon that forbeares a knowne ſinne, ſinneth; but if each mans knowne ſinne, be euery mans, what difference is betwixt the root and the branches ? Adams ſinne ſpred it ſelfe to vs, becauſe we were in him, ſtood or fell in him ; our caſe is not ſuch. Doe but ſee how God ſcorneth that vniuſt Prouerb of the Iews, That the Fathers haue eaten ſowre grapes, and the childrens teeth are ſet on edge: How much leſſe are ſtrangers? Is any bond ſo neere as this of bloud ? Shall not the childe ſmart for the Parent; and ſhall we (euen ſpiritually) for others? You obiect Achans ſtealth, and Iſraels puniſhment : an vnlike caſe, and extraordinary: for ſee how direct Gods charge is, Be ye ware of the execrable thing, leſt ye make your ſelues execrable; and in taking of the execrable thing, make alſo the Hoaſt of Iſrael execrable and trouble it. Now euery man is made a party, by a peculiar iniunction : and not onely all Iſrael is as one man ; but euery Iſraelite is a publike perſon in this act, you cannot ſhow the like in euery one, no, not in any : it was a law for the preſent, not intended for perpetuitie: you may as well challenge the Trumpets of Rams-hornes, and ſeuen daies walke vnto euery ſiege. Looke elſe-where : The Church of Thyatira ſuffers the woman Iezabel to teach and deceiue. A great ſinne, Yet to you (ſaith the Spirit) the reſt of Thyatira, as many as haue not this learning, I will put vpon you none other burden, but that which you haue, hold faſt; He ſaith not, Leaue your Church, but Hold faſt your owne. Looke into the practice of the Prophets, ranſacke their burdens, and ſee if you finde this there; yea, behold our beſt patterne, the Sonne of God. The Iewiſh Rulers in Chriſt's time were notoriouſly couetous, proud, oppreſſing, cruell, ſuperſtitious : our Sauiour feared not polluting, in ioyning with them; and was ſo farre from ſeparating himſelfe, that hee called and ſent others to them. But, a little Leauen leauens the whole lumpe: it is true; by the infection of it, ſinne, where it is vnpuniſhed, ſpreadeth; it ſowreth all thoſe whoſe hands are in it, not others. If we diſlike it, deteſt, deſiſt, reproue, and mourne for it, we cannot be tainted : the Corinthian loue-feaſts had groſſe and ſinfull diſorder: yet you heare not Paul ſay, Abſtaine from the Sacrament till theſe be reformed; Rather hee enioynes the act, and controules the abuſe : God hath bidden you heare and receiue: ſhew me, where he hath ſaid, except others be ſinfull. Their vncleanneſſe can no more defile you, than your holineſſe can excuſe them. But while I communicate (you ſay) I conſent; God forbid. It is ſinne, not to caſt out the deſeruing : but not yours; who made you a Ruler and a Iudge? The vncleane muſt be ſeparated ; not by the people: Would you haue no diſtinction betwixt priuate and publike perſons ? What ſtrange confuſion is this ? And what other than the old note of Corah and his company, Yee take too much vpon you, ſeeing all the Congregation is holy, euery one of them, and the Lord is among them : wherefore then lift ye vp your ſelues aboue the Congregation of the Lord ? What is (if this be not) to make a Monſter of Chriſts body ? hee is the head, his Church the body, conſiſting of diuers limbes. All haue their ſeuerall faculties and imployments; not euery one, all; who would imagine any man ſo abſurd, as to ſay, that this body ſhould be all tongue, or all hands ; euery man a Teacher, euery man a Ruler ? As Chriſt had ſaid to euery man, Goe teach, and whoſe ſinnes yee remit: How ſenſeleſſe are theſe two extreames ? Of the Papiſts, that one man hath the Keyes: Of the Browniſts, that euery man hath them. But theſe priuiledges and charges are giuen to the Church : True; to be executed by her Gouernours : the faculty of ſpeech is giuen to the whole man, but the vſe of it to the proper inſtrument. Man ſpeaketh; but by his tongue; if a voice ſhould be heard from his hand, eare, foot, it were vnnaturall: Now if the tongue ſpeake not when it ought, ſhall wee bee ſo fooliſh as to blame the hand? But you ſay; if the tongue ſpeake not, or ſpeake ill, the whole man ſmarteth; the man ſinneth: I grant it, but you ſhall ſet the naturall body on too hard a rack, if you ſtraine it in all things, to the likeneſſe of the ſpirituall, or ciuill. The members of that being quickned by the ſame ſoule, haue charge of each other, and therefore either ſtand or fall together: It is not ſo in theſe. If then notwithſtanding vnpuniſhed ſinnes, we may ioyne with the true Church: Whether is ours ſuch? You doubt, and your ſolicitors deny: ſurely, if we haue many enormities, yet none worſe than raſh and cruell iudgement; let them make this a colour to depart from themſelues: there is no leſſe woe to them that call good euill. To iudge one man is bold and dangerous. Iudge then what it is to condemne a whole Church; God knowes, as much without cauſe, as without ſhame. Vaine men may libell againſt the Spouſe of Chriſt: her husband neuer diuorced her: No, his loue is ſtill aboue their hatred, his bleſſings aboue their cenſures: Doe but aske them, were we euer the true Church of God? If they deny it, Who then were ſo? Had God neuer Church vpon earth, ſince the Apoſtles time, till Barrow and Greenwood aroſe? And euen then ſcarce a number? nay, when or where was euer any man in the world (except in the ſchooles perhaps of Donatus or Nouatus) that taught their doctrine; and now ſtill hath he none, but in a blinde lane at Amſterdam? Can you thinke this probable? If they affirme it, when ceaſed we? Are not the points controuerted ſtill the ſame? The ſame gouernment, the ſame doctrine? Their minds are changed, not our eſtate: Who hath admoniſhed, euinced, excommunicated vs; and when? All theſe muſt be done. Will it not be a ſhame to ſay; that Francis Iohnſon, as he tooke power to excommunicate his Brother, and Father; ſo had power to excommunicate his Mother, the Church? How baſe and idle are theſe conceits? Are wee then Hereticks condemned in our ſelues? Wherein ouerthrow wee the foundation? What other God, Sauiour, Scriptures, Iuſtification, Sacraments, Heauen, doe they teach beſides vs? Can all the Maſters of Separation, yea can all the Churches in Chriſtendome, ſet forth a more exquiſite and worthy confeſſion of faith, than is contained in the Articles of the Church of England? Who can hold theſe and bee hereticall? Or, from which of theſe are we reuolted? But to make this good, they haue taught you to ſay, that euery truth in Scripture is fundamentall; ſo fruitfull is errour of abſurdities; Whereof ſtill one breeds another more deformed than it ſelfe. That Trophimus was left at Miletum ſicke, that Pauls Cloake was left at Troas, that Gaius, Pauls hoaſt, ſaluted the Romanes, that Nabal was drunke; or that Thamar baked Cakes, and a thouſand of this nature are fundamentall: how large is the Separatiſts Creed, that hath all theſe Articles? If they ſay all Scripture is of the ſame Author, of the ſame authoritie; ſo ſay we, but not of the ſame vſe: is it as neceſſary for a Chriſtian to know that Peter hoſted with one Simon a Tanner in Ioppa, as that Ieſus Chriſt the Sonne of God was borne of the Virgin Mary? What a monſter is this of an opinion, that all truths are equall? that this ſpirituall houſe ſhould be all foundation, no walls, no roofe? Can no man be ſaued but he that knowes euery thing in Scripture? Then both they and wee are excluded: heauen would not haue ſo many, as their Parlor at Amſterdam. Can any man be ſaued that knowes nothing in Scripture? It is farre from them to bee ſo ouercharitable to affirme it: you ſee then that both all truths muſt not of neceſſitie bee knowne, and ſome muſt; and theſe we iuſtly call fundamentall: which who ſo holdeth, all his hay and ſtubble (through the mercy of God) condemne him not: ſtill he hath right to the Church on earth, and hope in heauen: but whether euery truth bee fundamentall, or neceſſary? diſcipline (you ſay) is ſo: indeed neceſſary to the well-being of a Church, no more: it may be true without it, not perfect. Chriſt compares his Spouſe to an Army with banners: as order is to an Armie, ſo is diſcipline to the Church: if the troopes be not well marſhalled in their ſeuerall rankes, and moue not forward according to the diſcipline of warre, it is an Armie ſtill: confuſion may hinder their ſucceſſe, it cannot bereaue them of their name : it is, as beautifull proportion to the bodie, an hedge to a vineyard, a wall to a City, an hem to a garment , ſeeling to an houſe. It may be a body, vineyard, citie, garment, houſe, without them: it cannot be well and perfect: yet which of our aduerſaries will ſay we haue no diſcipline ? Some they grant, but not the right: as if they ſaid : Your Citie hath a bricke wall indeed, but it ſhould haue one of hewne ſtone; your Vineyard is hedged, but it ſhould be paled and ditched: while they cauill at what we want, we thanke God for what we haue; and ſo much we haue, in ſpight of all detraction, as makes vs both a true Church, and a worthy one.

But the maine quarrell is againſt our Miniſterie, and forme of worſhip : let theſe be examined; this is the circle of their cenſure. No Church, therefore no Miniſtery: and no Miniſterie, therefore no Church: vnnaturall ſonnes, that ſpit in the face of thoſe ſpirituall Fathers that begot them, and the Mother that bore them. What would they haue ? Haue we not competent gifts from aboue, for ſo great a function ? Are wee all vnlearned, vnſufficient ? Not a man that knowes to diuide the word aright? As Paul to the Corinths, Is it ſo that there is not one wiſe man amongſt vs ? No man will affirme it : ſome of them haue cenſured our exceſſe in ſome knowledge ; none, our defect in all : What then ? Haue we not a true deſire to doe faithfull ſeruice to God and his Church ? No zeale for Gods glory ? Who hath been in our hearts to ſee this ? Who dare vſurpe vpon God, and condemne our thoughts ? Yea, we appeale to that onely Iudge of hearts, whether he hath not giuen vs a ſincere longing for the good of his Sion : he ſhall make the thoughts of all hearts manifeſt : and then ſhall euery man haue praiſe of God. If then we haue both abilitie and will to doe publike good : our inward calling (which is the maine point) is good and perfect; for the outward, what want we? Are we not firſt (after good tryall) preſented and approued by the learned in our Colledges, examined by our Church-gouernors, ordain'd by impoſition of hands of the Elderſhip, allowed by the Congregations we are ſet ouer ? Doe we not labour in word and doctrine ? doe we not carefully adminiſter the Sacraments of the Lord Ieſus ? haue we not by our publike meanes wonne many ſoules to God ? what ſhould we haue and doe more ? All this, and yet no true Miniſters ? we paſſe very little to bee iudged of them, or of mans day : but our Ordainers (you ſay) are Antichriſtian : ſurely our cenſurers are vnchriſtian : tho we ſhould grant it, ſome of vs were baptized by Hereticks : is the Sacrament annihilated, and muſt it be redoubled ? How much leſſe Ordination, which is but an outward admiſſion to preach the Goſpell ? God forbid that we ſhould thus condemne the innocent: more hands were laid vpon vs, than one: and of them, for the principall, except but their perpetuall honour , and ſome few immateriall Rites, let an enemie ſay what they differ from Super-intendents; and can their double honour make them no Elders ? If they haue any perſonall faults, why is their calling ſcourged? Looke into our Sauiours times : what corruptions were in the very Prieſthood ? It was now made annuall, which was before fixed and ſingular. Chriſt ſaw theſe abuſes, and was ſilent : here was much diſlike and no clamour : we, for leſſe, exclaime and ſeparate : euen perſonall offences are fetcht in to the condemnation of lawfull courſes. God giue both pardon and redreſſe to this foule vncharitableneſſe. Alas, how ready are we to toſſe the fore-part of our Wallet, whiles our owne faults are ready to breake our necks behinde vs : all the world ſees and condemnes their Ordination to be faulty, yea none at all : yet they cry out firſt on vs, craftily (I thinke) leſt we ſhould complaine. That Church-gouernors ſhould ordaine Miniſters, hath bin the conſtant practice of the Church, from Chriſts time, to this houre. I except onely, in an extreme deſolation, meerely for the firſt courſe : that the people ſhould make their Miniſters, was vnheard of in all ages and Churches, till Bolton, Browne, and Barrow : and hath neither colour nor example : Doth not this compariſon ſeeme ſtrange and harſh ? Their tradeſ-men may make true Miniſters, our Miniſters cannot : who but they would not be aſhamed of ſuch a poſition ? Or who but you would not thinke the time miſ-pent in anſwering it ? No leſſe friuolous are thoſe exceptions that are taken againſt our worſhip of God, condemned for falſe and idolatrous, whereof Volumes of Apologies are written by others: we meet together, pray, reade, heare, preach, ſing, adminiſter, and receiue Sacraments: wherein offend we? How many Gods doe we pray to? or to whom but the True God? In what words but holy? whom doe we preach but the ſame Chriſt with them? what point of faith, not theirs? What Sacraments but thoſe they dare not but allow? Where lyes our Idolatry, that we may let it out? In the manner of performing: in ſet prayers, Antichriſtian Ceremonies of croſſing, kneeling, &c. For the former: what ſinne is this? The originall and truth of prayer is in the heart, the voice is but as accidentall; if the heart may often conceiue the ſame thought, the tongue her ſeruant may often vtter it, in the ſame words: and if daily to repeat the ſame ſpeeches be amiſſe, then to entertaine the ſame ſpirituall deſires, is ſinfull: to ſpeake once without the heart is hypocriticall: but to ſpeake often the ſame requeſt with the heart, neuer offendeth. What intolerable boldneſſe is this; to condemne that in vs which is recorded to haue beene the continuall practice of Gods Church in all ſucceſſions? Of the Iewes, in the time of Moſes, Dauid, Salomon, Iehoſaphat, Ezekiah, Ieremie: Of the ancient Chriſtian aſſemblies, both Greeke, and Latine, and now at this day of all reformed Churches in Chriſtendome; yea, which our Sauiour himſelfe ſo directly allowed, and in a manner preſcribed, and the bleſſed Apoſtles Paul and Peter in all their formall ſalutations (which were no other than ſet prayers) ſo commonly practiſed: for the other, (leſt I exceed a Letter) though we yeeld them ſuch as you imagine (worſe they cannot be) they are but Ceremonious appendances, the body and ſubſtance is ſound. Bleſſed be God that wee can haue his true Sacraments at ſo eaſie a rate, as the payment (if they were ſuch) of a few circumſtantiall inconueniences: how many deare children of God in all ages, euen neere the golden times of the Apoſtles, haue gladly purchaſed them much dearer, and not complained: but ſee how our Church impoſes them: not as to binde the conſcience, otherwiſe than by the common bond of obedience; not as actions, wherein Gods worſhip eſſentially conſiſteth, but as themſelues, Ceremonies: comely or conuenient, not neceſſary; whatſoeuer: is this a ſufficient ground of ſeparation? How many moderate and wiſer ſpirits haue we, that cannot approue the Ceremonies, yet dare not forſake the Church? and that hold your departure farre more euill, than the cauſe. You are inuited to a feaſt, if but a Napkin or Trencher be miſ-placed, or a diſh ill carued; do you run from the Table, and not ſtay to thanke the Hoaſt? Either be leſſe curious or more charitable. Would God both you and all other, which either fauour the Separation or profeſſe it, could but reade ouer the ancient ſtories of the Church to ſee the true ſtate of things and times; the beginnings, proceedings, increaſes, encounters, yeeldings, reſtaurations of the Goſpell, what the holy Fathers of thoſe firſt times were glad to ſwallow for peace; what they held, practiſed, found, left: whoſoeuer knowes but theſe things, cannot ſeparate; and ſhall not be contented only, but thankfull: God ſhall giue you ſtill more light: in the meane time, vpon the perill of my ſoule, ſtay, and take the bleſſed offers of your God, in peace: And ſince Chriſt ſaith by my hand, will you alſo goe away? Anſwer him with that worthy Diſciple, Maſter whither ſhall I goe from thee? thou haſt the words of eternall life.

Ep. VI. A complaint of the miſ-education of our Gentry.

I Confeſſe, I cannot honour bloud without good qualities; not ſpare it, with ill. There is nothing that I more deſire to be taught, than what is true Nobilitie: What thanke is it to you, that you are borne well? If you could haue loſt this priuiledge of Nature,

hall, J.

Nature, I feare you had not beene thus farre Noble : that you may not plead deſert, you had this before you were ; long ere you could either know or preuent it ; you are deceiued if you thinke this any other than the bodie of Gentilitie : the life and ſoule of it, is in noble and vertuous diſpoſition, in gallantneſſe of ſpirit without haughtineſſe, without inſolence, without ſcornfull ouerlineſſe : ſhortly, in generous qualities, cariage, actions. See your errour, and know that this demeanor doth not anſwer an honeſt birth : If you can follow all faſhions, drinke all healths, weare fauours and good cloaths, conſort with Ruffianly companions, ſweare the biggeſt oathes, quarrell eaſily, fight deſperately, game in euery inordinate Ordinary, ſpend your patrimony ere it fall, looke on euery man betwixt ſcorne and anger ; vſe gracefully ſome geſtures of apiſh complement ; talke irreligiouſly, dally with a Miſtris, or (which tearme is plainer) hunt after Harlots, take ſmoke at a Play-houſe, and liue as if you were made all for ſport, you thinke you haue done enough, to merit, both of your bloud, and others opinions. Certainly, the world hath no baſeneſſe, if this be generoſitie : well-fare the honeſt and ciuill rudeneſſe of the obſcure ſonnes of the earth, if ſuch be the graces of the eminent: The ſhame whereof (me thinkes) is not ſo proper to the wildneſſe of youth, as to the careleſneſſe or vanitie of Parents : I ſpeake it boldly; our Land hath no blemiſh comparable to the miſ-education of our Gentry : Infancie and youth are the ſeed-times of all hopes : if thoſe paſſe vnſeaſonably, no fruit can be expected from our age, but ſhame and ſorrow : who ſhould improue theſe, but they which may command them ? I cannot altogether complaine of our firſt yeares. How like are wee to children, in the training vp of our children ! Giue a childe ſome painted Babe ; he ioyes in it at firſt ſight, and for ſome dayes will not abide it out of his hand or boſome ; but when hee hath ſated himſelfe with the new pleaſure of that gueſt, he now (after a while) caſts it into corners, forgets it, and can looke vpon it, with no care : Thus doe we by ours. Their firſt times finde vs not more fond, than carefull : wee doe not more follow them with our loue, than ply them with inſtruction : When this delight begins to grow ſtale, we begin to grow negligent. Nothing that I know can bee faulted in the ordering of Childhood, but indulgence. Fooliſh Mothers admit of Tutots, but debar rods. Theſe, while they deſire their children may learne, but not ſmart, as is ſaid of Apes, kill their young ones with loue ; for what can worke vpon that age, but feare ? And what feare without correction ? Now at laſt, with what meaſure of Learning their owne will would vouchſafe to receiue, they are too early ſent to the common Nurſeries of Knowledge ; There (vnleſſe they fall vnder carefull tuition) they ſtudy in ieſt, and play in earneſt. In ſuch vniuerſall meanes of Learning, all cannot fall beſides them ; what their company, what ther recreation would either inſtill or permit, they bring home to their glad Parents. Thence are they tranſplanted to the Collegiate Innes of our common Lawes : and there too many learne to be lawleſſe, and to forget their former little : Pauls is their Weſtminſter, their Study, an Ordinary, or Play-houſe, or Dancing-ſchoole, and ſome Lambert their Ploydon. And now after they haue (not without much expence) learned faſhions and licentiouſneſſe, they returne home, full of welcomes and gratulations. By this time ſome bloſſomes of youth appearing in their face, admoniſh their Parents to ſeeke them ſome ſeaſonable match ; Wherein the Father inquires for wealth, the ſonne for beauty, perhaps the mother for Parentage, ſcarce any for Vertue, for Religion. Thus ſetled, What is their care ; their diſcourſe, yea, their Trade, but either an Hound, or an Hawke ? And it is well, if no worſe : And now, they ſo liue, as if they had forgotten that there were bookes : Learning is for Prieſts, and Pedants ; for Gentlemen, pleaſure. Oh ! that either wealth or wit ſhould be caſt away thus baſely : That euer reaſon ſhould grow ſo debauched, as to thinke any thing more worthy than knowledge. With what ſhame and emulation may wee looke vpon other Nations (whoſe apiſh faſhions we can take vp in the channels, neglecting their imitable examples) and with what ſcorne doe they looke vpon vs ? They haue their ſolemne Academies for all thoſe qualities, which may accompliſh Gentility : from which they returne richly furniſhed, both for action, and ſpeculation. They account knowledge and abilitie of diſcourſe as eſſentiall to greatneſſe, as bloud: neither are they more aboue the vulgar in birth, than in vnderſtanding: They trauell with iudgement, and returne with experience: ſo doe they follow the exerciſes of the body, that they neglect not the culture of the minde. From hence growes ciuility, and power to manage affaires, either of Iuſtice, or State: from hence encouragement to learning, and reuerence from inferiors. For thoſe onely can eſteeme knowledge, which haue it; and the common ſort frame either obſeruance, or contempt, out of the example of their Leaders.

Amongſt them, the ſonnes of Nobles ſcorne not either Merchandize, or learned profeſſions; and hate nothing ſo much as to doe nothing: I ſhame and hate to thinke, that our Gallants hold, there can be no diſparagement, but in honeſt callings. Thus perhaps I haue abated the enuy of this reproofe, by communicating it to more; which I had not done, but that the generality of euill importunes redreſſe. I well ſee that either good or euill deſcends: In vaine ſhall we hope for the reformation of the many, while the better are diſordered. Whom to ſolicite herein, I know not, but all: How glad ſhould I be to ſpend my light to the ſnuffe, for the effecting of this! I can but perſwade and pray; theſe I will not faile of: The reſt to him that both can amend and puniſh.

To M. Ionas Reigesbergivs in Zeland.

Ep. VII. Written ſome whiles ſince, concerning ſome new opinions then broached in the Churches of Holland; and vnder the name of Arminius (then liuing) perſwading all great wits to a ſtudy and care of the common peace of the Church, and diſſwading from all affectation of ſingularity.

I Receiued lately a ſhort relation of ſome new Paradoxes from your Leiden; you would know what we thinke: I feare not to be cenſured, as medling: your truth is ours: The Sea cannot diuide thoſe Churches whom one faith vnites. I know not how it comes to paſſe, that moſt men, while they too much affect ciuility, turne flatterers; and plaine truth is moſt-where counted rudeneſſe. He that tels a ſicke friend hee lookes ill, or termes an angry tumour the Gowt, or a watriſh ſwelling Dropſie; is thought vnmannerly. For my part, I am glad that I was not borne to feed humors: How euer you take your own euils, I muſt tell you, we pity you, and think you haue iuſt cauſe of deiection, and we for you: not for any priuate cares, but (which touch a Chriſtian neereſt) the Common-wealth of God. Behold, after all thoſe hills of carkaſſes, and ſtreames of bloud, your ciuill ſword is ſheathed, wherein we neither congratulate, nor feare your peace; lo now, in ſtead of that, another while, the ſpirituall ſword is drawne and ſhaken, and it is well, if no more. Now the politicke State ſits ſtill, the Church quarrels: Oh! the inſatiable hoſtility of our great enemie, with what change of miſchiefes doth he afflict miſerable man? No ſooner did the Chriſtian world beginne to breathe from perſecution, but it was more puniſhed with Arrianiſme: when the red Dragon cannot deuoure the childe, hee tryes to drowne the mother; and when the waters faile, he raiſes warre. Your famous Iunius had nothing more admirable than his loue of peace: when our buſie Separatiſts appealed him, with what a ſweet calmneſſe did he reiect them, and with a graue importunitie call'd them to moderation! How it would haue vexed his holy ſoule (now out of the danger of paſſions) to haue foreſeene his chaire troubleſome. God forbid that the Church ſhould finde a Challenger, in ſtead of a Champion: Who would thinke but you ſhould haue beene taught the benefit of peace, by the long want? But if your temporall ſtate (beſides either hope, or beleefe) hath growne wealthy with warre, like thoſe Fowles which fatten with hard weather: yet bee too ſure, that theſe ſpirituall broyles cannot but impoueriſh the Church; yea, affamiſh it. It were pity that your Holland ſhould bee ſtill the Amphitheatre of the world, on whoſe ſcaffolds all other Nations ſhould ſit, & ſee variety of bloudy ſhews, not without pitie, and horror. If I might challenge ought in that your acute and learned Arminius; I would thus ſolicite and coniure him: Alas that ſo wiſe a man ſhould not know the worth of peace; that ſo noble a ſonne of the Church ſhould not bee brought to light, without ripping the wombe of his mother! What meane theſe ſubtill Nouelties? if they make thee famous, and the Church miſerable, who ſhall gaine by them? Is ſingularity ſo precious, that it ſhould coſt no leſſe, than the ſafety and quiet of our common mother? If it be truth thou affecteſt; what alone? Could neuer any eyes (till thine) be bleſſed with this obiect? Where hath that ſacred verity hid her ſelfe thus long from all her carefull Inquiſitors, that ſhe now firſt ſhewes her head to thee vnſought? Hath the Goſpell ſhined thus long, and bright, and left ſome corners vnſeene? Away with all new truths; faire and plauſible they may bee, ſound they cannot: ſome may admire thee for them; none ſhall bleſſe thee. But grant that ſome of theſe are no leſſe true, than nice points: what doe theſe vnſeaſonable crochets and quauers trouble the harmonious plaine-ſongs of our peace? Some quiet error may bee better than ſome vnruly truth. Who bindes vs to ſpeake all we thinke? So the Church may be ſtill, would God thou wert wiſe alone. Did not our aduerſaries quarrell enough before, at our quarrells? Were they not rich enough with our ſpoiles? By the deare name of our common parents, what meaneſt thou Arminius? Whither tend theſe new-rais'd diſſentions? Who ſhall thriue by them but they which inſult vpon vs, and riſe by the fall of truth? Who ſhall be vndone, but thy brethren? By that moſt precious, and bloudy ranſome of our Sauiour, and by that awfull appearance wee ſhall once make before the glorious Tribunall of the Sonne of God, remember thy ſelfe, and the poore diſtracted limmes of the Church: Let not thoſe excellent parts, wherewith God hath furniſhed thee, lye in the narrow way, and cauſe any weake one either to fall, or ſtumble, or erre. For Gods ſake, either ſay nothing, or the ſame. How many great wits haue ſought no by-paths, and now are happy with their fellowes! Let it be no diſparagement to goe with many to heauen. What could he reply to ſo plaine a charge? No diſtinction can auoid the power of ſimple truth. I know he heares not this of me firſt: Neither that learned and worthy Fran. Gomarus, nor your other graue fraternitie of reuerend Diuines, haue beene ſilent in ſo maine a cauſe. I feare rather too much noiſe in any of theſe tumults: There may too many contend, not intreat. Multitude of ſuters is commonly powerfull; how much more in iuſt motions? But if either he, or you, ſhall turne me home, and bid me ſpend my little moiſture vpon our owne brands, I grant there is both the ſame cauſe, and the ſame need. This counſell is no whit further from vs, becauſe it is directed to you: Any Reader can change the Perſon: I lament to ſee, that euery where peace hath not many clients, but fewer louers; yea, euen many of thoſe that praiſe her, follow her not. Of old, the very Nouatian men, women, children, brought ſtones and mortar (with the Orthodox) to the building of the Church of the reſurrection, and ioyned louingly with them, againſt the Arrians: leſſer quarrels diuide vs; and euery diuiſion ends in blowes, and euery blow is returned; and none of all lights beſide the Church. Euen the beſt Apoſtles diſſented; neither knowledge, nor holineſſe can redreſſe all differences: True, but wiſdome and charitie could teach vs to auoid their preiudice. If we had but theſe two vertues, quarrels ſhould not hurt vs, nor the Church by vs: But (alas) ſelfe-loue is too ſtrong for both theſe: This alone opens the floud-gates of diſſention, and drownes the ſweet, but low valley of the Church. Men eſteeme of opinions, becauſe their owne; and will haue truth ſerue, not gouerne. What they haue vndertaken, muſt be true: Victory is ſought for, not ſatiſfaction; victory of the Author, not of the cauſe: Hee is a rare man that knowes to yeeld, as well as to argue : what ſhould we doe then, but beſtow our ſelues vpon that which too many neglect, publike peace ; firſt, in prayers that we may preuaile, then in teares that we preuaile not ? Thus haue I beene bold to chat with you of our greateſt and common cares. Your old loue, and late hoſpitall entertainment in that your Iland called for this remembrance ; the rather to keepe your Engliſh tongue in breath, which was wont not to be the leaſt of your deſires. Would God you could make vs happie with newes, not of truce, but ſincere amitie and vnion ; not of Prouinces, but ſpirits. The God of ſpirits effect it both here and there, to the glory of his Name and Church.

To W. J. condemned for murder.

Ep. VIII. Effectually preparing him, and (vnder his name) whatſoeuer Malefactor for his death.

IT is a bad cauſe that robbeth vs of all the comfort of friends ; yea, that turnes their remembrance into ſorrow. None can do ſo, but thoſe that proceed from our ſelues: for outward euils, which come from the infliction of others, make vs cleaue faſter to our helpers, and cauſe vs to ſeeke and find eaſe in the very commiſeration of thoſe that loue vs : whereas thoſe griefes which ariſe from the iuſt diſpleaſure of conſcience, will not abide ſo much as the memorie of others affection ; or if it doe, makes it ſo much the greater corraſiue, as our caſe is more vncapable of their comfort. Such is yours. You haue made the mention of our names tedious to your ſelfe, and yours to vs. This is the beginning of your paine, that you had friends : If you may now ſmart ſoundly from vs, for your good, it muſt be the only ioy you muſt expect, and the finall dutie we owe to you. It is both vaine and comfortleſſe, to heare what might haue beene ; neither would I ſend you backe to what is paſt, but purpoſely to increaſe your ſorrow ; who haue cauſed all our comfort to ſtand in your teares. If therefore our former counſels had preuailed, neither had your hands ſhed innocent blood, nor iuſtice yours. Now, to your great ſinne, you haue done the one ; and the other muſt bee done to your paine : and we your well-willers, with ſorrow and ſhame liue to be witneſſes of both. Your ſinne is gone before, the reuenge of iuſtice will follow : ſeeing you are guilty, let God be iuſt. Other ſinnes ſpeake, this cryeth, and will neuer be ſilent, till it be anſwered with it ſelfe. For your life ; the caſe is hopeleſſe ; feede not your ſelfe with vaine preſumptions, but ſettle your ſelfe to expiate anothers blood with your own. Would God your deſert had beene ſuch, that we might with any comfort haue deſired you might liue. But now, alas, your fact is ſo hainous, that your life can neither bee craued without iniuſtice, nor be protracted without inward torment. And if our priuate affection ſhould make vs deafe to the ſhouts of blood, and partialitie ſhould teach vs to forget all care of publique right ; yet reſolue, there is no place for hope. Since then you could not liue guiltleſſe, there remaines nothing, but that you labour to die penitent ; and ſince your bodie cannot bee ſaued aliue, to endeuour that your ſoule may be ſaued in death. Wherein, how happy ſhall it be for you, if you ſhall yet giue eare to my laſt aduice ; too late indeed for your recompence to the world, not too late for your ſelfe. You haue deſerued death, and expect it : Take heed leſt you ſo faſten your eyes vpon the firſt death of the bodie, that you ſhould not looke beyond it to the ſecond, which alone is worthy of trembling, worthy of teares.

For, this, though terrible to Nature, yet is common to vs, with you. You muſt die: what doe we elſe ? And what differs our end from yours, but in haſte and violence ?

hall, J.

And who knowes whether in that? It may be a ſickneſſe as ſharpe, as ſudden, ſhall fetch vs hence: it may be the ſame death, or a worſe, for a better cauſe: Or if not ſo, there is much more miſery in lingring: He dies eaſily, that dies ſoone: but the other is the vtmoſt vengeance that God hath reſerued for his enemies: This is a matter of long feare, and ſhort paine. A few pangs let the ſoule out of priſon: but the torment of that other is euerlaſting; after ten thouſand yeares ſcorching in that flame, the paine is neuer the neerer to his ending. No time giues it hope of abating; yea, time hath nothing to doe with this eternitie. You that ſhall feele the paine of one minutes dying, thinke what paine it is to be dying for euer and euer. This, although it be attended with a ſharpe paine, yet is ſuch as ſome ſtrong ſpirits haue endured without ſhew of yeeldance. I haue heard of an Iriſh Traitor, that when he lay pining vpon the wheele with his bones broke, asked his friend if he changed his countenance at all; caring leſſe for the paine, than the ſhew of feare. Few men haue died of greater paines, than others haue ſuſtained and liue. But that other ouerwhelmes both bodie and ſoule, and leaues no roome for any comfort in the poſſibilitie of mitigation. Here, men are executioners, or diſeaſes; there fiends. Thoſe Deuils that were ready to tempt the graceleſſe vnto ſinne, are as ready to follow the damned with tortures. Whatſoeuer become of your carkaſe, ſaue your ſoule from the flames; and ſo manage this ſhort time you haue to liue, that you may die but once. This is not your firſt ſinne; yea, God hath now puniſhed your former ſinnes with this: a fearfull puniſhment in it ſelfe, if it deſerued no more: your conſcience (which now begins to tell truth) cannot but aſſure you, that there is no ſinne more worthy of hell, than murder; yea, more proper to it. Turne ouer thoſe holy leaues (which you haue too much neglected, and now ſmart for neglecting) you ſhall finde murderers among thoſe that are ſhut out from the preſence of God: you ſhall find the Prince of that darkneſſe, in the higheſt ſtile of his miſchiefe, termed a man-ſlayer. Alas! how fearefull a caſe is this, that you haue herein reſembled him, for whom Topheth was prepared of old; and imitating him in his action, haue endangered your ſelfe to partake of his torment! Oh, that you could but ſee what you haue done, what you haue deſerued; that your heart could bleed enough within you, for the blood your hands haue ſhed: That as you haue followed Satan our common enemy in ſinning, ſo you could defie him in repenting: That your teares could diſappoint his hopes of your damnation. What a happie vnhappineſſe ſhall this be to your ſad friends, that your better part yet liueth? That from an ignominious place your ſoule is receiued to glory? Nothing can effect this but your repentance; and that can doe it. Feare not to looke into that horror, which ſhould attend your ſinne: and be now as ſeuere to your ſelfe, as you haue beene cruell to another. Thinke not to extenuate your offence with the vaine titles of manhood: what praiſe is this, that you were a valiant murderer? Strike your owne breſt (as Moſes did his Rocke) and bring downe riuers of teares to waſh away your blood-ſhed. Doe not ſo much feare your iudgment, as abhorre your ſinne; yea, your ſelfe for it. And with ſtrong cries lift vp your guilty hands to that God whom you offended, and ſay, Deliuer me from blood-guiltineſſe O Lord. Let me tell you: As without repentance there is no hope; ſo with it, there is no condemnation. True penitence is ſtrong, and can grapple with the greateſt ſinne, yea with all the powers of hell. What if your hands be red with blood? Behold, the blood of your Sauiour ſhall waſh away yours: If you can bathe your ſelfe in that; your Scarlet ſoule ſhall bee as white as Snow. This courſe alone ſhall make your Croſſe the way to the Paradiſe of God. This plaiſter can heale all the ſores of the ſoule, if neuer ſo deſperate: Onely, take heed that your heart bee deepe enough pierced, ere you lay it on; elſe, vnder a ſeeming skin of diſſimulation, your ſoule ſhall feſter to death. Yet ioy vs with your true ſorrow, whom you haue grieued with your offence; and at once comfort your friends, and ſaue your ſoule.

To Mr. Iohn Mole, of a long time now priſoner vnder the Inquiſition at Rome.

Epist. IX. Exciting him to his wonted conſtancy, and encouraging him to Martyrdome.

What paſſage can theſe lines hope to find into that your ſtrait and curious thraldome? Yet who would not aduenture the loſſe of this paines for him, which is readie to loſe himſelfe for Chriſt? what doe we not owe to you which haue thus giuen your ſelfe for the common faith? Bleſſed be the name of that God who hath ſingled you out for his Champion, and made you inuincible; how famous are your bonds? how glorious your conſtancy? Oh, that out of your cloſe obſcurity, you could but ſee the honour of your ſuffering, the affections of Gods Saints, and in ſome, an holy enuie at your diſtreſſed happineſſe. Thoſe wals cannot hide you: No man is attended with ſo many eies from earth & heauen: The Church your Mother beholds you, not with more compaſſion, than ioy: Neither can it be ſayd, how ſhee at once pities your miſery, and reioyces in your patience: The bleſſed Angels looke vpon you with gratulation and applauſe. The aduerſaries with an angry ſorrow to ſee themſelues ouercome by their captiue, their obſtinate cruelty ouer-matched with humble reſolution, and faithfull perſeuerance. Your Sauiour ſees you from aboue, not as a meere ſpectator, but as a patient with you, in you, for you: yea, as an agent in your indurance and victory, giuing new courage with the one hand, and holding out a Crowne with the other. Whom would not theſe ſights incourage? who now can pity your ſolitarines? The hearts of all good men are with you. Neither can that place be but full of Angels, which is the continuall obiect of ſo many prayers, yea the God of heauen was neuer ſo neere you, as now you are remoued from men. Let me ſpeake a bold, but true word. It is as poſſible for him to be abſent from his heauen, as from the priſons of his Saints. The glorified ſpirits aboue ſing to him; the perſecuted ſoules below, ſuffer for him, and cry to him; he is magnified in both, preſent with both; the faith of the one, is as pleaſing to him, as the triumph of the other. Nothing obligeth vs men ſo much, as ſmarting for vs; words of defence are worthy of thanks, but paine is eſteemed aboue recompence. How doe we kiſſe the wounds which are taken for our ſakes, & profeſſe that we would hate our ſelues, if we did not loue thoſe that dare bleed for vs? How much more ſhall the God of mercies bee ſenſible of your ſorrowes, and crowne your patience? To whom you may truly ſing that ditty of the Prophet, Surely for thy ſake am I ſlaine continually, and am counted as a ſheepe for the ſlaughter. What need I to ſtir vp your conſtancy, which hath already amazed, and wearied your perſecutors? No ſuſpicion ſhall driue me hereto; but rather the thirſt of your praiſe. He that exhorts to perſiſt in well-doing, while he perſwades, commendeth: Whither ſhould I rather ſend you, than to the ſight of your owne Chriſtian fortitude? which neither prayers, nor threats, haue beene able to ſhake: Here ſtands on the one hand, liberty, promotion, pleaſure, life, and (which eaſily exceeds all theſe) the deare reſpect of wife and children (whom your only reſolution ſhall make widow and orphanes) theſe with ſmiles, and vowes, and teares, ſeeme to importune you. On the other hand, bondage, ſolitude, horror, death, (and the moſt lingring of all miſeries) ruine of poſterity: theſe with frownes and menaces labour to affright you: Betwixt both, you haue ſtood vnmoued; fixing your eyes either right forward vpon the cauſe of your ſuffering, or vpwards vpon the crowne of your reward: It is an happy thing when our own actions may be either examples, or arguments of good. Theſe bleſſed proceedings call you on to your perfection; The reward of good beginnings proſecuted, is doubled; neglected, is loſt. How vaine are thoſe temptations, which would make you a loſer of all this praiſe, this recompence? Goe on therefore happily; keepe your eyes where they are, and your heart cannot be but where it is, and where it ought: Looke ſtill, for what you ſuffer, and for whom: For the truth, for Chriſt: what can be ſo precious as truth? Not life it ſelfe. All earthly things are not ſo vile to life, as life to truth; Life is momentarie, Truth eternall; Life is ours, the truth, Gods: Oh happy purchaſe, to giue our life for the truth. What can we ſuffer too much for Chriſt? He hath giuen our life to vs; hee hath giuen his owne life for vs. What great thing is it, if he require what he hath giuen vs, if ours for his? Yea, rather if he call for what he hath lent vs; yet not to bereaue, but to change it; giuing vs gold for clay, glory for our corruption. Behold that Sauiour of yours weeping, and bleeding, and dying for you: alas! our ſoules are too ſtrait for his ſorrowes; wee can be made but paine for him; He was made ſinne for vs: wee ſuſtaine, for him, but the impotent anger of men; he ſtrugled with the infinite wrath of his Father for vs. Oh, who can endure enough for him, that hath paſſed thorow death and hell for his ſoule? Thinke this, and you ſhall reſolue with David, I will bee yet more vile for the Lord. The worſt of the deſpight of men, is but Death; and that, if they inflict not, a diſeaſe will; or if not that, Age. Here is no impoſition of that, which would not be; but an haſtning of that which will be: an haſtning to your gaine. For behold, their violence ſhall turne your neceſſitie, into vertue and profit. Nature hath made you mortall: none but an enemie can make you a Martyr; you muſt die, though they will not; you cannot die for Chriſt, but by them. How could they elſe deuiſe to make you happie? ſince the giuer of both liſes hath ſaid, He that ſhall loſe his life for my ſake ſhall ſaue it. Loe, this alone is loſt with keeping, and gained by loſſe. Say you were freed, vpon the ſafeſt conditions, and returning: (as how welcome ſhould that newes bee, more to yours, than to your ſelfe) perhaps, Death may meet you in the way, perhaps ouertake you at home: neither place, nor time, can promiſe immunitie from the common deſtinie of men: Thoſe that may abridge your houres, cannot lengthen them; and while they laſt, cannot ſecure them from vexation; yea, themſelues ſhall follow you into their duſt; and cannot auoid what they can inflict; death ſhall equally tyrannize by them, and ouer them: ſo their fauours are but fruitleſſe, their malice gainfull. For it ſhall change your Priſon into Heauen, your Fetters into a Crowne, your Iaylors to Angels, your miſerie into glory. Looke vp to your future eſtate, and reioyce in the preſent: Behold, the Tree of Life, the hidden Manna, the Scepter of power, the Morning-Starre, the white garment, the new name, the Crowne, and Throne of Heauen, are addreſſed ſor you. Ouercome and enioy them: oh glorious condition of Martyrs! whom conformity in death, hath made like their Sauiour in bleſſedneſſe; whoſe honour is to attend him for euer, whom they haue ioyed to imitate. What are theſe which are araied in long white robes, and whence came they? Theſe are (ſayes that heauenly Elder) they which came out of great tribulation, and waſhed their long Robes, and haue made their Robes white, in the blood of the Lambe.

Therefore they are in the preſence of the Throne of God, and ſerue him day and night in his Temple: and he that ſitteth on the Throne, will dwell among them, and gouerne them, and lead them vnto the liuely Fountaines of waters, and God ſhall wipe all teares from their eyes.

All the elect haue Seales in their fore-heads: but Martyrs haue Palmes in their hands. All the elect haue white Robes; Martyrs, both white and long: white, for their glory; long, for the largeneſſe of their glory. Once red with their owne bloud; now white with the bloud of the Lambe: there is nothing in our bloud, but weake obedience; nothing but merit in the Lambes bloud. Behold, his merit makes our obedience glorious. You doe but ſprinkle his feet with your bloud; loe, hee waſhes your long white Robes, with his. Euery drop of your bloud is anſwered with a ſtreame of his; and euery drop of his is worth Riuers of ours: Precious in the ſight of the Lord is the death of his Saints : Precious in preuention, precious in acceptation, precious in remuneration. Oh, giue willingly that which you cannot keepe, that you may receiue what you cannot leeſe. The way is ſteepe, but now you breathe towards the top. Let not the want of ſome few ſteps, loſe you an eternall reſt. Put to the ſtrength of your owne Faith : The prayers of Gods Saints ſhall further your pace ; and that gracious hand that ſuſtaines heauen and earth, ſhall vphold, and ſweetly draw you vp to your glory. Goe on to credit the Goſpell with your preſeuerance : and ſhew the falſe-hearted clients of that Roman-Court, that the Truth yeelds reall and hearty profeſſors ; ſuch as dare no leſſe ſmart, than ſpeake for her.

Without the wals of your reſtraint, where can you looke beſide incouragements of ſuffering ? Behold in this, how much you are happier than your many predeceſſors. Thoſe haue found friends, or wiues, or children, the moſt dangerous of all tempters. Suggeſtions of weakneſſe, when they come masked with loue, are more powerfull to hurt. But you, all your many friends, in the valour of their Chriſtian loue, wiſh rather a bleſſed Martyr, than a liuing and proſperous reuolter : yea, your deare wife (worthy of this honour, to be the wife of a Martyr) prefers your faith, to her affection ; and in a courage beyond her ſex, contemnes the worſt miſery of your loſſe ; profeſſing ſhee would redeeme your life with hers, but that ſhe would not redeeme it with your yeeldance : and while ſhe lookes vpon thoſe many pawnes of your chaſte loue, your hopefull children, wiſhes rather to ſee them fatherleſſe, than their father vnfaithfull : The greateſt part of your ſufferings are hers : She beares them with a cheerefull reſolution : She diuides with you in your ſorrowes, in your patience ; ſhe ſhall not bee diuided in your glory : For vs, we ſhall accompany you with our prayers, and follow you with our thankfull commemorations ; vowing to write your name in red letters in the Kalendars of our hearts ; and to regiſter it in the monuments of perpetuall Records, as an example to all poſterity, The memoriall of the iuſt ſhall be bleſſed.

To all READERS.

Ep. X. Containing Rules of good aduice for our Chriſtian and ciuill cariage.

I Grant, breuity where it is neither obſcure, nor defectiue, is very pleaſing, euen to the daintieſt indgments. No maruell therefore, if moſt men deſire much good counſell in a narrow roome ; as ſome affect to haue great perſonages drawne in little tablets; or, as we ſee worlds of Countries deſcribed in the compaſſe of ſmall maps : Neither do I vnwillingly yeeld to follow them; for both the powers of good aduice are the ſtronger when they are thus vnited ; and breuity makes counſell more portable for memorie, and readier for vſe. Take theſe therefore for more ; which as I would faine practiſe, ſo am I willing to commend. Let vs begin with him who is the firſt and laſt : Informe your ſelfe aright concerning God ; without whom, in vaine doe we know all things : Be acquainted with that Sauiour of yours, which paid ſo much for you on earth, and now ſues for you in heauen ; without whom we haue nothing to doe with God, nor he with vs. Adore him in your thoughts, truſt him with your ſelfe : Renew your ſight of him euery day, and his of you. Ouer-looke theſe earthly things ; and when you doe at any time caſt your eyes vpon heauen, think, there dwels my Sauiour, there I ſhall be. Call your ſelfe to often recknings ; caſt vp your debts, payments, graces, wants, expences, employments ; yeeld not to thinke your ſet deuotions troubleſome : Take not eaſie denials from your ſelfe ; yea, giue peremptory denials to your ſelfe : Hee can neuer bee good that flatters himſelfe : hold nature to her allowance ; and let your will ſtand at courteſie : happy is that man which hath obtained to be the maſter of his owne heart. Thinke all Gods outward fauours and prouiſions the beſt for you : your owne abilitie, and actions the meaneſt. Suffer not your mind to be either a Drudge, or a Wanton ; exerciſe it euer, but ouer-lay it not : In all your buſineſſes, looke through the world, at God ; whatſoeuer is your leuell, let him be your ſcope : Euery day take a view of your laſt ; and thinke either it is this, or may be : Offer not your ſelfe either to honour, or labour ; let them both ſeeke you : Care you onely to be worthy, and you cannot hide you from God. So frame your ſelfe to the time and company, that you may neither ſerue it, nor ſullenly neglect it ; and yeeld ſo far, as you may neither betray goodneſſe, nor countenance euill. Let your words be few, and digeſted: It is a ſhame for the tongue to cry the heart mercy, much more to caſt it ſelfe vpon the vncertaine pardon of others eares. There are but two things which a Chriſtian is charged to buy, and not to ſell, Time and Truth ; both ſo precious, that we muſt purchaſe them at any rate. So vſe your friends, as thoſe which ſhould be perpetuall, may be changeable. While you are within your ſelfe, there is no danger : but thoughts once vttered muſt ſtand to hazard. Do not heare from your ſelfe, what you would be loth to heare from others. In all good things, giue the eye and eare the full of ſcope, for they let into the mind : reſtraine the tongue, for it is a ſpender. Few men haue repented them of ſilence. In all ſerious matters, take counſell of dayes, and nights, and friends ; and let leiſure ripen your purpoſes: neither hope to gaine ought by ſuddenneſſe. The firſt thoughts may be confident, the ſecond are wiſer. Serue honeſty euer, though without apparent wages : ſhee will pay ſure, if ſlow. As in apparell, ſo in actions, know not what is good, but what becomes you. How many warrantable acts haue miſ-ſhapen the Authors ? Excuſe not your owne ill, aggrauate not others : and if you loue peace, auoid cenſures, compariſons, contradictions. Out of good men chuſe acquaintance ; of acquaintance, friends ; of friends, familiars : after probation admit them, and after admittance change them not: Age commendeth friendſhip. Doe not alwayes your beſt : it is neither wiſe, nor ſafe for a man euer to ſtand vpon the top of his ſtrength. If you would bee aboue the expectation of others, be euer below your ſelfe. Expend after your purſe, not after your mind : take not where you may deny, except vpon conſcience of deſert, or hope to requite. Either frequent ſuits, or complaints, are weariſome to a friend. Rather ſmother your griefes and wants as you may, than be either querulous, or importunate. Let not your face belie your heart, nor alwayes tell tales out of it : he is fit to liue amongſt friends or enemies, that can be ingenuouſly cloſe. Giue freely, ſell thriftily : Change ſeldome your place, neuer your ſtate : either amend inconueniences, or ſwallow them, rather then you ſhould run from your ſelfe to auoid them.

In all your recknings for the world, caſt vp ſome croſſes that appeare not ; either thoſe will come, or may : Let your ſuſpicions be charitable ; your truſt fearfull ; your cenſures ſure. Giue way to the anger of the great : The thunder and cannon will abide no fence. As in throngs we are afraid of loſſe ; ſo while the world comes vpon you, looke well to your ſoule ; There is more danger in good than in euill : I feare the number of theſe my rules ; for Precepts are wont (as nayles) to driue out one another : but theſe, I intended to ſcatter amongſt many : and as I was loth that any gueſt ſhould complaine of a niggardly hand ; Dainty diſhes are wont to be ſparingly ſerued out : homely ones ſupply in their bigneſſe, what they want in their worth.

TO THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, AND MY VERY good Lord, THOMAS, Lord Biſhop of LONDON, I. H. wiſheth all Grace and Happineſſe.

Right Reuerend and Honourable:

I Know there is ſtore of Sermons extant: The Pulpit ſcarce affordeth more than the Preſſe. I adde to the number, and complaine not: in all good things, abundance is an eaſie burden. If the ſoule may feed it ſelfe with varietie, both by the eare, and by the eye, it hath no reaſon to finde fault with choice. But if any weaker ſtomacke (as in our bodily Tables) ſhall feare to ſurfet at the ſight of too much, it is eaſie for that man to looke off, and to confine his eyes to ſome few: Who cannot much ſooner abate to himſelfe, than multiply to another? Let not his nice ſullenneſſe preiudice that delight and profit which may ariſe to others from this number. For mee, I dare not be ſo enuious, as not to bleſſe God for this plenty, and ſeriouſly to reioyce that Gods people may thus liberally feaſt themſelues by both their ſenſes: neither know I for whether more: The ſound of the word ſpoken pierceth more; the letter written endureth longer: the eare is taught more ſuddenly, more ſtirringly; the eye with leiſure and continuance. According to my poore abilitie, I haue deſired to doe good both wayes; not ſo much fearing cenſures, as caring to edifie. This little labour ſubmiſſely offers it ſelfe to your Lordſhip, as iuſtly yours: being both preached at your call, and (as it were) in your charge, and by one vnder the charge of your fatherly iuriſdiction, who vnfainedly deſires by all meanes to ſhew his true heart to Gods Church, together with his humble thankefulneſſe to your Lordſhip: and profeſſeth ſtill to continue

MATTH. Chap. 5. Verſ. 20.

Except your righteouſneſſe exceed the righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, ye ſhall not enter into the kingdome of heauen.

THE curious Doctors of the Iewes had reduced all Gods ſtatute-law to ſix hundred and thirteene precepts; ſo many as there are dayes in the yeere, and members in the body. It was an honeſt and (which were ſtrange) a Chriſtian conceit of one of their Rabbins, that Dauid abridges all theſe to eleuen, in his Pſalme 15. Eſay to ſix, in his 33. 15. Michai yet lower to three, in his 6, 8. Eſay yet againe to two, in his 56. 1. Habacuc to one, The iuſt man ſhall liue by faith. So yee ſee, the Law ends in the Goſpell: and that Father ſaid not amiſſe, The Law is the Goſpell foretold; and the Goſpell is the Law fulfilled. Theſe two are the freehold of a Chriſtian; and what but they?

The Iewes of theſe times peruerted the Law, reiected the Goſpell. Our Sauiour therefore, that great Prophet of the world (as it was high time) cleares the Law, deliuers and ſettles the Goſpell, well approuing in both theſe, that he came not to conſume, but to conſummate the Law. Wherein (as Paul to his Corinths) he had a great doore, but many aduerſaries: amongſt theſe were the great maſters of Iſrael (ſo our Sauiour tearmes the Phariſes) and their fellowes (and yet their riuals) the Scribes: both ſo much harder to oppoſe, by how much their authority was greater.

Art thou a Maſter in Iſrael?

Truth hath no roome till falſhood be remoued: Our Sauiour therefore (as behooueth) firſt ſhewes the falſhood of their Gloſſes, and the hollowneſſe of their profeſſion: and if both their life and doctrine be naught; what free part is there in them? And loe both of theſe ſo faulty, that Except your righteouſneſſe exceed the righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, ye ſhall not enter into the kingdome of Heauen.

What were the men? What was their righteouſneſſe? What wanted it? Follow me, I beſeech you, in theſe three: and if my diſcourſe ſhall ſeeme, for a while, more thorny and perplexed, remedy it with your attention.

Thoſe things which are out of the ken of ſenſe or memory, muſt be fetcht from Story. The Sect (or order whether) of the Phariſes ceaſed with the Temple; ſince that, no man reades of a Phariſe; and now is growne ſo farre out of knowledge, that the moderne Iewes are more ready to learne of vs who they were: There is no point, wherein it is more difficult to auoid variety, yea oſtentation of reading ; without any curious trauerſing of opinions, I ſtudy for ſimple truth, as one that will not lead you out of the rode-way to ſhew you the turnings. Scribes were ancient ; Ezra is called (Sopher mahir) a prompt Scribe. As long before him, ſo euer ſince they continued till Chriſts time ; but in two rankes ; ſome were γραμματεῖς λαοῦ ; others νόμου. Some popular, others legall ; Some the peoples ; others, Gods ; the one, Secretaries, Recorders, Notaries, as 2 Chron: 24. 11. (Sopher hamelec) the Kings Scribe : The other Doctors of the Law of God : The Law of the Lord is with vs, in vaine made he it, the penne of the Scribe is in vaine.

Act. 15. 5.

As the Phariſes were (νομοδιδάσκαλοι ;) Law maſters : ſo theſe are the ſame which Luke 11. 45. are called (νομικοὶ) interpreters of the Law. Tho to ſome not meane Critickes it ſeemes theſe ſhould be a third ſort ; which conſider not that our Sauiour on purpoſe addreſſing his ſpeech to the Phariſes, fell by the way vpon the Scribes ; and being admoniſhed by one of them, as of an ouer-ſight, now auerres right downe of the Scribes, what before he had but indifferently glanced at. What they were, is plaine by Ezraes pulpit, and Moſes his chaire. Theſe and Phariſes differed not ſo much ; they agreed in ſome good, but in more euill. But the profeſſion of Phariſes, becauſe it is more obſcure, you ſhall giue me leaue to fetch ſomewhat further.

There were, ſaith old Egeſippus (as Euſebius cites him) diuers opinions in the Circumciſion ; which all croſſed the Tribe of Iuda : Eſſens, Galileans, Emerobaptiſts, Masbutheans, Samaritans, Phariſes, Sadduces. It were eaſie to helpe him with more, Sebuans, Cannaeans, Sampſeans ; and if need were, yet more. Where are thoſe wauerers, that ſtagger in their truſt to the Church, becauſe of different opinions, receiuing that rotten argument of profane Celſus againſt the Chriſtians ? Say the Papiſts, one ſaith I am Caluins, another, I am Luthers. We diſclaime, we defie theſe titles, theſe diuiſions : we are one in truth : would God we were yet more one : It is the lace and fringe of Chriſts garment that is queſtioned amongſt vs, the cloth is ſound. But what ? Was the Iewiſh Church before Chriſt, Gods true Church, or not ? If it were not, which was it ? If it were : lo that here rent in more then eight parts, & one of them differing from it ſelfe in eighteene opinions : and yet as Irenaus well obſerues, Before Chriſt, there were neither ſo many hereſies, nor ſo blaſphemous.

Shew me a Church on earth without theſe wrinkles of diuiſion, and I will neuer ſeeke for it in heauen : although to ſome, Phariſaiſme ſeemes rather a ſeuerall order, then a ſect : but S. Luke that knew it better, hath (αἵρεσιν φαρισαίων) the ſect of the Phariſes. When the Profeſſion began, no hiſtory recordeth. Some would faine fetch them Eſay 65. 5. Touch me not, for I am holier then thou. But theſe ſtraine too farre ; for in the verſe before, the ſame men eat Swines fleſh ; which to the Phariſes is more then piacular. Heare briefly their name, their original, their office. Their name (though it might admit of other probable deriuations, yet) by conſent of all * Hebrew Doctors (I haue a great author for it) is fetcht from ſeparation ; tho vpon what grounds, all agree not ; doubtleſſe for the perfection of their doctrine, and auſterity of life. Their originall is more intricate ; which after ſome ſcanning, I haue thus learned of ſome great Maſters of Iewiſh Antiquities. Before there was any open breach in the old Iewiſh Church, there were two generall and diuers conceits about Gods ſeruice : One that tooke vp onely with the law of God ; and if they could keepe that, thought they needed no more ; neither would they ſapere ſupra ſcriptum, be wiſer than their Maker : Theſe were called (Karraim) of which ſort there are diuers at this day in Conſtantinople, and other-where, at deadly feod with the other Iewes, which they now call Rabbiniſts.

In eam conſentiunt omnes Hebræi, teſte Babal. Haruch, Pagnin. in פרש Ar. Montanus Ioſ. Scal. I. Druſius, &c.

The other, that thought it ſmall thanks to doe onely what they were bidden ; Gods Law was too ſtraight for their holineſſe : It was nothing, vnleſſe they did more than content God, earne him (for theſe were popiſh Iewes) and ſupererrogate of him. Theſe were therefore called Chaſidim, Holy, aboue the Law. They plyed God with vnbidden oblations, gaue more than needed, did more than was commanded ; yet ſo, as both parts pleaſed themſelues, reſiſted not the other. The more franke ſort vpbraided not the other, with too much niggardlineſſe; neither did the ſtraiter-handed enuy the other for too much lauiſhneſſe. Would God we could doe thus. They agreed, though they differed. But now, when theſe voluntary ſeruices began to be drawne into Canons (as Scaliger ſpeaketh) and that which was before but arbitrary, was impoſed as neceſſary, (neceſſary for beleefe, neceſſary for action) queſtions aroſe, and the rent began in the Iewes. Thoſe dogmaticall Doctors which ſtood for ſupererogation, and traditions aboue Law, were called (Peruſchim) Phariſes; ſeparate frō the other in ſtrict iudgement, in ſuperfluous holineſſe: Theſe, as they were the brood of thoſe (Chaſidim) whom wee find firſt mentioned in the Machabees, by the corrupt name of Aſideans; ſo from them againe, in a ſecond ſucceſſion proceeded (as their more refined iſſue) the Eſſens, both Collegiate and Eremiticall: Theſe Phariſes then, were a fraternitie or College of extraordinary deuotion; whoſe rule was Tradition, whoſe practiſe voluntary auſtereneſſe: To them the Scribes ioyned themſelues, as the purer Iewes; for Paul calls them [ἀκριβεστάτην αἵρεσιν] the moſt exquiſite ſect; yea, &(as Ioſephus) the beſt expoſitors; willingly expounding the law according to their Traditiōs, & countenancing their traditions by the forced ſenſes of the Law. Both which profeſſions were greatly inlarged & graced by two famous Doctors, Sammai & Hillel (whom ſome, though falſly, would haue the founders of them) not long before Chriſts time; for old Hillel of a 120. yeeres, protracted his daies by likely cōputation, to ten yeeres after Chriſts birth. How Hierom fetcheth their names with more wittines than probabilitie, from Diſſipating & Profaning the Law; and what bickerings & deadly quarels were euen amongſt themſelues in thoſe two famous houſes; and what were the foure expoſitions of the Law which they followed, I liſt not now to diſcourſe. Their imploiment was, expounding the Law, and vrging Traditions; therefore their auditors had wont to ſay, when they called one another to Church (as S^t^. Hierome tells vs) [οἱ σοφοὶ δευτερῶσι] The wiſe, that is, the Phariſes, expound to day. Whence perhaps, that may be interpreted of S. Paul to the Corinths, Where is the wiſe? where is the Scribe? So did the Scribes too; but the difference was, that the Scribes were more Textuall, the Phariſes more Traditionall: therefore obſerue, that the Scribe findes fault with the ſuſpicion of blaſphemy; the Phariſe, with vnwaſhen hands: the Scribes (their Doctors) exceld for learning, the Phariſes for piety. Their attire was the ſame, and their faſhions: but the Phariſes had [πολιτείας μείζω] more ſway; and were more ſtrict and Cappucine-like; profeſſed more yeeres continency; and in a word, tooke more paines to goe to hell. Theſe did ſo carry away the hearts of the Iewes, that there was no holy man, which was not tearmed a Phariſe; and therefore among the ſeuen kindes of Phariſes in their Talmud, they make Abraham a Phariſe of Loue, Iob a Phariſe of Feare. And if from the men you caſt your eyes vpon their righteouſneſſe, you cannot but wonder at the curioſity of their zeale. Wherein looke (I beſeech you) firſt at their deuotion, then their holy carriage, laſtly their ſtrict obſeruation of the Law.

Such was their deuotion, that they prayed [συνεχῶς] as a Father ſaith, oft and long: thriſe a day was ordinary; at nine, twelue, and three a clocke: yea their progenitors (whom they would ſcorne not to match) diuided the day into three parts; whereof one was beſtowed on prayer, the next on the Law, the third on their worke. See here, God had two parts of three, themſelues but one: beſides at their meales what ſtrictneſſe?

Their very diſciples were taught (to ſhame vs Chriſtians) if they had forgotten to giue thankes, to returne from the field to the boord to ſay grace. For diuine ſeruice; the Decalogue muſt be read once a day of euery man: the Scribes ſay the firſt watch; the Phariſes, any houre of the night: others, twice, without mouing eye, hand, foot, in a cleane place, free from any excrement, and foure cubits diſtant from any ſepulchre. For faſting, they did it twice a weeke; not popiſhly (which Wickliffe iuſtly calls Foole-faſting) but in earneſt; on Monday and Thurſday. Beſides (to omit their almes, which were euery way proportionable to the reſt) what miſerable penance did they wilfully? They beat their heads againſt the walls, as they went, till bloud came: whence one of their ſeuen Phariſes is called (Kizai) a Phariſe-draw-bloud: They put thornes in their skirts, to ſting them themſelues; they lay, on plankes, on ſtones, on thornes: and Banus that that Heremiticall Phariſe drencht himſelfe oft, night and day, in cold water [πρὸς ἁγνείαν] for chaſtity; or (if you read it without an aſpiration) it ſignifies for folly rather: what could that apiſh and ſtigmaticall Frier haue done either more or worſe? This was their deuotion. The holineſſe of their carriage was ſuch, that they auoided euery thing that might carry any doubt of pollution: they would not therefore conuerſe with any different religion; and this Law went currant amongſt them: He that eats a Samaritans bread, be as he that eats ſwines fleſh. An Hebrew Midwife might not helpe a Gentile; not bookes, not wax, not incenſe, might be ſold to them: yea, no familiarity might be ſuffered with their owne vulgar. For whereas there were three ranks among the Iewes; the wiſe, (thoſe were the Phariſes) their Diſciples, and the populus terræ, (as they called them) this was one of the ſix reproaches to a nouice of the Phariſes, To eat with the vulgar ſort: and leſt (when they had beene abroad) they ſhould haue beene toucht by any, contrary to the warning of their phylacteries, they ſcoure themſelues at their returne; and eat not, vnleſſe they haue waſht [πυγμῇ] that is, accurately, as the Syriac; oft, as Eraſmus; or with the grip't fiſt, as Beza following Hierome. And not with euery water (marke the niceneſſe) but with that onely which they had drawne vp with their owne labour: and to make vp the meaſure of their pretended ſanctimony, they vowed continency, not perpetuall (as our Romaniſts vrge) but for eight or tenne yeeres. Thus they did vnbidden. How ſtrictly did they performe what was inioyned? No men ſo exact in their tithes: I pay tithes of all, ſaith the boaſting Phariſe: Of all (as a great Doctor noteth) it was more than he needed. God would haue a Sabbath kept; they ouerkeepe it. They would not on that day ſtop a running veſſell, not lay an apple to the fire, not quench a burning, not knocke on a table to ſtill a childe: what ſhould I note more? not rub or ſcratch in publike. God commands them to weare (Totaphoth) phylacteries: they do (which our Sauiour reproues) [πλατύνουσι] enlarge them: and theſe muſt be written with right lines in a whole parchment of the hide of a cleane beaſt. God commands to celebrate and roſt the Paſſeouer; they will haue it done (in an exceſſe of care) not with an iron, but a woodden ſpit, and curiouſly chuſe the wood of Pomegranate: God commanded to auoid Idolatry; they taught their Diſciples, if an Image were in the way, to fetch about ſome other; if they muſt needs goe that way, to runne: and if a thorne ſhould light in their foot (neere the place) not to kneele, but ſit downe to pull it out, leſt they ſhould ſeeme to giue it reuerence. I weary you with theſe Iewiſh niceties. Conſider then how deuout, how liberall, how continent, how true dealing, how zealous, how ſcrupulous, how auſtere theſe men were, and ſee if it be not a wonder that our Sauiour thus brandeth them; Except your righteouſneſſe exceed the righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, yee ſhall not enter into the Kingdome of Heauen: That is, If your doctrine be not more righteous, you ſhall not be entred of the Church: if your holineſſe be not more perfect, you ſhall not enter into heauen: behold, Gods kingdome below and aboue is ſhut vpon them.

The poore Iewes were ſo beſotted with the admiration of theſe two, that they would haue thought if but two men muſt go to heauen, the one ſhould be a Scribe, the other a Phariſe. What ſtrange newes was this from him that kept the keyes of Dauid, that neither of them ſhould come there? It was not the perſon of theſe men, not their learning, not wit, not eloquence, not honour they admired ſo much, but their righteouſneſſe: and loe nothing but their righteouſnes is cenſured: Herein they ſeemed to exceed all men: herein all that would be ſaued, muſt exceed them. Doe but thinke how the amazed multitude ſtared vpon our Sauiour, when they heard this Paradox. Exceed the Phariſes in righteouſneſſe? It were much for an Angell from Heauen. What ſhall the poore ſonnes of the earth doe, if theſe Worthies be turned away with a repulſe? yea perhaps, your ſelues, all that heare me this day, receiue this not without aſtoniſhment and feare, whiles your conſciences ſecretly comparing your holineſſe with theirs, finde it to come as much ſhort of theirs, as theirs of perfection. And would to God you could feare more, and be more amazed with this compariſon; for (to ſet you forward) muſt we exceed them, or elſe not be ſaued? If we let them exceed vs, what hope, what what poſſibilitie is there of our ſaluation? Ere we therefore ſhew how farre we muſt goe before them, looke backe with me (I beſeech you) a little, and ſee how farre we are behinde them.

They taught diligently, and kept Moſes his chaire warme: how many are there of vs, whom the great Maſter of the Vineyard may finde loytering in this publike market-place, and ſhake vs by the ſhoulder with a Quid ſtatis otioſi? Why ſtand you here idle?

Matth.23.3.

They compaſt ſea and land (Satans walke) to make a proſelyte: we ſit ſtill and freeze in our zeale, and loſe proſelytes with our dull and wilfull neglect. They ſpent one quarter of the day in prayer: how many are there of vs that would not thinke this an vnreaſonable ſeruice of God? Wee are ſo farre from this extreme deuotion of the old Euchita, that we are rather worthy of a cenſure with thoſe Spaniſh Prieſts for our negligence. How many of you Citizens can get leaue of Mammon to beſtow one houre of the day in a ſet courſe, vpon God? How many of you Lawyers, are firſt clients to God, ere you admit others, clients to you? How many of you haue your thoughts fixed in Heauen, ere they be in Weſtminſter? Alas, what dulneſſe is this? what iniuſtice? All thy houres are his, and thou wilt not lend him one of his owne for thine owne good. They read, they recited the Law, (ſome) twice a day; neuer went without ſome parts of it about them: but to what effect? There is not one of our people (ſaith Ioſephus) but anſwers to any queſtion of the Law as readily as his owne name. How ſhall their diligence vpbraid, yea condemne vs? Alas! how doe our Bibles gather duſt for want of vſe, while our Chronicle, or our Statute-booke, yea perhaps our idle and ſcurrilous play-bookes, are worne with turning? Oh how happy were our fore-fathers (whoſe memory is bleſſed for euer) if they could with much coſt and more danger get but one of Pauls Epiſtles in their boſomes; how did they hugge it in their armes, hide it in their cheſt, yea in their hearts! How did they eat, walk, ſleep, with that ſweet companion, and in ſpight of perſecution, neuer thought themſelues well, but when they conuerſed with it in ſecret! Lo now theſe ſhops are all open, we buy them not; theſe books are open, we read them not, and we will be ignorant becauſe we will. The Sunne ſhines and we ſhut our windowes. It is enough for the miſerable Popiſh Laitie to be thus dark, that liue in the perpetual night of Inquiſition. Shall this be the only difference betwixt them and vs; that they would reade theſe holy leaues, & may not; we may, & will not? There is no ignorance, to the wilfull. I ſtand not vpon a formall and verball knowledge: that was neuer more frequent, more flouriſhing. But if the maine grounds of Chriſtianity were throughly ſetled in the hearts of the multitude, we ſhould not haue ſo much cauſe of ſhame and ſorrow, nor our aduerſaries of triumph and inſultation. Shew leſſe therefore for Gods ſake, and learne more; and ballace your wauering heart with the ſound truth of godlineſſe, that you may flie ſteadily thorow all the tempeſts of errours. Make Gods Law of your learned counſell with Dauid, and be happy. Elſe if you will needs loue darkneſſe, you ſhall haue enough of it: you haue here inward darkneſſe, there outward (σκότος ἐξώτερον) This is your owne darkneſſe, that his of whom the Pſalmiſt; He ſent darkneſſe, and it was darke: Darke indeed: A thicke and terrible darkneſſe, ioyned with weeping and gnaſhing. I vrge not their awfull reuerence in their deuotion, our ſleepy or wilde careleſneſſe; their auſtere and rough diſcipline of the bodie, our wanton, pampering of the fleſh; though who can abide to thinke of a chaſte Phariſe, and a filthy Chriſtian? a temperate Phariſe, and a drunken Chriſtian? how ſhamefully is this latter vice (eſpecially) growne vpon vs with time? we knew it once in our ordinary ſpeech appropriated to beggers, now gallants fight for it. This beaſtlineſſe had wont be baſhfull, now it is impudent; once children were wont to ſhout at a drunkard (as ſome foule wonder) now not to be drunke is quarrell enough among men, among friends: Thoſe knees that we were wont to bow to the God of Heauen, are now bent to Bacchus, in a paganiſh, beſtiall, deuilliſh deuotion. To leaue the title of Chriſtians, for ſhame let vs be either men or beaſts. My ſpeech haſtens to their holy and wiſe ſtrictneſſe of carriage; wherein I can neuer complaine enough of our inequality: They haced the preſence, the fire, the faſhion, the bookes of a Gentile, of a Samaritane; neither was there any hatred loſt on the Samaritans part; for if he had but toucht a Iew, hee would haue throwne himſelfe into the water, cloathes and all: both of them equally ſicke of a Noli me tangere; Touch me not, for I am holier, Eſay 65.

Our Romiſh Samaritanes haunt our tables, our cloſets, our eares; we frowne not, we diſlike not: We match, conuerſe, conferre, conſult with them careleſly, as if it were come to the old ſtay of that indifferent Apelles in Euſebius; Sat eſt credere in crucifixum: but that which I moſt lament, and yee, Fathers and Brethren, if my voice may reach to any whom it concerneth, in the bowels of Chriſt let me boldly (though moſt vnworthy) moue your wiſdoms, your care to redreſſe it. Our young ſtudents (the hope of poſterity) newly crept out of the ſhell of Philoſophie, ſpend their firſt houres in the great Doctors of Popiſh controuerſies; Bellarmine is next to Ariſtotle: yea, our very vngrounded Artizans, young Gentlemen, fraile Women, buy, reade, trauerſe promiſcuouſly the dangerous Writings of our ſubtileſt Ieſuits. What is the iſſue? Many of them haue taken poyſon, ere they know what milke is; and when they haue once taſted this bane, they muſt drinke and die. Oh what pity, what vexation is it to a true heart, to ſee vs thus rob'd of our hopes; them of their ſoules! I haue heard, yea I haue ſeene and enuied the cautelous ſeueritie of our Aduerſaries, which vpon the deepeſt paines forbid the ſale, yea the ſight of thoſe Authors, which they terme infectious; where was euer Caluin publikely bought in one of their Church-yards? where euer read without licence, without ſecurity? I cenſure not this as the peculiar fault of this place: would God this open remiſſeneſſe were not a common euill, and had not ſpred it ſelfe wide thorow all thoſe Churches that are gone out of Babylon. Let no man tell me of the diſtinction of that old Canoniſt: Some things (ſaith he) we reade leſt they ſhould be neglected, as the Bible; ſome leſt they ſhould be vnknowne, as Arts and Philoſophie; ſome that they may be reiected, as Hereticall bookes. True; But let them reade that can reiect, that can confute; we diſtruſt not our cauſe, but their weake iudgements. A good Apothecary can make a good medicine of a ſtrong poyſon; muſt children therefore be allowed that box? I know how vnworthy I am to aduiſe; only I throw downe my ſelfe at your feet, and beſeech you, that our loſſes and their examples may make vs no leſſe wiſe in our generation.

I follow the compariſon; They paid tithes of all they had: not a pot-herbe, but they tithed it. Heare this ye ſacrilegious Patrons, the merchants of ſoules, the Pirats of the Church, the enemies of religion; they tithed all; you nothing; they paid to their Leuites, your Leuites muſt pay to you: Your Cures muſt be purchaſed, your tithes abated or compounded for: O the ſhame of Religion! How too iuſtly may I vſurpe of you that of Seneca? Pettie ſacrileges are puniſhed, while great ones ride in triumph. Neuer excuſe it with pretence of Ceremonie; Moſes neuer gaue ſo ſtrict a charge for this, as Paul [ἐν πᾶσιν ἀγαθοῖς] communicate all thy goods with thy Teacher; All, with an emphaſis. Wel-fare yet the honeſt Phariſes, whoſe rule was: (Decima vt diues fias) Tithe and be rich: If euer thou be the fatter for this grauell, or the richer with that thou ſtealeſt from God, let me come to begge at thy doore.

Gal. 6. 6.

Woe to you ſpirituall robbers. Our blinde forefathers clothed the Church; you deſpoile it: their ignorant deuotion ſhall riſe in iudgement againſt your rauening couetouſneſſe. If robbery, ſimony, periury will not carry you to hell; hope ſtill that you may be ſaued. They gaue plentifull almes to the poore: we in ſtead of filling their bellies, grinde their faces. What excellent Lawes had we lately enacted that there ſhould be no begger in Iſrael? Let our ſtreets, wayes, hedges, witneſſe the execution. Thy liberality releeues ſome poore. It is well. But hath not thy oppreſſion made more? Thy vſury, extorting, racking, incloſing, hath wounded whole Villages, and now thou befriendeſt two or three with the plaiſters of thy bounty. The mercies of the wicked are cruel. They were preciſe in their Sabbath; we ſo looſe in ours, as if God had no day: See whether our Tauerns, ſtreets, high-waies deſcry any great difference. Theſe things I vowed in my ſelfe to reproue, if too bitterly, (as you thinke) pardon (I beſeech you) this holy impatience: and blame the fouleneſſe of theſe vices, not my iuſt vehemency. And you (Chriſtian hearers) than which no name can be dearer: be perſwaded to ranſacke your ſecure hearts; and if there be any of you whoſe awaked conſcience ſtrikes him for theſe ſinnes, and places him below theſe Iewes in this vnrighteouſneſſe, if you wiſh or care to be ſaued, thinke it high time, as you would euer hope for entrance into Gods Kingdome, to ſtrike your ſelues on the thigh, and with amazement and indignation to ſay, What haue I done? to abandon your wicked courſes; to reſolue, to vow, to ſtriue vnto a Chriſtian and conſcionable reformation. Paul, a Phariſe, was according to the righteouſneſſe of the Law vnreproueable: yet if Paul had not gone from Gamaliels feet, to CHRISTS, he had neuer beene ſaued. Vnreproueable, and yet reiected? Alas, my brethren, what ſhall become of our gluttony, drunkenneſſe, pride, oppreſſion, bribing, couſenages, adulteries, blaſphemies, and our ſelues for them? God and men reproue vs for theſe; what ſhall become of vs? If the ciuilly righteous ſhall not be ſaued, where ſhall the notorious ſinner appeare? A Chriſtian below a Iew? For ſhame, where are we? where is our emulation? Heauen is our goale, we all runne; loe the Scribes and Phariſes are before thee; what ſafety can it be to come ſhort of thoſe that come ſhort of Heauen? Except your righteouſneſſe, &c.

Phil. 6. 3.

You haue ſeene theſe Scribes and Phariſes; their righteouſneſſe and our vnrighteouſneſſe. See now with like patience, their vnrighteouſneſſe that was, and our righteouſneſſe that muſt be, wherein they failed, and we muſt exceed. They failed then in their Traditions and Practice. May I ſay they failed, when they exceeded? Their Traditions exceeded in number and proſecution, faulty in matter.

To runne well, but out of the way, (according to the Greeke Prouerbe) is not better than to ſtand ſtill. Fire is an excellent thing: but if it be in the top of the chimney, it doth miſchiefe rather. It is good to be zealous in ſpight of all ſcoffes, but [ἐν καλῷ] in a good thing. If they had beene as hot for God, as they were for themſelues, it had beene happy: but now in vaine they worſhip me (ſaith our Sauiour) teaching for doctrines the Traditions of men. Hence was that axiome receiued currantly amongſt their Iewiſh followers: There is more in the words of the wiſe than in the words of the Law: More; that is, more matter, more authoritie: and from this principally ariſes and continues that mortall quarrell betwixt them and their (Karraim) and (Minim) vnto this day. A great Ieſuite (at leaſt that thinks himſelfe ſo) writes thus in great earneſt: The Phariſes (ſaith he) may not vnfitly be compared to our Catholikes. Some men ſpeake truth ignorantly, ſome vnwillingly; Caiaphas neuer ſpake truer, when he meant it not: one egge is not liker to another, than the Tridentine Fathers to theſe Phariſes in this point, beſides that of free-will, merit, full performance of the Law, which they abſolutely receiued from them: For marke, With the ſame reuerence and deuotion doe wee receiue and reſpect Traditions, that we doe the Bookes of the Old and New Teſtament, ſay thoſe Fathers in their fourth Seſſion: Heare both of theſe ſpeake, and ſee neither; if thou canſt diſcerne whether is the Phariſe, refuſe me in a greater truth. Not that we did euer ſay with that Arrian in Hilary: We debarre all words that are not written: or would thinke fit with thoſe phanaticall Anabaptiſts of Munſter, that all bookes ſhould be burnt beſides the Bible: ſome Traditions muſt haue place in euery Church; but, Their place: they may not take wall of Scripture: Subſtance may not in our valuation giue way to circumſtance, God forbid. If any man expect that my ſpeech on this opportunity ſhould deſcend to the diſcourſe of our contradicted ceremonies, let him know that I had rather mourne for this breach than meddle with it. God knowes how willingly I would ſpend my ſelf into perſwaſions if thoſe would auaile any thing: but I well ſee that teares are fitter for this Theame than words. The name of our Mother is ſacred, and her peace precious. As it was a true ſpeech cited from that Father by Bellarmine: The war of Heretikes is the peace of the Church: ſo would God our experience did not invert it vpon vs: The war of the Church is the peace of Heretikes. Our diſcord is their muſicke; our ruine their glory: Oh what a ſight is this, Brethren ſtriue, while the enemy ſtands ſtill, and laughs and triumphs. If we deſired the griefe of our common mother, the languiſhing of the Goſpel, the extirpation of Religion, the loſſe of poſteritie, the aduantage of our aduerſaries, which way could theſe be better effected than by our diſſentiōs? That Spaniſh Prophet in our Age (for ſo I finde him ſtiled) when King Philip asked him how hee might become maſter of the Low-Countries, anſwered: If he could diuide them from themſelues; According to that old Machiuellian principle of our Ieſuites, Diuide and Rule. And indeed it is concord onely (as the Poeſie or Mot of the vnited States runs) which hath vpheld them in a rich and flouriſhing eſtate againſt ſo great and potent enemies. Our Aduerſaries already brag of their victories: and what good heart can but bleed to ſee what they haue gained ſince we diſſented; to foreſee what they will gaine? They are our mutuall ſpoiles that haue made them proud and rich. If you euer therefore looke to ſee the good daies of the Goſpell, the vnhorſing and confuſion of that ſtrumpet of Rome, for Gods ſake, for the Churches ſake, for our owne ſoules ſake, let vs all compoſe our ſelues to peace and loue: Oh pray for the peace of Ieruſalem: that peace may be within her walls and proſperitie within her palaces.

Concordiâ res paruæ creſcunt, &c.

Noſtrâ miſeriâ tu es magnus de Pomp. Mimus.

For the matter of their Traditions, our Sauiour hath taxed them in many particulars; about waſhings, oathes, offerings, retribution: whereof he hath ſaid enough when hee hath tearmed their doctrine, the Leauen of the Phariſes, that is, ſowre and ſwelling. S. Hierome reduces them to two heads: They were Turpia anilia; ſome ſo ſhamefull that they might not bee ſpoken; others idle and dotiſh; both ſo numerous that they cannot be reckoned. Take a taſte for all; and to omit their reall Traditions, heare ſome of their interpretatiue. The Law was, that no Leper might come into the Temple; their Tradition was, if he were let downe thorow the roofe, this were no irregularity. The Law was, a man might not carry a burthen on the Sabbath: their Traditionall gloſſe; if he caried ought on one ſhoulder, it was a burthen; if on both, none. If ſhooes alone, no burthen; if with nailes, not tolerable. Their ſtint of a Sabbaths iourney was a thouſand cubits; their gloſſe was, That this is to be vnderſtood without the walls: but if a man ſhould walke all day thorow a Citie as bigge as Niniue, he offends not. The Church of Rome ſhall vie ſtrange gloſſems and ceremonious obſeruations with them, whether for number or for ridiculouſneſſe. The day would faile mee if I ſhould either epitomize the volume of their holy rites, or gather vp thoſe which it hath omitted. The new elected Pope in his ſolemne Lateran proceſſion muſt take copper money out of his Chamberlaines lap, and ſcatter it among the people, and ſay; Gold and ſiluer haue I none. Seuen yeeres penance is inioyed to a deadly ſinne; becauſe Miriam was ſeparated ſeuen daies for her leproſie; and God ſayes to Ezekiel, I haue giuen thee a day for a yeere. Chriſt ſaid to Peter, Lanch forth into the deepe: therefore he meant that Peters ſucceſſor ſhould catch the great fiſh of Conſtantines donation. But I fauour your eares. That one I may not omit, how S. Hierome, whom they fondly terme their Cardinall, compares ſome Popiſh faſhions of his time with the Phariſaicall; who when he had ſpoken of their purple fringes in the foure corners of their (Tallin) and the thornes which theſe Rabbins tie in their skirts, for penance, and admonition of their dutie: Hoc apud nos (ſaith he) ſuperſtitioſæ mulierculæ in parvulis Euangelijs, in crucis ligno & iſtiuſmodi rebus factitant: That is, Thus ſuperſtitious old wiues doe amongſt vs with little Goſpels of Ioh. with the wood of the Croſſe, and the like. Thus that Father directly taxeth this Romiſh vſe: who if he were now aliue, and ſhould heare their Church groaning vnder the number of Ceremonies more than the Iewiſh, would (beſides holy Auſtins complaint) redouble that cenſure of our Sauiours, Woe to you Scribes, Phariſes, hypocrites: for yee finde heauy burthens and grieuous to be borne, and lay them on mens ſhoulders. I forbeare to ſpeake of the erroneous opinions of theſe Iewiſh Maſters concerning that Pythagorian tranſanimation or paſſage of the ſoule from one body to another (a point which the Iewes had learned from them, Matth. 16.14.) concerning the not riſing vp of the wicked, Aſtronomicall deſtinie, free will, merit of workes, perfection of obedience; in euery of which it were eaſie to loſe my ſelfe and my ſpeech. I haſte to their maine vnrighteouſneſſe; which was not ſo much the planting of theſe ſtocks, which God neuer ſet, as the graffing of all holineſſe & Gods ſeruice, vpon them; a faſhionable obſeruation of the outward letter, with neglect of the true ſubſtance of the Law; a vaine-glorious oſtentation of piety and perfection; and more care to be thought, than to be good; a greater deſire to be great, than good; crueltie and oppreſſion coloured with deuotion. My ſpeech now towards the cloſure ſhall draw it ſelfe vp within theſe two liſts; of their Hypocriſie, their Worldlineſſe: Hypocriſie in Faſhionableneſſe and Oſtentation; Worldlineſſe in Couetouſneſſe, Ambition. Only ſtirre vp your ſelues a while, and ſuffer not your Chriſtian attention to faile in this laſt act.

Some of their Rabbins ſay well, that God requires two things concerning his law; Cuſtodie and Worke. Cuſtodie in the heart; worke in the execution: Theſe vnſound and ouerly Phariſes did neither. It was enough if they kept the Law in their hands; ſo they had a formall ſhew of godlineſſe, it was enough: if the outſide of the platter were cleane, they cared for no more. God had charged them to binde the Law to their hand, and before their eyes, Deut.6. wherein, as Ierome and Theophylact well interpret it, he meant the meditation and practiſe of his Law: they, like vnto the fooliſh Patient, which when the Phyſitian bids him take that preſcript, eats vp the paper; if they could get but a liſt of parchment vpon their left arme next their heart, and another ſcroll to tie vpon their forehead, and foure corners of fringe, or (if theſe be denied) a red threed in their hand, thought they might ſay with SAVL, Bleſſed be thou of the Lord, I haue done the commandement of the Lord. That Opus operatum of the Papiſts (for I ſtill parallel them) is not more falſe Latine than falſe Diuinity: it is not the outſide of thy obedience that God cares for, if neuer ſo holy, neuer ſo glorious; it is enough that men are couſened with theſe flouriſhes: the heart and the reins are thoſe that God looks after. What cares a good market-man how good the fleece be, when the liuer is rotten? God doth not regard faſhion ſo much as ſtuffe. Thou deceiueſt thy ſelfe, if thou thinke thoſe ſhewes that bleared the eyes of the world, can deceiue him. God ſhall ſmite thee thou whited wall, God ſhall ſmite thee. Doeſt thou thinke he ſees not how ſmoothly thou haſt dawbed on thine whoriſh complexion? He ſees thee a far off, and hates thee while thy paraſites applaud thy beauty. I ſpeake not of this carrion-fleſh which thou wantonly infecteſt with the falſe colours of thy pride, which God ſhall once waſh off with riuers of brimſtone: I ſpeake of thy painted ſoule, and thy counterfeit obedience. Giue me leaue (yea let me take it) to complaine that we are fallen into a cold and hollow age, wherein the religion of many is but faſhion, and their piety gilded ſuperſtition: Men care onely to ſeeme Chriſtians; if they can get Gods liuerie on their backes, and his name in their mouthes, they out-face all reproofes. How many are there, which if they can keepe their Church, giue an almes, bow their knee, ſay their prayers, pay their tithes, and once a yeere receiue the Sacrament (it matters not how corrupt hearts, how filthy tongues, how falſe hands they beare) can ſay in their hearts with Eſau, I haue enough my brother? As if God cared for this thy vaine formalitie; as if he hated thee not ſo much more than a Pagan, by how much thou wouldſt ſeeme more good. Be not deceiued: If long deuotions, ſad looks, hard penances, bountifull almes, would haue carried it (without the ſolid ſubſtance of godlineſſe) theſe Scribes and Phariſes had neuer beene ſhut out of heauen. Conſider this therefore (deare brethren) none but your owne eyes can looke into your hearts: we ſee your faces, the world ſees your liues; if your liues be not holy, your hearts ſound, though your faces were like Angels, you ſhall haue your portion with Deuils. Tell not me thou heareſt, prayeſt, talkeſt, beleeueſt: How liueſt thou? What doeſt thou? Shew me thy faith by thy workes, ſaith Iames. It was an excellent anſwer that good Moſes gaue to Lucius in the Church-ſtory: The faith that is ſeene, is better than the faith that is heard; and that of Luther not inferiour, that faith doth pingueſcere operibus, grow fat and well-liking with good workes. It is a leane ſtarued carcaſſe of faith thou pretendeſt without theſe. If profeſſion be all, the Scribes and Phariſes are before thee. Ranſacke thy heart, and finde ſound affection to God, firme reſolutions to goodneſſe, true hatred of ſinne: ranſacke thy life, and finde the truth of works, the life of obedience; then alone thy righteouſneſſe exceeds the righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, and thou ſhalt enter into Heauen. Their oſtentation followes; wherein it is ſtrange to conſider, how thoſe that cared not to be good, ſhould deſire yet to ſeeme good: ſo did theſe Phariſes. They would not faſt without a ſmeared face, face, not giue an almes without a trumpet, not pray without witneſſes. Scribes, Phariſes, hypocrites. They did act a religious part, they did but play deuotion. They were nothing beſide the ſtage: all for ſight, nothing for ſubſtance. Would God this vice of hypocriſie had either died with them, or had only hereditarily deſcended to their ſucceſſors. Satan will not let vs be thus happy. I ſee no mans heart: but I dare boldly ſay, the world is full of hypocriſie. By their fruits yee ſhall know them (ſaith our Sauiour:) By their fruits; not by the bloſſomes of good purpoſes, nor the leaues of good profeſſion, but by the fruits of their actions. Not to ſpeake how our mint and cummin hath incroched vpon iudgement and iuſtice: Search your ſelues (yee Citizens:) now you draw neere to God with your lips, with your eares, where is your heart? Here your deuout attention ſeemes to crie, The Lord is God: how many are there of you, that haue any God at home? how many that haue a falſe God? God at Church; Mammon in your ſhops? I ſpeake not of all; God forbid. This famous Citie hath in the darkeſt, in the wantoneſt times, afforded (and ſo doth) many, that haue done God honour, honeſty to the Goſpell. But how many are there of you that vnder ſmooth faces haue foule conſciences? Faire words, falſe meaſures, forſworne valuations, adulterate wares, griping vſuries, haue filled many of your coffers, and feſtered your ſoules: You know this, and yet like Salomons Curtizan you wipe your mouthes, and it was not you. Your almes are written in Church-windowes, your defraudings in the ſand; all is good ſaue that which appeares not. How many are there euery where, that ſhame Religion by profeſſing it? whoſe beaſtly life makes Gods truth ſuſpected: for as, howſoeuer the Samaritan, not the Iew, releeued the diſtreſſed traueller, yet the Iewes religion was true, not the Samaritans; ſo in others, truth of cauſes muſt not be iudged by acts of perſons; yet, as he ſaid, It muſt needs be good that Nero perſecutes; ſo who is not readie to ſay: It cannot be good that ſuch a miſcreant profeſſes? Woe to thee Hypocrite, thou canſt not touch, not name goodneſſe, but thou defileſt it; God will plague thee for acting ſo high a part: See what thou art, and hate thy ſelfe; or (if not that) yet ſee how God hates thee: he that made the heart, ſayes thou art no better than an handſome tombe; the houſe of death. Behold here a greene turfe, or ſmooth marble, or ingrauen braſſe, and a commending Epitaph; all ſightly: but what is within? an vnſauoury, rotten carcaſſe. Though thou were wrapt in gold, and perfumed with neuer ſo loud prayers, holy ſemblances, honeſt proteſtations; yet thou art but noyſome carrion to God: Of all earthly things, God cannot abide thee; and if thou wouldſt ſee how much lower yet his deteſtation reacheth, know that when he would deſcribe the torments of Hell, he calls them (as their worſt title) but the portion of hypocrites. Wherefore cleanſe your hands yee ſinners, and purge your hearts yee double minded: For vnleſſe your righteouſneſſe exceed the hypocriticall righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, yee ſhall not enter into the kingdome of Heauen. Iam.4.8. δίψυχοι.

My ſpeech muſt end in their Couetouſneſſe and Ambition: A paire of hainous vices. I ioyne them together: for they are not only brethren, but twins; yet ſo as the elder here alſo ſerues the younger. It is Ambition that blowes the fire of Couetouſneſſe. Oppreſſion gets wealth; that wealth may procure honour. Why doe men labour to be rich, but that they may be great? Their couetouſneſſe was ſuch; that their throat (an open ſepulchre) ſwallowed vp whole houſes of Widowes. Whence their goods are called by our Sauiour [τὰ ἐνόντα] not τὰ ὄντα, as if they were already in their bowels: and which was worſt of all, while their lips ſeemed to pray, they were but chewing of that morſell. Their Ambition ſuch, that they womaniſhly brawled and ſhouldred for the beſt ſeat; the higheſt pew: A title, a wall, a chaire, a cap, a knee, theſe were goodly cares for them that profeſſed grauitie, humilitie, mortification. Let me boldly ſay, Ieruſalem neuer yeelded ſo very Phariſes as Rome. Theſe old diſciples of Sammai and Hillel were not Phariſes in compariſon of our Ieſuites. From iudgement (you ſee) I am deſcended to practice: wherein it is no leſſe eaſily made good that theſe are more kindly Phariſes, than the ancient. A poore Widowes Cottage filled the panch of an old Phariſe; How many faire Patrimonies of deuout young Gentlemen * Druryed by them (pardon the word, it is their owne; the thing I know and can witneſſe) haue gone downe the throat of theſe Loyoliſts, let their owne Quodlibet and Catechiſme report. What ſpeake I of ſecular inheritances? theſe eyes haue ſeene no meane houſes of deuotion and charitie ſwallowed vp by them. As for their ambitious inſinuations, not only all their owne Religious enuiouſly crie downe, but the whole world ſees and rings of. What oare of State can ſtir without their rowing? What Kingdome either ſtands or falls without their intermedling? What noble Family complaines not of their proling and ſtealth? And all this with a ſterne face of ſad pietie and ſterne mortification. Yea what other is their great Maſter, but the King of Phariſes? who, vnder a pretence of ſimple pietie, challenges without ſhame to haue deuoured the whole Chriſtian world, the naturall inheritances of ſecular Princes, by the foiſted name of Peters patrimony, and now in moſt infamous and ſhameleſſe ambition calls great Emperours to his ſtirrup, yea to his foot-ſtoole. But what wander we ſo far from home? Væ nobis miſeris (ſaith S. Ierome) ad quos Phariſæorum vitia tranſierunt, (Woe to vs wretched men, to whom the Phariſes vices are deriued.) The great Doctor of the Gentiles long agoe ſaid, All ſeeke their owne, and not the things of God; and is the world mended with age? would God we did not finde it a ſure rule; that (as it is in this little world) the older it growes, the more diſeaſed, the more couetous: we are all too much the true ſonnes of our great grandmother; and haue each of vs an Eues ſweet tooth in our heads, we would be more than we are: and euery man would be either (τὶς) or (ὁ) either the man, or ſome-body. If a number of your conſciences were ript, O yee that would be Chriſtian Gentlemen, Lawyers, Citizens, what doe we thinke would be found in your mawes? Here the deuoured patrimonie of poore Orphans; there the commons of whole Townſhips: here the impropriate goods of the Church; their piles of vſury: here bribes and vnlawfull fees; there the raw and indigeſted gobbets of Simony: yea, would God I might not ſay, but I muſt ſay it, with feare, with ſorrow, euen of our ſacred & diuine profeſſion, that which our Sauiour of his Twelue, Yee are cleane, but not all. The multitude of our vnregarded Charges, and ſoules dying and ſtarued, for want of ſpirituall prouiſion, (while they giue vs bodily) would condemne my ſilence for too partiall. In all conditions of men (for particulars are ſubiect to enuie and exception) the daughters of the horſe-leach had neuer ſuch a fruitfull generation: They crie ſtill, Giue, Giue: not giue alone, that is, the bread of ſufficiencie; but giue, giue; that is, more than enough. But what is more than enough? What is but enough? What is not too little for the inſatiable gulfe of humane deſires? Euery man would ingroſſe the whole world to himſelfe, and with that ambitious Conquerour feares it will be too little; and how few Agurs are there, that pray againſt too much? From hence it is, that yee Courtiers grate vpon poore Trades with hard Monopolies. Hence, yee Merchants load them with deepe and vnreaſonable prices, and make them pay deare for daies. Hence yee great men wring the poore ſponges of the Commonaltie into your priuate purſes, for the maintenance of pride and exceſſe. Hence yee cormorant corne-mongers hatch vp a dearth in the time of plenty. God ſends graine, but many times the Deuill ſends garners. The earth hath beene no niggard in yeelding: but you haue beene lauiſh in tranſporting, and cloſe in concealing. Neuer talke of our extreme froſts: we ſee Gods hand, and kiſſe the rod; but if your hearts, your charitie, were not more frozen than euer the earth was, meane Houſe-keepers ſhould not need to beg, nor the meaneſt to ſtarue for want of bread. Hence laſtly, our loud oppreſſions of all ſorts crie to heauen, and are anſwered with threats, yea with variety of vengeances. Take this with thee yet, O thou worldling, which haſt the greedy-worme vnder thy tongue with Eſaies dogges, and neuer haſt enough; Thou ſhalt meet with two things as vnſatiable as thy ſelfe: the Graue and Hell; and thou, whom all the world could not ſatisfie, there be two things whereof thou ſhalt haue enough: Enough mould in the graue, enough fire in hell.

I loue not to end with a iudgement; and as it were to let my Sunne ſet in a cloud. We are all Chriſtians, we ſhould know the World what it is, how vaine, how tranſitorie, how

TO THE READER.

I Deſire not to make any Apologie for the Edition of this my Sermon: It is motiue enough, that herein I affect a more publike and more enduring good. Spirituall niceneſſe, is the next degree to vnfaithfulneſſe: this point cannot be too much vrged, either by the tongue, or Preſſe. Religion and our ſoules depend vpon it, yet are our thoughts too much beſide it. The Church of Rome ſo fixes her ſelfe (in her adoration) vpon the Croſſe of Chriſt, as if ſhe forgat his glorie: Many of vs ſo conceiue of him glorious, that we neglect the meditation of his Croſſe, the way to his glorie and ours. If we would proceed aright, we muſt paſſe from his Golgotha to the mount of Oliues, and from thence to heauen, and there ſeeke and ſettle our reſt. According to my weake abilitie, I haue led this way in my ſpeech, beſeeching my Readers to follow me with their hearts, that we may ouertake him which is entred into the true Sanctuarie, euen the higheſt heauens, to appeare now in the ſight of GOD for vs.

THE PASSION SERMON.

IOH. 19. VER. 30.

When Ieſus therefore had receiued the Vineger, he ſaid, It is finiſhed ; and bowing the head, he gaue vp the ghoſt.

THE bitter and yet victorious paſſion of the Sonne of God, (Right Honourable and beloued Chriſtians) as it was the ſtrangeſt thing that euer befell the earth ; ſo is both of moſt ſoueraigne vſe, and lookes for the moſt frequent and carefull meditation. It is one of thoſe things, which was once done, that it might bee thought of for euer. Euery day therefore muſt be the Good-Friday of a Chriſtian : who, with that great Doctor of the Gentiles, muſt deſire to know nothing but Ieſus Chriſt, and him crucified.

There is no branch or circumſtance in this wonderfull buſineſſe, which yeelds not infinite matter of diſcourſe. According to the ſolemnitie of this time and place, I haue choſen to commend vnto your Chriſtian attention, our Sauiours Farewell to Nature (for his reuiuing was aboue it) in his laſt word, in his laſt act. His laſt word, It is finiſhed ; his laſt act, He gaue vp the Ghoſt. That which he ſaid, hee did. If there be any theame that may challenge and command our eares and hearts, this is it : for behold, the ſweeteſt word that euer Chriſt ſpake, and the moſt meritorious act that euer he did, are met together, in this his laſt breath. In the one ye ſhall ſee him triumphing ; yeelding in the other; yet ſo as he ouercomes. Imagine therefore, that you ſaw Chriſt Ieſus, in this day of his paſſion (who is euery day here crucified before your eyes) aduanced vpon the Chariot of his Croſſe ; and now, after a weary conflict, cheerefully ouer-looking the deſpight and ſhame of men, the wrath of his Father, the Law, ſinne, death, hell ; which all lie gaſping at his foot : and then you ſhall conceiue, with what ſpirit he ſaith, Conſummatum eſt, It is finiſhed. What is finiſhed ? Shortly ; All the prophecies that were of him ; All legall obſeruations, that prefigured him ; his owne ſufferings ; our ſaluation. The prophecies are accompliſht, the ceremonies aboliſht, his ſufferings ended, our ſaluation wrought : theſe foure heads ſhall limit this firſt part of my ſpeech ; only let them finde and leaue you attentiue.

Euen this very word is propheſied of ; All things that are written of me haue an end, ſaith Chriſt. What end ? This, It is finiſhed. This very end hath his end here. What therefore is finiſhed ? Not this prediction only of his laſt draught, as Auguſtine : that were too particular. Let our Sauiour himſelfe ſay, All things that are written of mee by the Prophets. It is a ſure and conuertible rule ; Nothing was done by Chriſt, which was not foretold: Nothing was euer foretold by the Prophets of Chriſt, which was not done.

It would take vp a life to compare the Prophets and Euangeliſts, the predictions and the hiſtorie, and largely to diſcourſe how the one foretels, and the other anſwers: let it ſuffice to looke at them running. Of all the Euangeliſts, Saint Matthew hath beene moſt ſtudious, in making theſe reſferences and correſpondences; with whom, the burden or vnderſong of euery euent, is ſtill (vt impleretur) that it might be fulfilled. Thus hath he noted (if I haue reckoned them aright) two and thirtie ſeuerall prophecies concerning Chriſt, fulfilled in his birth, life, death.

To which S. Iohn addes many more. Our ſpeech muſt be directed to his Paſſion: Omitting the reſt, let vs inſiſt in thoſe.

He muſt be apprehended: it was fore-propheſied; The Anointed of the Lord was taken in their nets, ſaith Ieremie: but how? he muſt bee ſold: for what? for thirtie ſiluer peeces; and what muſt thoſe doe? buy a field: all foretold; And they tooke thirtie ſiluer peeces, the price of him that was valued, and gaue them for the potters field, ſaith Zacharie (miſwritten Ieremie, by one letter miſtaken in the abbreuiation.) By whom? That childe of perdition, that the Scripture might bee fulfilled. Which was hee? It is foretold; He that eateth bread with me, ſaith the Pſalmiſt. And what ſhall his Diſciples doe? Runne away: ſo ſaith the Prophecie: I will ſmite the ſhepherd, and the ſheepe ſhall be ſcattered, ſaith Zacharie. What ſhall bee done to him? Hee muſt bee ſcourged and ſpet vpon: behold, not thoſe filthy excrements could haue light vpon his ſacred face, without a prophecie; I hid not my face from ſhame and ſpetting, ſaith Eſay. What ſhall bee the iſſue? In ſhort, he ſhall be led to death: it is the prophecie, The Meſsias ſhall be ſlaine, ſaith Daniel: what death? He muſt be lift vp; Like as Moſes lift vp the Serpent in the wilderneſſe, ſo ſhall the Sonne of man bee lift vp. Chryſoſtome ſaith well, that ſome actions are parables; ſo may I ſay, ſome actions are prophecies, ſuch are all types of Chriſt, and this with the formoſt. Lift vp, whither? to the Croſſe: it is the prophecie, hanging vpon a tree, ſaith Moſes: how lift vp? nailed to it: ſo is the prophecie, Foderunt manus, They haue pierced my hands and my feet, ſaith the Pſalmiſt: With what companie? Two theeues: With the wicked was hee numbred, ſaith Eſay: Where? Without the gates, ſaith the prophecie: What becomes of his garments? They cannot ſo much as caſt the dice for his coat, but it is propheſied: They diuided my garments, and on my veſtures caſt lots, ſaith the Pſalmiſt. He muſt die then on the Croſſe: but how? voluntarily. Not a bone of him ſhall be broken: what hinders it? loe, there he hangs, as it were neglected and at mercie; yet all the raging Iewes, no, all the Deuils in hell cannot ſtir one bone in his bleſſed bodie: It was propheſied in the Eaſter-Lamb, and it muſt be fulfilled in him, that is the true Paſſeour, in ſpight of fiends and men: how then? he muſt be thruſt in the ſide: behold, not the very ſpeare could touch his precious ſide being dead, but it muſt be guided by a prophecie; They ſhall ſee him whom they haue thruſt thorow, ſaith Zacharie: what ſhall he ſay the while? not his very words but are fore-ſpoken: his complaint, Eli Eli lamma ſabactani, as the Chaldee, or עזבתני as the Hebrew, Pſal. 22. 2. his reſignation, In manus tuas, Into thy hands I commend my ſpirit, Pſal. 31. 5. his requeſt, Father forgiue them: He prayed for the tranſgreſſors, ſaith Eſay. And now when he ſaw all theſe prophecies were fulfilled, knowing that one remained, he ſaid I thirſt. Domine, quid ſitis? ſaith one, O Lord, what thirſteſt thou for? A ſtrange hearing, that a man, yea that GOD and MAN dying, ſhould complaine of thirſt.

Could he endure the ſcorching flames of the wrath of his Father, the curſe of our ſinnes, thoſe tortures of bodie, thoſe horrours of ſoule, and doth he ſhrinke at his thirſt? No, no: he could haue borne his drought, he could not beare the Scripture not fulfilled. It was not neceſſity of nature, but the neceſſitie of his Fathers decree, that drew forth this word, I thirſt. They offered it before, he refuſed it: Whether it were an ordinarie potion for the condemned to haſten death (as in the ſtorie of M. Antonie which is the moſt receiued conſtruction) or whether it were that Iewiſh potion, whereof the Rabbines ſpeake; whoſe tradition was, that the malefactor to be executed, ſhould after ſome good counſell from two of their Teachers, be taught to ſay; Let my death be to the remiſsion of all my ſinnes; and then that he ſhould haue giuen him a boule of mixt wine, with a graine of Frankincenſe, to bereaue him both of reaſon and paine.

Sit mors mea in remiſsionem omnium iniquitatũ mearum.

Vt vſus rationis tollatur.

I durſt be confident in this latter; the rather for that Saint Marke calls this draught, οἶνον ἐσμυρνισμένον, Myrrhe-wine, mingled (as is like) with other ingredients. And Montanus agrees with me in the end, Ad ſtuporem & mentis alienationem: A faſhion which Galatine obſerues out of the Sannedrim, to be grounded vpon Prou. 31. 6. Giue ſtrong drinke to him that is ready to periſh. I leaue it modeſtly in the middeſt; let the learneder iudge. Whatſoeuer it were, he would not die till he had complained of thirſt, and in his thirſt taſted it. Neither would he haue thirſted for, or taſted any but this bitter draught; that the Scripture might bee fulfilled; They gaue me vineger to drinke: And loe, now Conſummatum eſt; All is finiſhed.

If there be any Iew amongſt you, that like one of Iohns vnſeaſonable Diſciples, ſhall aske, Art thou he, or ſhall we looke for another? he hath his anſwer; Yee men of Iſrael, why ſtand you gazing and gaping for another Meſſias? In this alone, all the Prophecies are finiſhed; and of him alone, all was propheſied, that was finiſhed. Pauls old rule holds ſtill, To the Iewes a ſtumbling blocke; and that more ancient curſe of Dauid, Let their table bee made a ſnare: And Steuens two brands ſticke ſtill in the fleſh of theſe wretched men: One in their necke, ſtiffe-necked; the other in their heart, vncircumciſed; the one, Obſtinacie; the other, Vnbeleefe: ſtiffe necks indeed, that will not ſtoope and relent with the yoke of ſixteene hundred yeeres iudgement and ſeruilitie; vncircumciſed hearts, the filme of whoſe vnbeleefe would not be cut off with ſo infinite conuictions. Oh mad and miſerable Nation! let them ſhew vs one prophecie that is not fulfilled, let them ſhew vs one other in whom all the prophecies can be fulfilled, and we will mix pittie with our hate: If they cannot, and yet reſiſt, their doome is paſt; Thoſe mine enemies, that would not haue me to reigne ouer them, bring them hither, and ſlay them before me. So let thine enemies periſh, O Lord.

ἀπερίτμητοι.

But what goe I ſo far? Euen amongſt vs (to our ſhame) this riotous age hath bred a monſtrous generation (I pray God I be not now in ſome of your boſomes, that heare me this day) compounded, much like to the Turkiſh religion, of one part, Chriſtian; another, Iew; a third, worldling; a fourth, Atheiſt; a Chriſtians face, a Iewes heart, a worldlings life; and therefore Atheous in the whole; that acknowledge a God, and know him not; that profeſſe a Chriſt, but doubt of him; yea, beleeue him not: The foole hath ſaid in his heart, There is no Chriſt. What ſhall I ſay of theſe men? They are worſe than deuils: that yeelding ſpirit could ſay, Ieſus I know: and theſe miſcreants are ſtill in the old tune of that tempting deuill; Si tu es filius Dei, If thou be the Chriſt. Oh God, that after ſo cleare a Goſpell, ſo many miraculous confirmations, ſo many thouſand martyrdomes, ſo many glorious victories of truth, ſo many open confeſsions of Angels, men, deuils, friends, enemies; ſuch conſpirations of heauen and earth, ſuch vniuerſall conteſtations of all Ages and people; there ſhould be left any ſparke of this damnable infidelitie in the falſe hearts of men. Behold then, yee deſpiſers, and wonder, and vaniſh away: Whom haue all the Prophets foretold? or what haue the prophecies of ſo many hundreds, yea thouſands of yeeres, foreſaid, that is not with this word finiſhed? who could foretell theſe things, but the Spirit of God? who could accompliſh them, but the Sonne of God? He ſpake by the mouth of his holy Prophets, ſaith Zacharie: he hath ſpoken, and he hath done; one true God in both: none other ſpirit could foreſay theſe things ſhould be done; none other power could doe theſe things, thus fore-ſhewed: this word therefore can fit none but the mouth of God our Sauiour, It is finiſhed. We know whom we haue beleeued; Thou art the Chriſt the Sonne of the liuing God. Let him that loues not the Lord Ieſus be accurſed to the death.

Aug. ad Hie. Dum volunt & Iudæi eſſe & Chriſtiani, nec Iudæi ſunt, nec Chriſtiani.

Thus the prophecies are finiſhed: Of the legall obſeruations, with more breuitie. Chriſt is the end of the Law: What Law? Ceremoniall, Morall. Of the Morall; it was was kept perfectly by himſelfe; ſatisfied fully for vs: Of the Ceremoniall; it was referred to him, obſerued of him, fulfilled in him, aboliſht by him. There were nothing more eaſie, than to ſhew you how all thoſe Iewiſh Ceremonies lookt at Chriſt: how Circumciſion, Paſſeouer, the Tabernacle, both outer and inner, the Temple, the Lauer, both the Altars, the Tables of Shew-bread, the Candleſtickes, the Vaile, the Holy of Holies, the Arke, the Propitiatorie, the pot of Manna, Aarons Rod, the High Prieſt, his Order & Line; his Habits, his Inaugurations, his Waſhings, his Anointings, his Sprinklings, Offerings, the Sacrifices, ἱλαστικὰ, εὐχαριστικὰ, and what euer Iewiſh Rite; had their vertue from Chriſt, relation to him, and their end in him. This was then their laſt gaſpe; for, now ſtraight they died with Chriſt, now the vaile of the Temple rent: as Auſtin well notes out of Matthewes order; It tore then, when Chriſts laſt breath paſſed. That conceit of Theophylact is wittie; that as the Iewes were wont to rend their garments, when they heard blaſphemie: ſo the Temple not enduring theſe execrable blaſphemies againſt the Sonne of God, tore his vaile in peeces. But that is not all: the vaile rent, is the obligation of the rituall Law cancelled; the way into the heauenly Sanctuarie opened; the ſhadow giuing roome to the ſubſtance: in a word, it doth that which Chriſt ſaith, Conſummatum eſt. Euen now then the law of Ceremonies died: It had a long and ſolemne buriall, as Auguſtine ſaith well; perhaps figured in Moſes, who died not lingeringly, but was thirtie dayes mourned for: what meanes the Church of Rome to digge them vp, now rotten in their graues? and that, not as they had beene buried, but ſowen with a plenteous increaſe; yea, with the inuerted vſurie of too many of you Citizens; ten for one. It is a graue and deepe cenſure of that reſolute Hierome; Ego è contrario loquar, &c. I ſay, ſaith he, and in ſpight of all the world dare maintaine, that now the Iewiſh ceremonies are pernicious and deadly; and whoſoeuer ſhall obſerue them, whether hee bee Iew or Gentile, in barathrum Diaboli devolutum; ſhall frie in Hell for it. Still Altars? ſtill Prieſts? ſacrifices ſtill? ſtill waſhings? ſtill vnctions? ſprinkling, ſhauing, puriſying? ſtill all, and more than all? Let them heare but Auguſtines cenſure, Quiſqui nunc, &c. Whoſoeuer ſhall now vſe them, as it were raking them vp out of their duſt, hee ſhall not be Pius deductor corporis, ſed impius ſepulturæ violator; an impious and ſacrilegious wretch, that ranſacks the quiet tombes of the dead.

ϑυμιατήριον. ϑυσιαστήριον.

Ex quo apparet tunc ſciſſum eſſe, cùm Chriſtus emiſit ſpiritum.

Ceremoniæ ſicut defuncta corpora neceſſariorum officijs deducenda erant ad ſepulturā, non ſimulatè, ſed religioſè, nec deſerenda continuò. Auguſtin. Ego è contrario loquar, & reclamante mundo liberâ voce pronunciem, ceremonias Iudæorū pernicioſas eſſe, & mortiferas, & quicunq; eas obſeruauerit, ſiue ex Iudæis ſiue ex Gentibus, in barathrum diaboli deuolutum. Hier. Quiſquis nunc ea celebrare voluerit, tanquam ſopitos cineres eruens, non erit pius, &c.

I ſay not that all Ceremonies are dead; but the Law of Ceremonies, and of Iewiſh. It is a ſound diſtinction of them, that profound Peter Martyr hath in his Epiſtle to that worthy Martyr, Father, Biſhop Hooper: Some are typicall, fore-ſignifying Chriſt to come: ſome of order and decencie, thoſe are abrogated, not theſe: the Iewes had a faſhion of Propheſying in the Churches; ſo the Chriſtians from them, as Ambroſe: the Iewes had an eminent pulpit of wood; ſo we: they gaue names at their Circumciſion; ſo we at Baptiſme: they ſung Pſalmes, melodiouſly in Churches, ſo doe we: they paid and receiued tithes, ſo doe we: they wrapt their dead in linnen with odors; ſo we: the Iewes had ſureties at their admiſſion into the Church; ſo wee: theſe inſtances might be infinite: the Spouſe of Chriſt cannot be without her laces, and chaines, and borders. Chriſt came not to diſſolue order. But thou O Lord, how long? how long ſhall thy poore Church finde her ornaments, her ſorrowes? and ſee the deare ſonnes of her wombe, bleeding about theſe apples of ſtrife: let me ſo name them, not for their value (euen ſmall things, when they are commanded, looke for no ſmall reſpect) but for their euent: the enemie is at the gates of our Siracuſe; how long will we ſuffer our ſelues, taken vp with angles and circles in the duſt: yee Men, Brethren, and Fathers, helpe; for Gods ſake put to your hands, to the quenching of this common flame: the one ſide by humilitie and obedience; the other by compaſſion; both by prayers and teares: who am I, that I ſhould reuiue to you the ſweet ſpirit of that diuine Auguſtine, who when he heard and ſaw the bitter contentions betwixt two graue and famous Diuines, Ierome and Ruffine; Heu mihi, ſaith he, qui vos alicubi ſimul inuenire non poſſum; Alas, that I ſhould neuer finde you two together, how I would fall at your feet, how I would embrace them, and weepe vpon them, and beſeech you, either of you for other, and each for himſeſe, both of you for the Church of God, but eſpecially, for the weake, for whom Chriſt died, who not without their owne great danger, ſee you two fighting in this Theatre of the world. Yet let me doe what he ſaid he would doe; begge for peace, as for life: by your filiall pietie to the Church of God, whoſe ruines follow vpon our diuiſions; by your loue of Gods truth; by the graces of that one bleſſed Spirit, whereby we are all informed and quickned; by the precious bloud of that Sonne of God, which this day, and this houre, was ſhed for our redemption, be inclined to peace and loue: and though our braines be different, yet let our hearts be one. It was, as I heard, the dying ſpeech of our late reuerend, worthy and gracious Dioceſan; Modo me moriente viuat ac floreat Eccleſia; Oh, yet if, when I am dead, the Church may liue and flouriſh.

What a ſpirit was here? what a ſpeech? how worthy neuer to die? how worthy of a ſoule ſo neere to his heauen? how worthy of ſo happy a ſucceſſion? Yee whom God hath made inheritours of this bleſſed care, who doe no leſſe long for the proſperitie of Sion, liue you to effect what he did but liue to wiſh; all peace with our ſelues, and warre with none but Rome and Hell. And if there bee any wayward Separatiſt, whoſe ſoule profeſſeth to hate peace; I feare to tell him Pauls meſſage, yet I muſt: Would to God thoſe were cut off that trouble you. How cut off? As good Theodoſius ſaid to Demophilus, a contentious Prelate; Si tu pacem fugis, &c. If thou flie peace, I will make thee flie the Church. Alas, they doe flie it: that which ſhould be their puniſhment, they make their contentment; how are they worthy of pitie? As Optatus of his Donatiſts; they are Brethren, might be companions, and will not. Oh wilfull men; whither doe they runne? from one Chriſt to another? Is Chriſt diuided? wee haue him, thanks be to our good God, and we heare him daily; and whither ſhall wee goe from thee? thou haſt the words of eternall life.

Si tu pacem fugis, ego te ab Eccleſia fugere mando.

Thus the Ceremonies are finiſhed: now heare the end of his ſufferings, with like patience and deuotion: his death is here included; it was ſo neere, that he ſpake of it as done; and when it was done, all was done. How eaſie is it to loſe our ſelues in this diſcourſe! how hard not to be ouerwhelmed with matter of wonder; and to finde either beginning or end! his ſufferings found an end, our thoughts cannot. Lo, with this word, he is happily waded out of thoſe deeps of ſorrowes, whereof our conceits can finde no bottome: yet let vs, with Peter, gird our coat, and caſt our ſelues a little into this ſea.

All his life was but a perpetuall Paſſion: In that hee became man, hee ſuffered more than we can doe, either while wee are men, or when wee ceaſe to be men; he humbled, yea, he emptied himſelſe. Wee, when we ceaſe to be here, are cloathed vpon, 2 Cor. 5. Wee both winne by our being, and gaine by our loſſe; he loſt, by taking our more or leſſe to himſelfe, that is, manhood. For, though euer as God, I and my Father are one: yet as man, My Father is greater than I. That man ſhould be turned into a beaſt, into a worme, into duſt, into nothing; is not ſo great a diſparagement, as that God ſhould become man: and yet it is not finiſhed; it is but begunne. But what man? If, as the abſolute Monarch of the world, hee had commanded the vaſſalage of all Emperours and Princes, and had trod on nothing but Crownes and Scepters, and the necks of Kings, and bidden all the Potentates of the earth to attend his traine; this had carried ſome port with it; ſuitable to the heroicall Maieſtie of Gods Sonne. No ſuch matter: here is neither Forme nor Beautie; vnleſſe perhaps (μορφὴν δούλου) the forme of a ſeruant: you haue made me to ſerue with your ſinnes. Behold, hee is a man to God; a ſeruant to man; and, be it ſpoken with holy reuerence, a grudge to his ſeruants. Hee is deſpiſed and reiected of men; yea (as himſelſe, of himſelfe) a worme, and no man, the ſhame of men, and contempt of the people. Who is the King of glorie? the Lord of Hoaſts, hee is the King of glorie. Set theſe two together; the King of glorie; the ſhame of men: the more honour, the more abaſement. Looke backe to his Cradle: there you finde him reiected of the Bethlemites; borne and laid, alas, how homely, how vnworthily; ſought for by Herod, exiled to Ægypt, obſcurely brought vp in the Cottage of a poore Foſter-Father, tranſported and tempted by Sathan, derided of his kindred, blaſphemouſly traduced by the Iewes, pinched with hunger, reſtleſſe, harbourleſſe, ſorrowfull, perſecuted by the Elders and Phariſes, ſold by his owne ſeruant, ἐταπείνωσε. ἐκένωσε.

Pſal. 24. 10.

uant, apprehended, arraigned, ſcourged, condemned, and yet it is not finiſhed. Let vs, with that Diſciple, follow him a far off; and paſsing ouer all his contemptuous vſage in the way, ſee him brought to his Croſſe. Still the further we looke, the more wonder: euery thing addes to this ignominie of ſuffering, and triumph of ouer-comming. Where was it? not in a corner, as Paul ſaith to Feſtus, but in Ieruſalem, the eye, the heart of the world. Obſcuritie abateth ſhame: publique notice heightens it: Before all Iſrael and before this Sunne, ſaith God to Dauid, when hee would throughly ſhame him: In Ieruſalem, which he had honoured with his preſence, taught with his preachings, aſtoniſht with his miracles, bewayled with his teares; O Ieruſalem, Ieruſalem, how oft would I, and thou wouldſt not: O yet, if in this thy day. Crueltie and vnkindneſſe, after good deſert, afflict ſo much more, as our merit hath beene greater. Wherabouts? without the gates: in Caluarie, among the ſtinking bones of execrable Malefactors. Before, the glory of the place bred ſhame; now the vileneſſe of it. When? but in the Paſſeouer; a time of greateſt frequence, and concourſe of all Iewes and Proſelytes: An holy time: when they ſhould receiue the figure, they reiect the ſubſtance: when they ſhould kill and eat the Sacramentall Lambe, in faith, in thankfulneſſe, they kill the Lambe of God, our true Paſſeouer, in crueltie and contempt. With whom? The qualitie of our companie either increaſes or leſſens ſhame. In the midſt of theeues (ſaith one) as the Prince of theeues: there was no guile in his mouth, much leſſe in his hands: yet behold he that thought it no robberie to be equall with God, is made equall to robbers and murderers; yea ſuperiour in euill. What ſuffered he? As all lifes are not alike pleaſant, ſo all deaths are not equally fearefull. There is not more difference betwixt ſome life and death, than betwixt one death and another. See the Apoſtles gradation: He was made obedient to the death, euen the death of the Croſſe. The Croſſe, a lingring, tormenting, ignominious death. The Iewes had foure kindes of death for malefactors; the towell, the ſword, fire, ſtones; each of theſe aboue other in extremitie. Strangling with the towell, they accounted eaſieſt: the ſword worſe than the towell; the fire worſe than the ſword: ſtoning worſe than the fire: but this Romane death was worſt of all. Curſed is euery one that hangeth on a Tree. Yet (as Ierome well) he is not therefore accurſed, becauſe he hangeth; but therefore he hangeth, becauſe he is accurſed. He was made (κατάρα) a Curſe for vs. The curſe was more than the ſhame: yet the ſhame is vnſpeakable; and yet not more than the paine. Yet all that die the ſame death, are not equally miſerable: the very theeues fared better in their death than he. I heare of no irriſion, no inſcription, no taunts, no inſultation on them: they had nothing but paine to encounter, he paine and ſcorne. An ingenuous and noble Nature can worſe brooke this than the other; any thing rather than diſdainfulneſſe and deriſion: eſpecially, from a baſe enemie. I remember that learned father begins Iſraels affliction, with Iſmaels perſecuting laughter. The Iewes, the Souldiers, yea, the very Theeues flouted him, and triumpht ouer his miſerie; his bloud cannot ſatisfie them, without his reproch. Which of his ſenſes now was not a window to let in ſorrow? his eyes ſaw the teares of his Mother and friends, the vnthankfull demeanure of Mankinde, the cruell deſpight of his enemies: his eares heard the reuilings and blaſphemies of the multitude; and (whether the place were noyſome to his ſent) his touch felt the nailes, his taſte the gall. Looke vp, O all ye beholders, looke vpon this precious body, and ſee what part yee can finde free. That head which is adored and trembled at by the Angelicall ſpirits, is all raked and harrowed with thornes: that face, of whom it is ſaid; Thou art fairer than the children of men, is all beſmeared with the filthy ſpittle of the Iewes, and furrowed with his teares; thoſe eyes, cleerer than the Sunne, are darkned with the ſhadow of death; thoſe eares that heare the heauenly conſorts of Angels, now are filled with the curſed ſpeakings and ſcoffs of wretched men: thoſe lips that ſpake as neuer man ſpake, that command the ſpirits both of light and darkneſſe, are ſcornfully wet with vineger and gall: thoſe feet that trample on all the powers of hell (his enemies are made his footſtoole) are now nailed to the footſtoole of the Croſſe: thoſe hands that freely ſway the ſcepter of the heauens, now carry the reede of reproach, and are nailed to the tree of reproch: that whole bodie, which was conceiued by the Holy-Ghoſt, was all ſcourged, wounded, mangled: this is the out-ſide of his ſufferings. Was his heart free? Oh no: the inner part or ſoule of this paine, which was vnſeene, is as far beyond theſe outward and ſenſible, as the ſoule is beyond the bodie; Gods wrath beyond the malice of men: theſe were but loue-ticks to what his ſoule endured. O all yee that paſſe by the way, behold and ſee, if there be any ſorrow like to my ſorrow: Alas, Lord, what can we ſee of thy ſorrowes? we cannot conceiue ſo much as the hainouſnes and deſert of one of thoſe ſinnes which thou bareſt: we can no more ſee thy paine, than we could vndergoe it; onely this we ſee, that what the infinite ſinnes, of almoſt infinite men, committed againſt an infinite Maieſtie, deſerued in infinite continuance; all this thou in the ſhort time of thy Paſſion haſt ſuſtained. We may behold and ſee; but all the glorious ſpirits in Heauen cannot looke into the depth of this ſuffering. Doe but looke yet a little into the paſſions of this his Paſſion: for, by the manner of his ſufferings, we ſhall beſt ſee, what he ſuffered. Wiſe and reſolute men doe not complaine of a little; holy Martyrs haue beene racked, and would not be looſed; what ſhall we ſay if the author of their ſtrength, God and Man, bewray paſſions? what would haue ouerwhelmed men, would not haue made him ſhrinke; and what made him complaine, could neuer haue beene ſuſtained by men. What ſhall we then thinke, if he were affrighted with terrors, perplexed with ſorrowes, and diſtracted with both theſe; And lo, he was all theſe: for, firſt, here was an amazed feare; for millions of men to deſpaire was not ſo much as for him to feare: and yet it was no ſlight feare: he began (ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι) to be aſtoniſhed with terror, which in the dayes of his fleſh, offered vp prayers and ſupplications, with ſtrong cries and teares, to him that was able to helpe him, and was heard in that he feared. Neuer was man ſo afraid of the torments of Hell, as Chriſt (ſtanding in our roome) of his Fathers wrath. Feare is ſtill ſutable to apprehenſion. Neuer man could ſo perfectly apprehend this cauſe of feare; he felt the chaſtiſements of our peace, yea, the curſe of our ſinnes; and therefore might well ſay with DAVID; I ſuffer thy terrors with a troubled mind; yea, with IOB; The arrowes of God are in me, and the terrors of God fight againſt me. With feare, there was a deiecting ſorrow (ἀδημονία) My ſoule is on all ſides heauy to the death: his ſtrong cries, his many teares, are witneſſes of this Paſſion: he had formerly ſhed teares of pittie, and teares of loue, but now of anguiſh: he had before ſent forth cries of mercy; neuer of complaint till now: when the Sonne of God weeps and cries, what ſhall we ſay or thinke? yet further, betwixt both theſe and his loue what a conflict was there? It is not amiſſe diſtinguiſhed, that he was alwayes in Agone; but now in ἀγωνία, in a ſtrugling paſſion of mixed griefe. Behold, this field was not without ſweat and bloud; yea, a ſweat of bloud. Oh what Man or Angell can conceiue the taking of that heart, that without all outward violence, meerely, out of the extremitie of his owne Paſſion, bled (through the fleſh and skin) not ſome faint deaw, but ſolid drops of bloud? No thornes, no nailes fetcht bloud from him, with ſo much paine as his owne thoughts: he ſaw the fierce wrath of his Fathar, and therefore feared: he ſaw the heauy burden of our ſinnes to be vndertaken; and thereupon, beſides feare, iuſtly grieued; he ſaw the neceſſitie of our eternall damnation, if he ſuffered not: if he did ſuffer, of our redemption; and therefore his loue incountred both griefe and feare. In it ſelfe, he would not drinke of that cup. In reſpect of our good, and his decree, he would and did; and while he thus ſtriueth, he ſweats and bleeds. There was neuer ſuch a combat, neuer ſuch a bloudſhed, and yet it is not finiſhed; I dare not ſay with ſome Schoolemen, that the ſorrow of his Paſſion, was not ſo great as the ſorrow of his compaſſion: yet that was ſurely exceeding great. To ſee the vngratious careleſneſſe of mankinde, the ſlender fruit of his ſufferings, the ſorrowes of his Mother, Diſciples, friends; to fore-ſee, from the watch-tower of his Croſſe, the future temptations of his children, deſolations of his Church; all theſe muſt needs ſtrike deepe into a tender heart. Theſe he ſtill ſees & pitties, but without paſſion; then he ſuffered in ſeeing them.

Can we yet ſay any more? Lo, all theſe ſufferings are aggrauated by his fulneſſe of know-knowledge, and want of comfort: for, he did not ſhut his eyes, as one ſaith, when hee drunke this cup: he ſaw how dreggiſh, and knew how bitter it was. Sodaine euils afflict, if not leſſe, ſhorter. He fore-ſaw, and fore-ſaid, euerie particular he ſhould ſuffer: ſo long as he fore-ſaw, he ſuffered: the expectation of euill, is not leſſe than the ſenſe: to looke long for good, is a puniſhment; but for euill, is a torment. No paſſion workes vpon an vnknowne obiect: as no loue, ſo no feare is of what we know not. Hence men feare not Hell, becauſe they fore-ſee it not: if we could ſee that pit open before wee come at it, it would make vs tremble at our ſins, and our knees to knocke together, as Baltazars; and perhaps without faith, to runne madde at the horror of iudgement. He ſaw the burden of all particular ſinnes to be laid vpon him; euery dramme of his Fathers wrath was meaſured out to him, ere he toucht this potion; this cup was full, and hee knew that it muſt be wring'd, not a drop left: it muſt be finiſhed. Oh yet, if as he fore-ſaw all his ſorrowes, ſo hee colud haue ſeene ſome mixture of refreſhing. But I found none to comfort me; no, none to pitty me. And yet it is a poore comfort that ariſes from pittie. Euen ſo, O Lord, thou treadeſt this wine-preſſe alone; none to accompanie, none to aſſiſt thee. I remember Ruffinus in his Eccleſiaſticall ſtorie reports, that one Theodorus a Martyr, told him, that when he was hanging ten houres vpon the racke for religion vnder Iulians perſecution, his ioynts diſtended and diſtorted, his body exquiſitely tortured with change of executioners; ſo as neuer age (ſaith he) could remember the like: he felt no paine at all, but continued indeed all the while in the ſight of all men ſinging & ſmiling: for there ſtood a comely young man by him on his Iibbet (an Angell rather, in forme of a man) which with a cleane towell, ſtill wip't off his ſweat, and powred coole water vpon his racked limbs; wherewith he was ſo refreſhed, that it grieued him to be let downe. Euen the greateſt torments are eaſie, when they haue anſwerable comforts: but a wounded and comfortleſſe ſpirit, who can beare? If yet but the ſame meſſenger of God might haue attended his Croſſe, that appeared in his agonie; and might haue giuen eaſe to their Lord, as he did to his ſeruant. And yet, what can the Angels helpe, where God will ſmite? Againſt the violence of men, againſt the furie of Satan, they haue preuailed in the cauſe of God, for men: they dare not, they cannot comfort, where God will afflict. When our Sauiour had beene wreſtling with Satan in the end of his Lent, then they appeared to him, and serued; but now, while about the ſame time, hee is wreſtling with the wrath of his Father for vs, not an Angell dare be ſeene to looke out of the windowes of heauen to releeue him. For men, much leſſe could they, if they would; but what did they? Miſerable comforters are ye all: the Souldiers, they ſtript him, ſcorned him with his purple crowne, reed, ſpat on him, ſmote him; the paſſengers, they reuiled him; and inſulting, wagging their heads and hands at him, Hey thou that deſtroyedſt the Temple, come downe &c. The Elders and Scribes; alas, they haue bought his bloud, ſuborned witneſſes, incenſed Pilate, preferred Barrabas, vndertooke the guilt of his death, cried out, Crucifie, Crucifie. Ho thou that ſauedſt others. His Diſciples: alas, they forſooke him, one of them forſweares him, another runnes away naked, rather than hee will ſtay and confeſſe him. His mother and other friends, they looke on indeed, and ſorrow with him; but to his diſcomfort. Where the griefe is extreme, and reſpects neere, partnerſhip doth but increaſe ſorrow. Paul chides this loue: What doe you weeping & breaking my heart? The teares of thoſe we loue, doe either ſlacken our hearts, or wound them. Who then ſhall comfort him? himſelfe? Sometimes our owne thoughts finde a way to ſuccour vs, vnknowne to others; no, not himſelfe. Doubtleſſe (as Aquinas) the influence of the higher part of the ſoule, was reſtrained from the aid of the inferiour: My ſoule is filled with euills, Pſalm. 87. 4. Who then? his Father? here; here was his hope: If the Lord had not holpen me, my ſoule had almoſt dwelt in ſilence: I and my Father are one. But now (alas) hee, euen hee, deliuers him into the hands of his enemies; when he hath done, turnes his backe vpon him as a ſtranger; yea, hee woundeth him as an enemy. The Lord would breake him, Eſay 53. 10. yet any thing is light to the ſoule whiles the comforts of God ſuſtaine it; who can diſmay, where God will releeue? But here, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? What a word was here, to come from the mouth of the Son of God? My diſciples are men, weake and fearefull; no maruell if they forſake me. The Iewes are themſelues, cruell and obſtinate. Men are men, graceleſſe & vnthankfull. Deuills are, according to their nature, ſpightfull and malicious. All theſe doe but their kinde; and let them doe it: but thou, O Father, thou that haſt ſaid, This is my welbeloued Sonne, in whom I am well pleaſed: thou of whom I haue ſaid, It is my Father that glorifies me; what? forſaken mee? Not onely brought me to this ſhame, ſmitten me, vnregarded me; but, as it were, forgotten, yea, forſaken me? What, euen mee, my Father? How many of thy conſtant ſeruants haue ſuffered heauy things: yet in the multitudes of the ſorrowes of their hearts, thy preſence and comforts haue refreſhed their ſoules. Haſt thou releeued them, and doſt thou forſake me? me, thine onely, deare, naturall, eternall Son? O ye heauens and earth, how could you ſtand, whiles the Maker of you thus complained? Ye ſtood: but partaking after a ſort of his Paſſion: the earth trembled and ſhooke, her rocks tore, her graues opened, the heauens withdrew their light, as not daring to behold this ſad and fearefull ſpectacle.

Oh deare Chriſtians, how ſhould theſe earthen and rockie hearts of ours ſhake, and rend in peeces at this Meditation? how ſhould our faces be couered with darkneſſe, and our ioy be turned into heauineſſe? All theſe voyces, & teares, and ſweats, and pangs are for vs; yea from vs. Shall the Sonne of God thus ſmart for our ſinnes, yea with our ſins, and ſhall not we grieue for our owne? ſhall he weepe to vs in this Market-place, and ſhall not we mourne? Nay, ſhall he ſweat and bleed for vs, and ſhall not we weepe for our ſelues? Shall he thus lamentably ſhrieke out, vnder his Fathers wrath, and ſhall not we tremble? Shall the heauens and earth ſuffer with him, and we ſuffer nothing? I call you not to a weake and idle pitie of our glorious Sauiour: to what purpoſe? His iniurie was our glorie. No, no; Ye daughters of Ieruſalem, weepe not for me, but weepe for your ſelues: for our ſinnes, that haue done this; not for his ſorrow that ſuffered it: not for his pangs, that were; but for our owne, that ſhould haue beene, and (if wee repent not) ſhall be. Oh how grieuous, how deadly are our ſins, that coſt the Sonne of God (beſides bloud) ſo much torment? how farre are our ſoules gone, that could not be ranſomed with an eaſier price? that, that tooke ſo much of this infinite Redeemer of men, God and man, how can it chuſe but ſwallow vp, and confound thy ſoule, which is but finite and ſinfull? If thy ſoule had beene in his ſoules ſtead, what had become of it? it ſhall be, if his were not in ſtead of thine. This weight that lies thus heauie on the Son of God, and wrung from him theſe teares, ſweat bloud, and theſe vnconceiueable groanes of his afflicted ſpirit, how ſhould it chuſe but preſſe down thy ſoule to the bottome of hell? and ſo it will doe: if he haue not ſuffered it for thee, thou muſt and ſhalt ſuffer it for thy ſelfe. Goe now thou lewd man, and make thy ſelfe merry with thy ſins; laugh at the vncleanneſſes, or bloudineſſe of thy youth: thou little knoweſt the price of a ſin; thy ſoule ſhall doe, thy Sauiour did, when he cried out, to the amazement of Angels, and horror of men; My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? But now no more of this; It is finiſhed: the greater conflict, the more happy victorie. Well doth he finde and feele of his Father, what his type ſaid before, He will not chide alwaies, nor keepe his anger for euer. It is fearefull; but in him, ſhort: eternall to ſinners; ſhort to his Son, in whom the God-head dwelt bodily. Behold; this ſtorme, wherewith all the powers of the world were ſhaken, is now ouer. The Elders, Phariſes, Iudas, the Souldiers, Prieſts, witneſſes, Iudges, theeues, executioners, deuils, haue all tyred themſelues in vaine, with their owne malice; and he triumphs ouer them all, vpon the throne of his Croſſe: his enemies are vanquiſht, his Father ſatisfied, his ſoule with this word at reſt and glory; It is finiſhed. Now there is no more betraying, agonies, arraignements, ſcourgings, ſcoffing, crucifying, conflicts, terrors; all is finiſhed. Alas, beloued, and will we not let the Sonne of God be at reſt? do we now againe goe about to fetch him out of his glorie, to ſcorne and crucifie him? I feare to ſay it: Gods ſpirit dare and doth; They crucifie againe to themſelues the Sonne of God, and make a mocke of him. To themſelues, not in himſelfe:that they cannot,it is no thanke to them;they would doe it. See and conſider:the notoriouſly-ſinfull conuerſations of thoſe,that ſhould be Chriſtians,offer violence vnto our glorified Sauiour,they ſtretch their hand to heauen,and pull him downe from his throne, to his Croſſe:they teare him with thornes,pierce him with nailes,load him with reproches. Thou hateſt the Iewes, ſpitteſt at the name of Iudas, raileſt on Pilate, condemneſt the cruell butchers of Chriſt ; yet, thou canſt blaſpheme, and ſweare him quite ouer,curſe, ſwagger, lye,oppreſſe, boyle with luſt, ſcoffe,ryot, and liueſt like a debauched man ; yea like an humane Beaſt;yea like an vncleane Deuill. Cry Hoſanna as long as thou wilt;thou art a Pilate,a Iew,a Iudas, an Executioner of the Lord of life; and ſo much greater ſhall thy iudgement be, by how much thy light and his glory is more. Oh, beloued, is it not enough that he died once for vs ? Were thoſe paines ſo light,that we ſhould euery day redouble them?Is this the entertainment that ſo gracious a Sauiour hath deſerued of vs by dying?Is this the recompence of that infinite loue of his, that thou ſhouldeſt thus cruelly vex and wound him with thy ſinnes ? Euery of our ſinnes is a thorne, and nayle, and ſpeare to him : while thou powreſt downe thy drunken carowſes, thou giueſt thy Sauiour a potion of gall ; while thou deſpiſeſt his poore ſeruants, thou ſpitteſt on his face : while thou putteſt on thy proud dreſſes, and liſteſt vp thy vaine heart with high conceits, thou ſetteſt a Crowne of thornes on his head: while thou wringeſt and oppreſſeſt his poore children, thou whippeſt him, and draweſt bloud of his hands and feet. Thou hypocrite ; how dareſt thou offer to receiue the Sacrament of God, with that hand, which is thus imbrued with the bloud of him whom thou receiueſt? In euery Ordinary thy profane tongue walkes, in the diſgrace of the religious and conſcionable. Thou makeſt no ſcruple of thine owne ſinnes, and ſcorneſt thoſe that doe: Not to be wicked,is crime enough.Heare him that ſaith,Saul, Saul, why perſecuteſt thou me ? Saul ſtrikes at Damaſcus ; Chriſt ſuffers in heauen. Thou ſtrikeſt ; Chriſt Ieſus ſmarteth,and will reuenge. Theſe are the [ὑστερήματα] afterings of Chriſts ſufferings:In himſelfe it is finiſhed ; in his members it is not, till the world bee finiſhed. We muſt toile,and groane,and bleed,that we may reigne : if he had not done ſo, It had not beene finiſhed. This is our warfare;this is the region of our ſorrow & death. Now are we ſet vpon the ſandie pauement of our Theatre, and are marched with all ſorts of euills ; euill men,euill ſpirits, euill accidents ; and (which is worſt) our owne euill hearts ; temptations, croſſes, perſecutions, ſickneſſes, wants, infamies, death ; all theſe muſt in our courſes, be encountred by the Law of our profeſſion. What ſhould we doe but ſtriue and ſuffer, as our Generall hath done, that we may reigne as he doth, and once triumph in our Conſummatum eſt? God and his Angells ſit vpon the ſcaffolds of heauen,and behold vs : our Crowne is readie:our day of deliuerance ſhall come;yea our redemption is neere,when all teares ſhall be wip't from our eies ; and we that haue ſowne in teares,ſhall reape in ioy.In the meane time,let vs poſſeſſe our ſoules not in patience only,but in comfort:let vs adore and magnifie our Sauiour in his ſufferings, and imitate him in our owne:our ſorrowes ſhall haue an end,our ioyes ſhall not:our paines ſhall ſoone be finiſhed;our glory ſhall be finiſhed,but neuer ended.

Thus his ſufferings are finiſhed ; now together with them, mans ſaluation. Who knowes not, that man had made himſelfe a deepe debtor, a bankrupt, an out-law to God? Our ſins are our debts ; and by ſins,death. Now, in this word and act,our ſinnes are diſcharged, death endured, and therefore we cleared : the debt is paid, the ſcore is croſſed,the Creditor ſatisfied,the Debtors acquitted,& ſince there was no other quarrell,ſaued : we are all ſicke, and that mortally : ſinne is the diſeaſe of the ſoule : Quot vitia, tot febres, ſaith Chryſoſtome ; ſo many ſinnes, ſo many ſeuers, and thoſe peſtilent. What wonder is it, that we haue ſo much plague, while we haue ſo much ſinne ? Our Sauiour is the Phyſitian : The whole need not the Phyſitian, but the ſicke: wherein ? He healeth all our infirmities : he healeth them after a miraculous manner; not by giuing vs receits,but by taking our receits for vs. A wonderfull Phyſitian ; a wonderfull courſe of cure : One while he would cure vs by abſtinence ; our ſuperfluity, by his fortie dayes emptineſſe,according to that old rule ; Hunger cures the diſeaſes of gluttony : Another ther while, by exerciſe: He went vp and downe from City to City, and in the day was preaching in the Temple; in the night praying in the Mount. Then, by dyet; Take, eat, this is my body: and, Let this cup paſſe. After that yet, by ſweat, ſuch a ſweat as neuer was, a bloudy one: yet more, by inciſion; they pierced his hands, feet, ſide: and yet againe by potion; a bitter potion, of vineger and gall. And laſtly, which is both the ſtrangeſt and ſtrongeſt receit of all, by dying: Which died for vs, that whether wee wake or ſleepe, we ſhould liue together with him. We need no more, we can goe no further; there can be no more phyſicke of this kinde: there are cordials after theſe, of his Reſurrection and Aſcenſion; no more penall receits. By this bloud we haue redemption, Epheſ. 1.7. Iuſtification, Rom. 3.24. Reconciliation, Coloſ. 1.20. Sanctification, 1 Pet. 1.2. Entrance into glory, Heb. 10.19. Is it not now finiſhed? Woe were vs if he had left but one mite of ſatisfaction vpon our ſcore, to be diſcharged by our ſoules: and woe be to them that derogate from Chriſt, that they may charge themſelues; that botch vp theſe all-ſufficiently meritorious ſufferings of Chriſt, as imperfect, with the ſuperfluities of fleſh and bloud. Maledictus homo qui ſpem ponit in homine. We may not with patience ſee Chriſt wrong'd by his falſe friends; As that heroicall Luther ſaid in the like; Curſed be that ſilence that here forbeareth. To be ſhort, here be two iniuries intolerable; both giue Chriſt the lie vpon his Croſſe: It is finiſhed. No: ſomewhat remaines: the fault is diſcharged, not the puniſhment. Of puniſhments, the eternall is quit, not the temporall. It is finiſhed by Chriſt: No, there wants yet much; the ſatisfaction of Saints applied by this Vicar; adde mens ſufferings vnto Chriſts; then the treaſure is full; till then, It is not finiſhed.

1 Theſſ. 5. 10.

Maledictum ſilentium quod hic conniuet.

Two qualities ſtriue for the firſt place in theſe two opinions; impietie and abſurditie: I know not whether to preferre. For impietie; here is God taxed of iniuſtice, vnmercifulneſſe, inſufficiencie, falſhood. Of iniuſtice, that he forgiues a ſinne, and yet puniſhes for that which he hath forgiuen: vnmercifulneſſe, that he forgiues not while he forgiues, but doth it by halues: inſufficiencie, that his ranſome muſt be ſupplied by men: falſhood, in that he ſaith, It is finiſhed, when it is not. For abſurditie; how groſſe and monſtrous are theſe poſitions? that at once the ſame ſinne ſhould bee remitted and retained; that there ſhould be a puniſhment, where there is no fault; that what could ſtrike off our eternall puniſhment, did not wipe off the temporall; that he which paid our pounds, ſticks at our farthings; that God will retaine what man may diſcharge; that it is, and it is not finiſhed.

If there be any opinions, whoſe mention confutes them, theſe are they. None can be more vaine, none had more need of ſoliditie: for this prop beares vp, alone, the weight of all thoſe millions of indulgences, which Rome creates and ſels to the world. That Strumpet would well-neere goe naked, if this were not. Theſe ſpirituall Treaſures fetcht in the temporall: which yet our reuerend and learned Fulke, iuſtly cals, a moſt blaſphemous and beggerly principle: It brings in whole cheſts, yea mines of gold, like the Popes Indies; and hath not ſo much as a ragge of proofe to couer it, whether of Antiquitie, of Reaſon, of Scripture. Not of Antiquitie: for theſe Iubilie proclamations beganne but about three hundred yeares agoe. Not of Reaſon? how ſhould one meere man pay for another, diſpenſe with another, to another, by another? Not of Scripture, which hath flatly ſaid, The bloud of Ieſus Chriſt his Sonne, purgeth vs from all ſinne: and yet I remember that acute Sadeel hath taught mee, that this practiſe is according to Scripture: what Scripture? He caſt the money-changers out of the Temple, and ſaid; Ye haue made my houſe a denne of theeues. Which alſo Ioachim, their Propheticall Abbot, well applies to this purpoſe. Some modeſt Doctors of Louan would faine haue minced this Antichriſtian blaſphemie; who began to teach, that the paſſions of the Saints are not ſo by Indulgences applied, that they become true ſatisfactions; but that they only ſerue to moue God by the ſight of them to apply vnto vs Chriſts ſatisfaction. But theſe meale-mouth'd Diuines were ſoone charm'd; foure ſeuerall Popes (as their Cardinall confeſſeth) fel vpon the necke of them and their opinion; Leo the tenth, Pius the fift, Gregory the thirteenth, and Clemens the ſixt: and with their furious Buls bellow out threats againſt them, and toſſe them in the aire for Hereticks, and teach them vpon paine of a curſe, to ſpeake home with Bellarmine, Paſſionibus ſanctorum expiari delicta, and ſtraight, Applicari nobis ſanctorum paſſiones ad redimendas pœnas, quas pro peccatis Deo debemus: That by the ſufferings of Saints, our ſinnes are expiated; and that, by them applied, we are redeemed from thoſe puniſhments, which we yet owe to God. Blaſphemie, worthy the tearing of garments: How is it finiſhed by Chriſt, if men muſt ſupply? Oh bleſſed Sauiour, was euery drop of thy bloud enough to redeeme a world, and doe we yet need the helpe of men? How art thou a perfect Sauiour, if our brethren alſo muſt be our Redeemers? Oh ye bleſſed Saints, how would you abhorre this ſacrilegious glory? and with thoſe holy Apoſtles, yea, that glorious Angell, ſay, Vide ne feceris: and with thoſe wiſe Virgins; Leſt there will not be enough for vs and you, goe to them that ſell, and buy for your ſelues. For vs, we enuie not their multitude: let them haue as many Sauiours as Saints, and as many Saints as men; we know with Ambroſe, Chriſti paſſio adiutore non eguit; Chriſts paſſion needs no helper: and therefore, with that worthy Martyr, dare ſay, None but Chriſt, none but Chriſt. Let our ſoules die, if he cannot ſaue them; let them not feare their death or torment, if he haue finiſhed. Heare this thou languiſhing and afflicted ſoule: There is not one of thy ſins but it is paid for; not one of thy debts in the ſcroll of God, but it is croſſed; not one farthing of all thine infinite ranſome is vnpaid. Alas, thy ſinnes (thou ſayeſt) are euer before thee, and Gods indignation goes ſtill ouer thee, and thou goeſt mourning all the day long, & with that pattern of diſtreſſe, cryeſt out in the bitterneſſe of thy ſoule, I haue ſinned, what ſhall I doe to thee, O thou preſeruer of men? What ſhouldſt thou doe? Turne & beleeue. Now thou art ſtung in thy conſcience with this fiery Serpent, looke vp with the eies of faith to this brazen Serpent, Chriſt Ieſus, and be healed. Behold, his head is humbly bowed down in a gracious reſpect to thee; his arms are ſtretched out louingly to embrace thee; yea, his precious ſide is open to receiue thee, & his tongue interprets all theſe to thee for thine endleſſe comfort; It is finiſhed. There is no more accuſatiõ, iudgment, death, hel for thee: all theſe are no more to thee than if they were not. Who ſhall condemne? It is Chriſt which is dead. I know how ready euery man is to reach forth his hand to this dole of grace, & how angry to be beaten from this dore of mercy. We are all eaſily perſwaded to hope well, becauſe we loue our ſelues well: Which of all vs in this great congregation, takes exceptions to himſelſe, and thinks, I know there is no want in my Sauiour; there is want in me. He hath finiſhed, but I beleeue not, I repent not. Euery preſumptuous & hard heart ſo catches at Chriſt, as if he had finiſht for all, as if he had broken downe the gates of hell, and looſed the bands of death, and had made forgiueneſſe as common as life: Proſperitas ſtultorũ perdit eos, ſaith wiſe Salomon; Eaſe ſlayeth the fooliſh, and the proſperitie of fooles deſtroyeth them; yea, the confidẽce of proſperity. Thou ſayeſt, God is merciful, thy Sauiour bounteous, his paſſion abſolute: all theſe, and yet thou maieſt be condemned. Mercifull, not vniuſt; bountifull, not lauiſh; abſolutely ſufficient for all, not effectuall to all. Whatſoeuer God is, what art thou? Here is the doubt: Thou ſayeſt well; Chriſt is the good Shepheard. Wherein? He giues his life: but for whom? for his ſheepe. What is this to thee? While thou art ſecure, prophane, impenitent, thou art a Wolfe or a Goat: My ſheep heare my voice: what is his voice, but his precepts? Where is thine obedience to his cõmandements? If thou wilt not heare his Law, neuer hearken to his Goſpell. Here is no more mercy for thee, than if there were no Sauiour. He hath finiſhed, for thoſe in whom he hath begunne: if thou haue no beginnings of grace as yet, hope not for euer finiſhing of ſaluation: Come to me all yee that are heauy laden, ſaith Chriſt: thou ſhalt get nothing, if thou cõme when he calls thee not. Thou art not called, and canſt not be refreſhed, vnleſſe thou be laden, not with ſinne (this alone keepes thee away from God) but with conſcience of ſinne: A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not deſpiſe. Is thy heart wounded with thy ſinne? doth griefe and hatred ſtriue within thee, whether ſhall be more? Are the deſires of thy ſoule with God? Doeſt thou long for holineſſe, complaine of thy imperfections, ſtruggle againſt thy corruptions? Thou art the man, feare not, It is finiſhed. That Law which thou wouldeſt haue kept, and couldeſt not, thy Sauiour could, and did keep for thee: that ſaluation which thou couldeſt neuer worke-out alone (alas, poore impotent creatures, what can we doe towards heauen without him, which cannot moue on earth but in him?) he alone for thee hath finiſhed. Looke vp therefore boldly to the throne of God, and vpon the truth of thy repentance and faith, know that there is no quarrell againſt thee in heauen, nothing but peace and ioy. All is finiſhed. He would be ſpitted on, that he might waſh thee; he would be couered with ſcornfull robes, that thy ſinnes might be couered; he would be whipped, that thy ſoule might not bee ſcourged eternally; he would thirſt, that thy ſoule might be ſatisfied; he would beare all his Fathers wrath, that thou mighteſt beare none; he would yeeld to death, that thou mighteſt neuer taſte of it; hee would be in ſenſe for a time as forſaken of his Father, that thou mighteſt be receiued for euer.

Now bid thy ſoule returne to her reſt, and enioyne it Dauids taske: Praiſe the Lord, O my ſoule; and, What ſhall I render to the Lord for all his benefits? I will take the cup of ſaluation, and call vpon the name of the Lord. And, as rauiſht from thy ſelfe with the ſweet apprehenſion of this mercy, call all the other creatures to the fellowſhip of this ioy, with that diuine Eſay: Reioyce O yee heauens, for the Lord hath done it: ſhout yee lower parts of the earth, burſt forth into praiſes ye mountaines: for the Lord hath redeemed Iacob, and will be glorified in Iſrael. And euen now beginne that heauenly Song, which ſhall neuer end with thoſe glorified Saints; Praiſe, and honour, and glory, and power, be to Him that ſitteth vpon the Throne, and to the Lambe for euermore.

Thus our ſpeech of Chriſts laſt word is finiſhed. His laſt act accompanied his words: our ſpeech muſt follow it. Let it not want your deuout and carefull attention; He bowed and gaue vp the ghoſt.

The Croſſe was a ſlow death, and had more paine than ſpeed; whence a ſecond violence muſt diſpatch the crucified: their bones muſt be broken, that their hearts might breake. Our Sauiour ſtayes not deaths leiſure, but willingly and couragiouſly meets him in the way; and like a Champion that ſcornes to bee ouercome, yea, knowes hee cannot be, yeeldeth in the middeſt of his ſtrength, that he might by dying, vanquiſh death. He bowed and gaue vp: Not bowing, becauſe he had giuen vp, but becauſe he would. Hee cried with a loud voice, ſaith Matthew. Nature was ſtrong, hee might haue liued; but he gaue vp the ghoſt, and would die, to ſhew himſelfe Lord of life and death. Oh wondrous example! he that gaue life to his enemies, gaue vp his owne: hee giues them to liue, that perſecute and hate him; and himſelfe will die the whiles for thoſe that hate him. Hee bowed and gaue vp: not they; they might crowne his head, they could not bow it: they might vex his ſpirit, not take it away: they could not doe that without leaue; this they could not doe, becauſe they had no leaue. Hee alone would bow his head, and giue vp his ghoſt: I haue power to lay downe my life. Man gaue him not his life; man could not bereaue it. No man takes it from me. Alas, who could? The High-Prieſts forces, when they came againſt him armed, he ſaid but, I am hee, they flee and fall backward. How eaſie a breath diſperſt his enemies? whom hee might as eaſily haue bidden the earth, yea, hell to ſwallow, or fire from heauen to deuoure. Who commanded the Deuils and they obeyed, could not haue beene attached by men: hee muſt giue not onely leaue, but power to apprehend himſelfe, elſe they had not liued to take him: hee is laid hold of; Peter fights: Put vp, ſaith Chriſt; Thinkeſt thou that I cannot pray to my Father, and he will giue me more than twelue Legions of Angels? What an Armie were here? more than threeſcore and twelue thouſand Angels, and euery Angell able to ſubdue a world of men: he could, but would not be reſcued; hee is led by his owne power, not by his enemies; and ſtands now before Pilate, like the ſcorne of men; crowned, robbed, ſcourged, with an Ecce homo; Yet thou couldſt haue no power againſt me, vnleſſe it were giuen thee from aboue.

Behold, he himſelfe muſt giue Pilate power againſt himſelfe, elſe he could not be condemned: he will be condemned, lifted vp, nailed; yet no death without himſelfe. Hee ſhall giue his ſoule an offering for ſinne, Eſay 53. 10. No action, that ſauours of conſtraint, can be meritorious: he would deſerues, therefore he would ſuffer and dye. Hee bowed his head, and gaue vp the ghoſt. O gracious and bountifull Sauiour : hee might haue kept his ſoule within his teeth, in ſpight of all the world ; the weakneſſe of God is ſtronger than men : and if he had but ſpoken the word, the heauens and earth ſhould haue vaniſht away before him : but he would not. Behold, when hee ſaw, that impotent man could not take away his ſoule, he gaue it vp, and would die, that we might liue. See here a Sauiour, that can contemne his owne life for ours; and cares not to be diſſolued in himſelfe, that we might be vnited to his Father. Skin for skin, ſaith the Deuill, and all that he hath a man will giue for his life. Loe here, to proue Satan a lyer, skinne and life and all hath Chriſt Ieſus giuen for vs. We are beſotted with the earth, and make baſe ſhifts to liue ; one with a maimed body, another with a periured ſoule, a third with a rotten name : and how many had rather neglect their ſoule than their life, and will rather renounce and curſe God, than die ? It is a ſhame to tell ; Many of vs Chriſtians dote vpon life, and tremble at death ; and ſhew our ſelues fooles in our exceſſe of loue, cowards in our feare. Peter denies Chriſt thrice, and forſweares him ; Marcellinus twice caſts graines of incenſe into the Idols fire ; Ecebolius turnes thrice ; Spira reuolts and deſpaires : Oh let me liue, ſaith the fearfull ſoule. Whither doeſt thou reſerue thy ſelfe, thou weake and timorous creature ? or what wouldeſt thou doe with thy ſelfe? Thou haſt not thus learned Chriſt : he died voluntarily for thee, thou wilt not be forced to die for him : he gaue vp the ghoſt for thee ; thou wilt not let others take it from thee for him, thou wilt not let him take it for himſelfe.

When I looke backe to the firſt Chriſtians, and compare their zealous contempt of death with our backwardneſſe ; I am at once amazed and aſhamed : I ſee there euen women (the feebler ſex) running with their little ones in their armes, for the preferment of Martyrdome, and ambitiouſly ſtriuing for the next blow. I ſee holy and tender Virgins, chuſing rather a ſore and ſhamefull death, than honourable Eſpouſals. I heare the bleſſed Martyrs, intreating their tyrants and tormentors for the honour of dying. Ignatius, amongſt the reſt, fearing leſt the beaſts will not deuoure him ; and vowing the firſt violence to them, that he might bee diſpatched. And what leſſe courage was there in our memorable and glorious fore-fathers of the laſt of this age ? and doe we, their cold and feeble off-ſpring, looke pale at the face of a faire and naturall death ; abhorre the violent, though for Chriſt ? Alas, how haue we gathered ruſt with our long peace ? Our vnwillingneſſe is from inconſideration, from diſtruſt. Looke but vp to Chriſt Ieſus vpon his Croſſe, and ſee him bowing his head, and breathing out his ſoule, and theſe feares ſhall vaniſh : hee died, and wouldeſt thou liue ? hee gaue vp the ghoſt, and wouldeſt thou keepe it ? whom wouldeſt thou follow, if not thy Redeemer ? If thou die not, if not willingly, thou goeſt contrary to him, and ſhalt neuer meet him. Though thou ſhouldeſt euery day die a death, for him, thou couldeſt neuer requite his one death ; and doeſt thou ſticke at one ? Euery word hath his force; both to him and thee : he died, which is Lord of life, and commander of death ; thou art but a tenant of life, a ſubiect of death : and yet it was not a dying, but a giuing vp, not of a vaniſhing and aërie breath, but of a ſpirituall ſoule, which after ſeparation, hath an entire life in it ſelfe. Hee gaue vp the ghoſt : hee died, that hath both ouercome, and ſanctified, and ſweetned death. What feareſt thou ? Hee hath pull'd out the ſting and malignitie of death : If thou be a Chriſtian, carry it in thy boſome, it hurts thee not. Dareſt thou not truſt thy Redeemer ? If he had not died, Death had beene a Tyrant ; now he is a ſlaue. O death where is thy ſting ? O graue where is thy victorie ? Yet the Spirit of God ſaith not, he died, but gaue vp the ghoſt. The very Heathen Poet ſaith ; He durſt not ſay, that a good man dies. It is worth the noting (mee thinks) that when Saint Luke would deſcribe to vs the death of Ananias and Sapphira, he ſaith (ἐξέψυξε) he expired : but when Saint Iohn would deſcribe Chriſts death, hee ſaith, παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα, He gaue vp the ghoſt : How ? How gaue hee it vp, and whither ? So, as after a ſort he retained it : his ſoule parted from his bodie ; his God-head was neuer diſtracted either from ſoule or body : this vnion is not in nature, but in perſon. If the natures of Chriſt could be diuided, each would haue his ſubſiſtence ; ſo there

ſhould be more perſons. God forbid, one of the natures thereof may haue a ſeparation in it ſelfe : the ſoule from the bodie : one nature cannot be ſeparate from other, or either nature from the perſon. If you cannot conceiue, wonder: the Sonne of God hath wedded vnto himſelfe our humanity, without all poſſibility of diuorce; the body hangs on the Croſſe, the ſoule is yeelded, the Godhead is eternally vnited to them both; acknowledges, ſuſtaines them both. The ſoule in his agony feeles not the preſence of the Godhead; the body vpon the Croſſe feeles not the preſence of the ſoule. Yet as the Fathers of Chalcedon ſay truly, (ἀδιαιρέτως, ἀχωρίστως) indiuiſibly, inſeparably is the Godhead, with both of theſe, ſtill and euer, one and the ſame perſon. The Paſſion of Chriſt (as Auguſtine) was the ſleepe of his Diuinitie: ſo I may ſay, The Death of Chriſt was the ſleepe of his humanity. If hee ſleepe, hee ſhall doe well, ſaid that Diſciple, of Lazarus. Death was too weake to diſſolue the eternall bonds of this heauenly coniunction. Let not vs Chriſtians goe too much by ſenſe; wee may bee firmely knit to God, and not feele it: thou canſt not hope to be ſo neere thy God, as Chriſt was, vnited perſonally: thou canſt not feare, that God ſhould ſeeme more abſent from thee, than he did from his own Son: yet was he ſtill one with both body and ſoule, when they were diuided from themſelues; when he was abſent to ſenſe, he was preſent to faith; when abſent in viſion, yet in vnion one and the ſame: ſo will he be to thy ſoule, when he is at worſt. He is thine, and thou art his: if thy hold ſeeme looſened, his is not. When temptations will not let thee ſee him, he ſees thee and poſſeſſes thee; onely beleeue thou againſt ſenſe, aboue hope, and though he kill thee, yet truſt in him. Whither gaue he it vp? Himſelfe expreſſes; Father, into thy hands; And, This day ſhalt thou bee with me in Paradiſe. It is iuſtice to reſtore whence wee receiue; Into thy hands. Hee knew where it ſhould be both ſafe and happy: True; hee might bee bold (thou ſayeſt) as the Sonne with the Father. The ſeruants haue done ſo; Dauid before him, Steuen after him. And leſt we ſhould not thinke it our common right; Father, (ſaith he) I will that thoſe thou haſt giuen me, may be with me, euen where I am: he wills it, therefore it muſt be. It is not preſumption, but faith, to charge God with thy ſpirit; neither can there euer be any beleeuing ſoule ſo meane, that he ſhould refuſe it; all the feare is in thy ſelfe: how canſt thou truſt thy iewell with a ſtranger? What ſudden familiarity is this? God hath beene with thee, and gone by thee; thou haſt not ſaluted him: and now in all the haſte thou bequeatheſt thy ſoule to him. On what acquaintance? How deſperate is this careleſneſſe? If thou haue but a little money, whether thou keepe it, thou layeſt it vp in the Temple of truſt; or whether thou let it, thou art ſure of good aſſurance, ſound bonds. If but a little land, how carefully doeſt thou make firme conueyances, to thy deſired heires? If goods, thy Will hath taken ſecure order, who ſhall enioy them: We need not teach you Citizens to make ſure worke for your eſtates. If children, thou diſpoſeſt of them in trades, with portions: onely of thy ſoule (which is thy ſelfe) thou knoweſt not what ſhall become. The world muſt haue it no more; thy ſelfe wouldſt keepe it, but thou knoweſt thou canſt not: Satan would haue it, & thou knoweſt not whether he ſhall: thou wouldſt haue God haue it, and thou knoweſt not whether he will: yea, thy heart is now ready with Pharaoh to ſay, Who is the Lord? O the fearefull and miſerable eſtate of that man, that muſt part with his ſoule, he knowes not whither: which if thou wouldeſt auoid, (as this very warning ſhall iudge thee if thou doe not) be acquainted with God in thy life, that thou maiſt make him the Guardian of thy ſoule in thy death. Giuen vp it muſt needs be, but to him that hath gouerned it: if thou haue giuen it to Satan in thy life, how canſt thou hope God will in thy death entertaine it? Did you not hate me, and expell me out of my Fathers houſe? how then come yee to me now in this time of your tribulation, ſaid Iephta to the men of Gilead. No, no, either giue vp thy ſoule to God while he cals for it in his word, in the prouocations of his loue, in his afflictions, in the holy motions of his ſpirit to thine: or els when thou wouldſt giue it, he will none of it, but as a Iudge to deliuer it to the Tormentor. What ſhould God doe with an vncleane, drunken, prophane, proud, couetous ſoule? Without holineſſe, it is no ſeeing of God. Depart from me, ye wicked, I know ye not: Goe to the gods you haue ſerued. See how God is euen with men: they had, in the time of the Goſpell, ſaid to the holy one of Iſrael, Depart from vs; now in the time of iudgement, he ſaith to them, Depart from me: They would not know God when they might: now God will not know them when they would.

Now therefore (beloued) if thou wouldſt not haue God ſcorne the offer of thy death-bed, fit thy ſoule for him in thy health; furniſh it with grace; inure it to a ſweet conuerſation with the God of heauen: then mayeſt thou boldly giue it vp, and he ſhall as graciouſly receiue it, yea fetch it by his Angels to his glory.

He gaue vp the ghoſt. We muſt doe as he did: not all with the ſame ſucceſſe. Giuing vp, ſuppoſes a receiuing, a returning. This inmate that we haue in our boſome, is ſent to lodge here for a time, may not dwell here alwayes. The right of this tenure is the Lords, not ours: As he ſaid of the hatchet; It is but lent, it muſt be reſtored: It is ours to keepe, his to diſpoſe and require. See and conſider both our priuiledge and charge. It is not with vs as with bruit creatures: we haue a liuing ghoſt to informe vs, which yet is not ours, (&, alas, what is ours, if our ſoules be not?) but muſt be giuen vp to him that gaue it.

Why doe we liue as thoſe that tooke no keepe of ſo glorious a gueſt? as thoſe that ſhould neuer part with it, as thoſe that thinke it giuen them to ſpend, not to returne with a reckoning?

If thou hadſt no ſoule, if a mortall one, if thine owne, if neuer to be required, how couldſt thou liue but ſenſually? Oh remember but who thou art, what thou haſt, and whither thou muſt; and thou ſhalt liue like thy ſelfe, while thou art, and giue vp thy ghoſt confidently, when thou ſhalt ceaſe to be. Neither is there here more certaintie of our departure, than comfort. Carry this with thee to thy death-bed, and ſee if it can refreſh thee, when all the world cannot giue thee one dram of comfort. Our ſpirit is our deareſt riches: if we ſhould loſe it, here were iuſt cauſe of griefe. Howle and lament, if thou thinkeſt thy ſoule periſheth: it is not forfeited, but ſurrendred. How ſafely doth our ſoule paſſe through the gates of death, without any impeachment, while it is in the hand of the Almightie? Woe were vs, if he did not keep it while we haue it; much more when we reſtore it. We giue it vp to the ſame hands that created, infuſed, redeemed, renewed; that doe protect, preſerue, eſtabliſh, and will crowne it: I know whom I haue beleeued, and am perſwaded that he is able to keepe that which I haue committed to him against that day. O ſecure and happy eſtate of the godly: O bleſſed exchange of our condition: while our ſoule dwels in our breaſt, how is it ſubiect to infinite miſeries, diſtempered with paſſions, charged with ſinne, vexed with tentations? aboue, none of theſe: how ſhould it be otherwiſe? This is our pilgrimage, that our home: this is our wildernes, that our land of promiſe: this our bondage, that our kingdom: our impotency cauſeth this our ſorrow.

When our ſoule is once giuen vp, what euill ſhall reach vnto heauen, and wreſtle with the Almightie? Our lothneſſe to giue vp, comes from our ignorance and infidelitie. No man goes vnwillingly to a certaine preferment. I deſire to be diſſolued, ſaith Paul; I haue ſerued thee, I haue beleeued thee, and now I come to thee, ſaith Luther. The voice of Saints, not of men. If thine heart can ſay thus, thou ſhalt not need to intreat with old Hilarion, Egredere mea anima, egredere, quid times? Goe thy wayes forth my ſoule, goe forth, what feareſt thou? but it ſhall flie vp alone cheerefully from thee, and giue vp it ſelf into the armes of God, as a faithfull Creator & Redeemer. This earth is not the element of thy ſoule, it is not where it ſhould be. It ſhall be no leſſe thine, when it is more the owners. Thinke now ſeriouſly of this point; Gods Angell is abroad, & ſtrikes on all ſides; we know not which of our turnes ſhall be the next: we are ſure, we carry deaths enow within vs. If we be ready, our day cannot come too ſoone. Stirre vp thy ſoule to an heauenly cheerefulneſſe, like thy Sauiour: Know but whither thou art going; and thou canſt not but, with diuine Paul, ſay from our Sauiours mouth, euen in this ſenſe: It is a more bleſſed thing to giue, than to receiue. God cannot abide an vnwilling gueſt: giue vp that ſpirit to him, which he hath giuen thee; and he will both receiue what thou giueſt, and giue it thee againe, with that glory and happineſſe, which can neuer be conceiued, and ſhall neuer be ended. Euen ſo LORD IESVS come quickly.

THE IMPRESE OF GOD.

THE FIRST PART.

ZACHAR. 14. 20.

In that day ſhall be written vpon the bridles (or, bels) of the Horſes, Holineſſe vnto the Lord: and the pots of the Lords houſe, ſhall be like the bowles before the Altar.

IF any man wonder whither this diſcourſe can tend, of horſes, and bells, and pots, and bowles for the Altar; Let him conſider that of Tertullian, Ratio diuina in medulla eſt, non in ſuperficie: Theſe Horſes if they be well menaged, will proue like thoſe fierie Horſes of Elias, to carry vs vp to our heauen, 2 King. 2. 11. Theſe Bells, like thoſe golden bels of Aarons robe, Exod. 39. 25. Theſe Pots like that Olla pulmenti of the Prophets, after Eliſha's meale, 2 King. 4. and theſe Bowles, like that bleſſed and fruitfull nauell of the CHVRCH, Cant. 7. 2.

S. Paul asks, Doth God take care for oxen? ſo may I here, Doth God take care for horſes? Surely, to prouide for them, not to propheſie of them; much leſſe of their bells, the vnneceſſarie ornaments of a neceſſary creature; But he that forbids vs to learne of the horſe that leſſon of ſtubborneſſe, by the PSALMIST, and checks vs oft by the oxe and aſſe, for their good nature, would haue vs learne here, vnder this parable of the horſe, and the bells of the horſe, and the writing on thoſe bells, the eſtate of our owne peace and ſanctification. God doth both ſpeake, and worke in Parables, as that Father ſaith well: Of this then I may truly ſay, as Hierome ſaid of the booke of IOB, Singula verba plena ſunt ſenſibus: Suffer your ſelues with Abrahams Ram, to bee perplexed a while in theſe bryers, that you may be prepared for a fit ſacrifice to God.

In that day:] What day is that? All dayes are his, who is the Ancient of dayes; and yet he ſayes, Abraham ſaw my day, and reioyced. He that made all dayes, ſayes yet againe, This is the day which the Lord hath made: There is one day of the weeke, Gods; κυριακη, Reuel. 1. and yet I would it were his; Gods day by creation, by ordination; I would it were his by obſeruation too: There is one day in an Age his: While it is called to day, Heb. 3. The day of viſitation; and yet This thy day, Luk. 19. 42. One day in a world his, Matth. 7. 22. In that day: A day beyond the world, his. To day haue I begotten thee, Hodie, i. ab Eterno, which is a nunc ſtans, as Aquinas defines it.

The

Hall, J.

The Heathens had fiue famous periods of computations, Ninus Monarchie, Ogyges Flood, Troian Warre, Olympiads, Vrbs condita; All ours is ab illo die, which S. Paul cals, The fulneſſe of Time; But Chriſt hath two dayes, as two commings: His firſt, In die illa radix Ieſſe, ſaith Eſay 11.10. The day of his comming to ſoiourne in the world; His ſecond, 1 Cor. 1.8. The day of his returne, which S. Paul cals ἡμέραν ἀπολυτρώσεως, Epheſ. 4.30. when he comes to ranſome vs, and to iudge the world: Both are dayes indeed; In the firſt, there is no night of his abſence, though to our ſenſe there be ſome little darkneſſe of our miſerie: In the ſecond, no abſence, nor no miſerie; A day without night, Reuel. 21.25. This prophecie is true of both; Partially, and inchoately of the firſt; totally and abſolutely of the ſecond: Of the firſt ſo farre as it makes way for, and reſembles the ſecond: and this as it is here principally intended, ſo ſhall it be the drift of our diſcourſe.

This is the day: Now what of this day? There ſhall be a Motto written: An honourable Motto; ſuch as was written vpon the מִצְנֶפֶת the Turbant of the High Prieſt, Holineſſe to the Lord: And where ſhall it be written? An honourable Motto in an ignoble place; על מצלות; Not as Aquila and Theodotion, vnder the belly of the horſe, ſuper profundum; Nor as Symmachus, vnder his feet, ſuper inceſſum vmbroſum; Theſe ſenſes are ſenſeleſſe (though you take them cum grano ſalis, as the Lawyers admoniſh) they ſauour neither the ſenſe, nor word; Not, as Ierome, the Septuagint and Geneue, ſuper frænum; Tho this hath the ſenſe well, not the word; Hieroms maſter came a little neerer (ſuper phaleras); Thoſe of the Rabbins yet light righteſt both on the word, and ſenſe, which turne ſuper Tintinnabula; For ten times at leaſt in the Chronicles and Ezra, is the ſame word dually vſed; for Cymbals; and the Verbe of this root, is the ſame, whereby God would expreſſe the tingling of the eares; תצלנה Tinnient aures audientium, Ier. 19. To adorne their horſes with bels, was not onely a faſhion in thoſe South-Eaſt Countries, but in our fore-fathers dayes in this Land: as it were eaſie to ſhow you, but out of Chaucers Antiquitie; and ſome of vs haue ſeene it ſtill in vſe elſewhere. What bells then were theſe? Not of the Prieſt; It had beene eaſie to transferre his embleme from his forehead, to his skirts; but of the horſes: The horſe an vncleane beaſt, Leuit. 11. A warlike beaſt, Equus paratur in diem belli, Prou. 21.31. Whence ſtill ſhall you finde Horſes and Chariots put together; and In bello & equis, Oſe. 1.7. Behold this Motto had wont to be written vpon a man, now vpon a beaſt; had wont vpon an holy man, The High Prieſt: now vpon an vncleane beaſt; before, vpon a man of peace, now on a beaſt of warre; Before vpon the forehead of the High Prieſt, now (as Rab. Eliezer) inter oculos, betwixt the eyes of the Horſe. But what? not to continue there; as ſome Rabbins and good Interpreters; but ſo that of theſe very Bells ſhall be made Pots for the vſe of ſacrifice; Like as of the glaſſes of the Iewiſh women was made a Lauer; and of the iewels of the Midianitiſh Camels, a rich Ephod. This is well, to come thus neere; yet they ſhall be promoted higher: They ſhall be bowles for the Altar: The Pots might be greater, for there was Olla Grandis, 2 King. 4. But the bowles were more noble, and more peculiarly deuoted to Gods ſeruice: Moſes ſhall comment vpon Zacharie: Num. 7. Twelue ſeuerall times you haue the matter of theſe bowles (ſiluer) the weight, 70. ſhekels; The vſe, for floure and oyle for the meat-offering, beſides that following imployment for the incenſe. But I hold not this dependance neceſſary: Here are rather two diſtinct prophecies, though to one purpoſe as we ſhall ſee in the proceſſe.

You ſee now Zacharies holy riddle read; That God, vnder the Goſpell will effect a gracious ſanctification both of things, and perſons; and by thoſe things which in their vſe haue beene altogether prophane will indifferently glorifie himſelfe, and worke them both to peace, and holineſſe: And as Cyprian ſaith, Fidem rerum curſus impleuit.

What now is more fit for Courtiers to heare of, than an Impreſe of honour? What more fit for Kings and Princes than the Impreſe of the God of heauen? And as in all Impreſes, there is a body, and a ſoule, as they are termed; ſo are both here without any affectation: The ſoule of it is the Motto, or Word, Holineſſe to the Lord: The bodie, is the ſubiect it ſelfe ; As oft-times the very ſhield is the deuice : The ſubiect, Bells of the horſes.

In the Word, firſt ſee the ancient vſe of Heraldry in the Scriptures ; That part eſpecially which concernes Inſcriptions ; as on Coynes, Shields, Enſignes : If the Teſtament of the Patriarcks had as much credit, as antiquitie, all the Patriarcks had their Armes aſſign'd them by IACOB ; Iudah a Lion, Dan a Serpent, Nepthali an Hinde, Beniamin a Wolfe, Ioſeph a bough, and ſo the reſt. The Coyne which Iacob paid to the Shechemites, was ſtamped with a Lambe, Gen. 32. And, if Iudahs ring that he left with Thamar, had not had an inſcription, it could not ſo certainly haue deſcryed his maſter. Theſe coynes had a figure without a word ; The frontall of the High Prieſt had a word, without a figure ; The ſhekel of the Sanctuarie (whoſe Character we haue oft ſeene) had both a word and a figure : the word, Holy Ieruſalem ; the figure, A pot of Manna, like a large chalice, and Aarons rod, not budding but branching out. Salomon compares the Church, to an Armie with Banners ; there could be no vſe, no diſtinction of Banners, without inſcriptions ; The Maccabees had foure Hebrew letters in their Enſigne, for both their word, and deuice ; whence they had their name : Yea, this is not in viâ onely, but in patria : They ſhall haue a white ſtone, and a new name written in it : The field and the armes, both named, and vnknowne : The vſe therefore of inſcriptions and armes muſt needs be very laudable, as ancient ; ſince God himſelfe was the firſt Herald, and ſhall be the laſt. Yea the very Anabaptiſts, that ſhake off all the yoke of Magiſtracie, yet when they had ripened their fanaticall proiects, and had raiſed their King Becold, from the ſhop-boord to the Throne, would not want this point of honour : And therefore, he muſt haue one henchman on the right hand, to carry a Crowne, and a Bible, with an inſcription ; On the left, another, that carried a ſword naked, and a ball of Gold : Himſelfe in great ſtate carries a Globe of Gold, with two ſwords acroſſe. His preſſing yron and ſheeres would haue become him better.

And if I ſhould looke to heatheniſh Antiquitie, I ſhould neede to ſay no more, than that the Ægyptian Hieroglyphicks, whereof they ſay Horus Apollo was the inuenter, were nothing elſe, but Emblemes, and Impreſes : among the reſt, it is memorable that Ruffinus reports, that the ſigne of the Croſſe was one of their χαράγματα ἱερατικὰ, their ancient figures long before CHRIST : which (ſaith he) ſignified to them, eternall life : and Socrates adds, that when they found the ſigne of the Croſſe (in templo Serapidis) the Heathen and Chriſtians contended for it, each challenged it for theirs ; and when the Heathen knowing the ſignification of it, ſaw it thus fulfilled to the Chriſtians, many of them conuerted to Chriſtianitie. Be it farre from vs, to put any ſuperſtition in this ; I thinke it done, by the ſame inſtinct whereby the Sybils propheſied of Chriſt. And as Armes, and Embleticall deuices are thus ancient, and commendable ; ſo more directly Poſies and words, whether for inſtruction, or diſtinction, are here warranted. So the word of a faithfull King, is Dominus mihi adiutor ; or when he would thankfully aſcribe his peace to God ; Exurgat Deus, diſſipentur inimici : ſo of a good Prince, either, I ſerue, to expreſſe his officious care ; Or, One of your owne, to ſignifie his reſpectiue loue. So the good Stateſman's ſhould be giuen him by Salomon, Non eſt conſilium contra Dominũ, No policie againſt the Lord : A good Courtier's, by Samuel, Honorantes me honorabo : A good Biſhop's, by Paul, εὐκαίρως ἀκαίρως ; In ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon. A good ſubiect's, Not for feare but Conſcience. A good Chriſtians, Chriſtus mihi viuere eſt. So the Iſraelites were charged to make their Embleme the Law of God ; for their poſts, for their garments. But theſe things may not be written vpon our walls, or ſhields only ; They muſt be written vpon our hearts ; elſe we are as very painted walls, as our walls themſelues : Elſe we ſhall be like ſome Inne, that hath a Crowne for the ſigne without, and within there is none but Peſants ; or a Roſe vpon the poſt without, and nothing but ſluttiſhneſſe and filth within : Or an Angell without, and nothing within, but lewd drunkards. As it is ſaid of God, Dixit, & factum eſt ; So alſo, ſcripſit, & factum eſt ; They ſhall be written holy, that is, they ſhall be made holy : Happy is it for vs, tho we write no new Emblemes of our owne, if we can haue this holy Impreſe of God, written not in our fore-heads, but in our hearts, Holineſſe to the Lord. Thus much of the Embleme, or word. Now for the ſubiect and circumſtances : In that day, aboue this ; there is the proficiencie of the Church ; Holineſſe ſhall bee written vpon the Bells ; prophane things ſhall be holy, There is the ſanctification of the Church : The bells of warlike horſes ſhall bee turned to the quiet vſe of Religion ; There is the religious peace of the Church. Thirdly, the pots to ſeeth in, ſhall be as Bowles to offer vp incenſe in ; There is the degrees of the Churches perfection : ſo that here ariſe foure heads of our ſpeech ; The proficiencie, Sanctification, Peace, Perfection of the Church. All which craue your gracious and Chriſtian attention; or leſt I be too long, two of them onely.

When therefore ſhall this be fulfilled ? Not vnder the Law : It had beene a great profanation: For none but the High-Prieſt might weare this poſie : the place oft times diſparages ; As to put the Arke of God into a Cart, or to ſet it by Dagon.

It is vnder the Goſpell, that this poſie of Holineſſe ſhall be ſo common ; in illa die ; and this is that day: How great is this proficiencie of the Church? Looke how much difference there is betweene one and many, betweene the holieſt of men, and an ordinary beaſt, betweene the frontall of the High-Prieſt, and the Bells of horſes, ſo much there muſt be betwixt the Church in that day, and in this. It is the faſhion of the true Church, to grow vp ſtill, from worſe to better, as it is ſaid of the head of the Church, Creſcebat & corroborabatur. As it is compared to ſtones for firmneſſe, ſo to grifts for growth; Yea the Kingdome of heauen is like a graine of muſtard-ſeed, that of the leaſt ſeed, proues the greateſt plant, in his kind : the riuer of God flowes firſt vp to the ankles, then to the knees, and at laſt to the chin.

The Church was an Embryo till Abrahams time ; In ſwathing-bands till Moſes; In child-hood till Chriſt ; A man in Chriſt, A man full-growne in glory. As man is an Epitome of the World, ſo is euery Chriſtian an abridgment of the Church ; Beſt at laſt ; In illa die. He is like to the feaſt of Cana, where the beſt wine was brought in laſt : not naturally, but by tranſmutation. It was a blaſphemous, and (mee thinks) a Vorſtian reaſon, that Toſtatus brings, why God did not create the voices out of the Propitiatorie, Quia Deus non poteſt agere per ſucceſſionem : Surelie in vs hee doth ; and as wee can doe nothing, in inſtante, no more doth God in vs. As in the Creation hee could haue made all at once, but hee would take dayes for it, ſo in our re-creation by grace : As naturall, ſo ſpirituall agents, doe agere per moram. That rule of Aquinas is ſure, Succeſſiuorum non ſimul eſt eſſe & perfectio : to which that accords of Tertullian, Perfectio ordine poſt-humat. There muſt be an illa dies, for our full ſtature ; till which, if we be true Chriſtians, we muſt grow from ſtrength to ſtrength : herein grace is contrary to nature, ſtrongeſt at laſt. We muſt change till then, but in melius ; till we come to our beſt ; and then, we muſt be like him, in whom is no ſhadow by turning.

But, where wee ſhould be like the Sunne till noone, euer riſing ; there be many like Ezekias Sunne, that goe backe many degrees in the diall : whoſe beginnings are like Neroes firſt fiue yeares, full of hope, and peace. Or, like the firſt moneth of a new ſeruant ; or like vnto the foure Ages, whoſe firſt was gold, the laſt iron: Or to Nebuchadnezzars image, which had a precious head, but baſe feet. Looke to your ſelues, this is a fearefull ſigne, a fearefull condition : Can hee euer bee rich, that growes euery day poorer ? Can he euer reach the Goale, that goes euery day a ſtep backe from it ? Alas then, how ſhall he euer reach the Goale of glory, that goes euery day a ſtep backward in grace ? He that is worſe euery day, can neuer be at his beſt, In illa die, In that day.

Hitherto the proficiencie ; The ſanctification followes. The Moſaicall Law was ſcrupulous : There were vnholy places, vnholy garments, perſons, beaſts, fowles, veſſels, touches, taſts : Vnder the Goſpell all is holy. All was made vnholy, when the firſt Adam ſinned ; when the ſecond Adam ſatisfied for ſinne, all was made holy : Moſes the ſeruant built his houſe, with a τὸ μεσότοιχον φραγμοῦ, Epheſ. 2. 14. A partition wall in the midſt: Chriſt the Sonne pull'd downe that ſcreene, and caſt all into one ἀμφότερα ἕν: Iewes and Gentiles, whole hooſes and clouen, dwell now both vnder a roofe. Moſes branded ſome creatures with vncleanneſſe; he that redeemed his children from morall impuritie, redeemed his creatures from legall: What ſhould S. Peters great ſheet let downe by foure corners teach vs, but that all creatures through the foure corners of the world, are cleane and holy? S. Paul proclaimes the ſumme of Peters viſion; Omnia munda mundis: It is an iniurious ſcrupulouſneſſe, to make differences of creatures; iniurious to God, to the creature, to our ſelues: To God, while we will not let him ſerue himſelfe of his owne: To the creature, while we powre that ſhame vpon it, which God neuer did: To our ſelues, while we bring our ſelues into bondage, where God hath inlarged vs. When Iulian had poyſoned the wells, and ſhambles, and fields, with his heatheniſh Luſtrations; the Chriſtians (ſaith Theodoret) ate freely of all, by vertue of PAVLS, Quicquid in macello: To let paſſe the idle curiouſnes of our ſemi-Anabaptiſts, of the ſeparation, at whoſe follie, if any man be diſpoſed to make himſelfe ſport, let him read the Tragicomicall relation of the Troubles and Excommunication of the Engliſh at Amſterdam; There ſhall he ſee ſuch warres waged betwixt brothers, for but a buske, or whale-bone, or lace, or cork-ſhooe, as if all Law and Goſpell ſtood vpon this point; as if heauen and earth were little enough to be mingled in this quarrell; Nec gemino bellum Troianum. To paſſe ouer all other lighter niceneſſe of this kinde: Who can chooſe but be aſhamed of the Church of Rome; which is here in a double extremitie, both groſſe: In denying, wiping out holineſſe, where God hath written it: and in writing it, where God hath not written it: in the firſt, how doe they driue out Deuils out of good creatures, by fooliſh exorciſmes? I would he were no more in themſelues. How doe they forbid meats, drinks, dayes, mariage which God hath written holy? Hee that reads Nauars Manuall, ſhall finde cholericke blaſphemie a veniall ſinne, pag. 91. ſome theft veniall, p. 140. Common lying, veniall, p. 191. Curſing of Parents, if not malicious, veniall, p. 100. and yet the ſame Author, chap. 21. nu. 11. p. 209. to eat of a forbidden diſh, or an allowed diſh more than once on a forbidden day, is a mortall ſinne: And now theſe venials (ſaith Francis a Victoria) by a Pater-noſter, or ſprinkling of holy water, or knocke of the breaſt are cleared; but that mortall eater is ἔνοχος τῇ κρίσει: guilty of iudgement, yea, of hell it ſelfe: Scribes, Phariſes, Hypocrites, which prate of Peters chaire, but will neuer take out Peters leſſon, That which God hath ſanctified, pollute thou not. In the other: What Holineſſe doe they write in religious cowles, Altars, Reliques, Aſhes, Candles, Oyles, Salts, Waters, Enſignes, Roſes, Words, Graines, Agnus Dei, Medalls, and a world of ſuch traſh: So much, that they haue left none in themſelues. Let me haue no faith, if euer play-booke were more ridiculous, than their Pontificall, and booke of holy Ceremonies. It is well that Ierome reads theſe words, ſuper frænum, not ſuper Tintinnabulum; Elſe, what a rule ſhould we haue had; tho he had ſaid, Equorum, not Templorum: What compariſons would haue beene; If Holineſſe to the Lord muſt be written on the Bells of Horſes, much more on the Bells of Churches. What a colour would this haue beene for the waſhing, anointing, bleſſing, chriſtening of them? What a warrant for driuing away Deuils, chaſing of ghoſts, ſtilling of tempeſts, ſtaying of thunders, yea deliuering from Tentations, which the Pontificall aſcribes to them? By whoſe account, there ſhould be more vertue in this peece of metall, than in their holy Father himſelfe, yea than in any Angell of heauen: But their vulgar bridles them in this, which reads it, ſuper frænum, which ſome ſuperſtitious man would ſay were fulfilled in Conſtantines ſnaffle made of the nailes that pierced Chriſt. How worthy are they in the meane time of the whip, not of men onely, but of God, which thus in a ridiculous preſumption write Holineſſe, where God would haue a blanke; and wipe out Holineſſe, where God hath written it.

For vs, there is a double holineſſe; for vſe, for vertue: All things are holy to vs for vſe; nothing is holy for vertue of ſanctification, but thoſe things which God hath ſanctified to this vertue; his word, his ſacraments: We may vſe the other, and put no holineſſe in them ; we muſt vſe theſe, and expect holineſſe from them : οὐδὲν κοινὸν, Nothing vncleane, is Peters rule, but with Pauls explication, Munda mundis : All things are cleane in themſelues ; to thee they are not cleane, vnleſſe thou be cleane. Mine owne clothes ſhall make me filthy, ſaith Iob, 9. 31. Many a one may ſay ſo, more iuſtly. The proud mans gay coat, the wanton womans beaſtly faſhions, both ſhew them to be vncleane, and make them ſo. But the lewd man makes his owne clothes filthy ; his meats, drinks, ſports, garments, are vncleane to him, becauſe he is vncleane to God ; they are curſed to him, becauſe he is curſed of God : God hath written on the outſide of his creatures, Holy to the Lord ; we write on the inſide, Vnholy to men ; becauſe our outſide and inſide is vnholy to God : yea, we doe not onely deface this inſcription of holineſſe in other creatures to vs, but we will not let God write it vpon vs, for himſelfe. O our miſerie and ſhame : All things elſe are holy ; Men, Chriſtians, are vnholy. There is no impuritie but where is Reaſon, and Faith, the grounds of Holineſſe. How oft would God haue written this title vpon our foreheads ? and ere he can haue written one full word, we blot out all : One ſweares it away, another drinks it away, a third ſcoffs it away, a fourth riots it away, a fift ſwaggers it away ; and I would to God it were vncharitable to ſay, that there is as much holineſſe in the Bridles of the Horſes, as in ſome of their Riders. Oh holineſſe, the riches of the Saints, the beauty of Angels, the delight of God, whither haſt thou withdrawne thy ſelfe ? where ſhould we finde thee if not among Chriſtians ? and yet how can we be, or be named Chriſtians without thee ? I ſee ſome that are afraid to be too holy : and I ſee but ſome that feare to be too prophane. We are all Saints, πάντες ἅγιοι, 1 Cor. 1. 2. All by calling ; and ſome but by calling : By calling of men, not of God : As the Church of Rome hath ſome Saints which are queſtioned whether euer they were in nature ; others, whether they be not in hell ; burning Tapers to them on earth, to whom perhaps the fiends light firebrands below. As Cæſarius the Monke brings in Petrus Cantor, and Roger the Norman diſputing the caſe of Becket ; ſo we haue many titular Saints, few reall ; many which are written in red Letters in the Calendar of the world, Holy to the Lord, whom God neuer canonizes in heauen, and ſhall once entertaine with a Neſcio, I know you not. Theſe men yet haue Holineſſe written vpon them, and are like, as Lucian compares his Græcians, to a faire, gilt, boſſed booke : looke within, there is the Tragedie of Thyeſtes, or perhaps Arrius his Thalia ; the name of a Muſe, the matter hereſie ; or Conradus Vorſtius his late monſter, that hath De Deo in the front, and Atheiſme and Blaſphemie in the text. As S. Paul ſayes to his Corinths, would God yee could ſuffer me a little : Yee cannot want praiſers, ye may want reprouers ; and yet you haue not ſo much neede of Panegyricks, as of reprehenſions. Theſe by how much more rare they are, by ſo much more neceſſarie. Nec cenſura deeſt quæ increpet, nec medicina quæ ſanet, ſaith Cyprian. A falſe praiſe grieues, and a true praiſe ſhames, ſaith Anaſtaſius. As Kings are by God himſelfe called Gods (for there are Dij nuncupatiuè, and not eſſentialiter, as Gregorie diſtinguiſhes) becauſe of their reſemblance of God, ſo their Courts ſhould be like to heauen, and their attendants like Saints and Angels : Decet domum tuam ſanctitudo, agrees to both. Thus you ſhould be : But alas, I ſee ſome care to be gallant, others care to be great, few care to be holy. Yea I know not what Deuill hath poſſeſſed the hearts of many great ones of our time in both ſexes, with this conceit, that they cannot be gallant enough, vnleſſe they be godleſſe. Holineſſe is for Diuines, or men of meane ſpirits, for graue, ſubdued, mortified, retired minds ; not for them that ſtand vpon the tearmes of honour, height of place and ſpirit, noble humours ; hence are our oathes, duels, profaneneſſes. Alas, that we ſhould be ſo beſotted, as to thinke that our ſhame, which is our onely glory : It is reaſon that makes vs men, but it is holineſſe that makes vs Chriſtians. And woe to vs that wee are men, if wee be not Chriſtians. Thinke as baſely of it as yee will : you ſhall one day finde, that one dram of holineſſe is worth a whole world of greatneſſe ; yea, that there is no greatneſſe, but in holineſſe. For Gods ſake therefore doe not ſend holineſſe to Colledges or Hoſpitals for her lodging, but entertaine her willingly into the Court, as a moſt happy gueſt. Thinke it a ſhame, and danger, to goe in fine clothes, while you haue foule hearts; and know, that in vaine ſhall you be honour'd of men, if you be not holy to the Lord. Your goodly outſides may admit you into the Courts on earth; but you ſhall neuer looke within the gates of the Court of heauen without holineſſe: Without holineſſe no man ſhall ſee God. O God, without holineſſe we ſhall neuer ſee thee; and without thee wee ſhall neuer ſee holineſſe: write thou vpon theſe flintie hearts of ours, Holineſſe to thy ſelfe: Make vs holy to thee, that wee may be glorious with thee and all thy Saints and Angels.

All this onely for thy Chriſts ſake, and to whom, &c.

THE IMPRESE OF GOD.

THE SECOND PART.

ZACH. vlt. 20.

IT is well-neere a yeere agoe, ſince in this Gracious Preſence, wee entred vpon this myſticall, yet pertinent Text. You then heard what This day is ; what theſe Bells or Bridles ; what this inſcription ; what theſe Pots and Bowles : And out of That day you heard the proficiencie of the Church ; out of Holineſſe written on the Bells, the ſanctification of the Church : You ſhall now heare, out of theſe Bells, or Bridles of warlike horſes, thus inſcribed, the change of the holy warre, and peace of the Church ; out of theſe Pots, aduanced to the likeneſſe of the Bowles of the Altar, the degrees of the Churches perfection, and acceptation ; All which craue your gracious and honourable attention. That conceit (which yet is graced with the name of ſome Fathers) that takes this in the literall ſenſe of Conſtantines bridle, wee paſſe, as more worthy of ſmiles than confutation : Queſtionleſſe, the ſenſe is ſpirituall ; and it is a ſure rule, that as the hiſtoricall ſenſe is fetcht from ſignification of words, ſo the ſpirituall from the ſignification of thoſe things, which are ſignified by the words.

For this inſcription then, it ſhall not be vpon the bells, for their owne ſakes, but for the horſes : not as bells, but as bells of the horſes ; And on the horſes, not for their owne ſakes, but as they ſerue for their Riders. The horſe, a militarie creature ; there is no other mention of him in Scripture, no other vſe of him of old : when the eyes of Eliſhaes ſeruant were open, he ſaw the hill full of horſes, 2 Kings 6. Euen the celeſtiall warfare is not expreſſed without them : Hence you ſhall euer finde them matcht with Chariots in the Scripture : And the Poet, Nunc tempus equos, nunc poſcere currus : he ruſheth into the battell, ſaith Ieremy ; and he is made for it ; for he hath both ſtrength and nimbleneſſe. He is ſtrong : there is fortitudo equi, Pſalm.47. and God himſelfe acknowledges it. Haſt thou giuen the horſe his ſtrength, Iob 39. He is ſwift, ſaith Ieremy, 4.13. yea as Eagles, or Leopards, ſaith Abacuc. We muſt take theſe horſes then, either as continuing themſelues, or as altered. If the firſt; The very warres vnder the Goſpell ſhall be holy; and God ſhall much glorifie himſelfe by them: He ſaith not, There ſhall be no horſes, or thoſe horſes ſhall haue no bells, or thoſe bells no inſcription; but thoſe horſes, and their vſe, which is warre, and their ornaments, which are bells, ſhall haue a title of Holineſſe. While Cornelius Agrippa writes of the vanitie of Sciences, wee may well wonder at the vanitie of his opinion, that all warre was forbidden vnder the Goſpell. But let Agrippa be vaine in this, as a meere Humaniſt, and the Anabaptiſts groſly falſe, as being franticke heretiques: It is maruell how Eraſmus ſo great a ſcholler, and Ferus ſo great a Text-man could miſcarry in this Manichean conceit. Alphonſus à Caſtro would faine haue our Oecolampadius to keepe them company, but Bellarmine himſelfe can hardly beleeue him: No maruell, when he ſees Zuinglius die in the field, tho as a Paſtor, not as a ſouldier: and when our ſwords haue ſo well taught them, beſides our tongues, that the hereticks are as good friends to warre, as enemies to them. It is Gods euerlaſting title, Dominus exercituum. To ſpeake nothing of the old Teſtament; What can Cornelius Agrippa ſay to Cornelius the Centurion; I feare no man would giue that title to him that oppoſed warre, which Gods ſpirit giues to this agent in warre; A iuſt man, and fearing God: His warfare, ſaith Chryſoſtome, hurt him not. Did not Chriſt himſelfe bid (euen hee that ſaid, Whoſo ſmites with the ſword, ſhall periſh with the ſword, in caſe of priuate reuenge) Qui non habet gladium, vendat tunicam, emat gladium? The Angels themſelues are heauenly ſouldiers; Euery Chriſtian is a ſouldier: As he is a Chriſtian, he fights not againſt fleſh and bloud, but principalities and powers; as he is a Chriſtian ſouldier, he fights both againſt fleſh and bloud, and principalities; All the warres of God: So that contrary to S. Martin, who ſaid, I am a Chriſtian, I may not fight; he muſt ſay, I am a Chriſtian, I muſt fight. And why may he not? God when he makes vs Chriſtians, leaues vs the ſame wit to deuiſe ſtratagems, the ſame hands to execute them. All things (as Eraſmus wittily) haue in them naturally a meanes of defence; the Horſe heeles, Dog teeth, Oxe hornes, Porcupine quills, Bee ſting, Serpent poyſon; thoſe weaker creatures that cannot reſiſt, haue either nimble feet to out-run vs, or wings to out-flie vs: Only man is left naked: Yet ſo, as his furniture within can ſoone furniſh him for without: Yet all horſes, all warres, are not written holy; As there is a ſpirituall euill warre, of the fleſh againſt the ſpirit: ſo there is a temporall of fleſh, againſt fleſh. Vnde bella? ſaith Saint Iames. Militare propter prædam, to fight for a booty (ſaith Ambroſe) is ſinne. That witty Alphonſus King of Arragon (to whom wee are beholden for ſo many Apothegmes) had for his Impreſe a Pellican ſtriking her ſelfe in the breſt, and feeding her young with the bloud; with a word, Pro lege, & grege. All warre drawes bloud: oft of the innocent part, πολεμος is πολυ-αιμος, and therefore muſt neuer be but pro lege, for Religion; or pro grege, for the Common-wealth. And as it hath theſe two grounds; ſo alſo two directors; Iuſtice and Charitie. Iuſtice, that requires both authoritie in the menager, and innocence in menaging; Authoritie; A ſubordinate power is not capable of holy warre: He only may ſay pro lege, that is cuſtos vtriuſque tabulæ; he only pro grege, that is ποιμην λαων: If priuate men ſhall ſay, pro lege, or pro grege, they are traitors, and not ſouldiers; In them, as he ſaid to Alexander, warre is but theft and murder. Only Kings are the publike Iuſticers of the world: which can command peace, with their owne, and puniſh the breach of peace in others Innocence. Wrong no man, ſaith Ioh. Bapt. That non ex iure, is more than vnchriſtian, bruitiſh.

Charitie; whether in the intention; Peace muſt be the end of warre. Bellarmine ſaid this one thing well, that warre to the Common-wealth is as vulnera Chirurgi: or, in the action; both of vndertaking and ceſſation: vndertaking; according to the Iewiſh prouerbe, Firſt we muſt inquire of Abel; and the heathen Poet could ſay, extrema nemo primo tentauit loco: no iuſt warre is ακηρυκτος: Ceſſation, vpon iuſt ſatisfaction; as Shebaes head raiſes the ſiege of Abel: This is bellum Domini; and Holineſſe is written vpon the bells of theſe horſes of warre. Such were the warres of that bleſſed Conſtantine, both Theodoſij, Honorius, and all whom God wrote Holy, and made happy. Such were many gallant Princes of old perſwaded that thoſe warres of Paleſtine were; who in a cunning wile were ſent to get the Holy Land, that in the meane time they might leeſe their owne: How many Councels were ſummon'd, how many Armies leuied, one of 300000 at once, by Pope Vrbans procurement? how many ſtreames of Chriſtian bloud ſpilt to recouer the land of them that murdred Chriſt, which God had curſed to confuſion, terram ſacerrimam, in the Plautine ſenſe? Such are thoſe that are vndertaken againſt the ſcourge of Chriſtendome, the creature of Mahomet, that Turkiſh Magog. Such are thoſe that the Defender of the Chriſtian faith hath beene iuſtly prouoked to vndertake againſt that Romiſh vſurper, PETERS ſucceſſor in nothing, but in denying his Maſter. The inclemencie of the late Pope labouring to foreſtall him in his iuſt throne, and the abſurd pragmaticall impudencie of the preſent, in that groſſe prohibition of a fauourable and naturall oath, for his Maieſties ſecurity, in a ſort countenancing rebellion againſt his Perſon; beſide thoſe ſhameleſſe libels of his factors, to the ſcorne of Gods Anointed, haue ſeemed to vſurpe Samuels meſſage, Vade, percute, demolire. To omit priuate motiues; Pope Vrbane in that his zealous Oration to the Councell of Cleremont vſed no one reaſon to perſwade the world to draw their ſword againſt the Turkes which might not iuſtly be vrged to Chriſtian Princes, to ſcale the wals of Rome. Doth hee ſpeake of the Saracens prophaning of Ieruſalem? we parallel the ſhamefull profanations of the ſpirituall Ieruſalem; their heatheniſme was neuer ſo idolatrous. Doth he ſpeake of abuſing the ſepulcher of Chriſt? we parallel them with the abuſing of his ſacred body. Doth he ſpeake of the cruelty of thoſe ſauages? we alſo may ſay of them, Effunditur ſanguis Chriſtianus, Chriſti ſanguine redemptus &c. neither need I feare to ſay with Iunius, that in this they are Trucis Truciores. But I know what difference there is betwixt a Preacher, and an Herald: our title is Euangelizantes pacem; And tho the ſword of the hand doth well, yet it is the ſword of the mouth, that muſt ſlay that Man of ſinne: Yet this I dare ſay, that if in the cauſe of God and his Church, this warre ſhould be vndertaken, Holineſſe ſhould be written vpon our Horſes bridles; and, as we ſhall enter with fewer croſſes vpon our breſts, than thoſe honeſt ſouldiers into their holy warre: ſo both our cauſe ſhould be more holy, and we ſhould returne with fewer croſſes on our backes; But I meddle not with this. There is a warre that wee cannot ſhake off: Not with the perſon, but the corruptions of that foule Church, wee haue long waged it. God had neuer any quarrell vpon earth, if this be not his. Our bleſſed forefathers haue ſhed their bloud in this field, and are glorious: let vs ſtir vp our chriſtian courage to this ſeruice, vpon our horſes heads ſhall be written holines; vpon ours, glory and immortality. But take theſe horſes and bels altered (as fits better) by this writing from themſelues; what God writes is done: Write this man childleſſe: therefore he muſt be ſo: Ioel doth not ſo well comment vpon this place, Breake your plow-ſhares into ſwords, and your ſithes into ſpeares, Ioel 3.10. as Micach 4. 3. They ſhall break their ſwords into mattocks, and their ſpeares into ſithes; Mattocks and ſithes the inſtruments of profit, one for the commodities aboue the earth, the other for thoſe vnder it: which as I take it, would not be ſo ſtrictly reſtrained to the very time of Chriſts comming, when there was an vniuerſall peace on earth, and the Temple of Ianus was ſhut: as Cyril, Chryſoſtome, Euſebius, Hierome, vnderſtand it: rather it is a prophecie of that outward and during peace vnder the Goſpell which all the true profeſſors of it ſhould maintaine with themſelues. Al nations, though fierce and ſterne of diſpoſition, yet if they once ſtoop ſincerely to the Goſpell, ſhall compoſe themſelues to a ſweet accordance, and imploy their vnited ſtrength to the ſeruice of God: But how is this fulfilled? Some in all ages haue run forth into fury, & troubled the common peace: It is true; but theſe are blanks, ſuch as vpon whom God hath not written holines. It is no hoping that all horſes ſhall be bridled, or all bridles written on. As grace, ſo peace is not in ſuch ſort vniuerſall, that all ſhould incline to it, on all conditions: There are ſome שוני שלום Peace-haters; it is as poſſible to tame a waſpe, as to incline them to peace: Such are the wilful Romaniſts of our time (to omit Schiſmes) which will rather mingle heauen & earth together, than remit one gainefull error. But what euer become of theſe Mamzers, which doe thus exclude themſelues from the congregation of God, it were happy, if al the true and acknowledged ledged ſonnes of the Church would admit the inſcription of an holy peace. Alas, why doe wee that are brethren fall out for our change of ſuits by the way? and make thoſe quarrels deadly, which deſerue not to be quarrels? Oh that ſome bleſſed Doue would bring an Oliue of peace into this Arke of God! Who is ſo fit for this glorious ſeruice as our gracious peace-maker? Nemo me impune laceſſet, is a good Poſie; but Beati pacifici, is a better. Let the Vice-gerent of him which is the Prince of peace, as he was made for the peace of the walls, and proſperity of the gates of Sion, be that Angelus pacis, Eſ. 33.7. Let his wiſedome and ſweet moderation proceed to allay all theſe vnkindly ſtormes of the Church, that we may liue to ſee that happy greeting of the Pſalmiſt, Righteouſneſſe and Peace haue kiſſed each other. And as this holds in matter of iudgment, ſo of practiſe too. Do you ſee a looſe & lawleſſe man, wilfull in his deſires, vnbridled in his affections, inordinate in his life, imploying his wit to ſcoffe at his Creator, caring for nothing but the worſe part of himſelfe? There is one of Zacharies horſes; when Gods ſpirit breaths vpon the ſoule of this man, he is now another from himſelfe: Holineſſe to the Lord is written vpon his Bels. This was done ſometimes of old: Saul was among the Prophets; Salomon and Manaſſes, great patternes of conuerſion; but rarely in reſpect of the dayes of the Goſpell. What ſhould I ſpeake of S. Paul? No ground would hold him, he runs chafing and foaming from Hieruſalem to Damaſcus; of his Iaylor? of Mary Magdalen? Behold whole troupes of wilde natures reclaimed, Eph. 4. Coloſſ. 3. Act. 2. Who can deſpaire where God vndertakes? Shew me neuer ſo violent and deſperate a ſinner, let him be as Iobs wilde aſſe in the deſart, or as Amos his horſe, that will run vpon the rocks, Amos 6.12. if God once take him in hand, thou ſhalt ſoone ſee that this horſe is fleſh, and not ſpirit; and ſhalt ſing Deborahs, Vngulæ ceciderunt, Iudg. 5.22. or Ioſhuahs, Subneruabis, Ioſ. 11.6. Now ſhalt thou ſee him ſtand quaking vnder the almighty hand of God, ſo that he may write what he will in his bridle, yea in his skin. And if there be any ſuch headſtrong and reſtie ſteed here among vs, let him know, that God will either breake his ſtomacke or his heart: Flagellũ equo, ſaith Salomon; and if that will not ſerue, Collidã in te equum & equitẽ, Ier. 51.21. But alas, how rare are theſe examples of reclamation? Where is this power of the Goſpell? Men continue beaſts ſtill, and with that filthy Gryllus plead for the priuiledge of their beſtialitie. The ſins of men ſtriue to outface the glory of the Goſpell. What ſhall I ſay to this? If after all theſe meanes thou haue no bridle, or thy bridle no inſcription, it is a fearfulll doome of the Apoſtle; If our Goſpell be hid, it is hid to them that periſh. Thus much of the horſes and bels. Now from the pots and bowles, you ſhall ſee the degrees of the Churches perfection: and ſee it, I beſeech you, without wearineſſe, with intention. The pots of the Temple were ſeething veſſels for the vſe of ſacrifice: Theſe are the Prieſts themſelues here, for that there is a diſtinction made betwixt the Pots of the Lords houſe, and euery pot in Ieruſalem. The ordinarie Iew was euery pot: therefore the Pots of the Lords houſe muſt be his Miniſters. Theſe vnder the Goſpel ſhall be of more honorable vſe; (as the bowles before the Altar) like as the Altar of perfumes was more inward, and of higher reſpect. The pots were of ſhining braſſe; bowles of gold, 1 King. 7.50. It is no brag to ſay, that the Miniſterie of the Goſpell is more glorious than that of the Law: The leaſt in the kingdome of heauen (ſaith CHRIST) is greater than Iohn Baptiſt, Matth. 11. 11. The kingdome of heauen, that is, the Church; not as Auſten, Ierome, Bede expound it, of the third heauen; for Chriſt would make an oppoſition betwixt the old and new Teſtament. The not vnlearned Ieſuite Maldonat, while he taxeth vs for preferring euery Miniſter of the Goſpell to Iohn Baptiſt, mends the matter ſo well, that he verifies it of euery perſon; Minimus quiſque in Euangelio, that is, qui Euangelium recipit, maior eſt illo; not feeling how he buffets himſelfe: for if the leaſt of thoſe that receiue the Goſpell, how much more the leaſt of thoſe that preach it? This is no arrogance. God would haue euery thing in the laſt Temple more glorious than in the firſt, which was figured by the outward frame, more glorious in CHRISTS time, than that of SALOMON; as that was beyond the Tabernacle. This is a better Teſtament, Heb. 7. 22. That had the ſhadow, this the ſubſtance, Heb. 10. Vnder this, is greater illumination; Effundam ſpiritum meum, ſaith the Prophet; before, ſome few drops diſtilled; now a whole current of graces; Effundam. If therefore Iohn Baptiſt were greater than the ſonnes of men, becauſe they ſaw Chriſt to come, he pointed at him comming; ours muſt needs be more glorious, becauſe we ſee and point at him now come, and fully exhibited. We will not conteſt with the Leuiticall Prieſthood, for coſt of clothes, for price of veſſels; let the Church of Rome emulate this pompe, (which cares not if ſhee haue golden veſſels, though ſhee haue leaden Prieſts,) we enuie it not; but for inward graces, for learning, knowledge, power of teaching, there is no leſſe difference, than betwixt the pots of the Temple, and bowles of the Altar: God ſayes of them in way of reiection, *Non eſt mihi voluntas in vobis, Mal.*1. Hence the Prieſthood of the new Law is Leui refined, Mal. 3. 3. Et purgabit filios Leui; which Hierome not vnlikely, interprets of the Miniſterie of the Goſpell: They are the ſonnes of Leui, which ſignifies Copulation; quia homines cum Deo copulant; but of Leui purged, and purged as gold: As much difference betweene them, as betwixt gold in the Ore, and in the wedge. Hence is double honour challenged to the Euangelicall Miniſterie, yea, and giuen: Yee receiued me, ſaith S. Paul, as an Angell of God, yea as Chriſt Ieſus, Gal. 4.14. Hence the Angell, of himſelfe to IOHN, I am thy fellow-ſeruant. Woe be to them therefore which ſpet in the faces of thoſe whom God hath honoured: It is Gods ſecond charge, this of his Prophets: His firſt is, Touch not mine anointed; his ſecond, Hurt not my Prophets. And if one diſgracefull word ſpoken but by rude children to a Prophet of the old Teſtament, coſt ſo many throats, God be mercifull to thoſe dangerous and deadly affronts that haue beene, and are daily offered to the Prophets of the new: What can wee ſay, but with the women of Tekoah, Serua ô Rex. We bleſſe God that we may bemoane our ſelues to the tender and indulgent eares of a gracious Soueraigne, ſenſible of theſe ſpirituall wrongs; who yet (we know) may well anſwer vs with Iacobs queſtion, An loco Dei ego ſum? It grieues me to thinke and ſay of our ſelues, that for a great part of this, Perditio tua ex te. Woe to thoſe corrupted ſonnes of Heli, which through their inſufficiencie and vnconſcionableneſſe, haue powred contempt on their owne faces. That proud fugitiue Campian could ſay, Miniſtris illorum nihil vilius, &c. As falſly as ſpightfully. Let heauen and earth witneſſe, whether any Nation in the world can afford ſo learned, ſo glorious a Clergie. But yet, among ſo many pots of the Temple, it is no maruell if ſome be drie for want of liquor, others ruſtie for want of vſe, others full of liquor without meat, others ſo full of meat that they want liquor. Let the Lords anointed, whoſe example and incouragements haue raiſed euen this diuine learning to this excellent perfection, by his gracious countenance, diſpell contempt from the profeſſors of it, and by his effectuall endeuours remoue the cauſes of this contempt.

But as euery Chriſtian vnder the Goſpell is a Prieſt and Prophet, let the people be theſe pots, or the offerings of the people. That ſhall be in reſpect of the frequence, or fragrance, according to the double acception of that particle of compariſon (Camiſrachim) as the bowles; for number, or qualitie. For the frequence. A few ſeething pots ſerued the ſacrifice; but bowles they vſed many: what for the vſe of the Altar of incenſe, what for the receiuing of the bloud of the ſacrifice, Salomon made an 100 of gold. Now then ſaith God, in the dayes of the Goſpell, there ſhall be ſuch ſtore of oblations to God, that the number of the pots ſhall equalize the number of the bowles of the Altar: not vnlike, becauſe of the following words; Euery pot in Ieruſalem ſhall be faine to be employed to the ſacrifices. This frequence then, is either of the officers, or offerings; perſons, or acts. For the perſons; they were few in compariſon, vnder the Law. All Paleſtine, which comprehends all their officers, except ſome few Proſelytes, was but (as Ierome, which was a Lieger there, reckons it) an 160 miles long from Dan to Beerſheba, and 46 miles broad from Ioppa to Bethleem. Now the partition wall is broken downe, all nations vnder heauen yeeld franke offerers to the Altar of God. There was no offering then but at Ieruſalem: now Ieruſalem is euery where. So much therefore as the world is wider than Iudea, ſo much as Chriſtendome is larger than the walles of the Temple; ſo many more officers hath the Goſpell than the Law. And it were well, if there were as many, as they ſeeme. If but as many as all the world ouer offer their preſence to Gods ſeruice on Gods day (leaue thoſe that ſpend it in the Stewes and Tauernes, to him whom they ſerue) were true offerers, how rich would the Altar be, and the Temple how glorious? But alas, if God will be ſerued with mouthes full of oathes, curſes, bitterneſſe, with heads full of wine, with eyes full of luſt, with hands full of bloud, with backs full of pride, with panches full of gluttonie, with ſoules and liſes full of horrible ſinnes, he may haue offerers as many as men: elſe as Eſay, relicta eſt in vrbe ſolitudo; a few pots will hold our ſacrifices: and what is this, but through our wilfull diſobedience, to croſſe him which hath ſaid, that in this day the pots of the Temple ſhall be as the bowles of the Altar. The act or commoditie is offerings; whether outward, or inward. The outward fulfilled in thoſe large endowments of the Church, by our deuout and bountifull predeceſſors. What liberall reuenues, rich maintenances were then put into (mort-maine) the dead hand of the Church? Lawes were faine to reſtraine the bountie of thoſe contributions (the grounds whereof I examine not) in ſtead of MOSES his proclamation, Nequis facito deinceps opus ad oblationem Sanctuarij, ſatis enim eſt, adeoq́ ſupereſt, Exod. 26. 6. Then mons Domini, mons pinguis: but now the Church may cry with the Prophet, My leanneſſe, my leanneſſe. For ſhame, why ſhould ſacrilege croud in with religion? why ſhould our better knowledge finde vs leſſe conſcionable? O iniurious zeale of thoſe men, which thinke the Church cannot be holy enough, vnleſſe ſhee begg. It hath beene ſaid of old, That Religion bred wealth, and the daughter eat vp the mother: I know not, if the daughter deuoured the mother; I am ſure theſe men would deuoure both daughter and mother: Men of vaſt gorges, and inſatiable. Our Sauiour cryed out againſt the Scribes and Phariſes, yet they deuoured but widowes houſes, poore low cottages: but theſe gulfes of men, whole Churches; and yet the ſepulchers of their throats are open for more. I can tell them of a mouth that is wider than theirs, and that is the Prophets, Os inferni: Therefore Hell hath inlarged it ſelfe, and hath opened his mouth, without meaſure: and their glory, and their pompe, and he that reioyceth in it, ſhall deſcend into it, Eſa. 5. 14. In the meane time, Oh that our SAMSON would pull this honie of the Church out of the iawes of theſe Lyons; or if the cunning conueyances of ſacrilege haue made that impoſſible, ſince it lies not now entire in the combes, but is let downe and digeſted by theſe rauenners, let him whoſe glory it is not to be Pater Patriæ onely, but Pater Eccleſiæ, prouide that thoſe few pots we haue, may ſtill ſeeth, and that if nothing will be added, nothing can be recouered, yet nothing may be purloyned from the Altars of God. But theſe outward offerings were but the types of the inward: What cares God for the bloud or fleſh of bullocks, rams, goats? Non delectaris ſacrificio vt dem, holocauſtum non vis, ſaith Dauid: what then? The ſacrifice of God is a contrite ſpirit, a broken heart. Our humiliation is ſacrificium pœnitentiæ, our new obedience is ſacrificium iuſtitiæ, our thankfull commemorations are ſacrificium laudis. Theſe are the oblations which as they ſhall be frequent vnder the Goſpell, ſo moſt fragrant vnto God: and this is that laſt, and perhaps moſt proper ſenſe, wherein the fleſh-pots of the ſacrifices erant ſicut aromata, ſhall be as perfumes in the bowles of incenſe. A liuely ſacrifice is well matcht with holy and acceptable. When Noah ſacrificed to God after the Deluge, it is ſaid God ſmelt a ſauour of reſt, alluding to his name: but now the ſacrifices we offer are ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, a ſauour of ſweetneſſe: ſo that the ſame ſauour that Chriſts oblation had, Epheſ. 5. 2. the ſame haue our offerings, Philip. 4. 18. Gods children, out of the conſcience of their owne weakneſſes, are eaſily diſcouraged in the valuation of their owne obedience. As therefore they can ſay of their perſons, with Mephiboſheth, What is thy ſeruant? ſo of their ſeruices, as Philip ſaid of the fiue loaues and two fiſhes, ἀλλὰ ταῦτα τί ἐστιν, Alas, what are theſe? But they and their offerings cannot be ſo baſe to themſelues, as they are precious to God. There is no ſenſe that giues ſo liuely a refreſhing to the ſpirits, as that of ſmelling: no ſmell can yeeld ſo true and feeling delight to the ſenſe, as the offerings of our penitence, obedience, praiſe, ſend vp into the noſtrils of the Almighty. Hence as the Church can ſay of Chriſt, He is as a bundle of myrrh lying betweene her breaſts; ſo he againe of her in that heauenly Epithalamion, Thy plants are as an Orchard of Pomegranates, with ſweet fruits, as cypres, ſpicknard, ſaffron, calamus, and cinamon, with all the trees of incenſe, myrrh, and aloes, with all the chiefe ſpices, Cant. 4. 13. Let this therefore comfort vs, againſt our imperfections; If we be pots of the Lords houſe, thoſe faint ſtreames that we ſend vp, ſhall be as ſweet, as the beſt incenſe of the bowles of the Altar, and God ſaies to vs, as to Cornelius, Thy praiers and thine almes are come vp, Act. 10. And how are they come vp? Like pillars of ſmoke perfumed with myrrh and incenſe, and with all the chiefe ſpices, Cant. 3. 6. I ſay if we bee pots of the Lords houſe; for if we be Ægyptian fleſh-pots, that reeke of the ſtrong-ſmelling onions and garlike of our owne corruptions; If we be Ezechiels bloudy pots, whoſe ſcumme or (as the vulgar) whoſe ruſt is in them, Ezec. 24. If we boile with luſt, if with reuenge, if with ambition; I can ſay no other of vs, than the ſonnes of the Prophets ſaid of theirs, Mors in olla, Death is in the pot; a double death, of body, and ſoule. It is a true ſpeech of Origen, Peccatum eſt putidi odoris: No carion is ſo noiſome. Alas, what ſauours are ſent vp to God from thoſe, that would ſeeme not onely pots of the Temple, but bowles of the Altar; How vnſauourie is the pride, prophaneneſſe, riotouſneſſe, oppreſſion, beaſtlineſſe of our times? It were happy if the Court were free: and as it receiues more ſweet influences of fauour, than all other places; ſo, that it returned backe more fragrant obedience: that as it is ſaid of Maries ſpicknard, wherewith ſhee anointed Chriſt, that the whole houſe was filled with the ſauour of the ointment, Ioh. 12. 3. ſo the whole world might be full of the pleaſant perfumes of vertuous example, that might ariſe from hence. But alas, the painted faces, and manniſhneſſe, and monſtrous diſguiſedneſſe of the one ſex, the factious hollowneſſe, prodigall gariſhneſſe, wanton pampering, exceſſe in our reſpect to our ſelues, defects in our reſpects to God in the other, argue too well, that too many of vs ſauour more like the golden ſockets of the holy lights, than the bowles of the Altar; God cannot abide theſe ill ſents. The fiue Cities of the plaines ſent vp ſuch poiſonous vapours to God, that he ſent them downe brimſtone againe with their fire. That which hell is deſcribed by, is ſent downe from Heauen, becauſe that ſuch helliſh exhalations aſcend from them, to heauen. How ſhould the ſinnes of Sodome not expect the iudgements of Sodome? Well might the Iewes feare, becauſe they would not be ſeruiceable caldrons vnto God, that therefore they ſhould be the fleſh, and their Citie the caldron, Ezec. 11. 3. Well may we feare it, who haue had ſo ſenſible proofes, as of the fauours, ſo of the iudgements of God: and happy ſhall it be for vs, if we can ſo feare, that our feare may preuent euils. Let theſe pots of ours therefore ſend vp ſweet fumes of contrition, righteouſneſſe, thankſgiuing, into the noſtrils of God; and the ſmoke of his diſpleaſure, wherewith coales of eternall fire are kindled againſt his enemies, ſhall not come forth of his noſtrils againſt vs: He ſhall ſmell a ſauour of reſt from vs; we a ſauour of peace and life from him: which God for his mercy ſake, and for his Sonne Chriſts ſake, vouchſafe to grant vs. To whom with the Father, and the holy Ghoſt, one glorious God, be giuen all praiſe, honour, and glory, now and for euer.

AMEN.

A FAREWELL SERMON,

PREACHT TO THE FAMILIE OF PRINCE HENRY,

VPON THE DAY OF THEIR DISSOLVTION AT S. IAMES.

Imprinted at London, 1627.

A FAREWELL SERMON.

Revel. 21. 3.

And I heard a great voice from heauen, ſaying, Behold the Tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they ſhall be his people, and God himſelfe ſhall bee their God with them.

And God ſhall wipe away all teares from their eyes, and there ſhall be no more death, neither ſorrow, nor crying, neither ſhall there be any more paine, for the firſt things are paſſed. And he that ſate vpon the throne ſaid; Behold, I make all things new.

IT is no wonder, if this place, as it is (for the preſent) the Well-head of ſorrow to all Chriſtendome, haue ſent forth abundance of waters of teares. And perhaps, you may expect, that as the trumpets of our late heauy funerall-ſolemnity, ſounded baſeſt and dolefulleſt at the laſt, ſo my ſpeech being the laſt publike breath of this ſad diſſoluing Family, ſhould bee moſt paſſionately ſorrowfull. And ſurely I could eaſily obtaine of my ſelfe, out of the bitterneſſe of my ſoule, to ſpend my ſelfe in lamentations, and to breake vp this aſſembly, in the violent expreſſions of that griefe, wherewith our hearts are already broken: but, I well conſider, that we ſhall carry ſorrow enough home with vs, in my ſilence; and that it is both more hard, and more neceſſary for vs, to be led forth to the waters of comfort. And becauſe our occaſions of griefe are ſuch, as no earthly tongue can releeue vs, nor no earthly obiect, A voice from heauen ſhall doe it, and a voyce leading vs from earth to heauen, And I heard a voice from heauen, &c.

This day is a day of note for three famous periods. Firſt, it is the day of the diſſipation of this Royall Family. Then, the laſt day of our publike and ioynt mourning. Laſtly, the day of the alteration and renewing of our ſtate, and courſe of life, with the New-yeere. All theſe meet in this Text with their cordialls, and diuine remedies; Our diſſipation and diſſolution in theſe words, Behold the Tabernacle of God is with men. Our mourning, God ſhall wipe away all teares, &c. Our change of eſtate, Behold, I will make all things new. I muſt craue leaue to glide thorow all of theſe with much ſpeed, and (for the better conueniencie of our diſcourſe) thorow the firſt, laſt.

Hall, J.

My ſpeech therefore ſhall as it were climbe vp theſe ſix ſtaires of doctrine.

1. That here our eyes are full of teares: how elſe ſhould they be wip't away? how all, vnleſſe many?

2. That theſe teares are from ſorrow; and this ſorrow from death, and toyle, out of the connexion of all theſe.

3. That God will once free vs, both from teares which are the effect of ſorrow, and from toile and death which are the cauſes of it.

4. That this our freedome, muſt bee vpon a change; for that the firſt things are paſſed.

5. That this change ſhall be in our Renouation. Behold I make all things new.

6. That this renouation and happy change ſhall be in our perpetuall fruition of the inſeparable preſence of God, whoſe Tabernacle ſhall be with men.

As thoſe grounds that lie low are commonly mooriſh, this baſe part of the world wherein we liue, is the vale of teares, That true Bochim, as the Iſraelites called their mourning-place: We begin our life with teares, and therefore our Lawyers define life, by weeping; if a childe were heard cry, it is a lawfull proofe of his liuing: elſe if hee be dead, we ſay he is ſtill-borne; and at our parting God findes teares in our eies, which he ſhall wipe off. So we finde it alwayes, not onely (לבכות עת) a time of weeping, but (סמוך) of ſolemne mourning, as Salomon puts them together, Eccl. 3. 4. Except we be in that caſe that Dauid and his people were in, (and Ieremie ſayes the ſame in his Lamentations, of the Iewes) that they wept till they could weepe no more: Here are teares at our deuotion; The Altar couered with teares, Mal. 2. Teares in the bed, Dauid watered his couch with teares, Pſal. 6. Teares to waſh with, as Maries. Teares to eat, Pſal. 42. 3. Teares to drinke, Pſal. 80. yea drunkenneſſe with teares, Eſay 16. 9. This is our deſtiny as we are men, but more as we are Chriſtians, To ſow in Teares; and God loues theſe wet ſeed-times; they are ſeaſonable for vs here below: Thoſe men therefore are miſtaken, that thinke to goe to heauen with drie eyes, and hope to leape immediately out of the pleaſures of earth, into the Paradiſe of God; inſulting ouer the drouping eſtate of Gods diſtreſſed ones. As Ierome, and Bede, ſay of Peter, that he could not weepe while he was in the High Prieſts walls, ſo theſe men cannot weepe where they haue offended. But let them know that they muſt haue a time of teares, and if they doe not begin with teares, they ſhall end with them; Woe be to them that laugh, for they ſhall weepe; and if they will not weepe, and ſhake their heads here, they ſhall weepe and waile, and gnaſh their teeth hereafter: Here muſt be teares, and that good ſtore: All teares; as riuers are called the teares of the ſea, (נבכי ים) Iob 38. ſo muſt our teares be the riuers of our eyes, Pſal. 119. 136. and our eyes fountaines, Ier 9. 1. Here muſt be teares of penitence, teares of compaſſion, and will be teares of ſorrow: Well are thoſe two met therefore; teares and ſorrow: for though ſome ſhed teares for ſpight, others for ioy, as Cyprians Martyrs, Gaudium pectoris lachrymis exprimentes; yet commonly teares are the iuyce of a minde preſſed with griefe; And as well doe teares, and crying, and ſorrow, accompany death, either in the ſuppoſition, or the deniall; For as worldly ſorrow (euen in this ſenſe) cauſeth death, by drying the bones, and conſuming the body: ſo death euer lightly, is a iuſt cauſe of ſorrow; ſorrow to nature in our ſelues, ſorrow to ours. And as death is the terribleſt thing, ſo it is the ſaddeſt thing, that befals a man. Nature could ſay in the Poet, Quis matrem in funere nati Flere vetat? yea God himſelfe allowed his holy Prieſts, to pollute themſelues in mourning, for their neereſt dead friends, except the High Prieſt; which was forbidden it in figure. And the Apoſtle while he forbids the Theſſalonians to mourne, as without hope, doth in a ſort command their teares, but barre their immoderation. It was not without a ſpeciall reference to a iudgment, that God ſayes to Ezechiel, Sonne of man, behold I will take from thee the pleaſure of thy life with a plague, yet ſhalt thou neither mourne nor weepe, neither ſhall thy teares runne downe. So fit did the Iewes hold teares for Funerals, that they hired mourners, which with incompoſed geſtures ranne vp and downe the ſtreets, Eccl. 12. who did alſo cut and lance themſelues, that they might mourne in earneſt, Ier. 16. That good natur'd Patriarch Iſaac, mourned three yeeres for his mother, as the Chineſes doe at this day for their friends. Iacob mourned two and twenty yeares for Ioſeph : and there want not ſome, which haue thought Adam and Eue mourned an 100 yeares for Abel : but, who knowes not the wailings of Abel-mitzraim for Ioſeph ; of the valley of Megiddon for Ioſiah ? And if euer any corps deſerued to ſwim in teares, if euer any loſſe could command lamentation ; then this of ours, yea of this whole ILAND, yea of the whole Church of God, yea of the whole world, iuſtly cals for it, and truly hath it.

O HENRY our ſweet Prince, our ſweet Prince HENRY, the ſecond glory of our Nation, ornament of mankinde, hope of poſterity, and life of our life, how doe all hearts bleed, and eies worthily guſh out, for thy loſſe ! A loſſe, that we had neither grace to feare, nor haue capacity to conceiue. Shall I praiſe him to you, who are therefore now miſerable, becauſe you did know him ſo well ? I forbeare it, though to my paine; if I did not ſpare you, I could not ſo ſwiftly paſſe ouer the name, and the vertues of that glorious Saint, our deare Maſter, or the aggrauation of that loſſe, whereof you are too ſenſible : my true commiſeration ſhall command me ſilence : yet I could not but touch our ſore (with this light hand) tho yet raw and bleeding : Death (eſpecially ſuch a death) muſt haue ſorrow and teares ; All Nations, all ſucceſſion of times ſhall beare a part with vs in this lamentation : And if wee could but as heartily haue prayed for him before, as we haue heartily wept for him ſince ; perhaps we had not had this cauſe of mourning. From ſorrow, let vs deſcend to paines (which is no ſmall cauſe of crying and teares) as I feare ſome of vs muſt : the word howſoeuer it is here tranſlated, is (πονος) labour ; I muſt confeſſe, labour and paine are neere one another ; whence we ſay, that he which labours, takes paines ; and contrarily, that a woman is in labour, or trauell, when ſhee is in the paine of child-birth ; teares cannot be wip't away whiles toile remaines ; That the Iſraelites may leaue crying, they muſt bee deliuered from the brick-kilnes of Ægypt. Indeed, God had in our creation allotted vs labour, without paine ; but when once ſinne came into the ſoule, paine ſeized vpon the bones, and the minde was poſſeſſed with a wearineſſe, and irkſome loathing of what it muſt do: and euer ſince, ſorrow and labour haue beene inſeparable attendants vpon the life of man: Inſomuch as God, when he would deſcribe to vs the happy eſtate of the dead, does it in thoſe termes, They ſhall reſt from their labours : Looke into the field, there you ſhall ſee toiling at the plough and ſithe. Looke into the waters, there you ſee tugging at the oares and cabels. Looke into the City, there you ſee plodding in the ſtreets, ſweating in the ſhops. Looke into the ſtudies, there you ſee fixing of eyes, toſſing of bookes, ſcratching the head, paleneſſe, infirmitie. Looke into the Court, there you ſee tedious attendance, emulatory officiouſneſſe. All things are full of labour, and labour is full of ſorrow. If we doe nothing, idleneſſe is weariſome ; if any thing, worke is weariſome ; in one or both of theſe, the beſt of life is conſumed. Who now can bee in loue with a life that hath nothing in it but crying, and teares, in the entrance ; death, in the concluſion ; labour and paine in the continuance ; and ſorrow in all theſe ? What Gally-ſlaue but we would be in loue with our chaine ? what priſoner would delight in his dungeon ? How hath our infidelity beſotted vs, if we doe not long after that happy eſtate of our immortality, wherein all our teares ſhall be wip't away ; and we at once free from labour, ſorrow, and death ? Now, as it is vaine to hope for this till then ; ſo then not to hope for it, is paganiſh and brutiſh. He that hath tasked vs with theſe penances, hath vndertaken to releaſe vs. God ſhall wipe away all teares.

While we ſtay here, he keepes all our teares in a bottle, ſo precious is the water that is diſtilled from penitent eies; and becauſe he will be ſure not to faile, he notes how many drops there be, in his regiſter. It was a precious ointment, wherewith the woman in the Phariſes houſe (it is thought Mary Magdalen) anointed the feet of Chriſt : but her teares wherewith ſhe waſht them, were more worth than her ſpiknard. But that which is here precious, is there vnſeaſonable ; then he ſhall wipe away thoſe which here hee would ſaue. As death, ſo paſſions are the companions of infirmity ; Whereupon ſome that haue beene too nice, haue called thoſe which were incident into Chriſt, Propaſſions; not conſidering that he which was capable of death, might be as well of paſſions. Theſe troubleſome affections of griefe, feare, and ſuch like, doe not fall into glorified ſoules. It is true, that they haue loue, deſire, ioy in their greateſt perfection: yea they could not haue perfection without them; but like as God loues, and hates, and reioyces truly, but in a manner of his owne, abſtracted from all infirmity, and paſſion: ſo doe his glorified Saints in imitation of him. There therefore, as we cannot die, ſo wee cannot grieue, we cannot be afflicted. Here one ſayes, My belly, my belly, with the Prophet; another, Mine head, mine head, with the Shunamites ſonne; another, My ſonne, my ſonne, as Dauid; another, My father, my father, with Eliſha. One cryes out of his ſinnes, with Dauid; another of his hunger, with Eſau; another of an ill wife, with Iob; another 2 Kings 4. of treacherous friends, with the Pſalmiſt; One of a ſore in body, with Ezechias; another of a troubled ſoule, with our Sauiour in the garden; euery one hath ſome complaint, or other, to make his cheeks wet, and his heart heauy. Stay but a while, and there ſhall be none of theſe: There ſhall be no crying, no complaining in the ſtreets of the new Ieruſalem: No axe, no hammer ſhall be heard within this heauenly Temple. Why are we not content to weepe here a while, on condition that we may weepe no more? Why are we not ambitious of this bleſſed eaſe? Certainly, we doe not ſmart enough with our euills, that we are not deſirous of reſt; Theſe teares are not yet dry, yet they are ready to be ouertaken by others, for our particular afflictions. Miſeries, as the Pſalmiſt compares them, are like waues, which breake one vpon another, and toſſe vs with a perpetuall vexation; and we vaine men, ſhall we not wiſh to be in our hauen? Are we ſicke, and grieue to thinke of remedy? Are wee ſtill dying, and are wee loth to thinke of life? Oh this miſerable vnbeleefe, that tho we ſee a glorious heauen aboue vs, yet wee are vnwilling to goe to it: we ſee a weariſome world about vs, and yet are loth to thinke of leauing it: This gracious maſter of ours, whoſe diſſolution is ours, while he was here amongſt vs, his princely crowne could not keepe his head from paine, his golden rod could not driue away his feuers; now is he freed from all his aches, agues, ſtitches, conuulſions, cold ſweats: now he triumphs in glory, amongſt the Angels and Saints; now he walkes in white robes, and attends on the glorious bridegroome of the Church; and doe we thinke he would be content now, for all the Kingdomes of the world, to be as he was? We that profeſſe it was our ioy and honour to follow him, whitherſoeuer hee had gone; In his diſports, in his warres, in his trauels; why are we not now ambitious of following him to his better crowne; yea of reigning together with him, (for heauen admits of this equality) in that glory, wherein he reignes with his Sauiour & ours? Why doe we not now heartily, with him that was rauiſhed into the third heauen, ſay, Cupio diſſolui & eſſe cum Chriſto, not barely to bee diſſolued; a malecontent may doe ſo; but therefore to be diſſolued, that we may be with Chriſt, poſſeſſed of his euerlaſting glory, where we ſhall not onely not weepe, but reioyce and ſing Halleluiahs for euer; not onely not die, but enioy a bleſſed and heauenly life. Euen ſo Lord Ieſus come quickly. Now if any man ſhall aske the Diſciples queſtion: Maſter, when ſhall theſe things be; the celeſtiall voice tells him, it muſt bee vpon a change; For the firſt things are paſſed; It ſhall be in part, ſo ſoone as euer our firſt things, our life, the condition of our mortalitie are paſſed ouer; It ſhall be fully, when the firſt things of the world are paſſed; Paſſed not by abolition, but by immutation, as that Father ſaid well; Not the frame of the world, but the corruption of that frame muſt paſſe. The Spirit of God is not curious, he calls thoſe things firſt which were onely former; not in reſpect of the ſtate which is, but that which ſhall be; For thoſe things which were firſt of all, were like their Maker; good, not capable of deſtruction: Our ſinnes tainted the whole creation, and brought ſhame vpon all the frame of heauen, and earth: That which we did, ſhall be diſanulled, that which God did, ſhall ſtand for euer; and this diſſolution ſhall be our glory: other diſſolutions ſtrike teares into our eyes; as this day is witneſſe: it is our ſorrow that the firſt things are paſſed, our offices, our penſions, our hopes, our fauours, and (which we eſteemed moſt) our ſeruices are gone: Let this laſt diſſolution comfort vs againſt the preſent. Who can grieue to ſee a Familie diſſolued, that conſiders the world muſt bee diſſolued? This little world of ours, firſt, whereof this day giues vs an image: for as our ſeruice, ſo our life muſt away; and then that great one, whoſe diſſolution is repreſented in theſe. The difference is, that whereas this diſſolution brings teares to ſome eies, that wipes them away from all: For all our teares, and ſorrow, and toile, and crying, and death, are for our ſinnes; take away corruption, and miſery goes away with it, and till then, it will neuer be remoued: No man puts new wine into old veſſels; much leſſe will God put the new wine of glory, into the old veſſels of corruption: They are our ſinnes, which as in particular they haue rob'd vs of our Prince, changed our ſeaſons, ſwept away thouſands with varieties of deaths, ſo in generall, they haue deformed the face of heauen and earth, and made all the Creation ſigh and groane, and ſtill make vs incapable of the perfection of our bleſſedneſſe; for while the firſt things continue, there muſt needs be teares, and ſorrow, and death. Let vs therefore looke vpon heauen and earth as goodly creatures; but, as blemiſhed, as tranſitory, as thoſe which we ſhall once ſee more glorious. Let vs looke vpon our ſelues with indignation, which haue thus diſtained them; and as thoſe which after ſome terme of their cottage expired, are aſſured they ſhall haue a marble palace built for them, doe long after the time prefixed them, and thinke the dayes and moneths pace ſlowly away, till then; ſo let vs earneſtly deſire the day of the diſſolution of this great houſe of the world, that wee may haue our conſummation in the new heauen. For ſo ſoone as euer the old is paſt, Behold (ſaith God) I will make all things new. Yea, the paſſage of the one, is the renewing of the other: As the Snake is renewed, not by putting on any new coat, but by leauing his ſlough behind him: the gold is purified, by leauing his droſſe in the fire; Therefore hee addes, not, I will, but, I doe make all new; and becauſe this is a great worke, behold a great Agent; He that ſate vpon the Throne ſaid, Behold I make all new.

A Throne ſignifies Maieſtie, and ſitting permanence or perpetuity: God ſayes, Heauen is my throne, in the Pſalme: but as Salomons throne of iuory and gold, was the beſt peece of his houſe; So Gods throne is the moſt glorious heauen, the heauen of heauens; for you ſee that tho heauen and earth paſſe away, yet Gods throne remain'd ſtill, and hee ſitting on it; neither ſinne nor diſſolution, may reach to the Empyreall heauen, the ſeat of God.

Here is a ſtate worthy of the King of Kings; All the thrones of earthly Monarchs, are but peeces of his foot-ſtoole. And as his throne is maieſticall and permanent, ſo is his reſidence in it; Hee ſate in the throne. S. Stephen ſaw him ſtanding, as it were ready for his defence and protection: S. Iohn ſees him ſitting (as our Creed alſo runnes) in regard of his inalterable glory. How brittle the thrones of earthly Princes are, and how they doe rather ſtand than ſit in them, and how ſlippery they ſtand too, wee feele this day, and lament. O Lord, eſtabliſh the throne of thy ſeruant our King, and let his ſeed endure for euer. Let his throne be as the Sunne before thee for euermore; and as the Moone a faithfull witneſſe in heauen. But howſoeuer it be with our earthly Gods, of his kingdome there is no end. Here is a maſter for Kings, whoſe glory it is, to riſe vp from their thrones, and throw downe their Crownes at his feet, and to worſhip before his foot-ſtoole.

Be wiſe therefore, O ye Kings; be learned ye Rulers of the earth: ſerue this Lord in feare, and reioyce in him with trembling.

Yea behold here (ſince wee haue the honour to ſerue him, whom Kings ſerue) a royall Maſter for vs; It was one of our ſinnes I feare, that we made our Maſter, our God; I meane, that we made fleſh our arme; and placed that confidence in him, for our earthly ſtay, which wee ſhould haue fixed in heauen: Our too much hope hath left vs comfortleſſe: Oh that we could now make God our Maſter, and truſt him ſo much the more, as we haue leſſe in earth to truſt to. There is no ſeruice to the King of heauen; for both his throne is euerlaſting and vnchangeable, and his promotions certaine and honourable: He that ſits on the throne hath ſayd it; To him that ouercomes will I giue to ſit with mee in my throne; euen as I ouercame and ſit with my Father in his throne. Behold, yee

yee ambitious ſpirits, how yee may truly riſe to more than euer the ſonnes of Zebedee deſired to aſpire to : ſeruing is the way to raigning ; ſerue him that ſits vpon the Throne, and ye ſhall ſit your ſelues vpon the Throne with him.

This is the Agent ; the act is fit for him, I make all things new. Euen the very Turks in their Alcoran, can ſubſcribe to that of Tertullian, Qui potuit facere, poteſt & reficere : I feare to wrong the holy Maieſty with my rude compariſon ; It is not ſo much to God, to make a world, as for vs, to ſpeake : He ſpake the word and it was done : There is no change which is not from him : He makes new Princes, new yeeres, new gouernments, and will make new heauens, new earth, new inhabitants;how eaſie then is it for him, to make new prouiſions for vs ? If wee bee left deſtitute, yet where is our faith ? Shall God make vs new bodies, when they are gone to duſt ? ſhall he make new heauens, and new earth, and ſhall not he (whoſe the earth is, and the fulneſſe thereof) prouide ſome new meanes, and courſes of life for vs, while we are vpon earth ? Is the maintenance of one poore worme more than the renewing of heauen and earth ? Shall he be able to raiſe vs when we are not, and ſhall he not ſuſtaine vs while we are ?

Away with theſe weake diffidences ; and if wee bee Chriſtians, truſt God with his Pſal. 37.34. owne : Wait thou on the Lord, and keepe his wayes, and he ſhall exalt thee. He will make all things new : And ſhall all things be made new, and our hearts bee old ? Shall nothing but our ſoules be out of the faſhion ? Surely beloued, none but new hearts are for the new heauens : Except we be borne anew, we enter not into life. All other things ſhall in the very inſtant receiue their renouation ; onely our hearts muſt bee made new before hand, or elſe they ſhall neuer be renewed to their glory. S. Peter, when he had told vs of 2 Pet. 3.14. looking for new heauens, and new earth ; infers this vſe vpon it ; Wherefore (beloued) ſeeing yee looke for ſuch things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without ſpot, and blameleſſe. Behold, the new heauens require pure and ſpotleſſe inhabitants. As euer therefore we looke to haue our part in this bleſſed renouation, let vs caſt off all our euill and corrupt affections, put off the old man with his works, and now with the new yeere, put on the new : labour for a new heart, begin a new life. That which S. Iohn ſaies here, that God will ſay and doe in our entrance to glorification ; Behold, I make all things 2 Cor. 5.17. out of Eſa. 43. new. Saint Paul ſaith he hath done it already, in our regeneration ; Old things are paſſed away, all things are become new. What meanes this, but that our regeneration muſt make way for our glorification, and that our glory muſt but perfect our regeneration ? and God ſuppoſes this is done, when there are meanes to doe it. Why doe we then ſtill (in ſpight of the Goſpell) retaine our old corruptions, and thinke to goe to the wedding feaſt in our old clothes ? if ſome of vs do not rather (as the vulgar reads that, Iudg. 10.6.) Addere noua veteribus, adde new ſinnes to our old ; new oathes, new faſhions of pride, new complements of drunkenneſſe, new deuices of filthineſſe, new tricks of Machiaueliſme : theſe are our nouelties which fetch downe from God new iudgements vpon vs, to the tingling of the eares of all hearers, and for which Topheth was prepared of old. If God haue no bettter newes for vs, we ſhall neuer enioy the new heauen with him. For Gods ſake therefore, and for our ſoules ſake, let vs be wiſer, and renew our couenant with God ; and ſeeing this is a day of gifts, let my New-yeeres-gift to you be this holy aduice from God, which may make you happy for euer : Let your New-yeeres-gift to God be your hearts, the beſt part of your ſelues, the center of your ſelues, to which all our actions are circumferences : and if they bee ſuch a preſent, as we haue reaſon to feare God will not accept, becauſe they are ſinfull ; yet if they be humbled, if penitent, Pſal. 51. we know he will receiue them : A contrite and a broken heart, O God, thou wilt not deſpiſe. And if we cannot giue him our hearts, yet giue him our deſires, and he will take our vn- Ezec. 11.14. worthy hearts from vs ; I will take the ſtony hearts out of their bodies, Ezec. 11. 19. and he will graciouſly returne an happy New-yeeres-gift to vs, I will put a new ſpirit within their bowels, and will giue them an heart of fleſh : He will create a cleane heart, and renew a right ſpirit within vs ; ſo, as he will make a new heauen for vs, he will make vs new for this heauen ; hee will make his Tabernacle in vs, that hee may make ours with him. Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men &c.

The ſuperſtitious Liſtrians cryed out amazed, that Gods were come downe to them in the likeneſſe of men: but we Chriſtians know, that it is no rare thing for God to come and dwell with men; Yee are the Temples of the liuing God, and I will dwell among them and walke there. The faithfull heart of man is the Tabernacle of God. But becauſe though God bee euer with vs, wee are not alwaies ſo with him, yea whiles wee are at home in the bodie, we are abſent from the Lord, as S. Paul complaines, therefore will God vouchſafe vs a neerer cohabitation that ſhall not be capable of any interpoſition, of any abſence. Behold, the Tabernacle of God is with men. But beſides this Tabernacle of fleſh, time was when God dwelt in a materiall viſible houſe with men: Hee had his Tabernacle firſt, which was a mouing Temple; and then his Temple, which was a fixed Tabernacle: both of them had one meaſure, both one name. But, as one ſaid vpon that, Eze. 42. Menſus eſt ſimilitudinem domus; that both the Tabernacle and Temple were ſimilitudes of Gods houſe, rather than the houſe it ſelfe: ſo ſay I, that they were intended for notable reſemblances both of the holy Church of God vpon earth, and of the glorious Sanctuarie of heauen. This is the true היכל of God, which word ſignifieth both a Temple, Ezra 4.1. and a Palace, Dan. 1.4. becauſe he dwels where he is worſhipped, and he is magnificent in both: It is the materiall Tabernacle which is alluded to, the immateriall which is promiſed; A Tabernacle that goes a thouſaud times more beyond the glittering Temple of Salomon, than Salomons Temple went beyond the Tabernacle of Moſes: Neither let it trouble any man, that the name of a Tabernacle implies flitting and vncertaintie. For as the Temple, howſoeuer it were called (בת עלם) a houſe of Ages; yet laſted not (either the firſt, I meane, or ſecond) vnto 500. yeeres: ſo this houſe, though God call it a Tabernacle, yet he makes it an euerlaſting habitation; for he tels vs, that both age and death are gone before it come downe to men. But why rather doth the Tabernacle of God deſcend to men, than men aſcend to it? Whether this be in reſpect of Iohns viſion, to whom the new Ieruſalem ſeemed to deſcend from heauen; deſcendit (as one ſaith) innoteſcendo, and therefore it is reſembled by all the riches of this inferiour world, gold, precious ſtones, pearle; or whether heauen is therefore ſaid to deſcend to vs, becauſe it meets vs in the aire, when Chriſt Ieſus attended with innumerable Angels ſhall deſcend to fetch his elect; or whether this phraſe be vſed for a greater expreſſion of loue, and mercy, ſince it is more for a Prince to come to vs, than for vs to goe to his Court. Certainly, God meanes only in this to ſet forth that perpetuall and reciprocall conuerſation, which hee will haue with men: They ſhall dwell with God, God ſhall dwell with them. Our glory begins euer in grace: God doth dwell with all thoſe in grace, with whom hee will dwell in glory: Euery Chriſtian carries in his boſome a ſhrine of God; Know yee not that Chriſt Ieſus is in you, ſaith S. Paul. Whereſoeuer God dwels, there is his Temple: Wilt thou pray in the Temple, pray in thy ſelfe, ſaith Auſten.

Here is the Altar of a cleane heart, from which the ſweet incenſe of our praiers, as a pleaſant perfume, is ſent vp into the noſtrils of God: Here are the pure candles of our faith euer burning before God, night and day; neuer to be extinguiſhed: Here is the ſpirituall Shew-bread, the bread of life ſtanding euer ready vpon the Table of the ſoule: Here doth the Arke of the heart, in the inwardeſt of the breaſt, keepe the law of God, and that Manna that came downe from heauen: Here God dwels, and here he is worſhipped. Behold, what need wee care whither we goe, while we carry the God of heauen with vs? He is with vs, as our companion, as our guide, as our gueſt: No impotency of perſon, no croſſe of eſtate, no diſtance of place, no oppoſition of men, no gates of hell can ſeparate him from vs: Hee hath ſaid it, I will not leaue, nor forſake thee: We are all now parting one from another: and now is looſing a knot of the moſt louing, and entire fellowſhip, that euer met in the Court of any Prince: our ſweet Maſter (that was compounded of all louelineſſe) infuſed this gracious harmony into our hearts; now we are ſaluting our laſt, and euery one is with ſorrow enough, taking his owne way: how ſafe, how happy ſhall we be, if each of vs ſhall haue God to go with him! Certainly (my deare fellowes) we ſhall neuer complaine of the want of Maſters, of friends, while we finde our ſelues ſure of him ; nothing can make vs miſerable while we are furniſhed with him. Shall wee thinke hee cannot fare ill that hath money in his purſe ; and ſhall we thinke he can miſcarry that hath God in his heart ? How ſhall not all comfort, all happineſſe accompany that God, whoſe preſence is the cauſe of all bleſſedneſſe ? He ſhall counſell vs in our doubts, direct vs in our reſolutions, diſpoſe of vs in our eſtates, cheere vs in our diſtreſſes, proſper vs in our liues, and in our deaths crowne vs. And if ſuch felicitie follow vpon Gods dwelling with vs in theſe ſmokie cottages of our mortality, where we (through our vnquiet corruptions) will not ſuffer our ſelues to haue a full fruition of God ; what happineſſe ſhall there be in our dwelling with God, in thoſe eternall Tabernacles of reſt and glory ? Beloued, there is no loſſe, no miſerie, which the meditation of heauen cannot digeſt : we haue liued in the eye of a Prince, whoſe countenance was able to put life into any beholder : How oft hath that face ſhined vpon vs, and we haue found our heart warme with thoſe comfortable beames ? Behold, we ſhall liue with that God, in whoſe preſence is the fulneſſe of ioy : we haue liued in the ſociety of worthy men ; yet, but men; ſubiect to all paſſions, infirmities, ſelf-reſpects: which of vs all can haue eſcaped without ſome vnkindneſſes, detractions, emulations ? Earthly Courts can be no more without theſe, than theſe can be without corruption: there, we ſhall liue in the company of innumerable Angels, and the ſpirits of iuſt and perfect men ; neither can there be any iar in theſe Halleluiahs; which we ſhall all ſing to God. We haue liued to ſee the magnificence of earthly Princes, and to partake of it; in their buildings, furnitures, feaſts, triumphs ; in their wealth, pompe, pleaſures: But open your eyes and ſee the new Ieruſalem, the Citie of the great King of Saints, and all theſe ſublunary vanities ſhall be contemned. Here you ſhall ſee a foure ſquare Citie; the wals of Iaſper, the foundations garniſhed with all precious ſtones, Twelue gates of twelue pearles, The houſes and ſtreets of pure gold, like ſhining glaſſe : A Cryſtall riuer runs in the midſt of it ; and on the banks of it growes the tree of life; euer greene, euer fruitfull ; this is for the eye. The eare ſhall be filled with the melody of Angels, euer ſinging Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty. The taſte ſhall be ſatisfied with Manna, the food of Angels, with the fruit of the tree of life, with that new wine which our Sauiour hath promiſed to drinke with vs in his Kingdome ; Theſe are the dimme ſhadowes of our future bleſſedneſſe. At thy right hand ô God are pleaſures for euermore; and ſuch pleaſures, as if they could be expreſſed or conceiued, were not worthy of our longings, nor able to ſatisfie vs : Oh that we could ſo much the more long to enioy them, by how much leſſe we are able to comprehend them ! When S. Paul made his Farewell-Sermon to the Epheſians, he fetcht teares from the eyes of his auditors (ſo full of holy paſſion was his ſpeech) eſpecially with that one clauſe, And now behold I know, that henceforth you all, through whom I haue gone preaching the kingdome of God, ſhall ſee my face no more : A ſad clauſe indeed, You ſhall ſee my face no more. The minde of man cannot endure to take a finall leaue of any thing that offends it not ; but the face of a friend, of a companion, hath ſo much pleaſure in it, that we cannot without much ſorrow thinke of ſeeing it our laſt : But what if we ſhall meet here no more? what if we ſhall no more ſee one anothers face ? Brethren, we ſhall once meet together aboue; we ſhall once ſee the glorious face of God, and neuer looke off againe.

Act. 20. 25.

Let it not ouer-grieue vs to leaue theſe Tabernacles of ſtone, ſince we muſt ſhortly lay downe theſe tabernacles of clay, and enter into tabernacles not made with hands; eternall in the heauens. Till then, farewell my deare brethren, farewell in the Lord: Goe in peace, and liue as thoſe that haue loſt ſuch a maſter, and as thoſe that ſerue a Maſter, whom they cannot loſe : And the God of peace goe with you, and proſper you in all your wayes; and ſo fix this Tabernacle in you vpon earth, that you may be recei-ued into thoſe Tabernacles of the new Ieruſalem, and dwell with him for euer, in that glory which he hath prouided for all that loue him.

D

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, SIR IOHN SWINERTON Knight, Lord Maior of the Citie of LONDON,

All Grace and Happineſſe.

Right Honourable:

MY owne forwardneſſe (whereof it repenteth me not) hath ſent forth other of my labours vnbidden, but this your effectuall importunitie hath drawne forth into the common light. It is an holy deſire that the eye may ſecond the eare in any thing that may helpe the ſoule: and we, that are fiſhers of men, ſhould be wanting to our ſelues, if we had not baits for both thoſe ſenſes. I plead not the diſaduantage of a dead letter, in reſpect of that life which elocution puts into any diſcourſe. Such as it is, I make it both publike and yours. I haue cauſed my thoughts, ſo neere as I could, to goe backe to the very tearmes wherein I expreſſed them, as thinking it better to fetch thoſe words I haue let fall, than to follow thoſe I muſt take vp. That therefore which it pleaſed your Lo. to heare with ſuch patient attention, and with ſo good affection to deſire, I not vnwillingly ſuffer abroad, that theſe papers may ſpeake that permanently to the eyes of all our Countrymen, which in the paſſage found ſuch fauour in the eares of your Citizens, and ſuch roome in ſo many hearts. Beſides your firſt and vehement motion for the Preſſe, your knowne loue to learning deſerues a better acknowledgement, and no doubt findes it from more worthy hands. And if my gratulation would adde any thing, thoſe ſhould enuie you which will not imitate you. For the reſt, God giue your Lo. a wiſe, vnderſtanding, and couragious heart, that you may prudently and ſtrongly menage theſe wilde times, vpon which you are fallen: and by your holy example and powerfull endeuours, helpe to ſhorten theſe raines of licentiouſneſſe: That ſo this Citie, which is better taught than any vnder heauen, may teach all other places how to liue; and may honour that profeſsion which hath made it renowmed, and all Gods Church ioyfull: The welfare and happineſſe whereof, and your Lo. in it, is vnfainedly wiſhed,

Your Lordſhips humbly deuoted,

AN HOLY PANEGYRICKE.

1 SAM. 12. 24, 25.

Therefore feare you the Lord, and ſerue him in truth with all your hearts, and conſider how great things he hath done for you. But if you doe wickedly, yee ſhall periſh, both yee and your King.

I Hold it no ſmall fauour of God (Right Honourable and beloued) that hee hath called mee to the ſeruice of this day, both in the name of ſuch a people, to praiſe him for his Anointed, and in his name to praiſe his anointed to his people. The ſame hand that giues the opportunitie, vouchſafe to giue ſucceſſe to this buſineſſe. That which the Iewes ſinned in but deſiring, it is our happineſſe to enioy. I need not call any other witneſſe than this day, wherein we celebrate the bleſſing of a King, and (which is more) of a King higher than other Princes by the head and ſhoulders. And if other yeeres had forgotten this tribute of their loyalty and thankfulneſſe, yet the example of thoſe ancient Romane Chriſtians (as Euſebius and Sozomen report) would haue taught vs, that the tenth compleat yeere of our Conſtantine deſerues to be ſolemne and Iubilar. And if our ill nature could be content to ſmother this mercy in ſilence, the very Lepers of Samaria ſhould riſe vp againſt vs and ſay, We doe not well; this is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace. My diſcourſe yet ſhall not be altogether laudatorie; but as Samuels, led in with exhortation, and carried out with threatning. For this Text is a compoſition of duties, fauours, dangers: of duties which wee owe, of fauours receiued, of dangers threatned. The duties that God lookes for of vs, come before the mention of the fauours we haue receiued from him (though after their receit) to teach vs, that as his mercie, ſo our obedience ſhould be abſolute: and the danger followes both, to make vs more carefull to hold the fauours, and performe the duties. And mee thinkes there cannot be a more excellent mixture. If we ſhould heare only of the fauours of God, nothing of our duties, we ſhould fall into conceitedneſſe: if onely of our duties, without recognition of his fauours, we ſhould proue vncheerefull; and if both of theſe without mention of any danger, we ſhould preſume on our fauours, and be ſlacke in our duties. Prepare therefore your Chriſtian eares and hearts for this threefold cord of God, that (through his bleſſing) theſe duties may draw you to obedience, ence, the dangers to a greater awe, and the fauours to a further thankfulneſſe.

Iuxta Homer. εἱς κοίρανος &c.

The goodneſſe of theſe outward things is not ſuch as that it can priuilege euery deſire of them from ſinne. Monarchie is the beſt of gouernments, and likeſt to his rule that ſits in the aſſembly of Gods. One God, one King, was the acclamation of thoſe ancient Chriſtians ; and yet it was miſ-deſired of the Iſraelites : We may not euer deſire that which is better in it ſelfe, but that which is better for vs ; Neither muſt we follow our conceit in this iudgment, but the appointment of God; Now, though God had appointed in time, both a Scepter and a Law-giuer to IVDA, yet they ſinned in mending the paſe of God, and ſpurring on his decree. And if they had ſtaid his leaſure, ſo that they had deſired that which was beſt in it ſelfe, beſt for them, appointed by God, and now appointed ; yet the manner and ground offended: For out of an humour of innouation, out of diſcontent, out of diſtruſt, out of an itch of conformitie to other Nations, to aske a King, it was not onely a ſinne, as they confeſſe, *verſe.*29. but (ragnah rabbab) a great wickedneſſe, as Samuel tels them, *verſe.*17. and (as oftentimes we may read Gods diſpleaſure in the face of heauen) he ſhowes it in the weather. God thunders and raines in the middeſt of wheat-harueſt. The thunder was fearfull ; the raine in that hot climate and ſeaſon, ſtrangely vnſeaſonable : both to be in the inſtant of Samuels ſpeech, was iuſtly miraculous. The heathen Poets bring in their fained God thundring in applauſe ; I neuer finde the true God did ſo. This voice of God brake theſe Cedars of Lebanon, and made theſe Hindes to calue ; and now they cry Peccauimus, verſe. 19. If euer we will ſtoope, the iudgements of God will bring vs on our knees. Samuel takes vantage of their humiliation, and according to the golden ſentence of that Samian-wiſe-man, that bids vs lay weight vpon the loden, (how euer Hierom take it in another ſenſe) he lades them with theſe three duties ; Feare, ſeruice, conſideration.

*Ioſh.*24.14.
Eccl.vlt.

Feare and ſeruice goe ſtill together. Serue the Lord in feare, ſaith David. Feare the Lord and ſerue him, ſaith Ioſhua ; And, feare euer before ſeruice, for that vnleſſe our ſeruice proceed from feare, it is hollow and worthleſſe. One ſaies well, that theſe inward diſpoſitions are as the kernell ; outward acts are as the ſhell ; he is but a deafe nut therefore, that hath outward ſeruice, without inward feare; Feare God (ſaith Salomon) firſt, & then, keepe his commandements. Behold, the ſame tongue that bade them not feare, *verſ.*20. now bids them feare ; and the ſame ſpirit that tells vs they feared exceedingly *(ver.18.)* now inioynes them to feare more. What ſhall we make of this ? Their other feare was at the beſt Initiall ; for now they began to repent ; and as one ſaies of this kinde of feare, that it hath two eyes fixed on two diuers obiects, ſo had this of theirs : One eye looked vpon the raine and thunder ; the other looked vp to the God that ſent it. The one of theſe it borrowed of the ſlauiſh or hoſtile feare (as Baſil calls it,) the other of the filiall ; for the ſlauiſh feare caſts both eyes vpon the puniſhment ; the filiall lookes with both eyes on the partie offended. Now then Samuel would rectifie and perfect this affection, and would bring them from the feare of ſlaues through the feare of penitents, to the feare of ſonnes : and indeed one of theſe make way for another. It is true that perfect loue thruſts out feare : but it is as true, that feare brings in that perfect loue, which is ioyned with the reuerence of ſonnes. Like as the needle or briſtle (ſo one compares it) drawes in the thred after it, or as the potion brings health. The compunction of feare (ſaith Gregorie) fits the minde for the compunction of loue. We ſhall neuer reioyce truly in God, except it be with trembling : Except we haue quaked at his thunder, we ſhall neuer ioy in his ſunne-ſhine. How ſeaſonably therefore doth Samuel, when he ſaw them ſmitten with that guilty and ſeruile feare, call them to the reuerentiall feare of God ; Therefore feare yee the Lord? It is good ſtriking, when God hath ſtriken ; there is no fiſhing ſo good as in troubled waters. The conſcience of man is a nice and ſullen thing : and if it be not taken at fit times, there is no medling with it. Tell one of our gallants, in the midſt of all his iollitie and reuels, of deuotion, of pietie, of iudgements ; he hath the Athenian queſtion ready, What will this babler ſay? Let that man alone till God haue toucht his ſoule with ſome terror, till he haue caſt his body on the bed of ſickneſſe, when his feather is turned to a kerchiefe, when his face is pale, his eyes ſunke, his hand ſhaking, his breath ſhort, his fleſh conſumed, now he may be talkt with, now he hath learned of Eli to ſay, Speake Lord, for thy ſeruant heareth. The conuex or out bowed ſide of a veſſell will hold nothing; it muſt be the hollow and depreſſed part that is capable of any liquor. Oh if we were ſo humbled with the varieties of Gods iudgements as we might, how ſauory ſhould his counſels be, how precious and welcome would his feare be to our trembling hearts? whereas now our ſtubborne ſenſeleſneſſe fruſtrates (in reſpect of our ſucceſſe, though not of his decree) all the threatnings and executions of God.

There are two maine affections, Loue and Feare; which as they take vp the ſoule where they are, and as they neuer goe aſunder, (for euery loue hath in it a feare of offending and forgoing; and euery feare implies a loue of that, which we ſuſpect may miſcarry) ſo each of them fulfills the whole Law of God. That loue is the abridgement of the Decalogue, both our Sauiour and his bleſſed Apoſtle haue taught vs: It is as plaine of Feare. The title of Iob is, A iuſt man, and one that feared God; iuſtice is expreſſed by Feare. For what is iuſtice, but freedome from ſin? And the feare of the Lord hates euill, ſaith Salomon. Hence Moſes his תירא Thou ſhalt feare, is turned by our Sauiour (προσκυνήσεις) Thou ſhalt worſhip, or adore. And that which Eſay ſaith, In vaine they feare mee, our Sauiour renders, In vaine they worſhip me; as if all worſhip conſiſted in Feare. Hence it is probable that God hath his name in two languages from (Θεὸς) Feare, and the ſame word in the Greeke ſignifies both Feare and Religion. And Salomon when he ſaies, The feare of the Lord is ראשית the beginning (as we turne it) of wiſdome, ſaies more then we are aware of; for the word ſignifies as well Caput or Principatum, the head or top of wiſdome; yea (ſaith Siracides) it is the crowne vpon the head; it is the root of the ſame wiſdome, whereof it is the top-branch, ſaith the ſame Author. And ſurely this is the moſt proper diſpoſition of men towards God; for though God ſtoope downe ſo low as to vouchſafe to be loued of men, yet that infinite inequalitie, which there is between him and vs, may ſeem not to allow ſo perfect a fitneſſe of that affection, as of this other; which ſuits ſo well betwixt our vileneſſe, and his glory, that the more diſproportion there is betwixt vs, the more due and proper is our feare. Neither is it leſſe neceſſary than proper, for we can be no Chriſtians without it; whether it be (as Hemingius diſtinguiſhes it well) timor cultus, or culpa, either our feare in worſhiping, or our feare of offending; the one is a deuout feare, the other a carefull feare. The latter was the Corinthians feare, whoſe godly ſorrow when the Apoſtle had mentioned, he addes, Yea what indignation, yea what feare, yea what deſire? The former is that of the Angels, who hide their faces with their wings; yea of the Son of God, as man, who fell on his face to his Father. And this is due to God, as a Father, as a maſter, as a benefactor, as a God infinite in all that he is. Let me be bold to ſpeake to you, with the Pſalmiſt, Come yee children, harken to mee, and I will teach you the feare of the Lord. What is it therefore to feare God; but to acknowledge the glorious (tho inuiſible) preſence of God in all our wayes, with Moſes his eyes ὁρῶν ἀόρατον: to be awfully affected at his preſence with Iacob (quàm tremendus?) to make an humble reſignation of our ſelues to the holy will of God with Eli, It is the Lord; and to attend reuerently vpon his diſpoſing with DAVID, Heere I am, let him doe to me as ſeemeth good in his eyes. This is the feare of the Lord. There is nothing more talkt of, nothing leſſe felt. I appeale from the tongues of men to their hands; the wiſe Heathen taught mee to doe ſo, Verba rebus proba. The voice of wickedneſſe is actuall, ſaith the Pſalmiſt, wickedneſſe ſaith there is no feare of God before his eyes. Behold whereſoeuer is wickedneſſe, there can be no feare of God; theſe two cannot lodge vnder one roofe, for the feare of God driues out euill (ſaith Eccleſiaſticus.) As therefore Abraham argues well from the cauſe to the effect; Becauſe the feare of God is not in this place, therefore they will kill me: So Dauid argues backe from the effect to the cauſe, They imagine wickedneſſe on their bed, &c. therefore the feare of God is not before them. I would to God his argument were not too demonſtratiue. Brethren, our liues ſhame vs. If we feared the Lord, durſt we dally with his name, durſt we teare it in peeces? Surely we contemn his perſon, whoſe name we contemn. The Iewes haue a conceit, that the the ſinne of that Iſraelite which was ſtoned for blaſphemy, was onely this, that hee named that ineffable name of foure letters Iehouah. Shall their feare keepe them from once mentioning the dreadfull name of God, and ſhall not our feare keepe vs from abuſing it? Durſt we ſo boldly ſinne God in the face, if we feared him? Durſt we mocke God with a formall flouriſh of that, which our heart tells vs we are not, if we feared him? Durſt we be Chriſtians at Church, Mammoniſts at home, if we feared him? Pardon me if in a day of gratulation, I hardly temper my tongue from reproofe: for as the Iewes had euer ſome malefactor brought forth to them in their great feaſt: ſo it ſhall be the happieſt peece of our triumph and ſolemnitie, if we can bring forth that wicked profaneneſſe, wherewith we haue diſhonoured God, and blemiſht his Goſpell, to be ſcourged, and diſmiſſed with all holy indignity. From this feare, let vs paſſe as briefly, through that which wee muſt dwell in all our liues; the ſeruice of God. This is the ſubiect of all Sermons, mine ſhall but touch at it. You ſhall ſee how I haſten to that diſcourſe which this day and your expectation calls me to.

Diuine Philoſophy teaches vs to referre, not onely our ſpeculations, but our affections to action. As therefore our ſeruice muſt be grounded vpon feare, ſo our feare muſt be reduced to ſeruice. What ſtrength can theſe maſculine diſpoſitions of the ſoule yeeld vs, if with the Iſraelites brood they be ſmothered in the birth? Indeed the worſt kinde of feare, is that we call ſeruile: but the beſt feare, is the feare of ſeruants: For there is no ſeruant of God, but feares filially. And againe, God hath no ſonne but hee ſerues. Euen the naturall ſonne of God, was ſo in the forme of a ſeruant, that he ſerued indeed; and ſo did he ſerue, that he endured all ſorrow, and fulfilled all righteouſneſſe. So euery Chriſtian is a ſon and heyre to the King of heauen, and his word muſt be, I ſerue. We all know what ſeruice meanes. For we all are, or were (I imagine) either ſeruants of maſters, or ſeruants of the publike, or maſters of ſeruants, or all theſe. We cannot therefore be ignorant eyther what we require of ours, or what our ſuperiours require of vs. If ſeruice conſiſted onely in wearing of liueries, in taking of wages, in making of curteſies, and kiſſing of hands, there were nothing more eaſie, or more common. All of vs weare the cognizance of our Chriſtianitie in our Baptiſme, all liue vpon Gods trencher in our maintenance, all giue him the complements of a faſhionable profeſſion. But, be not deceiued, the life of ſeruice is worke; the worke of a Chriſtian is obedience to the Law of God. The Centurion, when he would deſcribe his good ſeruant in the Goſpell, needed ſay no more but this; I bid him doe this, and he doth it. Seruice then briefly is nothing but a readineſſe to doe as we are bidden; and therefore both Salomon, and he that was greater than Salomon, deſcribes it by keeping the commandements: and the choſen

Rom.6.1. veſſell giues an euerlaſting rule: His ſeruants ye are to whom yee obey. Now I might diſtinguiſh this ſeruice into habituall and actuall. Habituall; for as the ſeruant, while he eats or ſleepes, is in ſeruice ſtill; ſo are we to God. Actuall, whether vniuerſall in the whole

Luke 1.75. carriage of our liues (which Zacharie tells vs is in holineſſe, and righteouſneſſe; holineſſe to God, righteouſneſſe to men) or particular, eyther in the duties which are proper to God, Inuocation and Attendance on his ordinance (which by an excellence is tearmed his ſeruice) or in thoſe which are proper to vs, as we are peeces of a Familie, Church, Common-wealth; the ſtations whereof God hath ſo diſpoſed, that we may ſerue him in ſeruing one another. And thus you ſee I might make way for an endleſſe diſcourſe; but it ſhall content me (paſſing ouer this world of matter) to glance onely at the generality of this infinite theme.

As euery obedience ſerues God, ſo euery ſinne makes God ſerue vs: One ſaid wittily, that the angry man made himſelfe the Iudge, and God the executioner. There is no ſinne that doth not the like. The glutton makes God his cator, and himſelfe the gueſt, and his belly his God, eſpecially in the new-found feaſts of this Age, wherein profuſeneſſe and profaneneſſe ſtriue for the tables end. The laſciuious man makes himhaſt made me to ſerue with thy ſins. There cannot be a greater honor for vs than to ſerue ſuch a maſter, as commands heauen, earth, and hell: whom it is both diſhonor and baſeneſſe not to ſerue. The higheſt ſtile that King Dauid could deuiſe to giue himſelfe (not in the phraſe of a friuolous French complement, but in the plaine ſpeech of a true Iſraelite) was, Behold I am thy ſeruant; and he that is Lord of many ſeruants of the Deuill, delights to call himſelfe the ſeruant of the ſeruants of God. The Angels of Heauen reioyce to be our fellowes in this ſeruice. But there cannot be a greater ſhame than to ſee ſeruants ride on horſebacke, and Princes walking as ſeruants on the ground; I meane, to ſee the God of heauen made a lacquey to our vile affections, and in the liues of men, to ſee God attend vpon the world. Brethren, there is ſeruice enough in the world, but it is to a wrong maſter. In mea patria Deus venter (as Hierome ſaid;) Euery worldling is a Papiſt in this, that hee giues δυλειαν, ſeruice, to the creature, which is the loweſt reſpect that can be: Yea ſo much more humble than (latria) as it is more abſolute, and without reſpect of recompence. Yea, I would it were vncharitable to ſay, that many beſides the ſauages of Calecut, place Satan in the throne, and God on the footſtoole. For as Witches and Sorcerers conuerſe with euill ſpirits in plauſible and familiar formes, which in vgly ſhapes they would abhorre: ſo many a man ſerues Satan vnder the formes of gold and ſiluer, vnder the images of Saints and lightſome Angels, vnder glittering coats, or glorious titles, or beauteous faces, whom they would defie as himſelfe. And as the free-borne Iſraelite might become a ſeruant, either by forfaiture vpon treſpaſſe, or by ſale, or by ſpoile in warre; ſo this accurſed ſeruitude is incurred the ſame waies, by them which ſhould be Chriſtians. By forfaiture: for though the debt and treſpaſſe be to God, yet (tradet lictori) he ſhall deliuer the debtor to the Iaylor. By ſale, as Ahab ſold himſelfe to worke wickedneſſe: ſold vnder ſinne, ſaith the Apoſtle. By ſpoyle: Beware leſt any man make a ſpoyle of you συλαγωγων ſaith Paul to his Coloſſians. Alas, what a miſerable change do theſe men make, to leaue the liuing God, which is ſo bountifull, that he rewards a cup of cold water with eternall glory, to ſerue him that hath nothing to giue but his bare wages; and what wages? The wages of ſinne is death; And what death? not the death of the body, in the ſeuering of the ſoule; but the death of the ſoule, in the ſeparation from God: there is not ſo much difference betwixt life and death, as there is betwixt the firſt death and the ſecond. Oh wofull wages of a deſperate worke! Well were theſe men, if they might goe vnpaid, and ſerue for nothing: but as the mercy of God will not let any of our poore ſeruices to him goe vnrewarded; ſo will not his iuſtice ſuffer the contrary ſeruice goe vnpaid; in flaming fire rendering vengeance to them that know not God, and thoſe that obey not the Goſpell of our Lord Ieſus. Beloued, as that worthy Biſhop ſaid on his death-bed, we are happy in this, that we ſerue a good Maſter: how happy ſhall it be for vs, if we ſhall do him good ſeruice, that in the day of our account we may heare, Euge ſerue bone, well done good ſeruant, enter into thy maſters ioy.

Now he that preſcribes the act (ſeruice,) muſt alſo preſcribe the manner (Truly, totally.) God cannot abide we ſhould ſerue him with a double heart (an heart & an heart) that is, hypocritically. Neither that wee ſhould ſerue him with a falſe heart, that is, niggardly and vnwillingly: but againſt doubling, he will be ſeru'd in truth; and againſt haluing, he will be ſerued with all the heart. To ſerue God and not in truth, is mockerie. To ſerue him truly, and not with the whole heart, is a baſe dodging with God. This ὀφθαλμοδυλεια eye-ſeruice is a fault with men: but let vs ſerue God, but while hee ſees vs, it is enough, Behold hee ſees vs euery where. If hee did not ſee our heart, it were enough to ſerue him in the face; and if the heart were not his, it were too much to giue him a part of it: but now that he made this whole heart of ours, it is reaſon hee ſhould be ſerued with it; and now that hee ſees the inſide of the heart, it is madneſſe not to ſerue him in truth. Thoſe ſerue God, not in truth, which as Seneca ſaies of ſome auditors, come to heare, not to learne: which bring their tablets to write words, not their hearts for the finger of God to write in. Whoſe eyes are are on their Bible, whiles their heart is on their Count-booke; which can play the Saints in the Church, Ruffians in the Tauerne, Tyrants in their houſes, Cheators in their ſhops; thoſe Dames which vnder a cloke of modeſtie and deuotion, hide nothing but pride and fiendiſhneſſe. Thoſe ſerue God, not with all their heart; whoſe boſome is like Rachels tent, that hath (Teraphim) Idols hid in the ſtraw; or rather like a Philiſtims Temple, that hath the Arke and Dagon vnder one roofe; That come in euer with Naamans exceptiues, Onely in this: Thoſe that haue let downe the world like the ſpies into the bottome of the well of their heart, and couer the mouth of it with wheat: I meane that hide great oppreſſions, with the ſhow of ſmall beneficences: Thoſe which like Salomons falſe Curtizan, cry (Diuidatur) and are willing to ſhare themſelues betwixt God and the world. And certainly, this is a noble policie of the Deuill, becauſe he knowes, he hath no right to the heart, he can be glad of any corner; but withall he knowes, that if he haue any, he hath all; for where he hath any part, God will haue none. This baſe-mindedneſſe is fit for that euill one. God will haue all, or nothing. It was an heroicall anſwer, that Theodoret reports of Valentinian, whom when the ſouldiers had choſen to be Emperor, they were conſulting to haue another ioyned with him. No (my ſouldiers) ſaid he, it was in your power to giue me the Empire, while I had it not: but now when I haue it, it is not in your power to giue me a partner. We our ſelues ſay, The bed and the throne can abide no riuals. May we not well ſay of the heart, as Lot of Zoar, Is it not a little one? Alas it is euen too little for God; what doe we thinke of taking an Inmate into this cottage? It is a fauour and happineſſe, that the God of glory will vouchſafe to dwell in it alone. Euen ſo (O God) take thou vp theſe roomes for thy ſelfe; and enlarge them for the entertainment of thy Spirit: Haue thou vs wholly, and let vs haue thee. Let the world ſerue it ſelfe. O let vs ſerue thee, with all our hearts.

God hath ſet the heart on worke to feare, the hands on worke to ſerue him: now (that nothing may be wanting) he ſets the head on worke to conſider; and that, not ſo much the iudgements of God, (yet thoſe are of ſingular vſe, and may not be forgotten) as his mercies, What great things he hath done for you, not againſt you. He that looked vpon his owne workes, and ſaw they were good, and delighted in them, delights that we ſhould looke vpon them too, and applaud his wiſdome, power, and mercy that ſhines in them. Euen the leaſt of Gods workes are worthy of the obſeruation of the greateſt Angell in heauen: but (the magnalia Dei) the great things he hath done are more worthy of our wonder, of our aſtoniſhment. Great things indeed that he did for Iſrael; he meant to make that Nation a precedent of mercy; that all the world might ſee what he could doe for a people. Heauen and earth conſpir'd to bleſſe them. What ſhould I ſpeake of the wonders of Ægypt? Surely I know not whether their preſeruation in it, or deliuerance out of it, were more miraculous. Did they want a guide? Himſelfe goes before them in fire. Did they want a ſhelter? His cloud is ſpred ouer them for a couering. Did they want way? The ſea it ſelfe ſhall make it; and be at once a ſtreet, and a wall to them. Did they want bread? Heauen it ſelfe ſhall powre downe food of Angels. Did they want meat to their bread? The wind ſhall bring them whole drifts of Quailes into their Tents. Doe they want drinke to both? The very Rocks ſhall yeeld it them. Doe they want ſuits of apparell? Their very clothes ſhall not wax old on their backs. Doe they want aduice? God himſelfe ſhall giue his vocall Oracle betweene the Cherubins. Doe they want a law? God ſhall come downe vpon Sinai, and deliuer it in fire, thundring, ſmoke, earth-quakes, and write it with his owne finger, in tables of ſtone. Doe they want habitations? God ſhall prouide them a land that flowes with milke and honie. Are they perſecuted? God ſtands in fire betweene them and their harmes. Are they ſtung to death? The brazen ſerpent ſhall cure them. Are they reſiſted? The walles of Iericho ſhall fall downe alone; haileſtones braine their enemies. The Sunne ſhall ſtand ſtill in heauen, to ſee Ioſhuahs reuenge and victorie. Oh great and mighty things that God did for Iſrael!

And if any Nation vnder heauen could either parallel or ſecond Iſrael in the fauours of God, this poore little Iland of ours is it. The cloud of his protection hath couered vs. The bloud-red ſea of perſecution hath giuen way to vs, and we are paſſed it dry-ſhod. The true Manna from heauen is rained downe abundantly about our tents. The water of life guſheth forth plenteouſly to vs: The better law of the Goſpell is giuen vs from heauen by the hands of his Sonne: the walls of the ſpirituall Iericho are fallen downe before vs, at the blaſt of the trumpets of God; and curſed be he that goes about to build them vp againe. Now therefore, that we may come more cloſe to the taske of this day; Let me ſay to you, as Samuel to his Iſraelites, Conſider with me what great things the Lord hath done for vs: and as one wiſht that the enuious had eyes in euery place; ſo could I ſeriouſly wiſh that all which haue ill will at our Sion had their eares with me but one houre, that if they belong not to God, they might burſt with Iudas, which repine with Iudas at this ſeaſonable coſt of the precious oyntment of our praiſes.

If I ſhould looke backe to the ancient mercies of God, and ſhew you that this Kingdome (though diuided from the world) was one of the firſt that receiued the Goſpell: That it yeelded the firſt Chriſtian Emperor that gaue peace and honour to the Church: The firſt and greateſt lights that ſhone forth in the darkeſt of Poperie, to all the world, and that it was the firſt kingdome that ſhooke Antichriſt fully out of the ſaddle; I might finde iuſt matter of praiſe and exulcation: but I will turne ouer no other Chronicles but your memorie. This day alone hath matter enough of an eternall gratulation. For this is the communis terminus, wherein Gods fauours meet vpon our heads; which therefore repreſents to vs, both what we had, and what we haue; The one to our ſenſe, the other to our remembrance. This day was both Queene Elizabeths Initium gloriæ, and King Iames his Initium regni. To her Natalitium ſalutis, as the paſſion dayes of the Martyrs were called of old; and Natalis Imperij to him. Theſe two names ſhew vs happineſſe enough to take vp our hearts for euer. And firſt, why ſhould it not be our perpetuall glory and reioycing, that we were her ſubiects? Oh bleſſed Queene, the mother of this Nation, the Nurſe of this Church, the glory of womanhood, the enuie and example of forraine Nations, the wonder of times, how ſweet and ſacred ſhall thy memorie be to all poſterities? How is thy name not Parables of the duſt, as the Iewes ſpeake; not written in the earth, as Ieremie ſpeakes, but in the liuing earth of all loyall hearts, neuer to be razed. And though the foule mouths of our Aduerſaries ſticke not to call her miſeram fœminam, as Pope Clement did; nor to ſay of her, as Euagrius ſayes vncharitably of Iuſtinian the great Law-giuer (ad ſupplicia iuſto Dei iudicio apud inferos luenda profecta eſt;) and thoſe that durſt bring her on the ſtage liuing, bring her now dead (as I haue heard by thoſe that haue ſeene it) into their proceſſions, like a tormented ghoſt attended with fiends and firebrands, to the terror of their ignorant beholders: Yet, as we ſaw ſhee neuer proſpered ſo well, as when ſhee was moſt curſed by their Pius 5; ſo now we hope ſhee is rather ſo much more glorious in heauen, by how much they are more malicious on earth. Theſe arrogant wretches, that can at their pleaſure fetch Salomon from heauen to hell, and Traian and Falconella from hell to heauen; Campian and Garnet from earth to heauen, Queene Elizabeth from earth to hell, ſhall finde one day that they haue miſtaken the keyes; and ſhall know what it is to iudge, by being iudged. In the meane time, in ſpight of the gates of Rome, Memoria iuſta in benedictionibus. To omit thoſe vertues which were proper to her ſex, by which ſhee deſerued to be the Queene of women, how excellent were her Maſculine graces of learning, valour, wiſdome, by which ſhee might iuſtly challenge to be the Queene of men! So learned was ſhee, that ſhee could giue preſent anſwers to Embaſſadors in their owne tongues: or if they liſted to borrow of their neighbours, ſhee paid them in that they borrowed. So valiant, that her name like Ziſcaes drum, made the proudeſt Romaniſts to quake. So wiſe, that whatſoeuer fell out happily againſt the common Aduerſarie in France, Netherlands, Ireland; it was by themſelues aſcribed to her policie. What ſhould I ſpeake of her long and ſucceſſefull gouernment, of her miraculous preſeruations, of her famous victories, wherein the waters, waters, windes, fire, and earth fought for vs, as if they had beene in pay vnder Her? of Her excellent lawes, of Her carefull executions? Many daughters haue done worthily, but thou ſurmounteſt them all. Such was the ſweetneſſe of her gouernment, and ſuch the feare of miſerie in her loſſe, that many worthy Chriſtians deſired their eyes might be cloſed before Hers; and how many thouſands therefore welcomed their owne death, becauſe it preuented Hers. Euery one pointed to her white haires, & ſaid with that peaceable Leontius, When this ſnow melts, there will be a floud. Neuer day, except alwayes the fift of Nouember, was like to be ſo bloudy as this; not for any doubt of Title (which neuer any loyall heart could queſtion, nor any diſloyall euer did; beſides Dolman) but for that our Eſauites comforted themſelues againſt vs, and ſaid, The day of mourning for our mother will come ſhortly, then will we ſlay our brethren. What ſhould I ſay more? Lots were caſt vpon our Land; and that honeſt Politician (which wanted nothing but a gibbet to haue made him a Saint) Father Parſons, tooke paines to ſet downe an order, how all Engliſh affaires ſhould be marſhalled when they ſhould come to be theirs. Conſider now the great things that the Lord hath done for vs. Behold this day, which ſhould haue beene moſt diſmall to the whole Chriſtian world, he turned to the moſt happy day, that euer ſhone forth to this ILAND. That now we may iuſtly inſult with thoſe Chriſtians of Antioch (ποῦ σοῦ τὰ μαντεῖα μάξιμε μωρέ) Where are your prophecies, O yee fond Papiſts? Our ſnow lyes here melted, where are thoſe floudes of bloud that you threatned? Yea, as that bleſſed ſoule of Hers gained by this change of an immortall crowne, for a corruptible; ſo (bleſſed be the name of our God) this Land of ours hath not loſt by that loſſe. Many thinke that this euening the world had his beginning. Surely a new and golden world began this day to vs, and (which it could not haue done by her loynes) promiſes continuance (if our ſinnes interrupt it not) to our poſterities. I would the flatterie of a Prince were treaſon; in effect it is ſo: (for the flatterer is (ἥμερος σφάκτης) a kind murtherer. I would it were ſo in puniſhment. If I were to ſpeake before my ſoueraigne King and Maſter, I would praiſe God for him, not praiſe him to himſelfe. A Preacher in CONSTANTINES time, ſaith Euſebius, (auſus eſt Imperatorem in os beatum dicere) preſumed to call CONSTANTINE an happy Emperor to his face; but he went away with a check; ſuch ſpeed may any Paraſite haue, which ſhall ſpeake, as if he would make Princes proud, and not thankfull. A ſmall praiſe to the face may be adulation, (though it be within bounds:) a great praiſe in abſence may be but iuſtice. If we ſee not the worth of our King, how ſhall we be thankfull to God that gaue him? Giue me leaue therefore freely to bring forth the Lords Anointed before you, and to ſay with SAMVEL, See you him whom the Lord hath choſen.

As it was a great preſage of happineſſe to Mauritius the Emperor, that an (ἔμπουσα) a familiar Deuill remouing him from place to place in his ſwathing bands, yet had no power to hurt him; So that thoſe early conſpiracies, wherwith Satan aſſaulted the very cradle of our deare Soueraigne, preuailed not, it was a iuſt bodement of his future greatneſſe and beneficiall vſe to the world. And hee that gaue him life and crowne together, and miraculouſly preſerued them both; gaue him graces fit for his Deputie on earth to weild that Crowne, and improue that life to the behoofe of Chriſtendome. Let me begin with that (which the Heathen man required to the happineſſe of any ſtate) his learning and knowledge: wherein I may ſafely ſay he exceedeth all his 105 predeceſſors. Our Conqueror King William (as our Chronicler reports) by a blunt prouerbe that he was wont to vſe againſt vnlearned Princes, made his ſonne Henry a Beauclearc to thoſe times. But a candle in the darke will make more ſhew, than a bonefire by day. In theſe dayes ſo lightſome for knowledge, to excell (euen for a profeſſed ſtudent) is hard, and rare. Neuer had England more learned Biſhops and Doctors; which of them euer returned from his Maieſties diſcourſe without admiration? What King chriſtened hath written ſo learned volumes? To omit the reſt, his laſt (of this kind) wherein he hath ſo held vp Cardinall Bellarmine and his Maſter Pope Paulus, is ſuch, that Pleſſis and Mouline (the two great lights of France)

France) profeſſe to receiue their light in this diſcourſe, from his beames; and the learned Ieſuite Salkeild, could not but be conuerted with the neceſſity of thoſe demonſtrations; and I may boldly ſay, Poperie (ſince it was) neuer receiued ſo deepe a wound from any worke, as from that of His. What King euer moderated the ſolemne acts of an Vniuerſitie in all profeſſions, and had ſo many hands clapt in the applauſe of his acute, and learned determinations? Briefly, ſuch is his intire acquaintance with all ſciences, and with the Queene of all, Diuinity, that he might well diſpute with the infallible Pope Paulus Quintus for his triple Crowne; and I would all Chriſtian quarrels lay vpon this duell. His iuſtice in gouerning matcheth his knowledge how to gouerne; for as one that knowes the Common-wealth cannot bee vnhappy, wherein (according to the wiſe Heathens rule) law is a Queene, and will a ſubiect, He hath euer endeuoured to frame the proceedings of his gouernment to the lawes, not the lawes to them. Witneſſe that memorable example, whereof your eyes were witneſſes; I meane the vnpartiall execution of one of the ancienteſt Barons of thoſe parts, for the murder of a meane ſubiect. Wherein not the fauour of the blocke might bee yeelded, that the diſhonour of the death might bee no leſſe than the paine of the death. Yet who will not grant his Mercy to bee eminent amongſt his vertues, when Parſons himſelfe yeelds it? And if a vertue ſo continuing, could bee capable of exceſſe, this might ſeeme ſo in him. For that which was ſaid of Anaſtaſius the Emperor, that hee would attempt no exploit (though neuer ſo famous) if it might coſt the price of Chriſtian bloud; and that which was ſaid of Mauritius, that by his good will hee would not haue ſo much as a traitor die; and that of Veſpaſian, that he wept euen for iuſt executions; and laſtly that of Theodoſius, that hee wiſht hee could recall thoſe to life againe that had wronged him; may in ſome ſenſe be iuſtly verified of our mercifull Soueraigne. I pray God the meaſure of this vertue may neuer hurt himſelfe; I am ſure the want of it ſhall neuer giue cauſe of complaint to his aduerſaries. But among all his Heroicall Graces, which commend him as a Man, as a Chriſtian, as a King; Pietie and firmneſſe in Religion calls mee to it, and will not ſuffer mee to deferre the mention of it any longer. A priuate man vnſetled in opinion, is like a looſe tooth in the head, troubleſome and vſe-leſſe: but a publike perſon vnſtayed, is dangerous. Reſolution for the truth is ſo much better than knowledge, by how much the poſſeſſing of a treaſure, is better than knowing where it is. With what zeale did his Maieſtie flie vpon the blaſphemous nouelties of Vorſtius? How many ſolicitations, threats, promiſes, profers hath he trampled vnder his feet in former times, for but a promiſe of an indifferent conniuence at the Romiſh religion? Was it not an anſwer worthy of a King, worthy of marble and braſſe, that hee made vnto their agent for this purpoſe, in the times of the greateſt perill of reſiſtance, That all the Crownes and Kingdomes in this world ſhould not induce him to change any iot of his profeſſion? Hath hee not ſo ingaged himſelfe in this holy quarrell, that the world confeſſes Rome had neuer ſuch an Aduerſarie? and all Chriſtian Princes reioyce to follow him as their worthy leader in all the battles of God; and all Chriſtian Churches in their Prayers and exclamations, ſtile him, in a double right, Defender of the faith, more by deſert, than inheritance.

But becauſe as the Sunne beames, ſo praiſes are more kindly, when they are caſt oblique vpon their obiects, than when they fall directly; let me ſhew you him rather in the bleſſings we receiue from him, than in the graces which are in him. And not to inſiſt vpon his extinguiſhing of thoſe helliſh feuds in Scotland, and the reducing of thoſe barbarous borderers to ciuilitie and order, (two acts worthy of eternitie, and which no hand but his could doe) Conſider how great things the Lord hath done for vs by him in our Peace, in our freedome of the Goſpell, in our Deliuerance.

Continuance detracts from the value of any fauour. Little doe we know the price of peace. If we had beene in the coat of our forefathers, or our neighbours, wee ſhould haue knowne how to eſteeme this deare bleſſing of God. Oh, my deare brethren, wee neuer knew what it was to heare the murdering peeces about our eares; to ſee our Churches and houſes flaming ouer our heads; to heare the fearefull cracks of their ſals mixed with the confuſed out-cries of men, killing, incouraging to kill, or reſiſt, dying, and the ſhriekings of women and children ; we neuer ſaw tender babes ſnatcht from the breſts of their mothers, now bleeding vpon the ſtones, or ſprawling vpon the pikes ; and the diſtracted mother rauiſhed, ere ſhee may haue leaue to die. Wee neuer ſaw men and horſes lie wallowing in their mingled bloud, aud the ghaſtly viſages of death deformed with wounds. The impotent wife hanging with teares on her armed husband, as deſirous to die with him, with whom ſhe may not liue. The amazed runnings to and fro of thoſe that would faine eſcape if they knew how, and the furious pace of a bloudy victor ; The rifling of houſes for ſpoile, and euery ſouldier running with his load, and ready to fight with other for our booty ; The miſerable captiue driuen manacled before the inſulting enemie. Neuer did wee know how cruell an Aduerſary is, and how burdenſome an helper is in warre. Looke round about you. All your neighbours haue ſeene and taſted theſe calamities. All the reſt of the world haue beene whirled about in theſe wofull tumults : onely this ISLAND hath like the center ſtood vnmoueable. Onely this ISLE hath beene like Nilus, which when all other waters ouer-flow, keeps within the banks. That we are free from theſe and a thouſand other miſeries of warre, Whither ſhould we aſcribe it, but next vnder God, to his Anointed, as a King, as a King of Peace ? For both Anarchie is the mother of diuiſion, as we ſee in the ſtate of ITALIE : wherein, when they wanted their King, all ranne into ciuill broiles ; The Venetians with them of Rauenna ; Verona and Vincentia, with the Paduans, and Taruiſians ; The Piſans and Florentines with them of Luca and Sienna. And beſides, euery King is not a Peace-maker ; Ours is made of Peace. There haue beene Princes, which as the Antiochians ſaid of IVLIAN (taking occaſion by the Bull which he ſtampt in his coyne) haue goared the world to death. The breaſts of ſome Princes haue beene like a Thunder-cloud, whoſe vapours would neuer leaue working till they haue vented themſelues with terror to the world : Ours, hath nothing in it, but a gracious raine to water the inheritance of God. Behold, Hee, euen He alone, like to NOAHS Doue, brought an Oliue of Peace to the toſſed Arke of Chriſtendome ; Hee like another AVGVSTVS, before the ſecond comming of CHRIST hath becalmed the world, and ſhut the iron gates of warre ; and is the bond of that peace hee hath made. And if the Peace-maker both doth bleſſe, and is bleſſed ; how ſhould we bleſſe him, and bleſſe God for him, and hold our ſelues bleſſed in him ?

Now what were peace without religion, but like a Nabals ſheep-ſhearing ; like the fatting of an Epicurean hogge ; the very feſtiuall reuels of the Deuill. But for vs ; wee haue Gloria in excelſis Deo, ſung before our Pax in terris ; in a word, we haue Peace with the Goſpell. Machiauel himſelfe could ſay in his diſcourſes, that two continued ſucceſſions of vertuous Princes (fanno grandi effetti) cannot but doe great matters. Wee proue it ſo this day ; wherein religion is not only warmed, but locked in her ſeat ſo faſt, that the gates of hell ſhall neuer preuaile againſt it. There haue beene Princes, and that in this land, which (as the heathen Politician compared his Tyrant) haue beene like to ill Phyſitians, that haue purged away the good humours and left the bad behinde them; with whom any thing hath been lawful, but to be religious. Some of your gray haires can be my witneſſes. Behold the euils we haue eſcaped, ſhew vs our bleſſings. Here hath been no dragging out of houſes, no hiding of Bibles, no creeping into woods, no Bonnering or Butchering of Gods Saints, no rotting in dungeons, no caſting of infants out of the mothers belly into the mothers flames ; nothing but Gods truth abundantly preached, cheerefully profeſſed, incouraged, rewarded. What nation vnder heauen yeelds ſo many learned Diuines? What times euer yeelded ſo many preaching Biſhops? When was this City (the City of our ioy) euer ſo happy this way, as in theſe late ſucceſſions ? Whither can we aſcribe this health of the Church, and life of the Goſpell, but, next to God, to His example, His countenance, His endeuours : Wherein I may not omit how right he hath trod in the ſteps of that bleſſed Conſtantine, in all his religious proceedings. Let vs in one word parallel them. Conſtantine cauſed fifty Volumes of the Scriptures to be be faire written out in parchment, for the vſe of the Church. King Iames hath cauſed the Bookes of Scriptures to be accurately tranſlated and publiſhed by thouſands. Conſtantine made a zealous edict againſt Nouatians, Valentinians, Marcionites. King Iames beſides his powerfull proclamations and ſoueraigne lawes hath effectually written againſt Popery, and Vorſtianiſme. Conſtantine tooke away the libertie of the meetings of Heretickes: King Iames hath by wholſome lawes inhibited the aſſemblies of Papiſts and ſchiſmatickes. Conſtantine ſate in the middeſt of Biſhops, as if he had beene one of them. King Iames beſides his ſolemne conferences, vouchſafes (not ſeldome) to ſpend his meales in diſcourſe with his Biſhops, and other worthy Diuines. Conſtantine charged his ſonnes (vt planè & ſine fuco Chriſtiani eſſent) that they ſhould be Chriſtians in earneſt. King Iames hath done the like in learned and diuine precepts, which ſhall liue till time be no more. Yea, in their very coynes is a reſemblance: Conſtantine had his picture ſtampt vpon his metals praying. King Iames hath his picture with prayer about it; O Lord, protect the kingdomes which thou haſt vnited. Laſtly, Conſtantine built Churches; one in Ieruſalem, another in Nicomedia. King Iames hath founded one Colledge, which ſhall helpe to build and confirme the whole Church of God vpon earth. Yee wealthy Citizens that loue Ieruſalem, caſt in your ſtore after this royall example, into the Sanctuary of God: and whiles you make the Church of God happy, make your ſelues ſo. Brethren, if wee haue any reliſh of Chriſt, any ſenſe of heauen, let vs bleſſe God for the life of our ſoule, the Goſpell; and for the ſpirit of this life, his Anointed.

But where had beene our peace, or this freedome of the Goſpell, without our deliuerance? and where had our deliuerance beene without him? As it was reported of the Oake of Mamre, that all religions rendred their yeerely worſhip there: The Iewes becauſe of Abraham their Patriarch; the Gentile becauſe of the Angels that appeared there to Abraham; The Chriſtians becauſe of Chriſt that was there ſeene of Abraham with the Angels: So was there to King Iames in his firſt beginnings, a confluence of all ſects, with papers in their hands, and (as it was beſt for them) with a Rogamus Domine, non pugnamus, like the ſubiects of Theodoſius. But our cozens of Samaria, when they ſaw that Salomons yoke would not be lightned, ſoone flew off in a rage, What portion haue we in Dauid? And now thoſe, which had ſo oft lookt vp to Heauen in vaine, reſolue to dig downe to Hell for aid. Satan himſelfe met them, and offered (for ſauing of their labour) to bring Hell vp to them. What a world of ſulphur had hee prouided againſt that day? What a brewing of death was tunned vp in thoſe veſſells? The murderous pioners laught at the cloſe felicitie of their proiect; and now before-hand ſeemed in conceit to haue heard the cracke of this helliſh thunder, and to ſee the mangled carkaſſes of the Hereticks flying vp ſo ſuddenly, that their ſoules muſt needs goe vpward towards their perdition; their ſtreets ſtrewed with legges and armes; and the ſtones braining as many in their fall, as they blew vp in their riſe. Remember the Children of Edom, O Lord, in the day of Ieruſalem, which ſaid, Downe with it, downe with it, euen to the ground. O daughter of Babel, worthy to be deſtroyed, bleſſed ſhall be he that ſerueth thee, as thou wouldeſt haue ſerued vs. But hee that ſits in Heauen laught as faſt at them; to ſee ther preſumption that would bee ſending vp bodies to heauen before the reſurrection, and preferring companions to Elias in a fierie Chariot; and ſaid (vt quid fremuerunt?) Conſider now how great things the Lord hath done for vs; The ſnare is broken, and we are deliuered. But how? As that learned Biſhop well applied Salomon to this purpoſe, Diuinatio in labijs Regis. If there had not beene a diuination in the lips of the King, wee had beene all in iawes of death. Vnder his ſhadow wee are preſerued aliue, as Ieremie ſpeaketh. It is true, God could haue done it by other meanes; but he would doe it by this, that wee might owe the being of our liues to him, of whom we held our well-being before. Oh praiſed be the God of heauen for our deliuerance! Praiſed bee God for his anointed, by whom wee are deliuered. Yea how ſhould wee call to our fellow creatures? the Angels, Saints, heauens, elements, meteors, mountaines, beaſts, trees, to helpe vs praiſe the Lord for this mercy. And (as the oath of the Romane ſouldiers ranne) how deare and precious ſhould the life of Cæſar bee to vs, aboue all earthly things? how ſhould wee hate the baſe vnthankfulneſſe of thoſe men, which can ſay of him, as one ſaid of his Saint Martin, Martinus bonus in auxilio, charus in negotio; who whiles they owe him all, grudge him any thing. Away with the mention of outward things: all the bloud in our bodies is due to him: all the prayers and well-wiſhes of our ſoules are due to him. How ſolemnly feſtiuall ſhould this day be to vs and to our poſterities for euer? How cheerefully for our peace, our religion, our deliuerance, ſhould wee take vp that acclamation with the people of Rome vſed in the Coronation of Charles the great, Carolo Iacobo à Deo coronato, magno & pacifico Britannorum Imperatori, vita & victoria. To Charles Iames crowned of God, the great and peaceable Emperor of Britaine, Life and victorie, and let God and his people ſay, Amen.

Theſe were great things indeed, that God did for Iſrael; great that he hath done for vs; great for the preſent, not certaine for the future. They had not, no more haue we, the bleſſings of God by entaile, or by leaſe. Only at the good will of the Lord; and that is, during our good behauiour. Sin is a forfeiture of all fauours. If you doe wickedly, you ſhall periſh. It was not for nothing, that the ſame word in the originall ſignifies both ſin and puniſhment. Theſe two are inſeparable. There is nothing but a little priority in time betweene them. The Angels did wickedly, they periſht by their fall from heauen. The old world did wickedly, they periſht by waters from heauen. The Sodomites did wickedly, they periſht by fire from heauen. Corah and his company did wickedly, they periſht by the earth. The Ægyptians did wickedly, they periſht by the Sea. The Canaanites did wickedly, they periſht by the ſword of Iſrael. The Iſraelites did wickedly, they periſht by peſtilence, ſerpents, Philiſtims. What, ſhould I run my ſelfe out of breath in this endleſſe courſe of examples? There was neuer ſin, but it had a puniſhment, either in the Actor, or in the Redeemer. There was neuer puniſhment, but was for ſinne. Heauen ſhould haue no quarell againſt vs, Hell could haue no power ouer vs, but for our ſinnes. Thoſe are they that haue plagued vs: Thoſe are they that threaten vs.

Otho 3. Friſ. 6. 26.

But what ſhall be the iudgment? Periſhing. To whom? To you and your King. He doth not ſay, If your King doe wickedly, you ſhall periſh, as ſometimes he hath done: nor, If your King doe wickedly, he ſhall periſh, although Kings are neither priuileged from ſinnes, nor from iudgments: nor if you doe wickedly, you only ſhall periſh; but, If ye doe wickedly, ye and your King ſhall periſh. So neere a relation is there betwixt the King and Subiect; the ſin of the one reacheth to the iudgment of the other; and the iudgment of the one is the ſmart of both. The King is the Head, the Commons the ſtomacke: if the head be ſicke, the ſtomacke is affected. Dauid ſins, the people die. If the ſtomacke be ſicke, the head complaines. For the tranſgreſſion of the people are many Princes. What could haue ſnatcht from our head that ſweet Prince, of freſh and bleeding memory, (that might iuſtly haue challenged Othoes name, Mirabilia mundi) now in the prime of all the worlds expectation, but our traiterous wickedneſſes? His Chriſtian modeſty vpon his death-bed could charge himſelfe, (no, no, I haue ſins enow of my own to doe this.) But this very accuſation did cleare him, & burden vs. O glorious Prince, they are our ſins that are guilty of thy death & our loſſe. We haue done wickedly, thou periſhedſt. A harſh word for thy glorified condition. But ſuch a periſhing as is incident to Saints; (for there is a Perire de medio, as well as a Perire à facie) a periſhing from the earth, as wel as a periſhing frō God. It was a ioyful periſhing to thee: our ſins haue aduantaged thy ſoule, which is partly therfore happy, becauſe we were vnworthy of thee; but they haue robbed vs of our happines in thee. Oh our treacherous ſins, that haue offered this violence to that ſweet hopefull ſacred perſon! And doe they not yet ſtill conſpire againſt him, that is yet dearer to vs, the root of theſe godly branches, the breath of our noſtrils, the anointed of God? Brethren let me ſpeake it cōfidently: As euery ſin is a traitor to a mans owne ſoule, ſo euery wicked man is a traitor to his King: yea, euery of his crying ſins is a falſe-hearted rebel, that hides powder & pocket dags for the precious life of his Soueraign. Any ſtates-man may learne this euen of Machiauel himſelfe: which I confeſſe when I read, I thought of the Deuill confeſſing Chriſt. That the giuing of God his due, is the cauſe of the greatneſſe of any State; and contrarily, the neglect of his ſeruice, the cauſe of ruine: and if any prophane Zoſimus ſhall doubt of this point, I would but turne him to Euagrius his diſcourſe to this purpoſe, where he ſhall finde inſtances of enow particulars. What-euer politicke Philoſophers haue diſtinguiſhed, betwixt bonus vir, and ciuis, I ſay, that as a good man cannot be an ill ſubiect, ſo a lewd man can no more be a good ſubiect, than euill can be good. Let him ſooth, and ſweare what he will, his ſinnes are ſo many treaſons againſt the Prince and State: for, Ruine is from iniquitie, ſaith Ezechiel. Alas, what ſafetie can we be in, when ſuch miſcreants lurke in our houſes, iet in our ſtreets; when the Country, City, Court, is ſo full of theſe ſpirituall conſpiracies? Ye that are Magiſtrates, not for Gods ſake only, but for your Kings ſake, whoſe Deputies ye are, as he is Gods; not for religion only, but for very policie, as you tender the deare life of our gracious Soueraigne; as you regard the ſweet peace of this State, and Kingdome; the welfare of this Church; yea, as you loue your owne life, peace, welfare; rouze vp your ſpirits, awaken your Chriſtian courage, and ſet your ſelues heartily againſt the traitorly ſinnes of theſe times, which threaten the bane of all theſe. Cleanſe ye theſe Augean ſtables of our drunken Tauernes, of our prophane Stages, and of thoſe blinde Vaults of profeſſed filthineſſe, Whoſe ſteps goe downe to the chambers of death, yea, to the deepe of hell. And ye, my holy brethren, the meſſengers of God, if there be any ſonnes of Thunder amongſt you, if euer you ratled from heauen the terrible iudgements of God againſt ſinners, now doe it; for (contrary to the naturall) the deepe winter of iniquitie is moſt ſeaſonable for this ſpirituall thunder. Be heard aboue, bee ſeene beneath. Out-face ſin, out-preach it, out-liue it. We are ſtarres in the right hand of God: let vs be like any ſtarres ſaue the Moone, that hath blots in her face; or the ſtarre worme-wood, whoſe fall made bitter waters; or Saint Iudes planets, that wander in irregularities. Let the light of our liues ſhine in the faces of the world, and dazle them whom it ſhall not guide. Then ſhall we with authoritie ſpeake what we doe, when we doe that which we ſpeake. We can neuer better teſtifie our thankfull and loyall reſpects to ſo good a King, in whoſe fauour is our life, and by whoſe grace we are vpheld againſt the vnworthy affronts of this ſacrilegious Age, than by crying downe, by liuing downe thoſe ſinnes which threaten our happineſſe in him. And ye, beloued Chriſtians, whoſe faces ſeeme worthily to congratulate the ioy of this day, if ye would approue your ſelues good ſubiects to our King, labour to be good ſubiects to His King, the King of Heauen. Away with thoſe rebellious wickedneſſes which may be preiudiciall to our peace. In vain ſhall we teſtifie our loyalty by theſe outward ceremonies of reioycing, if we be faulty in the ſubſtance. To what purpoſe ſhall we ring our bels, if in the meane time we hold faſt Salomons (funes peccatorum) cords of ſin; yea, the Prophets cart-ropes of iniquity; and thereby pull downe iudgement vpon our heads? To what purpoſe ſhall we kindle Bonefires in our ſtreets, if we kindle the flame of Gods diſpleaſure againſt vs by our ſinnes? To what purpoſe ſhall ye feaſt one another in your houſes, if you ſhall feaſt the fiends of hell with your wilfull ſinnes? Dæmonum cibus ebrietas; Hierome ſaith well, Drunkennes, luxurie, fornication, and euery ſinne is the very diet and dainties of the deuill. For Gods ſake therefore, for your Kings ſake, for your owne ſoules ſake, be good, that you may be loyall. Oh my brethren, let vs not with old Toby ſuffer our eyes to bee blinded with the ſwallowes dung of this world. Let vs not dare to make a willing ſhipwracke of conſcience, for the venture of a little ballaſt of gaine. Away with our pride, vſury, oppreſſion, falſe weights, falſe oathes, falſe faces; Doe no more wickedly, that we periſh not.

They are our ſins, which as they threaten to loſe vs our beſt friend aboue, (the God of our ſaluation) ſo they hearten our aduerſaries againſt vs on earth. Their hopes, their deſignes, their wickedneſſe to vs, hath beene profeſt to bee built vpon ours to God. If they did not ſee we did euill, they durſt not hope we could periſh. Authority hath wiſely and ſeaſonably taken order for diſarming of wilfull Recuſants. What ſhould weapons doe in the hand of diſloyalty? Oh that it could take order to ſtrip vs of our ſinnes, which will elſe arme God and his creatures againſt vs! The gates of Rome, the gates of hell, could not hurt vs, if wee did not hurt our ſelues. Oh that wee could ſo loue our ſelues, as to part with all our plauſible and gainfull euills; that we would this day renue our holy couenants with God, and keepe them for euer? How would he ſtill feed vs with the fineſt of the wheat? How would he, that (as this day) when we feared a tempeſt, gaue vs an happy calme, preuent a tempeſt in our calme when we feare not? How ſafely ſhould our children play, and we feaſt in our ſtreets? How memorable a patterne of mercy ſhould this Iland be to all poſterities? What famous Trophees of victorie would he erect ouer all Antichriſtianiſme amongſt vs? How freely and loud ſhould the Goſpell of God ring euery where in the eare of the generations yet vnborne? How ſure ſhould we be, long and long to enioy ſo gracious and deare a Soueraigne, ſo comfortable a peace, ſo happy a gouernment? euen till this Eue of the Annuntiation of the firſt comming of Chriſt, ouertake the day of the Annuntiation of the ſecond comming, for our redemption. Which God for his mercies ſake, for his Chriſts ſake, vouchſafe to grant vs. Amen.

IOHN 7. 24.

Iudge not according to the appearance, but iudge righteous iudgment.

AS in the ciuill body, ſo in the naturall; the head as it is the higheſt, ſo the chiefe part: according to the place is the dignitie: Of the head, the higheſt Region is chiefeſt, ſeruing only for the vſe of intellectuall powers; whereas the lower part of it is only imployed for bodily nutrition: Now, as the reaſonable part of the Soule is Vertex animæ, being contradiſtinguiſhed to the ſenſitiue; So, if yee diſtinguiſh the reaſonable into Iudgement and Deliberation, Naturale Iudicatorium dicetur eſſe vertex, ſaith Aquinas; Iudgement is the top of our Soule, and therefore cals for the top of our care; If the higheſt Wheele goe right, the inferiour hardly erre. Heare then the golden rule of the Author, of the Iudge of our iudgment, Iudge not according to the appearance, but iudge righteous iudgement. The negatiue part is firſt, Iudge not; then, Iudge: Where the minde is free and cleare, it is good to beginne with the poſitiue documents of right, which is the rule to it ſelfe and the wrong; but where the heart is foreſtalled with miſ-opinion, ablatiue directions are firſt needfull to vnteach error, ere wee can learne truth. Iudge not therefore according to the appearance: κατ' ὄψιν is (as the Vulgar rightly) ſecundùm faciem, according to the face, becauſe the face onely appeares, the reſt is hid: Euery thing, not man only, hath both a face and an heart; a face which is peruious to euery eye, an heart to which none eye can pierce but the wiſe. This face, as of man, ſo of things, is a falſe rule of iudgement; Frons, oculi, &c. The forehead, eyes, countenance tell many a lye. Iudge not therefore according to appearance: it is no meaſuring by a crooked line: There is nothing more vncertaine than appearance; ſome things appeare that are not, and ſome things are that appeare not; and that (beſides naturall occurrences) in morally both good and euill: Some things appeare good that are not, and therefore miſ-lead the heart both to an vniuſt proſecution, and to a falſe applauſe; ſome things appeare euill that are not, and therefore miſ-lead vs to an iniurious cenſure, and vndeſerued abomination: Againe, ſome things are good that appeare not, and therefore loſe both our allowance and purſuit; ſome things are euill that appeare not, and therefore inſinuate themſelues into our acquaintance and loue, to our coſt: Many a Snake lies hid vnder the Strawberry leaues, and ſtings vs ere we be aware. Vitia virtutes mentiuntur, ſaith Gregorie, Vice too oft makes a maske of the skin of Vertue, and lookes louely: Vertue as often comes forth (like a Martyr in the Inquiſition) with a San-benit vpon her back, and a cap painted with Deuils vpon her head, to make her vgly to the beholders; Iudge not therefore according to the appearance.

The appearance or face, is of things, as of men: We ſee it at once with one caſt of the eye, yet there are angles, & hills & dales, which vpon more earneſt view the eye ſees cauſe to dwell in: ſo it is with this appearance or face of things, which how-euer it ſeemes wholly to appeare to vs at the firſt glance, yet vpon further ſearch will deſcry much matter of our inquiry: For euery thing from the skin incluſiuely to the heart, is the face; euery thing beſides true being, is appearance. All the falſe κριτήρια that vſe to beguile the iudgment of man, hide themſelues vnder this appearance: Theſe reduce themſelues to three heads; Preſumptions, falſe Formes, Euents: Preſumptions muſt be diſtinguiſhed; for wheras there are three degrees of them, firſt (leuia Probabilia) light Probabilities, then faire Probabilities, & thirdly ſtrong Probabilities, which are called, Indicia iuris, the two firſt are allowed by very Inquiſitors, but as ſufficient to cauſe ſuſpition, to take information, to attache the ſuſpected, not enough whereon to ground the Libell or the torture, much leſſe a finall iudgment: Thus Elie ſees Annaes lips goe, therefore ſhe is drunke: The Phariſes ſee Chriſt ſit with ſinners, he is a friend to their ſins.

Falſe formes are preſented either to the eie or to the eare. In the former, beſides ſupernatural deluſions, there is a deceit of the ſight, whether through the indiſpoſition of the Organ, or the diſtance of the Obiect, or the miſ-diſpoſition of the medium: So as if we ſhould iudge according to appearance, the Sunne ſhould double it ſelfe by the firſt, through the croſneſſe of the eye, it ſhould diminiſh it ſelfe by the ſecond, and ſeeme as big as a large Siue, or no large Cart-wheele at the moſt; It ſhould dance in the riſing, & moue irregularly by the third. To the eare are miſ-reports, & falſe ſuggeſtions, whether concerning the perſon or the cauſe. In the former the calumniating tongue of the Detractor is the Iugler that makes any mans honeſty or worth appeare ſuch as his malice liſteth: In the latter, the ſmooth tongue of the ſubtile Rhetorician is the Impoſtor which makes cauſes appeare to the vnſetled iudgment, ſuch as his wit or fauour pleaſeth: Euents, which are oft-times as much againſt the intention, & aboue the remedie of the Agent, as beſides the nature of the Act: There is ſometimes a good euent of euill, as Iaſons aduerſary cured him in ſtabbing him; the Iſraelites thriue by oppreſſion, the Field of the Church yeelds moſt when it is manured with bloud: There is ſometimes an ill euent of good; Abimelec giues Dauid the Shew-bread, and the Sword, he and his family dies for it: Sapientis eſt praſtare culpam; It is enough for a wiſe man to weild the Act, the iſſue he cannot; Wiſdome makes demonſtratiue Syllogiſmes, à priori, from the cauſes; folly Paralogiſmes, à poſteriori, from the ſucceſſe. Careat ſucceſſibus opto quiſquis ab euentu, &c. was of old the word of the Heathen Poet. If therefore either vpon ſleight probabilities, or falſe formes, or ſubſequent euents we paſſe our verdict, we doe what is here forbidden, Iudge according to appearance.

Had the charge beene onely Iudge not, and gone no further, it had beene very vſefull, and no other than our Sauiour gaue in the Mount: we are all on our way; Euery man makes himſelfe a Iuſtice Itinerant, & paſſeth ſentence of all that comes before him, yea (beyond all commiſſion) of all aboue him; and that many times, not without groſſe miſ-conſtruction, as in the caſe of our late directions: Our very Iudges are at our bar; Secrets of Court, of Counſell, of State eſcape vs not, yea not thoſe of the moſt reſerued Cabinet of Heauen: Quis te conſtituit Iudicem? Who made thee a Iudge? as the Iſraelite (vniuſtly) to Moſes: Theſe are ſawcy vſurpers of forbidden Chaires; & therefore it is iuſt with God, that (according to the Pſalmiſt) ſuch Iudges ſhould be caſt down in ſtony places, yea, as it is in the Originall נשמטו בידי סלע that they ſhould be left in the hands of the rocke (allidantur Petræ) that they ſhould be daſht againſt the rockes, that will be ſailing without Card or compaſſe in the vaſt Ocean of Gods Counſels, or his Anointeds.

But now here our Sauiour ſeales our Commiſſion, ſets vs vpon the Bench; allowes vs the act, but takes order for the manner; we may iudge, we may not iudge according to the appearance; wee may bee Iudges (whether κρίται, or δικασταὶ) the one to condemne, the other to abſolue; we may not bee κρίται διαλογισμῶν πονηρῶν Iudges of euill thoughts; and we ſhall be euill-thoughted Iudges, if we ſhall iudge according to appearance. Not only Fortune and Loue, but euen Iuſtice alſo is wont to bee painted blindfold; to import that it may not regard faces. God ſayes to euery Iudge as hee did to Samuel, concerning Eliab, Looke not on his countenance, nor the height of his ſtature. Is an outragious rape committed? Is bloud ſhed? Looke not whether it be a Courtiers or a Peaſants, whether by a Courtier or a Peaſant; either of them cries equally loud to heauen; Iuſtice cannot bee too Lyncean to the being of things, nor too blinde to the appearance.

The beſt things appeare not, the worſt appeare moſt; God, the Angels, ſoules both glorified and encaged in our boſomes, grace, ſupernaturall truths, theſe are moſtwhat the obiects of our faith, and faith is the euidence of things not ſeene; Like as in bodily obiects, the more pure and ſimple ought is (as aire and ethereall fire) the more it flyeth the ſight; the more groſſe and compacted (as water and earth) the more it fils the eye, Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

It is an vſefull and excellent rule for the auoiding of errour in our iudgement of all matters whether Naturall, Ciuill, or Diuine.

Naturall; what is the appearance of a perſon, but the colour, ſhape, ſtature? The colour is oft-times bought or borrowed, the ſhape forced by Art, the ſtature raiſed (to contradict Chriſt) a cubit high; Iudge not therefore according to appearance. What are the colluſions of Iuglers and Mountebanks, the weepings and motions of Images, the noyſes of miraculous cures and diſpoſſeſſions, but appearances? Fit aliquando in Eccleſiâ maxima deceptio populi in miraculis fictis à ſacerdotibus; There is much cozenage of the poore people by cogged miracles, ſaith Cardinall Lyranus; theſe holy frauds could not gull men if they did not iudge according to appearance. Should appearance bee the rule, our harueſt had beene rich; there was not more ſhew of plenty in our fields, than now of ſcarcity in our ſtreets. This dearth (to ſay truth) is not in the graine, but in the heart; If the hearts of men were not more blaſted with couetouſneſſe and cruell ſelfe-loue, than their graine with diſtemper of aire, this needed not; The Barnes and Granaries are full, the Markets empty; Authority knowes how to remedy this euill, how to preuent a dearth in abundance, that men may not affamiſh whom God hath fed; and that when God hath giuen vs the ſtaffe of bread, it may not bee either hid, or broken; ſhortly, that our ſtore may not be iudged by the appearance.

Ciuill; Wiſemen and ſtateſmen eſpecially may not alwaies looke the ſame way they would goe; like skilfull Sea-men, they ſometimes lauere, and (as the wind may ſtand) fetch compaſſes of lawfull policies to their wiſhed point. That of Tiberius was fearefull; of whom Xiphiline ὧν ἔλεγεν οὐδὲν ἐβούλετο That he ſayled euer againſt the wind of his words: But ſometimes a good Conſtantius, or Anaſtaſius, will wiſely pretend what he intends not: As our Sauiour made as if hee went further, when hee meant to turne into Emaus: The hearts of Kings are as deepe waters; wee may not thinke to draine them in the hollow of our hand: Secret things to them of whom God hath ſaid, Dixi dȳ eſtis; things reuealed to vs and our children. Euen wee meane ones would be loth to haue alwaies our hearts read in our faces; Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

Diuine; In theſe our ſpeech muſt dwell; If wee ſhould iudge according to the appearance, we ſhould thinke baſely of the Sauiour of the world; Who that had ſeene him ſprawling and wringing in the Cratch, flitting to Ægypt, chopping of chips at Nazarath, famiſhing in the Deſart, tranſported by Satan, attended by Fiſhermen, perſecuted by his Kindred, betrayed by one Seruant, abiured by another, forſaken of all, apprehended, arraigned, condemned, buffeted, ſpat vpon, ſcourged to bloud, ſceptred with the reede, crowned with thornes, nailed to the Croſſe, hanging naked betwixt two Theeues, ſcorned of the beholders, ſealed vp in a borrowed graue, could ſay other, than, Hee hath no forme nor beauty, when wee ſhall ſee him there is nothing that wee ſhould deſire him? Who that ſhould haue ſeene his skinne all dewed with pearles of bloudy ſweat, his backe bleeding, his face blubbered and beſmeared, his forehead harrowed, his hands and feet pierced, his ſide guſhing out, his head bowed downe in death, and ſhould withall haue heard his dying lips ſay, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? would not haue ſaid, He is deſpiſed and reiected of men, yea (in appearance) of God himſelfe. Yet euen this while to the cutting of the ſinewss of thoſe ſtiff-necked Iewes, the Angels owned him for their Lord, the Sages adored him, the Starre deſigned him, the Prophets fore-ſhewed him, the Deuills confeſt him, his Miracles euinced him, the earth ſhooke, the Rocks rent, the Dead lookt out, the Sunne lookt in, aſtoniſhed at the ſufferings of the God of nature; Euen whiles hee was deſpiſed of men, hee commanded the Deuils to their chaines: whiles baſe men ſhot out their tongues at him, Principalities and Powers bowed their knees to him; whiles he hanged deſpicably vpon the tree of ſhame, the powers of hell were dragged captiue after the triumphant chariot of his Croſſe; the appearance was not ſo contemptible, as the truth of his eſtate glorious. Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

Should appearance be the rule, how ſcornfully would the carnall eye ouer-looke the poore ordinances of God? What would it finde here but fooliſhneſſe of preaching, homelineſſe of Sacraments, an inky Letter, a Prieſts lips, a ſauorleſſe meſſage, a morſell of Bread, a mouth full of Wine, an hand full of Water, a ſlander-beaten Croſſe, a crucified Sauiour, a militant Church, a deſpiſed profeſſion. When yet this fooliſhneſſe of preaching is the power of God to ſaluation; theſe mute Letters the liuely Oracles of God; theſe vile Lips the Cabinets of heauen to preſerue knowledge; this vnplauſible Meſſage, Magnalia Dei; this Water, the Water of Life in the midſt of the Paradiſe of God: (ἀειζὸν τὸ ὕδωρ) this Bread the Manna of Angels, this Wine heauenly Nectar, this Church the Kings Daughter, all glorious within, this dying Sacrifice the Lord of life, this Croſſe the Banner of Victory, this profeſſion Heauen vpon earth. Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

Should appearance be the rule, woe were Gods children, happy were his enemies. Who that had ſeene Cain ſtanding maſterly ouer the bleeding carkaſſe of Abel, Ioſeph in his bonds, his Miſtreſſe in her dreſſe, Moſes in the Flags, Pharaoh in the Palace, Dauid ſculking in the Wilderneſſe, Saul commanding in the Court, Elias fainting vnder his Iuniper tree, Iezebel painting in her cloſet, Michaiah in the priſon, Zidkijah in the preſence, Ieremie in the dungeon, Zedekiah in the throne, Daniel trembling among the Lions, the Median Princes feaſting in their Bowers, Iohns head bleeding in the Platter, Herods ſmiling at the Reuels, Chriſt at the Barre, Pilate on the Bench, the Diſciples ſcourged, the Scribes and Elders inſulting, would not haue ſaid; O happy Caine, Potiphars wife, Pharaoh, Saul, Iezebel Zidkijah, Zedekiah, Median Princes, Pilate, Herod, Elders; miſerable Abel, Ioſeph, Moſes, Dauid, Eliah, Michaiah, Ieremie, Daniel, Iohn, Chriſt, the Diſciples: Yet wee know Caines victorie was as wofull, as Abels martyrdome glorious; Ioſephs irons were more precious, than the golden tires of his Miſtreſſe; Moſes Reeds were more ſure than Pharaohs Cedars; Dauids Caue in the Deſart more ſafe than the Towers of Saul; Eliahs Rauen a more comfortable purueyor than all the Officers of Iezebel; Michaiahs priſon was the guard-chamber of Angels, when Ahabs preſence was the counſell-chamber of euill ſpirits; Ieremies Dungeon had more true light of comfort than the ſhining ſtate of Zedekiah; Daniel was better garded with the Lions, than Darius and the Median Princes with their Ianiſaries; Iohns head was more rich with the Crowne of his martyrdome, than Herods with the Diadem of his Tetrarchate; Chriſt at the Barre gaue life and being to Pilate on the Bench, gaue motion to thoſe hands that ſtrucke him, to that tongue that condemned him, and in the meane while, gaue ſentence on his Iudge; The Diſciples were better pleaſed with their ſtripes and wales than the Iewiſh Elders with their proud Phylacteries. After this, who that had ſeene the primitiue Chriſtians, ſome broyled on Gridirons, others boyled in Lead, ſome roſted, others frozen to death, ſome fleaed, others torne with horſes, ſome craſhed in peeces by the teeth of Lions, others caſt downe from the rocks to the ſtakes, ſome ſmiling on the wheele, others in the flame, all wearying their tormentors and ſhaming their Tyrants with their patience, would not haue ſaid; Of all things I would not be a Chriſtian; Yet, euen this while were theſe poore torturing-ſtocks higher (as Marcus Arethuſius bragged) than their perſecutors; dying Victors, yea Victors of death; neuer ſo glorious as when they began not to be; in gaſping crowned, in yeelding the ghoſt more than Conquerours; Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

When thou lookeſt about, aud ſeeſt on the one hand, a poore conſcionable Chriſtian drouping vnder the remorſe for his ſinne, auſterely checking his wanton appetite and curbing his rebellious deſires, wearing out his daies in a rough penitentiall ſeuerity, cooling his infrequent pleaſures with ſighs, and ſawcing them with teares; on the other hand ruffling Gallants made all of pleaſure and Iouiall delights, bathing themſelues in a ſea of all ſenſuall ſatieties, denying their pampered nature nothing vnder heauen, not wine in bowles, not ſtrange fleſh, and beaſtly dalliance, not vnnaturall titillations, not violent filthineſſe; that feaſt without feare, and drinke without meaſure, and ſweare without feeling, and liue without God; their bodies are vigorous, their coffers full, their ſtate proſperous, their hearts chearefull: O how thou bleſſeſt ſuch men: lo theſe (thou ſaiſt) theſe are the darlings of heauen and earth; Sic ô ſic iuuat viuere: Whiles thoſe other ſullen mopiſh creatures are the (καθάρματα) offſcouring and recrements of the world; Thou foole, giue me thy hand, let mee lead thee with Dauid into the ſanctuary of God: Now what ſeeſt thou? The end, the end of theſe men is not peace. Surely ô God thou haſt ſet them in ſlippery places, and caſteſt them downe into deſolation: how ſuddenly are they periſhed, and horribly conſumed! Woe is mee, they doe but dance a Galliard ouer the mouth of hell, that ſeemes now couered ouer with the greene ſods of pleaſure; The higher they leape, the more deſperate is their lighting: Oh wofull, wofull condition of thoſe godleſſe men, yea thoſe epicurean Porkets, whoſe belly is their God, whoſe heauen is their pleaſure, whoſe curſed iollity is but a feeding vp to an eternall ſlaughter: the day is comming, wherein euery minute of their ſinfull vnſatisfying ioyes ſhall be anſwered with a thouſand thouſand millions of yeers frying in that vnquenchable fire; And when thoſe damned Ghoſts ſhall forth of their inceſſant flames ſee the glorious remuneration of the penitent and penſiue ſoules which they haue deſpiſed, they ſhall then gnaſh and yell out that late recantation; Wee fooles thought their life madneſſe, and their end without honour; now they are counted among the children of God, and their portion is among the Saints, ours amongſt Deuils: Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

Should we iudge according to appearance, all would be Gold that gliſtererh, all droſſe that gliſtereth not: Hypocrites haue neuer ſhewed more faire than ſome Saints foule. Saul weepes, Ahab walkes ſoftly: Tobias and Sanballat will bee building Gods walls; Herod heares Iohn gladly; Balaam propheſies Chriſt, Iudas preaches him, Satan confeſſes him; When euen an Abraham diſſembles, a Dauid clokes adultery with murder, a Salomon giues (at leaſt) a toleration to idolatry; a Peter forſweares his Maſter; briefly, the prime diſciple is a Satan; Satan an Angell of light. For you: How gladly are we deceiued in thinking you all ſuch as you ſeeme; None but the Court of Heauen hath a fairer face. Prayers, Sermons, Sacraments, geniculation, ſilence, attention, reuerence, applauſe, knees, eyes, eares, mouthes full of God; Oh that ye were thus alwaies! Oh that this were your worſt ſide! But if wee follow you from the Church, and finde curſing and bitterneſſe vnder your tongues; licentious diſorder in your liues, bribery and oppreſſion in your hands; If God looke into the windowes of your hearts, and finde there be (intus rapina) we cannot iudge you by the appearance; or, if we could, What comfort were it to you to haue deceiued our charity with the appearance of Saints, when the righteous Iudge ſhall giue you your portion with Hypocrites; What euer wee doe, he will be ſure not to iudge according to the appearance.

If appearance ſhould be the rule, falſe religion ſhould be true, true falſe. Quædam falſa probabiliora quibuſdam veris, is the old word; Some falſhoods are more likely than ſome truths: Natiue beauty ſcornes Art: Truth is as a matron; Error a curtizan: The matron cares onely to concile loue by a graue and gracefull modeſty, the curtizan with philtres and farding. Wee haue no hierarchy mounted aboue Kings, no pompous oſtentation of magnificence, no gariſh proceſſions, no gaudy altars, no fine images clad with Taffates in ſummer, with veluets in winter, no flouriſhes of vniuerſality, no rumors of miracles, no ſumptuous canonizations, we haue nothing but (γάλα ἄδολον) the ſincerity of Scriptures, ſimplicity of Sacraments, decency of rare ceremonies, Chriſt crucified. We are gone if yee goe by appearance: Gone? alas, who can but bluſh and weepe, and bleed to ſee that Chriſtian ſoules ſhould (after ſuch beames of knowledge) ſuffer themſelues to bee thus palpably cozened with the gilded ſlips of error, that after ſo many yeeres pious gouernment of ſuch an incomparable ſucceſſion of religious Princes, authority ſhould haue cauſe to complaine of our defection?

Deare Chriſtians (I muſt be ſharpe) are we children or fooles, that wee ſhould bee better pleaſed with the glittering tinſell of a painted baby from a Pedlers ſhop, than with the ſecretly-rich and inualuable Iewell of diuine Truth? Haue we thus learned Chriſt? Is this the fruit of ſo cleere a Goſpell? of ſo bleſſed ſcepters? For Gods ſake be wiſe and honeſt, and yee cannot be Apoſtates.

Shortly, for it were eaſie to bee endleſſe: If appearance might bee the rule, good ſhould bee euill, euill good; there is no vertue that cannot bee counterfetted, no vice that cannot bee blanched: we ſhould haue no ſuch friend as our enemy, a flatterer; no ſuch enemie as our friend that reproues vs. It were a wonder if yee great ones ſhould not haue ſome ſuch burs, hanging vpon your ſleeues; As ſoone ſhall corne grow without chaffe, as greatneſſe ſhall bee free from adulation: Theſe ſeruile ſpirits ſhall ſooth vp all your purpoſes, and magnifie all your actions, and applaud your words, and adore your perſons: Sin what yee will, they will not checke you; Proiect what you will, they will not thwart you; ſay what ye will, they will not faile to ſecond you; bee what yee will, they will not faile to admire you; Oh how theſe men are all for you, all yours, all you; They loue you as the Rauens doe your eyes. How deare was Siſera to Iael, when ſhe ſmoothed him vp, and gaue him milke in a lordly diſh, Samſon to Dalilah, when ſhe lulled him in her lap; Chriſt to Iudas, when he kiſſed him; See how he loued him would ſome foole haue ſaid, that had iudged by appearance.

In the meane time an honeſt plaine dealing friend is like thoſe ſauces which a man praiſes with tears in his eyes: like a cheſnut, which pricks the fingers, but pleaſes our taſte; or like ſome wholeſome medicinall potion, that diſtaſtes and purges vs (perhaps makes vs ſicke) that it may heale vs. Oh let the righteous ſmite mee, for that is a benefit, let him reproue mee, and it ſhall bee a precious oyle that ſhall not breake my head; Breake it? no, it ſhall heale it, when it is mortally wounded by mine owne ſinne, by others aſſentation: Oh how happy were it, if we could loue them that loue our ſoules, and hate them that loue our ſinnes. They are theſe rough hands that muſt bring vs ſauory diſhes, and carry away a bleſſing; truth is for them now, thankes ſhall be for them hereafter, but in the meane time they may not be iudged by the appearance.

Laſtly, if we ſhall iudge friendſhip by complement, ſalubrity by ſweetneſſe, ſeruice by the eye, fidelity by oathes, valour by brags, a Saint by his face, a deuill by his feet, we ſhall be ſure to be deceiued: Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

But (that yee miſtake not) though we may not iudge onely by the appearance, yet appearance may not bee neglected in our iudgement. Some things according to the Philoſopher (δοκεῖ μὲν, ἔστι δὲ) ſeeme and are, are as they ſeeme: Semblances are

arenot alwaies ſeuered from truth ; Our ſenſes are ſafe guides to our vnderſtandings. Wee iuſtly laugh at that Scepticke in Laertius, who becauſe his ſeruant robbed his Cup-bord, doubted whether hee left his victualls there : What doe wee with eyes if wee may not beleeue their intelligence ? That world is paſt, wherein the gloſſe Clericus amplectens fœminam præſumitur benedicendi cauſa feciſſe ; The wanton imbracements of another mans wife muſt paſſe with a Clarke for a ghoſtly benediction; Men are now more wiſe, leſſe charitable : Words and probable ſhewes are appearances, actions are not ; and yet euen our words alſo ſhall iudge vs ; if they bee filthy, if blaſphemous, if but idle, wee ſhall account for them, we ſhall be iudged by them : Ex ore tuo; a foule tongue ſhewes euer a rotten heart ; By their fruits yee ſhall know them, is our Sauiours rule; I may ſafely ſay, No body deſires to borrow colours of euill : if you doe ill, thinke not that we will make dantie to thinke you ſo; When the God of loue can ſay by the Diſciple of loue, Qui facit peccatum, ex diabolo eſt ; Hee that committeth ſinne, is of the deuill : Euen the righteous Iudge of the world iudgeth (ſecundum opera) according to our works ; we cannot erre whiles we tread in his ſteps. If we doe euill, ſinne lies at the doore ; but it is on the ſtreet ſide ; Euery Paſſenger ſees it, cenſures it; How much more he that ſees in ſecret ? Tribulation & anguiſh vpon euery ſoule that doth euill: Euery ſoule; here is no exemption by greatneſſe, no buying off with bribes, no bleering of the eies with pretences, no ſhrouding our ſelues in the night of ſecrecy; but if it be a ſoule that doth euill, Tribulation & anguiſh is for it; Contrarily, If we doe well, ſhall we not be accepted ? If we be charitable in our almes, iuſt in our awards, faithfull in our performances, ſober in our carriages, deuout in our religious ſeruices, conſcionable in our actions; Glory, and honour, and peace to euery man that worketh good; we ſhal haue peace with our ſelues, honour with men, glory with God & his Angels: Yea that peace of God which paſſeth all vnderſtanding; ſuch honour as haue all his Saints, the incomprehenſible glory of the God of peace, the God of Saints and Angels, to the participation whereof, that good God that hath ordained vs, as mercifully bring vs for the ſake of his deare Sonne Ieſus Chriſt the iuſt : To whom with thee O Father, and thy good Spirit, one infinite God, our God, bee giuen all praiſe, honour and glory now and for euer. Amen.

THE GREAT IMPOSTOR, LAID OPEN, OVT OF IER. 17.9.

The heart is deceitfull aboue all things.

I Know where I am; in one of the famous Phrontiſteries of Law, and Iuſtice: wherefore ſerues Law and Iuſtice, but for the preuention or puniſhment of fraud and wickedneſſe? Giue me leaue therefore to bring before you, Students, Maſters, Fathers, Oracles of Law and Iuſtice, the greateſt Cheator and Malefactor in the world, our owne Heart. It is a great word that I haue ſaid, in promiſing to bring him before you; for this is one of the greateſt aduantages, of his fraud, that hee cannot bee ſeene: That as that old Iugler Apollonius Thyanæus, when he was brought before the Iudge, vaniſhed out of ſight; ſo this great Impoſtor, in his very preſenting before you, diſpeareth and is gone; yea ſo cunningly, that he doth it with our owne conſent, and we would be loth that he could be ſeene: Therefore as an Epiphonema to this iuſt complaint of deceitfulneſſe, is added Who can know it? It is eaſie to know that it is deceitfull, and in what it deceiues, though the deceits themſelues cannot be knowne, till too late; As we may ſee the ſhip, and the ſea, and the ſhip going on the ſea, yet the way of a ſhip in the ſea (as Salomon obſerues) we know not: God askes, and God ſhall anſwer; What he askes by Ieremie, he ſhall anſwer by S. Paul, Who knowes the heart of man? Euen the ſpirit of man that is in him. 1 Cor. 2. 11. If then the heart haue but eyes enow to ſee it ſelfe by the reflection of thoughts, it is enough: Ye ſhall eaſily ſee & heare enough (out of the analogie and reſemblance of hearts) to make you both aſtoniſhed and aſhamed.

The heart of man lies in a narrow roome, yet all the world cannot fill it; but that which may be ſaid of the heart, would more than fill a world: Here is a double ſtile giuen it; of deceitfulneſſe; of wickedneſſe; either of which knowes no end, whether of being, or of diſcourſe. I ſpend my houre, and might doe my life, in treating of the firſt.

See then, I beſeech you, the Impoſtor, and the Impoſture; The Impoſtor himſelfe, The heart of man; The Impoſture, Deceitfull aboue all things.

Hall, J.

As deceitfull perſons are wont euer to goe vnder many names, and ambiguous, and muſt be expreſt with an [aliàs] ſo doth the heart of man; Neither man himſelfe, nor any part of man hath ſo many names, as the heart alone; For euery faculty that it hath, and euery action it doth, it hath a ſeuerall name: Neither is there more multiplicity, than doubt in this name; Not ſo many termes are vſed to ſignifie the heart, as the heart ſignifies many things.

When ye heare of the heart, ye thinke ſtraight of that fleſhie part in the center of the bodie which liues firſt, and dies laſt; and whoſe beatings you finde to keepe time all the body ouer; That is not it which is ſo cunning; Alas, that is a poore harmeleſſe peece meerly paſſiue; and if it doe any thing, as the ſubminiſtration of Vitall ſpirits, to the maintenance of the whole frame, it is but good; no, it is the ſpirituall part that lurkes in this fleſh, which is guiltie of ſuch deceit. We muſt learne of witty Idolatry to diſtinguiſh betwixt the ſtocke and the inuiſible powers that dwell in it. It is not for me to bee a ſtickler betwixt the Hebrewes, and the Greeke Philoſophers, and Phyſitians, in a queſtion of naturall learning, concerning the ſeat of the ſoule; nor to inſiſt vpon the reaſons why the ſpirit of God rather places all the ſpirituall powers in the heart, than in the braine; Doubtleſſe in reſpect of the affections there reſident, whereby all thoſe ſpeculatiue abilities are drawne to practiſe; It ſhall ſuffice vs to take things as we finde them, and to hold it for granted, that this Monoſyllable (for ſo it is in many languages) compriſes all that intellectiue and affectiue world which concerneth man; and in plaine termes to ſay, that when God ſaies The heart is deceitfull, he meanes, the vnderſtanding, will, affections are deceitfull.

The vnderſtanding is doubly deceitfull; It makes vs beleeue it knowes thoſe things which it doth not; and that it knowes not thoſe things which it doth: As ſome fooliſh Mountebanke, that holds it a great glory to ſeeme to know all things; or ſome preſuming Phyſitian, that thinkes it a ſhame not to profeſſe skill in any ſtate, of the body or diſeaſe; ſo doth our vaine vnderſtanding; therein framing it ſelfe according to the ſpirits it meets withall; if they be proud and curious, it perſwades them, they know euery thing; if careleſſe, that they know enough.

In the firſt kinde; What hath not the fond heart of man dared to arrogate to it ſelfe? It knowes all the ſtarres by their names; Tuſh, that is nothing; It knowes what the ſtars meane by their very lookes, what the birds meane by their chirping, as Apollonius did; What the heart meanes, by the features of the face; it knowes the euents of life by the lines of the hand: the ſecrets of Art, the ſecrets of Nature, the ſecrets of State, the ſecrets of others hearts, yea the ſecrets of God in the cloſet of heauen; Yea, not onely what God hath done, but what he will doe: This is (ſapiens ſtultitia) a wiſe folly, as Irenæus ſaid of his Valentinians; All Figure-caſters, Palmeſters, Phyſiognomers, Fortune-tellers, Alchymiſts, fantaſticke proiectors, and all the rabble of profeſſors of thoſe περίεργα, not ſo much curious as idle Arts, haue their word giuen them by the Apoſtle, Deceiuing and deceiued; neither can theſe men make any worſe fooles, than their hearts haue made themſelues; and well may that Alexandrian tax bee ſet vpon them in both names, whether of actiue, or paſſiue folly: And (as it commonly falls out, that ſuperfluous things rob the heart of neceſſary) in the meane while, thoſe things which the heart may, and ſhould know, it lightly miſ-knowes: As our ſenſes are deceiued by diſtance, or interpoſitions, to thinke the ſtars beamie and ſparkling; the Moone horned, the Planets equally remote, the Sunne ſometimes red, pale other ſome: ſo doth alſo our vnderſtanding erre, in miſ-opinion of diuine things; It thinkes it knowes God, when it is but an Idoll of fancie, as Sauls meſſengers, when they came into the roome, thought they had the true Dauid, when it was but a Wiſpe; it knowes the will of God, when it is nothing but groſſe miſ-conſtruction: ſo as the common knowledge of men, though they thinke it a Torch, is but an Ignis Fatuus to lead them to a ditch: How many thouſand Aſſyrians thinke they are in the way to the Prophet, when they are in the midſt of Samaria? How many millions thinke they walke fairely on to heauen, when indeed they are in the broad way that leads to deſtruction? Oh poore blinde Pagans, halfe-ſighted Turkes, bleare-eied Iewes, blind-folded Papiſts, Squint-eied Schiſmaticks, purblind ignorants, how well doe they finde themſelues pleaſed with their deuotion, and thinke God ſhould bee ſo too ; when it is nothing but a mixture of meſpriſon ; ſuperſtition, conceitedneſſe ; and according to the ſeldome-reuerently-vſed prouerbe) whiles they thinke they haue God by the finger, they hold a deuill by the toe ; and all this, becauſe their heart deceiues them. If careleſſe, and loth to be at the paines of knowing more, it perſwades them they know enough ; that they cry out of more, as he did on the ointment, (Vt quid perditio hac ?) What needs all this waſte ? and makes them as conſcionable for knowledge, as Eſau was for cattle, I haue enough, my brother, keepe that thou haſt to thy ſelfe ; or as contentedly-reſolute, as the Epicure in the Goſpell: Soule take thy eaſe, thou haſt knowledge enough laid vp for many yeeres.

From whence it is, that too many reſt ſimply (yea wilfully) in their owne meaſure, not ſo much as wiſhing more skill in Soule-matters ; applauding their owne ſafe mediocritie ; like the credulous blinde man that thought he now ſaw a ſhimmering of the Sunne-beames, when indeed his backe was towards it : Hence it is that they ſcoffe at the fooliſhneſſe of preaching, ſcorn the forward bookiſhneſſe of others, fearing nothing but a ſurfet of Manna, and hating to know more than their neighbours, than their forefathers ; and thus are led on muffled vp in an vnfelt ignorance, to their graue, yea, (without the mercy of God) to their hell.

And as in theſe things there is a preſumption of knowing what we doe not ; ſo contrarily, a diſſimulation and concealement of the knowledge of what we doe vnderſtand : The heart of man is a great lier to it ſelfe this way ; Saint Paul ſaies that of Pagans, which I may boldly ſay of Chriſtians, they haue the effect of the law written in their hearts ; yet many of them will not bee acknowne of one letter ingrauen there by the finger of God : Certaine common principles there are (together with this law) interlinearily written in the Tables of the heart, as that we muſt doe as we would be done to ; That there is a God ; That this God is infinite in iuſtice and truth, and muſt bee ſerued like himſelfe ; theſe they either blot out, or lay their finger on, that they may not bee ſeene, purpoſely, that they may ſinne freely ; and faine would perſwade themſelues they neuer had any ſuch euidence from God : ſo putting off the checks of conſcience with bold denials ; like the harlot of Iericho, (but worſe than ſhe) that hath hid the Spies, and now out-faces their entertainment : Wherein the heart doth to it ſelfe, that which Nahaſh the Ammonite would haue done to Iſrael, put out his owne right eie, that it may not ſee that law whereby it might be conuinced, and finde it ſelfe miſerable. Thus the vnderſtanding of man is euery way deceitfull in ouer-knowing, miſ-knowing, diſſembling ; in all which it is like an euill and vnfaithfull eye, that either will be ſeeing by a falſe glaſſe, or a falſe light, or with diſtortion ; or elſe wilfully cloſes the lids that it may not ſee at all ; and in all this deceiues vs.

The will is no leſſe cunning ; which though it make faire pretences of a generall inclination to good, yet (hîc & nunc) in particulars, hangs towards a pleaſing euill ; Yea though the Vnderſtanding haue ſufficiently informed it of the worthineſſe of good, and the turpitude of euill, yet being ouercome with the falſe delectableneſſe of ſinne, it yeelds to a miſſe-aſſent ; Reaſon being (as Aquinas ſpeakes) either ſwallowed vp by ſome paſſion, or held downe by ſome vicious habit : It is true, ſtill the Will followes the Reaſon, neither can doe otherwiſe ; but therefore, if Reaſon miſ-led be contrary to Reaſon, and a ſchiſme ariſe in the ſoule, it muſt follow that the Will muſt needs bee contrary to Will and Reaſon ; Wherein it is like a Planet, which though it be carried about perpetually by the firſt mouer, yet ſlily creepes on his owne way, contrary to that ſtrong circumuolution : And though the minde be ſufficiently conuinced of the neceſſitie, or profit of a good act, yer for the tediouſneſſe annexed to it, in a dangerous ſpirituall acedie, it inſenſibly ſlips away from it, and is content to let it fall ; As ſome idle, or fearfull Merchant, that could be glad to haue gold, if it would come with eaſe, but will not either take the paines, or hazard the aduenture to fetch it : Thus commonly the

Will (in both reſpects) Water-man-like lookes forward, and rowes backward; and vnder good pretences doth nothing but deceiue.

The affections are as deceitfull as either; whether in miſſe-placing, meaſure, or manner.

Miſ-placing: They are fiery where they ſhould be coole; and where they ſhould burne, freeze; Our heart makes vs beleeue it loues God, and giues him pledges of affection; whiles it ſecretly doats vpon the world; like ſome falſe ſtrumpet, that entertaines her huſband with her eyes, and in the meane time treads vpon the toe of an Adulterer vnder the boord: That it loues iuſtice, when it is but reuenge; That it grieues for the miſſing of Chriſt, when indeed it is but for the loaues and fiſhes; That it feares God, when indeed it is but afraid of our owne torment; That it hates the ſin, when it is the perſon; That it hates the world, when it thruſts God out of doores to lodge it.

Meaſure: That we loue God enough, and the world but enough, when as indeed the one loue is but as the cold fit of an ague, the other an hot; we chill in the one, no leſſe than we glow in the other; when wee make God onely a ſtale to draw on the world; That we doe enough hate our corruptions, when (at our ſharpeſt) we doe but gently ſneape them, as Hely did his ſonnes; or as ſome indulgent parent doth an vnthriftie darling; whom he chides, and yet feeds with the fewell of his exceſſe; That we haue grieued enough for our ſinnes, when they haue not coſt vs ſo much as one teare, nothing but a little faſhionable winde, that neuer came further than the roots of our tongue; That we doe enough compaſſionate the afflictions of Ioſeph, when we drinke wine in bowles; That we feare God more than men, when we are aſhamed to doe that in preſence of a childe, which we care not to doe in the face of God.

Manner. That our heart loues, and hates, and feares, and ioyes, and grieues truly, when it is an hypocrite in all; That it delights conſtantly in God, and holy things, when it is but an Ephraims morning dew; That our anger is zealous, when it is but a flaſh of perſonall malice, or a ſuperſtitious furie; That we feare as ſonnes, when it is as cowards, or ſlaues; That we grieue as Gods patients, when we fret, and repine, and ſtruggle like franticks againſt the hand of our Maker. Thus (to ſumme vp all) the heart of man is wholly ſet vpon cozenage; the vnderſtanding ouer-knowing, miſ-knowing, diſſembling; The will pretending, and inclining contrarily; The affections mocking vs in the obiect, meaſure, manner; and in all of them the heart of man is deceitfull.

Ye haue ſeene the face of this Cheator; looke now at his hand; and now ye ſee who this Deceiuer is, ſee alſo the ſleights of his deceit; and therein the faſhion, the ſubiect, the ſequell of it; from whence we will deſcend to our Demeanour towards ſo dangerous an Impoſtor.

The faſhion of his deceit is the ſame with our ordinary Iuglers; either cunning conueyance, or falſe reſemblance. Cunning conueyance, whether into vs, in vs, from vs.

The heart admits ſinne, as Paradiſe did the Serpent; There it is, but by what chinks or cranies it entered, we know not; ſo as we may ſay of ſinne as the Maſter of the feaſt in the Goſpell ſaid to his ſlouenly gueſt, Quomodo intraſti? How cameſt thou in hither? Corruption doth not eat into the heart as our firſt Parents did into the apple, ſo as the print of their teeth might be ſeene, but as the worme eats into the core, inſenſibly; Neither is there leſſe cloſeneſſe when it is entred; I would it were as vntrue a word, as it is an harſh one, that many a profeſſedly-Chriſtian heart, lodges a deuill in the blinde roomes of it, and either knowes it not, or will not bee acknowne of it; euery one that harbours a willing ſinne in his breſt, doth ſo: The malicious man hath a furious deuill; the wanton an vncleane deuill, a Beelphegor, or a Tammuz; the proud man a Lucifer, the couetous a Mammon; Certainly, theſe foule ſpirits are not more truly in hell, than in a wicked heart; there they are, but ſo cloſely, that I know not if the heart it ſelfe know it; it being verified of this citadell of the heart, which was ſaid of that vaſt Niniue, that the enemie had taken ſome parts of it, long ere the other knew it: What ſhould I ſpeake of the moſt common, and yet moſt dangerous gueſt, that lodges in this Inne of the heart, Infidelity? Call at the doore, and aske if ſuch a one hoſt not there; They within make ſtrange of it, deny it, forſweare it; Call the officers, make priuie ſearch, you ſhall hardly finde him: Like ſome Ieſuite in a Popiſh dames chamber, hee is ſo cloſely contriued into falſe floores, and double walls, that his preſence is not more eaſily knowne, than hardly conuinced, confeſſed. How eaſie is it to ſay, that if infidelity did not lurke in the hearts of men, they durſt not doe as they doe; they could not doe but what they doe not? Durſt they ſinne if they were perſwaded of an hell? durſt they buy a minute of pleaſure with euerlaſting torments? Could they ſo ſleight heauen if they beleeued it? Could they bee ſo loth to poſſeſſe it? Could they thinke much of a little painfull goodneſſe to purchaſe an eternity of happineſſe? No, no, men, fathers, and brethren; if the heart were not Infidell, whiles the face is Chriſtian, this could not bee. Neither doth the heart of man more cunningly conuey ſinne into, and in it ſelfe, than from it; The ſinne that ye ſaw euen now openly in the hands, is ſo ſwiftly paſt vnder the boord, that it is now vaniſhed; Looke for it in his fore-head, there it is not; looke for it vnder his tongue, there is none; looke for it in his conſcience, yee finde nothing; and all this by the legier-de-maine of the heart: Thus Achan hath hid his wedge, and now hee dares ſtand out to a lot; Thus Salomons Harlot hath wip't her mouth, and it was not ſhee: Thus Saul will lie-out his ſacrilege, vntill the very beaſts out-bleat, and out-bellow him; Thus the ſwearer ſweares, and when hee hath done, ſweares that hee ſwore not; Thus the vncleane fornicator bribes off his ſinne, and his ſhame, and now makes challenges to the world of his honeſty. It cannot be ſpoken how peeuiſhly witty the heart of man is this way; neither doubt I but this wilineſſe is ſome of the poyſon that the ſubtile ſerpent infected vs with in that fatall morſell: They were three cunning ſhifts which the Scripture recordeth of three women (as that ſex hath beene euer noted for more ſudden pregnancie of wit) Rachel, Rahab, and the good wife of Bahurim; The firſt hiding the Teraphim with a modeſt ſeat, the ſecond, the ſpies with flaxe-ſtalkes, and the third Dauids ſcouts with corne ſpred ouer the Well; but theſe are nothing to the deuices that nature hath wont to vſe for the cloaking of ſinne; God made man vpright, ſaith Salomon, but he ſought many inuentions: Is Adam challenged for ſinne? Behold all on the ſudden it is paſſed from his hand, to Gods; The woman that thou gaueſt me: Is Saul challenged for a couetous and diſobedient remiſſeneſſe? the ſinne is ſtraight paſſed from the field to the Altar; I ſaued the fatteſt for a Sacrifice to the Lord thy God; So the one begins his ſinne in God, and the other ends it in him: Is Dauid bewitched with luſt to abuſe the Wife? the Husband muſt be ſent home drunke to hide it, or if not that, to his long home, in a pretended fauour of his valour: Is a griping Vſurer diſpoſed to put his money together to breed a monſter? hee hath a thouſand quirks to cozen both law and conſcience: Is a Simoniacall Patron diſpoſed to make a good match of his peoples ſoules? it ſhall be no bargaine, but a gift: hee hath a liuing to giue, but an horſe to ſell. And ſure I thinke in this wiſe age of the world, Vſurers and Simoniſts ſtriue who ſhall finde the wittieſt way to hell: What ſhould I ſpeake of the ſecret frauds in contracts, booties in matches, ſubornation of inſtruments, hiring of oathes, feeing of officers, equiuocations of anſwers, and ten thouſand other tricks that the heart of man hath deuiſed for the conueyances of ſin; in all which it too well approues it ſelfe incomparably deceitfull.

The falſe ſemblance of the heart is yet worſe; for the former is moſt-what for the ſmothering of euill; this is for the iuſtifying of euill, or the diſgrace of good; In theſe two doth this act of falſhood chiefly conſiſt; in making euill good, or good euill. For the firſt; The naturall man knowes well how filthy all his brood is, and therefore will not let them come forth, but diſguiſed with the colours and dreſſes of good; ſo as now euery one of natures birds is a Swan; Pride is handſomneſſe, deſperate fury, valour; lauiſhneſſe is noble munificence, drunkenneſſe ciuility, flattery complement, murderous reuenge, iuſtice; the Curtizan is bona fœmina, the Sorcerer a wiſe man, the oppreſſor a good husband; Abſolom will goe pay his vowes; Herod will worſhip the Babe.

For the ſecond ; ſuch is the enuy of nature, that where ſhee ſees a better face than her owne, ſhee is ready to ſcratch it, or caſt dirt in it ; and therefore knowing that all vertue hath a natiue beauty in it, ſhe labours to reforme it by the fouleſt imputations. Would the Iſraelites be deuout ? they are idle ; Doth Dauid daunce for ioy before the Arke ? he is a foole in a Morris: Doth Saint Paul diſcourſe of his heauenly Viſion ? too much learning hath made him mad. Doe the Diſciples miraculouſly ſpeake all the tongues of Babel? They are full of new wine : Doe they preach Chriſts Kingdome ? they are ſeditious ; The reſurrection ? they are bablers. Is a man conſcionable ? he is an Hypocrite : Is he conformable ? he is vnconſcionable : Is he plaine dealing ? he is rudely vnciuill : Is he wiſely inſinuatiue ? he is a flatterer : In ſhort, ſuch is the wicked craft of the heart, that it would let vs ſee nothing in it owne forme ; but faine would ſhew vs euill faire, that we might be inamored of it, and vertue vgly, that we might abhorre it ; and as it doth for the way, ſo doth it for the end ; hiding from vs the glory of heauen, that is laid vp for ouer-commers, and ſhewing vs nothing but the pleaſant cloſure of wickedneſſe ; making vs beleeue that hell is a palace, and heauen a dungeon, that ſo we might be in loue with death ; and thus both in cunning conueyance, and falſe ſemblance, The heart of man is deceitfull aboue all things.

2 Ye haue ſeene the faſhion of this deceit ; caſt now your eies vpon the ſubiect : And whom doth it then deceiue ? It doth deceiue others, it can deceiue it ſelfe, it would deceiue Satan, yea God himſelfe. Others, firſt: How many doe we take for honeſt and ſound Chriſtians, who yet are but errant hypocrites ? Theſe Apes of Satan haue learned to transforme themſelues into Angels of light ; The heart bids the eyes looke vpward to heauen, when they are full of Adultery ; It bids the hands to raiſe vp themſelues towards their Maker, when they are full of bloud ; It bids the tongue wagge holily, when there is nothing in the boſome but Atheous prophaneneſſe ; It bids the knee to bow like a Camell, when the heart is ſtiffe as an Elephant ; yea if need bee it can bid a teare fall from the eie, or an almes or iuſt action fall from the hand, and all to gull the world with a good opinion; In all which, falſe chapmen and horſe-courſers doe not more ordinarily deceiue their buyers in ſhops and faires, than wee doe one another in our conuerſation : Yea, ſo crafty is the heart, that it can deceiue it ſelfe ; By ouer-weening his owne powers, as the proud man ; by vnder-valuing his graces, as the modeſt ; by miſ-taking his eſtate, as the ignorant ; How many hearts doe thus groſſely beguile themſelues ? The firſt thinkes hee is rich, and fine, when hee is beggerly and naked ; ſo did the Angell of Laodicea : The ſecond is poore in his owne ſpirit, when hee is rich of Gods ſpirit : The third thinkes that hee is a great fauourite of heauen, when he is rather branded for an out-caſt ; that he is truly noble, when hee is a ſlaue to that, which is baſer than the worſt of Gods creatures, ſinne : Let the proud and ignorant worldling therefore know, that though others may mocke him with applauſes, yet that all the world cannot make him ſo much a foole as his owne heart.

1 Yea, ſo cunning is the heart, that it thinkes to goe beyond the deuill himſelfe : I can (thinks it) ſwallow his bait, and yet auoid his hooke ; I can ſinne, and liue ; I can repent of ſinning, and defeat my puniſhment by repenting ; I can runne vpon the ſcore, and take vp the ſweet and rich commodities of ſinfull pleaſure; and when I haue done, I can put my ſelfe vnder the protection of a Sauiour, and eſcape the arreſt ; Oh the world of ſoules that periſh by this fraud, fondly beguiling themſelues, whiles they would beguile the Tempter.

3 Yet higher : Laſtly, as Satan went about to deceiue the Sonne of God ; ſo this fooliſh conſort and client of his goes about to deceiue God himſelfe : The firſt paire of hearts that euer was, were thus credulous, to thinke they ſhould now meet with a meanes of knowledge and Deifying, which God either knew not of, or grudged them, and therefore they would bee ſtealing it out of the ſide of the apple, without God, yea againſt him : Tuſh, none eye ſhall ſee vs ; Is there knowledge in the moſt high, ſaith the ſottiſh Atheiſt ? Lord haue not wee heard thee preach in our ſtreets?

ſtreets? haue not we caſt out Deuils in thy name? ſayes the ſmoothing hypocrite; as if hee could fetch God ouer for an admiſſion into heauen. Thou haſt not lied to man, but to God, ſaith S. Peter to Ananias. And pettiſh Ionas, after he had beene cooled in the belly of the Whale, & the Sea, yet will be bearing God downe in an argument to the iuſtifying of his idle choler, I doe well to be angry to the death. But as the greateſt Politicians are oft ouertaken with the groſſeſt follies (God owes proud wits a ſhame) the heart of man could not poſſibly deuiſe how ſo much to befoole it ſelfe, as by this wicked preſumption: Oh yee fooles, when will ye vnderſtand? He that formed the eye, ſhall he not ſee? Hee that teacheth man knowledge, ſhall not hee vnderſtand? The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanitie. A rod for the backe of fooles, yea a rod of iron for ſuch preſumptuous fooles, to cruſh them in peeces like a Potters veſſell. Pſal. 94.10, 11.

Ye haue ſeene the faſhion and the ſubiect of this deceit: the ſequell, or effect followes; euery way lamentable; For hence it comes to paſſe that many a one hath had his heart in keeping forty, fifty, threeſcore yeeres, and more, and yet is not acquainted with it; and all becauſe this craft hath kept it at the Priſcillianiſts locke, Tu omnes, te nemo; It affects to be a ſearcher of all men, no man is allowed to come aboard of it; And if a man whether out of curioſitie, or conſcience, be deſirous to inquire into it (as it is a ſhame for a man to be a ſtranger at home; Know yee not your owne heart, ſaith the Apoſtle;) it caſts it ſelfe, Proteus-like, into ſo many formes, that it is very hard to apprehend it. One while the man hath no heart, (לא לב) ſaith Salomon; Then hee hath (לב ולב) an heart, and an heart, ſaith Dauid; and one of his hearts contradicts another; and then how knowes he whether to beleeue? And what certainty, what ſafety can it bee for a man to liue vnacquainted with himſelfe? Of this vnacquaintance, ſecondly, ariſes a dangerous meſpriſon of a mans ſelfe, in the nature and quantity of his ſinne, in the quality of his repentance, in his peace and intireneſſe with God, in his right to heauen, and (in a word) in his whole ſpirituall eſtate. Of this meſ-priſon, thirdly, ariſes a fearefull diſappointment of all his hopes, and a plunging into vnauoidable torments: Wherein it is miſerable to ſee, how cunningly the traiterous hearts of many men beare them in hand all their liues long; ſoothing them in all their courſes, promiſing them ſucceſſe in all their waies, ſecuring them from feare of euils, aſſuring them of the fauour of God & poſſeſſion of heauen (as ſome fond Bigot would bragge of his Bull, or Medall, or Agnus Dei; or as thoſe Prieſts that Gerſon * taxes, who made the people beleeue that the Maſſe was good for the eye-ſight, for the mawe, for bodily health, and preſeruation) till they come to their death-beds; But then when they come to call forth the comforts they muſt truſt to, they finde them like to ſome vnfaithfull Captaine, that hath all the while in Garriſon filled his purſe with dead payes; and made vp the number of his companies with borrowed men; and in time of eaſe ſhewed faire; but when hee is called forth by a ſudden alarum, bewraies his ſhame and weakneſſe, and failes his Generall when hee hath moſt need of him; right thus doe the perfidious hearts of many, after all the glorious bragges of their ſecurity, on the bed of their laſt reckoning, finde nothing but a cold deſpaire, and a wofull horror of conſcience; and therefore too iuſtly may their hearts ſay to them, as the heart of Appollodorus the Tyrant ſeemed to ſay vnto him; who dreamed one night that he was fleaed by the Scythians, and boyled in a Caldron; and that his heart ſpake to him out of the kettle (ἐγώ σοι τούτων αἰτία) It is I that haue drawne thee to all this. Certainly neuer man was, or ſhall be frying in hell, but cries out of his owne heart, and accuſes that deceitfull peece as guilty of all his torment: For let Satan be neuer ſo malicious, and all the world neuer ſo paraſiticall, yet if his owne heart had beene true to him, none of theſe could haue hurt him. Let the reſt of our enemies doe their worſt, onely from the euill of our owne hearts, good Lord deliuer vs.

Pſal. 12.

It were now time for our thoughts to dwell a little vpon the meditation, and deploration of our owne danger and miſery, who are euery way ſo inuironed with ſubtilty. If we looke at Satan, his old title is, that old Serpent; who muſt needs therefore now, by ſo long time and experience, bee both more old and more Serpent. If we looke at ſinne, it is as crafty as he ; Leſt any of you be hardened through the deceitfulneſſe of ſinne : If at our owne hearts, wee heare (that which wee may feele) that the heart is deceitfull aboue all things. Oh wretched men that we are, how are wee beſet with Impoſtors on all hands ; If it were more ſeaſonable for vs to bewaile our eſtate, than to ſeeke the redreſſe of it ; But ſince it is not ſo much worth our labour to know how deepe the pit is, into which we are fallen, as how to come out of it, heare rather (I beſeech you) for a concluſion, how wee may auoid the danger of the deceit of our falſe heart ; euen iuſt ſo as wee would preuent the nimble feats of ſome cheating Iugler ; Search him, watch him, Truſt him not.

* Qui publicè volunt dogmatizare ſeu prædicare populo, quod ſi quis audit miſſam in illo die non erit cæcus, nec morietur morte ſubitanea, nec carebit ſufficienti ſuſtentatione, &c.

Looke well into his hands, pockets, boxes, ſleeues ; yea, vnder his very tongue it ſelfe ; There is no fraud ſo ſecret, but may be deſcried ; were our hearts as crafty as the deuill himſelfe, they may be found out ; Wee are not ignorant (ſaith Saint Paul) of Satans deuices ; much more then may we know our owne ; Were the hearts of men (as Salomon ſpeakes of Kings) like vnto deepe waters, they haue a bottome, and may bee fathomed ; Were they as darke as hell it ſelfe, and neuer ſo full of windings, and blinde waies, and obſcure turnings, doe but take the lanthorne of Gods law in your hand, and you ſhall eaſily finde all the falſe and foule corners of them ; As Dauid ſaith of the Sun, nothing is hid from the light thereof ; Proue your ſelues, ſaith the Apoſtle ; It is hard if falſhood be ſo conſtant to it ſelfe that by many queſtions it be not tripped ; Where this duty is ſlackned, it is no wonder if the heart bee ouer-run with ſpirituall fraud ; Often priuy ſearches ſcarre away vagrant and diſorderly perſons ; where no inquiry is made, is a fit harbour for them ; If yee would not haue your hearts, therefore, become the lawleſſe Ordinaries of vncleane ſpirits, ſearch them oft ; Leaue not a ſtraw vnſhaken to finde out theſe Labaniſh Teraphim that are ſtollen, and hid within vs : And, when we haue ſearched our beſt, if we feare there are yet ſome vnknowne euils lurking within vs (as the man after Gods owne heart prayes againſt ſecret ſinnes) let vs call him in that cannot be deceiued ; and ſay to God with the Pſalmiſt, Search thou me, ô Lord, and trie mee ; Oh let vs yeeld our ſelues ouer to bee ranſackt by that all-ſeeing eye, and effectuall hand of the Almighty. All our daubing, and cogging, and packing, and ſhuffling lies open before him, and he onely can make the heart aſhamed of it ſelfe.

νοήματα αὐτοῦ.

And when our hearts are once ſtript naked, and carefully ſearcht, let our eyes be euer fixedly bent vpon their conueyances, and inclinations ; If we ſearch and watch not, we may be ſafe for the preſent, long we cannot ; for our eye is no ſooner off, than the heart is buſie in ſome practiſe of falſhood ; It is well if it forbeare whiles we looke on, for The thoughts of mans heart are only euill continually ; and many a heart is like ſome bold and cunning theefe, that lookes a man in the face, and cuts his purſe : But ſurely, if there be any guardian of the ſoule, it is the eye ; The wiſe mans eye (ſaith Salomon) is in his head ; doubtleſſe, on purpoſe to looke into his heart : My ſonne, aboue all keepings keepe thy heart, ſaith he ; If we doe not dogge our hearts then in all our wayes, but ſuffer our ſelues to loſe the ſight of them, they run wilde, and we ſhall not recouer them till after many ſlippery tricks on their parts, and much repentance on ours. Alas, how little is this regarded in the world ? wherein the moſt take no keepe of their ſoules, but ſuffer themſelues to run after the wayes of their owne hearts, without obſeruation, without controlement ; What ſhould I ſay of theſe men, but that they would faine be deceiued, and periſh ? For after this looſe licentiouſneſſe (without the great mercy of God) they neuer ſet eye more vpon their hearts, till they ſee them either fearefully intoyled in the preſent iudgments of God, or faſt chained in the pit of hell, in the torments of finall condemnation.

Thirdly, if our ſearches and watches ſhould faile vs, we are ſure our diſtruſt cannot ; It is not poſſible our heart ſhould deceiue vs, if we truſt it not ; Wee carry a remedie within vs of others fraud ; and why not of our owne ? The Italians not vnwiſely pray God (in their knowne prouerbe) to deliuer them from whom they truſt ; for we are obnoxious to thoſe we relie vpon, but nothing can leeſe that which it had not ; Diſtruſt therefore can neuer be diſappointed : If our hearts then ſhall promiſe vs ought (as it hath learned to proſer largely, of him that ſaid, All theſe will I giue thee) although with vowes and oathes, aske for his aſſurances; if he cannot fetch them from the euidences of God, truſt him not: If he ſhall report ought to vs, aske for his witneſſes; if hee cannot produce them from the records of God, truſt him not: If he ſhall aduiſe vs ought, aske for his warrant; if he cannot fetch it from the Oracles of God, truſt him not; And in all things ſo beare our ſelues to our heart, as thoſe that thinke they liue amongſt theeues and cozeners; euer iealouſly and ſuſpiciouſly; taking nothing of their word, ſcarce daring to truſt our owne ſenſes; making ſure worke in all matters of their tranſactions. I know I ſpeake to wiſe men, whoſe counſell is wont to be asked, and followed, in matter of the aſſurances of eſtates; whoſe wiſdome is frequently imployed in the triall, euiction, dooming of malefactors: Alas, what ſhall it auaile you that you can aduiſe for the preuention of others fraud, if in the meane time you ſuffer your ſelues to be cozened at home? What comfort can you finde in publike ſeruice to the ſtate againſt offenders, if you ſhould carry a fraudulent and wicked heart in your owne boſomes? There is one aboue whom we may truſt, whoſe word is more firme than heauen; When heauen ſhall paſſe, that ſhall ſtand; It is no truſting ought beſides, any further than he giues his word for it. Mans Epithet is Homo mendax, and his beſt part, the hearts, deceitfull. Alas, what ſhall we thinke, or ſay of the condition of thoſe men, which neuer follow any other aduice than what they take of their owne heart? Such are the moſt; that make not Gods Law of their counſell; As Eſay ſaid of Iſrael, Abijt vagus in via cordis ſui: Eſa.57.17. Surely they are not more ſure they haue an heart, than that they ſhall be deceiued with it, and betraied vnto death; Of them may I ſay, as Salomon doth of the wanton foole, that followes an harlot; Thus with her great craft ſhe cauſed him to yeeld, and with her flattering lips ſhe intiſed him: Pro.7.21. And he followed her ſtraight waies, as an oxe that goes to the ſlaughter, or as a foole to the ſtocks for correction. Oh then, deare Chriſtians, as euer yee deſire to auoid that direfull ſlaughter-houſe of hell, thoſe wailings, and gnaſhings, and gnawings, and euerlaſting burnings, looke carefully to your owne hearts; and what euer ſuggeſtions they ſhall make vnto you, truſt them not, till you haue tried them by that vnfaileable rule of righteouſneſſe, the royall law of your Maker, which can no more deceiue you than your hearts can free you from deceit.

Laſtly, that wee may auoid not onely the euents, but the very enterpriſes of this deceit, let vs countermine the ſubtill workings of the heart. Our Sauiour hath bidden vs be wiſe as Serpents; What ſhould be wiſe but the heart? And can the heart be wiſer than it ſelfe? Can the wiſedome of the heart remedie the craft of the heart? Certainly it may. There are two men in euery regenerate breſt, the old and the new; And of theſe (as they are euer plotting againſt each other) wee muſt take the better ſide, and labour that the new man, by being more wiſe in God, may out-ſtrip the old: And how ſhall that be done? If we would diſpoſſeſſe the ſtrong man that keepes the houſe, our Sauiour bids vs bring in a ſtronger than hee; and if we would ouer-reach the ſubtiltie of the old man, yea, the old Serpent, bring in a wiſer than he, euen the Spirit of God, the God of wiſdome; If we would haue Achitophels wicked counſels croſſed, ſet vp an Huſhai within vs: The fooliſhneſſe of God is wiſer than the wiſdome of men. Could we but ſettle God within vs, our craftie hearts would be out of countenance, and durſt not offer to play any of their deluding tricks before him from whom nothing is hid; and if they could be ſo impudently preſumptuous, yet they ſhould be ſo ſoone controlled in their firſt motions, that there would be more danger of their confuſion, than of our deceit. As ye loue your ſelues therefore, and your owne ſafetie, and would be free from the perill of this ſecret broaker of Satan, your owne hearts, render them obediently into the hands of God; giue him the keyes of theſe cloſets, of his owne making; beſeech him that he will vouchſafe to dwell and reigne in them; ſo ſhall we be ſure that neither Satan ſhall deceiue them, nor they deceiue vs; but both we and they ſhall be kept ſafe and inuiolable, and preſented glorious to the appearance of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt: To whom with the Father, and the holy Ghoſt, be all honour and glory, for euer and euer. Amen.

FINIS.

hath learned to profeſſe largely, of him that ſaid, [illegible]) although with vowes and oathes, aske for his aſſurances; if he cannot fetch them from the evidences of God, truſt him not: If he ſhall report ought to vs, aske for his warrant; if he cannot produce them from the records of God, truſt him not: If he ſhall teach vs ought, aske for his warrant; if he cannot fetch it from the Oracles of God, [illegible] and in all things ſo beare our ſelues to our tempter, as they that thinke they [illegible] and cozeners; [illegible] and ſuſpiciouſly; taking nothing of their word, ſcarce daring to truſt our owne ſenſes; making [illegible] of their meanes. I know I ſpeake to wiſe men, whoſe counſell is wont to be aſked, and [illegible] in matter of the aſſurances of [illegible]: whoſe [illegible] caution, deeming it maleſaction? Alas, what ſhall it [illegible] for the preuention of others [illegible] in the meane time you [illegible] cozened at home? What comfort can you [illegible] in the [illegible], if you ſhould carry a [illegible] and [illegible] of heart in your owne [illegible]? There is one aboue whom we may truſt, whoſe words [illegible] heauen, heauen ſhall paſſe, that ſhall ſtand; Yet [illegible] further than he giues his word for it. Mans ſpeeches is [illegible]. Alas, what ſhall we thinke or ſay of the condition of [illegible], which [illegible] follow any other aduice than what they [illegible]? Such are they [illegible] not Gods [illegible] of their counſell, [illegible] Surely they are [illegible] more ſure they [illegible], than that they ſhall be [illegible] with it, and be [illegible] vnto death. Of [illegible] that followes an harlot, [illegible] [illegible] or as a foole to the ſtockes for correction. O then, dearely beloued, as you [illegible] to auoid this [illegible] and guiltineſſe and [illegible], and [illegible], looke carefully to your owne hearts; [illegible] ſuggeſtions they ſhall make vnto you, truſt them not till you haue [illegible] them by that [illegible] rule of righteouſneſſe, the royall law of your Maker; [illegible] can ſo moſt deceiue you than your hearts can free you from deceit.

Laſtly, that we may auoid not onely the enemie, but the very [illegible] of this deceit, let vs [illegible] the ſubtill workings of the heart. Our Sauiour hath bidden vs be wiſe as Serpents; what ſhould he [illegible] but the heart? And [illegible]? Can the wiſedome of the heart [illegible] the craft of the [illegible]? There are two men in euery regenerate [illegible] the old man [illegible] as they are euer plotting againſt each other; [illegible] that the new man, [illegible] more wiſe [illegible] hath done? [illegible] diſpoſſeſſe the ſtrong man [illegible] bids vs bring in a ſtronger than hee; ſo if we would [illegible] man, yea, the old Serpent, bring in a wiſer than he, euen the [illegible] wiſdome; If we would haue [illegible] in vs: The fooliſhneſſe of God is wiſer than the wiſdome of men. [illegible] God within vs, our craftie hearts would be [illegible] of their [illegible] tricks before him from whom [illegible] hid: and if they could be ſo impudently preſumptuous, yet they ſhould [illegible] controlled in their [illegible], that there would be more danger of [illegible] of our [illegible]. Acquaint your ſelues therefore, and [illegible] your owne [illegible] free from [illegible] this ſecret broker of Satan, your owne heart [illegible] hand of God; giue him the keyes of thoſe [illegible]; beſeech him that he will vouchſafe to dwell and reigne [illegible]: ſo ſhall we [illegible] ſhall deceiue them, nor they deceiue vs; but [illegible] ſhall be [illegible], and proteſted glorious [illegible] our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; [illegible] the Father, and the holy Ghoſt, be all honour [illegible]

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

Let it pleaſe you to receiue from the Preſſe what you vouchſafed to require from my pen: Vnworthy I confeſſe either of the publike light, or the beames of your Honours iudicious eies; yet ſuch as (beſides the motiue of common importunity) I eaſily apprehended, might bee not a little vſefull for the times; which, if euer, require quickning: Neither is it to no purpoſe that the world ſhould ſee in what ſtile we ſpeake to the Court, not without acceptation. This, and what euer ſeruice I may be capable of, are iuſtly deuoted to your Lordſhip, whom all good hearts follow with true Honour, as the great Patron of learning, the ſincere friend of Religion, and rich purchaſer of Truth. The God of Heauen adde to the number of ſuch Peeres, and to the meaſure of your Lo: graces and happineſſe.

Your Honours in all humble and faithfull obſeruance,

The Beſt Bargaine.

Pro. 23. 23. Buy the Truth, and ſell it not.

THe ſubiect of my Text is a Bargaine, and Sale. A Bargaine enioyned, a ſale forbidden: and the ſubiect of both bargaine and ſale, is Truth; A bargaine able to make vs all rich; a ſale able to make any of vs miſerable; Buy the Truth, and ſell it not; A ſentence of ſhort ſound, but large extent; the words are but ſeuen ſyllables, an eaſie load for our memories; the matter is a world of worke; a long taske for our liues. And firſt, let me call you to this Mart, which holds both now, and euer; If yee loue your ſelues, be ye cuſtomers at this ſhop of heauen; Buy the Truth.

In euery bargaine there is merx, and mercatura; the commoditie, and the match; The commoditie to be bought is the Truth; The match made for this commodity, is Buying, Buy the Truth. An ill Iudge may put a good Interrogatory; yet it was a queſtion too good for the mouth of a Pilate, What is Truth? The ſchooles haue wearied themſelues in the ſolution; To what purpoſe ſhould I reade a Metaphyſicall Lecture to Courtiers? Truth is as Time, one in all; yet, as Time, though but one, is diſtinguiſhed into paſt, preſent, future, and euery thing hath a Time of it owne; ſo is Truth variouſly diſtinguiſhed, according to the ſubiects wherein it is; This is Anſelmes, cited by Aquinas; I had rather ſay, Truth is as light: (Send forth thy Truth, and thy light, ſaith the Pſalmiſt) which (though but one in all) yet there is one light of the Sunne, another of the Moone, another of the Starres, another of this lower aire: There is an eſſentiall, and cauſall Truth in the Diuine vnderſtanding, which the Schooles call Primo-primam; This will not be ſold, cannot be bought; God will not part with it, the world is not worth it; This Truth is as the Light in the body of the Sunne. There is an intrinſecall or formall truth in things truly exiſting; For, Being and True are conuertible; and Saint Auſten rightly defines, Verum eſt illud quod eſt; All this created Truth in things, is deriued exemplarily, and cauſally, from that increated Truth of God; this the ſchooles call Secundo-primam; and it is as the light of the Sun-beames, caſt vpon the Moone, and Starres. There is an extrinſecall, or ſecondary truth of propoſitions following vpon, and conformable to the truth of the things expreſſed: thus, Verum is no other than Eſſe declaratiuum, as Hilarie; And this Truth, being the thing it ſelfe ſubiectiuely, in words expreſſiuely, in the minde of man terminatiuely, preſuppoſeth a double conformitie or adequation; Both of the vnderſtanding to the matter conceiued; and of the words to the vnderſtanding; ſo as Truth is when we ſpeake as we thinke, and thinke as it is; And this Truth is as the light diffuſed from thoſe heauenly bodies, to the Region of this lower aire; This is the Truth we are called to Buy; But this deriuatiue and relatiue Truth, whether in the minde, or in the mouth, hath much multiplicitie, according to the matter either conceiued, or vttered; There is a Theologicall Truth, there is a naturall, there is a morall, there is a ciuill; all theſe muſt bee deare bought; but the beſt at the higheſt rate, which is Theologicall, or diuine; whether in the principles, or neceſſary concluſions; The principles of diuine Truth are Scriptura veritatis, Dan. 10. The Law of Truth, Mal. 2. The Word of Truth, 2 Cor. 6. The neceſſary concluſions are they, which vpon irrefragable inferences are deduced from thoſe holy grounds: Shortly then, euery parcell of Diuine Truth, whether laid downe in Scripture, or drawne neceſſarily from Scripture, is this Mercimonium ſacrum, which we are bidden to Buy; Buy the Truth.

This is the commodity; The match is, Buy; that is, Beat the price, and pay it. Buy it; Of whom? For what? Of whom, but of the owner, of the Maker?

Hall, J.

The owner; It is Veritas Domini, Gods Truth, Pſ.117. His ſtile is the Lord God of Truth, Pſal.31. The maker; The works of his hands are truth, and iudgment, Pſal.111. And if any vſurping ſpirit of error ſhall haue made a free-bootie of Truth, and ſhall with-hold it in vnrighteouſneſſe, we muſt redeeme it out of his hands with the higheſt ranſome.

What is the price? That is the maine thing in buying; For, Buying is no other than pacto pretij: Elſe-where God proclaimes; Hoe, euery one that thirſteth, come, buy wine and milke without mony, and without price, Eſay 55. This is a Donation in forme of ſale: But, here muſt be a price in the hand; God will giue mercy, and not ſell it; He will ſell Truth, and not giue it: For what will he ſell it? Firſt, for Labour; The Heathen Poet could ſay, his gods ſold learning for ſweat; The originall word here vſed is (קנה) Compara; Get it any way, either labore, or pretio; yea labore vt pretio. This great foreman of Gods ſhop tels vs we cannot haue it vnder, *Pro.*24. We muſt ſeeke for her as ſiluer, and ſearch for her, as for hid Treaſures; The veine of Truth lies low, it muſt bee digged and delued for to the very center. If Truth could be bought with eaſe and pleaſure, many a lazie Chriſtian would bid faire for it, who now reſolue rather vpon want, than toile. The ſlothfull worldling will rather take vp a falſhood for Truth, than beat his braine to diſcerne Truth from falſhood; an error of free-coſt is better than an high-rated Veritie; Labour for Truth is turn'd ouer for the taske of Church-men; no life ſauours to theſe flegmaticke Spirits, but that of the Lilies, Neque laborant, neque nent; They neither labour nor ſpin; This dull reſolution is vnworthy of a Chriſtian, yea of a reaſonable ſoule; and if we ſhould take vp no other for the body, wee ſhould be fed with hunger, and cloathed with nakedneſſe; the earth ſhould be our feather-bed, and the skie our Canopie; wee ſhould abound with want, liue ſauagely, and die miſerably. It was the iuſt Canon of the Apoſtle, He that labours not, let him not eat; Certainly, hee can neuer eat of the heauenly Manna of Truth, that will not ſtep forth to gather it: Heare this ye delicate Courtiers, that would heare a Sermon if yee could riſe out of your beds; that would lend God an houre, if yee could ſpare it from your pleaſures; the God of heauen ſcornes to haue his precious Truth ſo baſely vnder-valued; if yee bid God leſſe than labour for Truth, I can giue you no comfort, but that ye may goe to hell with eaſe.

The markets of Truth, as of all other commodities, varie: It is the rule of Caſuiſts; Iuſtitia pretij non conſiſtit in indiuiduo; The Iuſtice of the price doth not pitch euer vpon a point; Sometimes the price of Truth hath riſen, it would not be bought but for danger; ſometimes, not vnder loſſe, not vnder diſgrace, not vnder impriſonment, not vnder exile; ſometimes yet dearer, not vnder paine; yea ſometimes it hath not gone for leſſe than bloud. It did coſt Elias danger, Michaiah diſgrace, Ieremie impriſonment, the Diſciples loſſe, Iohn and Athanaſius exile, the holy Confeſſors paine, the holy Martyrs death; Euen the higheſt of theſe is pretium legitimum, if God call for it, how euer nature may tax it as rigorous, yea ſuch as the franke hearts of faithfull Chriſtians haue bidden at the firſt word for Truth; What doe ye weeping, and breaking my heart; For I am ready not to be bound only, but to die for the name of the Lord Ieſus, ſaith S. Paul, Act.21. Skin for skin, yea all that a man hath will he giue for his life, ſaith Satan, but skin, and life, and all, muſt a man giue for Truth, and not thinke it an hard penni-worth; Neither count I my life deare vnto me that I may finiſh my courſe with ioy; ſaith the choſen veſſell, to his Epheſians. Oh the heroicall ſpirits of our bleſſed fore-fathers, that ſtucke not to giue their deareſt heart-bloud for but ſome corollaries of ſacred Truth; whoſe burning zeale to Truth conſumed them before thoſe fires of Martyrdome, and ſent vp their pure and glorious ſoules, like Manoahs Angell, to heauen, in the flame. Bleſſed be God; Bleſſed bee his Anointed, vnder whoſe gracious Scepter we haue enioyed dayes as much more happy than theirs, as their hearts were more feruent than ours: We may now buy Truth at a better hand; ſtake but our labour, wee carry it with thanks; I feare there want not thoſe that would be glad to marre the market; It can bee onely knowne to heauen what treacheries the malice of hell may be a brewing. Had but that Powder once taken, nothing had beene abated of the higheſt price of our predeceſſors; we had paid for euery dram of Truth, as many ounces of bloud, as euer it coſt the frankeſt Martyr; ſhould the Deuill haue beene ſuffered to doe his worſt, wee might not haue grudged at this price of Truth, Non eſt delicata in Deum, & ſecura confeßio; qui in me credit, debet ſuum ſanguinem fundere, ſaith Ierome. Chriſtian profeſſion is no ſecure or delicate matter, hee that beleeues muſt be no niggard of his bloud. But why thus deare? Not without good reaſon: Monopolies vſe to enhance the price.: Yee can buy Truth at no ſhop but one, In cœlo præparata eſt Veritas tua, Pſal.89.2. Thy truth is prepared in heauen. And it is a iuſt Rule of Law, Quiſque in rebus ſuis eſt moderator, & arbiter: Euery man may rate his owne: Neither is this only the ſole commodity of God, but beſides, deare to the owner. Dilexiſti veritatem; Thou haſt loued Truth, ſaith the Pſalmiſt. And it is a true rule in the Caſes of Commerce, Affectus æſtimari poteſt, Our loue may be valued in the price. Yea, O God, thy loue to Truth cannot be valued; It is thy ſelfe, thou that art Truth it ſelfe haſt ſaid ſo, I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life; Wee cannot therefore know how much thou loueſt thy Truth, becauſe as thy ſelfe is infinite, ſo is thy loue to thy ſelfe: What ſhould wee hunt for compariſons? If all the earth were gold, what were it? when euen very heauen it ſelfe is traſh to thee in reſpect of Truth: No maruell if thou ſet it at an high rate; it is not more precious to thee, than beneficiall to vs. It frees vs, Iohn 8.32. It renues vs, Iames 1.18. It confirmes vs, Prou. 12.19. It ſanctifies vs, Iohn 17.17. It defends vs, Pſal. 91.4. Shortly, it doth all for vs that God doth; for God works by his Almighty word, and his Word is Truth, Iohn 17. Therefore buy the Truth. And if truth be thus precious, thus beneficiall; how comes it to paſſe that it is neglected, contemned? Some paſſe by it, and doe not ſo much as cheapen it; Others cheapen it, but bid nothing; Others bid ſomething, but vnder-foot; Others bid well, but ſtake it not; Others laſtly ſtake downe, but reuoke it. The firſt that paſſe by and cheapen it not, are careleſſe vnbeleeuers; The next that cheapen it, and bid nothing, are formall Chriſtians; The third that bid ſomething but not enough, are worldly ſemi-Chriſtians; The fourth that bid well and ſtake it not, are glorious hypocrites; The laſt that ſtake downe and reuoke it, are damnable Apoſtates. Take all theſe out of the ſociety of men; and how many cuſtomers hath God that care to buy the Truth? If Truth were ſome rich chattell, it would be bought; If Truth were ſome goodly Lordſhip, or the reuerſion of ſome good Office, it would be bought; If Truth were ſome Benefice, or ſpiritual promotion (Oh time!) it would be bought; Yea, how deare are we content to pay for our filthy luſts; wee will needs purchaſe them (too oft) with ſhame, beggery, diſeaſe, damnation; only the ſauing Truth of God will not off hand. What is the reaſon of this? Firſt of all; It is but bare, ſimple, plaine, honeſt, homely Truth, without welt, without guard; It will abide none but natiue colours, it ſcorneth to wooe fauour with farding, and licking, and counterfeiſance; it hates either bought, or borrowed beauty; and therefore like ſome natiue face among the painted, lookes courſe, and ruſty. There are two ſhops that get away all the cuſtome from Truth, The ſhop of Vanity, the ſhop of Error; The one ſels knacks and gew-gawes, the other falſe wares, and adulterate; both of their commodities are ſo gilded, and gaudy, and glittering, that all fooles throng thither, and complaine to want elbow-roome, and ſtriue who ſhall bee firſt ſerued; Whereas the ſecret worke of artleſſe and vnpoliſht Truth can winne no eie to view it, no tongue to aske ſo much, as, What will it coſt me? Oh yee ſonnes of men, how long will yee loue vanity, and ſeeke after lies?

Secondly, though Truth in it ſelfe bee alwaies excellent, yet the iſſue of it is not ſeldome diſtaſtefull; Veritas odium: There is one Michaiah whom I hate: Am I become your enemie, becauſe I tell you the truth? And this is the cauſe that Frier Menot alleages, why Truth in his Time was ſo vnwelcome to the court. But if truth be the mother of Hatred, ſhee is the daughter of Time, and Truth hath learn't this of Time, to deuoure her owne brood; So that in Time, Truth ſhall conſume hatred; and at the laſt, a galling Truth ſhall haue more thanks, than a ſmoothing ſuppariſitation. In the meane time, Veritas nihil erubeſcit præterquam abſcondi; Truth bluſheth at nothing but ſecrecy, as Tertul.

How euer then fond, or falſe hearts value the Truth, let vs, that ſhould be wiſe Chriſtians, eſteeme it as the pearle hid in the field, which the man ſold all that euer hee had to purchaſe. Would it not ſet any heart on fire with an holy anger, to ſee what the enemies of Truth bid, and giue for falſhood, for faction ? Their liberty, their country, the life of their Soueraigne, the eternall ſtate of their ſoules hath not ſeemed too deare to caſt away vpon an ill bargaine of miſ-religion; and ſhall not we bid ſo much as our zealous well-wiſhes, our effectuall endeuours, our carefull obſeruances for the vndoubted truth of our Maker and Redeemer ? What ſhall I ſay to the miſerable and ſtupid carelesneſſe of theſe thriftleſſe and godleſſe times ; wherein euery thing is appriſed, euery thing is bought, ſaue that which is moſt precious, moſt beneficiall, Truth. Yee great ones are made for precedents to the inferiour world ; your example is able to bring either good or euill into faſhion ; For Gods ſake, for your ſoules ſake, what euer tranſactions yee make for the world, lay your plots for the bleſſed purchaſe of Truth; Oh let not your fickle honours, your vnſatisfying pleaſures, your worthleſſe profits, yea your momentany liues ſeeme deare to you in compariſon of heauenly Truth. It is no ſhame in other parts for great Peeres to be Merchants ; Mereatores tui erant principes, ſaith the Angell concerning Babylon, Reuel. 18. Thy Merchants were the Princes of the earth ; And why ſhould not yee great ones be the Merchants of Truth ? Bleſſed be the God of Truth, ye are ſo. It is no proud word to ſay, that no Court vnder heauen hath ſo rich a ſtocke of Truth, as this of Great Britaine, yet let me tell you, the very Angels knew not ſo much, but they deſired to know more, Epheſ. 3. 10. And if yee had already that veſpertine knowledge of the Saints which ye ſhall once haue in heauen, yet know that this Bargaine ſtands not more in the iudgement, than in the affections. What euer our ſpeculations may be, if our hearts be not ſet vpon Truth, we may be Brokers, we are not Merchants; Brokers for others, not Merchants for our ſelues. As our Sauiour then, when hee bids vs ſell all, forſake all, holds it done, when in preparation of minde we are ready to abdicate all for his name, though wee doe it not, ſo doth God hold vs to buy Truth, when we beſtow our beſt thoughts, our deareſt well-wiſhes vpon it, though we haue it already. Oh ſtirre vp your languiſhing zeale, ye noble Courtiers, rouze vp your drouping loue to diuine Truth ; Giue your hearts to it, yee cannot but giue all for it ; And if yee doe not finde the ſweet gaine of this Bargaine, in this lower Region of error, and confuſion, ye ſhall once finde it in thoſe eternall and empireall habitations of Truth, where the God of Truth ſhall make vp the Truth of his promiſes, with the euerlaſting truth of his glorious performances; where Mercy and Truth ſhall ſo meet, and embrace one another, that both of them ſhall embrace the faithfull ſoule, for euer and euer.

This for the Bargaine of Truth; The forbidden ſale followeth; ſell it not. Commonly what we buy, we may ſell. Alexander, not the Great, but the good, ſold Miters, Keyes, Altars ; the verſe giues the reaſon; Emerat ille prius, He bought them. So Saint Auſten of Simon Magus, Volebat emere ſpiritum Sanctum, quia vendere volebat ſpiritum Sanctum ; Hee would buy the Holy Ghoſt, becauſe he meant to ſell it. Giue me a man that buyes a Seat of Iudicature; I dare not truſt him for not ſelling of Iuſtice; he that ſits in the chaire of Symony, will not giue Orders, will not ſticke to ſell ſoules. Some things we may buy to ſell, as Ioſeph did the Egyptian corne, ſome things we muſt ſell, if we buy, as an Iſraelites inheritance, Leu. 25. But here we are charged to buy what it is a ſin to ſell ; Buy the Truth and ſell it not; There is many a good thing ill ſold ; Eſau ſels his birthright for pottage, Hanun and Shechem ſell their Country for loue, Dalilah ſels her louer for a bribe; The Patriarchs ſell their Brother for twenty ſiluer rings ; Haman ſels the Iewes for nought. The Gentiles ſell the Iewiſh girles for wine, Ioel. 3.3. Iſrael ſels the righteous for ſiluer, and the poore for ſhooes, Amos 2.6. Their Iudges ſell ſins or innocency for rewards, Eſay 5.23. Ahab ſels himſelfe to wickedneſſe; Iudas ſels his maſter ; Demas ſels the Truth ; All theſe make an ill market; And in all it is a ſure rule, the better the commodity is, the more pernicious is the ſale. The indefiniteneſſe of the charge implies a generality. Buy it at any price ; At no price ſell it. It is the fauour of God, that it may be bought for any rate; It is the Iuſtice of God, that vpon any rate it ſhould not be ſold: As buying and ſelling are oppoſites in relation ; So that for which we muſt not ſell Truth is oppoſite to that for which we may buy it. Wee muſt buy it with labour, therefore we may not ſell it for eaſe; If need be we muſt buy it with loſſe, therefore wee may not ſell it for gaine; we muſt buy it with diſgrace, we may not ſell it for honour; we muſt buy it with exile or impriſonment, we may not ſell it for liberty; we muſt buy it with paine, we may not ſell it for pleaſure; We muſt buy it with death, we may not ſell it for life; Not for any, not for all of theſe may we ſell Truth; this were damnoſa mercatio, as Chryſ. In euery bargaine & ſale there muſt be a proportion; now eaſe, gaine, honour, liberty, pleaſure, life, yea worlds of all theſe are no way counteruailable to Truth; For what ſhall it profit a man to win the whole world and leeſe his owne ſoule? And he cannot ſell Truth, but his ſoule is loſt: And if any thing in the world may ſeeme a due price of Truth, it is Peace. Oh ſweet and deare name of Peace, the good newes of Angels, the ioy of good men! who can but affect thee, who can but magnifie thee? The God of heauen before whom I ſtand, from whom I ſpeake, knows how oft, how deeply I haue mourned for the diuiſions of his Church, how earneſtly I haue ſet my hand on worke vpon ſuch poore thoughts of re-vnion, as my meanneſſe could reach; but when all is done, I ſtill found we may not offer to ſell Truth for Peace. It is true that there be ſome Scholaſticall and immateriall Truths (the infinite ſubdiuiſion whereof haue rather troubled than informed Chriſtendome) which for the purchaſe of peace might be kept in, and returned into ſuch ſafe generalities as minds not vnreaſonable might reſt in; but ſold out they may not be; If ſome Truths may be contracted into a narrower roome, none may be contracted for; Qui diuinis innutriti ſunt eloquijs, as that Father ſaid; Thoſe that are trained vp in diuine truths may not change a ſyllable for a world. Tene quod habes, Hold that thou haſt, is a good rule in all things; which if in temporalities it were well obſerued, we ſhould not haue ſo many gallants ſquander away their inheritances to liue Cameleon-like vpon the aire of fauour; But how euer this bee too well obſerued in theſe earthly things by frugall hands, which take as if they were quicke, hold as if they were dead: yet in ſpiritual graces it can neuer be obſerued enough; we get Truth, we buy it as Iacob did his birth-right, to keepe, to enioy, not to ſell againe: If therefore the world, if Satan ſhall offer to greaſe vs in the fiſt for truth, let vs anſwer him as Simon Peter did Simon the Sorcerer, Thy mony periſh with thee, becauſe thou haſt thought the Truth of God may be purchaſed with mony.

What ſhall wee ſay then to thoſe pedling petty-chapmen which wee meet withall in euery market, that will be bartring away the truth of God for trifles? Surely the forme of our ſpirituall market is contrary to the ciuill; In our ciuill markets there are more buyers than ſellers; there would be but poore takings, if many did not buy of one; but in the ſpirituall, there are more Sellers of Truth than Buyers.

Many a one ſels that he neuer had, that he ſhould haue had, the Truth of God; Here one chops away the Truth for Feare or ambition; There another lets it go for the old ſhooes of a Gebeonitiſh pretence of Antiquity; Here one parts with it for a painted, gilded hobby-horſe of an outwardly pompous magnificence of the Church; there another for the bables of childiſh ſuperſtition; One for the fancies of hope, another for the breath of a colloguing Impoſtor; Amongſt them all, Diminutæ ſunt veritates à filijs hominum, Pſ. 12. Truth is failed from the children of men; Yea as Eſay complained in his time, Corruit in platea veritas, Eſa. 59. 14. Truth is fallen in the ſtreets. What a ſhame it is to ſee, that in this cleare and glorious Sun-ſhine of the Goſpell, vnder the pious gouernment of the true Defender of the Faith, there ſhould not want ſome ſoules that ſhould trucke for the truth of God, as if it were ſome Cheap-ſide, or ſome Smithfield-Commoditie? Commutauerunt veritatem Dei; They haue changed the Truth of God into a lie, Rom. 1. 25. And all their care is, that they may be deceiued good cheap. Whoſe heart cannot bleed to ſee ſo many well rigg'd and hopefull Barkes of our young Gentry, laden with the moſt precious merchandizes of Nature and Grace, hal'd in euery day to theſe deceitfull Ports of Error, the owners partly cheated, partly robbed of Truth, deſpoiled of their rich fraight, and at laſt turn'd ouer-boord into a ſea of Deſperation? Oh fooliſh Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye ſhould not obey, that ye ſhould not hold faſt the Truth; Where ſhall I lay the fault of this miſcariage? Me thinkes I could aske the Diſciples queſtion, Nunquid ego Domine, Is it we Lord? Are there of vs that preach our ſelues and not Chriſt? Are there that preach Chriſt, and liue him not? Woe to the world becauſe of offences. It muſt needs be that offences ſhould come, but woe to the man by whom the offence commeth: God forbid that we ſhould be ſo bad that the ſeuen hils ſhould not iuſtifie vs; But what euer we be, the Truth is ſtill, and euer it ſelfe, neither the better for our innocence, nor worſe for our guilt. If men be faulty, what hath Truth offended? Except the ſacred word of the Euer-liuing God can miſ-guide you, we haue ſet you right. We are but Duſt and Aſhes, yet, O God, giue vs thine humble vaſſals leaue in an awfull confidence ſo far to conteſt with thee, the Lord of heauen and earth, as to ſay, If we be deceiued, thou haſt deceiued vs. It is thou that haſt ſpoken by vs to thy people; Let God be true, and euery man a Lier; Whither ſhould we goe from thee? Thou haſt the words of eternall life. Deare Chriſtians, our fore-fathers tranſmitted to vs the intire inheritance of the glorious Goſpel of Ieſus Chriſt, repurchaſed by the bloud of their martyrdome; Oh let not our ill husbandry impaire it; Let not poſteritie once ſay, they might haue beene happy, but for the vnthriftineſſe of vs their progenitors; Let it not be ſaid, that the coldneſſe of vs the Teachers, and profeſſors of Truth, hath dealt with Religion as Rehoboham did with his ſhields, which he found of Gold, but left of Braſſe. If Truth had no friends, wee ſhould plead for it; but now that we haue before our eyes ſo powerfull an Ὑπερασπιστὴν of Chriſtian faith, that with his very pen hath ſo laid error vpon the backe, that all the world cannot raiſe it; what a ſhame were it to be wanting to him, to Truth, to our ſelues? But perhaps now I know ſome of your thoughts; you would buy Truth (ye thinke) you would hold it, if ye could be ſure to know it; There are many ſlips amongſt the true coyne; Either of the mothers pleaded the liuing childe to be hers, with equall proteſtations, oaths, teares. True, yet a Salomons ſword can diuide Truth from falſhood; and there is a teſt, and fire that can diſcerne true metals from adulterate; In ſpight of all counterfeiting there are certaine infallible marks, to know Truth from Error; Take but a few of many; whether in the originals, in the natures, in the ends of both. In the firſt, Truth is diuine, Error is humane; what is grounded vpon the diuine word muſt needs be irrefragably true; that which vpon humane Traditions, either muſt, or may be erroneous. In the ſecond, Truth is one conforme euer to it ſelfe, ἀλήθεια συναληθεύει, as one ſaid; Omne verum omni vero conſonat, All Truth accords with euery Truth, as Gerſon; and as it is pure, ſo peaceable; Error is full of diſſonance, of cruelty: No particulars of ours diſſent from the written verity of God; We teach no man to equiuocate; Our practiſe is not bloudy with treaſons & maſſacres. In the third, Truth, as it came from God, ſo is referd to him; neither hath any other end than the glory of the God of Truth; Error hath euer ſome ſelfe-reſpects; either αἰσχροκέρδειαν, or κενοδοξίαν, filthy lucre, or vaine-glory; profit, or pride; We doe not pranke vp nature; we aime not, either to fill the cofers, or feed the ambition of men; Let your Wiſdomes apply and inferre, and now (if ye can) ſhut your eyes, that you ſhould not ſee the Truth; and, if ye care not for your ſoules, when ye ſee it, ſell it: Let no falſe tongue perſwade you there is no danger in this ſale: How charitably ſoeuer we thinke of poore blinded ſoules, that liue in the forced, & inuincible darkneſſe of error, certainly Apoſtaſie is deadly; How euer thoſe ſpeed that are robbed of Truth, you cannot ſell Truth, and be ſaued. Haue mercy therefore on your owne ſoules, for their ſakes, for the ſake of him that bought them, with the deare ranſome of his precious bloud; And as God hath bleſſed you with the inualuable treaſure of Truth, ſo hoard it vp in your hearts, and menage it in your liues; Oh let vs be Gens iuſta cuſtodiens veritatem, Eſa. 26. A iuſt nation keeping faſt the Truth; So whiles ye keepe the Truth, the Truth ſhall keepe you, both in Life, in Death, in Iudgment; In life vnto death, in death and iudgment vnto the conſummation of that endleſſe and incomprehenſible glory which the God of Truth hath prepared for them that ouercome.

To the happy poſſeſſion whereof he that hath ordained, in his good time as mercifully bring vs; and that for the ſake of the Son of his Loue, Ieſus Chriſt the Righteous; To whom with thee, O Father, and thy bleſſed Spirit, one infinite God, be giuen all praiſe, honour, and glory, now and for euer. Amen.

FINIS.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD Lady, the Lady ELIZABETH Counteſſe of Exceter.

RIght Honourable : this poore Sermon both preached and penned at your motion (that is to me your command) now preſents it ſelfe to your hand, and craueth a place (though vnworthy) in your Cabinet, yea, in your heart. That holy zeale which deſired it, will alſo improue it. The God, whom your Ladiſhip hath thus honoured in the care and coſt of his Houſe, will not faile to honour you in yours.

For me, your Honour may iuſtly challenge mee on both ſides; both by the Druryes, in the right of the firſt Patronage; and by the Cecils, in the right of my ſucceeding deuotions. In either, and both, that little I haue, or am, is ſincerely at your Ladiſhips ſeruice, as whom you haue merited to be

Your Honours in all true
obſeruance and duty,

A SERMON PREACHED AT THE REEDIFIED CHAPEL OF THE RIGHT HONOVRAble Earle of Exceter, in his Houſe of Saint Johns.

HAGGAI 2. 9.

The glory of the latter houſe ſhall be greater than of the former, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts; and in this place will I giue peace, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts.

AS we haue Houſes of our owne, ſo God hath his; yea, as great men haue more houſes than one, ſo hath the great God of Heauen much more; more, both in ſucceſſion (as here, the latter houſe, and the firſt) and in varietie: Hee hath an houſe of fleſh, (Ye are the Temples of the liuing God;) An houſe of ſtone; (Salomon ſhall build me an houſe;) An houſe immateriall in the Heauens, 2 Cor. 5. 1. Wherefore then hath God an houſe? Wherefore haue we ours; but to dwell in? But doth not he himſelfe tell Dauid, and ſo doth Stephen the Protomartyr (vpon whoſe day we are fallen) tell the Iewes, that He dwels not in Temples made with hands? True, he dwels not in his Houſe, as we in ours, by way of comprehenſion; he dwels in it by teſtification of preſence. So doe we dwell in our houſes, that our houſes containe vs, that we are only within them, and they without vs. So doth he dwell in his, that yet he is elſwhere, yea euery where, that his houſe is within him. Shortly, God dwels where he witneſſes his gracious preſence, that, becauſe he doth both in the Empyreall heauen, amongſt his Angels and Saints, and in his Church vpon earth; therefore his dwelling is both in the higheſt Heauen in perfect glory; and on Earth, in the hearts and aſſemblie of his children. As of the former, our Sauiour ſaith, In domo Patris mei, In my Fathers houſe are many Manſions: So alſo may we ſay of the latter, There is much varietie and choice in it; There was the Church of the Iewes, the Church of the Gentiles; There is a materiall, and a ſpirituall houſe. In the one, Salomons, Zorobabels, ſuch piles as this: In the other; ſo much multiplicity, as there are Nations, yea, Congregations that profeſſe the Name of Chriſt. One of theſe was a figure of the other; the Materiall, vnder the Law, of the Spirituall, vnder the Goſpell. Yee ſee now the firſt houſe, and the latter, the ſubiect of our Text and diſcourſe. The latter, commended to vs comparatiuely, poſitiuely. Comparatiuely with the former, Maior gloria. Poſitiuely, tiuely, in it ſelfe, In this place will I giue peace. Both, ſet out by the ſtile of the promiſer, and avower; ſaith the Lord of Hoſts. All which challenge your Chriſtian attention.

As the firſt houſe (which was materiall) was a figure of the ſecond, which is ſpirituall: ſo the glory of that materiall, was a figure of the glory of this ſpirituall. Now becauſe all the life and glory of the ſpirituall, ſtands in Chriſt the Meſſias, the Prophet lookes through the type of the materiall, at him which ſhall beautifie, yea glorifie, the ſpirituall, of whoſe exhibition the Prophet ſpeakes, Adhuc modicum, yet a little while, and I will ſhake the Heauens. This Modicum was but ſome 500. and odde yeeres; much to men, but a modicum to the Ancient of dayes, with whom 1000. yeres are but one day. It is in and by him, that this latter houſe vnder the Goſpell, ſhall in glory ſurpaſſe that firſt vnder the law. The Prophets had ſpoken gloriouſly of the temple that ſhould be; and now, leſt when the people ſhould ſee the homely and cottage-like reedification of Zerubbabel, they ſhould bee diſ-heartned and offended, the Prophet deſires to draw their eyes from the ſtone and timber, to the ſpirituall inſide of the Euangelicall Church, ſhewing the glory of this latter Houſe, to exceed the former.

Some groſſe Interpreters haue lookt with Iewiſh eyes vpon the outward fabricke, which was threefold: Salomons, Zorobabels, Herods. Salomons, ſumptuous and magnificent: Zorobabels, meane and homely; Herods, rich and maieſticall, immodico ſumptu, incredibili ſplendore, as one ſayes. Salomons was before defaced. Now becauſe Zorobabel was ſo farre from making his Word good, that the people wept, when they ſaw the difference (which Caluin well obſerues, was not without a ſpeciall prouidence of the al-wiſe God; elſe the Iewes would ſo haue fixed their eyes vpon the outward ſplendor, that they would neuer haue looked for the ſpirituall and inward Grace of the Houſe of God:) therefore they haue taken it of Herods temple; the walls and lining whereof were indeed anſwerable to this Propheſie, more glorious. But this conceit, as it is too carnall, ſo is quite diſſonant from the context, both in regard of the precedents, and ſubſequents. Of the precedents: For, how did the deſire of all nations come to that Pile of Herods? Of the ſubſequents: For, what peace was vnder the Herodian Temple? Firſt, the builder of it, was the chiefe oppreſſor of the Iewiſh liberty: and then, ſecondly, it gaue occaſion to the perpetuall miſerie of that people. Pilate would expilate the Treaſures of it for aquæ ducta, which denied, coſt the Iewes much bloud. Vnder Claudius, twenty thouſand ſlaine in a Feaſt of vnleauened bread. Ionathas the Prieſt ſlaine by theeues ſuborned by Fælix, in the very Temple; and euer after, it was the harbour and ſpoile of Villaines. What hills of Carcaſſes? What ſtreames of bloud was in't at the laſt vaſtation? Enough to amaze any Reader: ſo as in that 79. yeares wherein it ſtood (longer it did not,) it was no better than a ſtage of Tragedies, a ſhambles of cruelty. Of that therefore God could not ſay, Dabo pacem; it was Templum adulterinum, as one cals it iuſtly, and had neither command nor promiſe: It was the Spirituall Temple, the Euangelicall Church, whoſe glory ſhall be greater than the Iewiſh, which ſhall be bleſſed with the deſire of the Nations, with the aſſurance of Peace. But why then doth the Holy Ghoſt ſpeake of Gold and Siluer, the coſtly materials of an outward ſtructure? Euen theſe very metals are figuratiue, : not that God cares ſo much for them, but becauſe wee doe; becauſe our eies vſe to be dazled with this beſt parcell of Earth; Therefore when hee would deſcribe a glorious Church, hee borrowes the reſemblance of Gold, Siluer, precious ſtones, Eſay 60. and euen by theſe doth he ſet forth his new and Heauenly Ieruſalem, Reuelat. 21. Wherein then is the glory of Gods Euangelicall Houſe greater, than of the Legall? Yea, wherein is it not greater? Whether yee looke to the efficient, the matter, the duration, the extent, the ſeruice. The efficient, that was built by man, though directed by God: In this, God himſelfe is the Architect, not onely giuing the modell, but the frame. The matter, whether of ſtructure, or ornament. The ſtructure of the one was of ſtone and wood: of the other is of liuing ſtones. The ornament of the one was Gold and Siluer: of the other, diuine Graces of Faith, Charity, Hope, Sanctity, Truth, Piety, and all other vertues, to which, Gold it ſelfe were but traſh.

The duration of the one (euen that longſt-liued Temple of Salomon, though called (Beth γωλαμ) domus ſeculi) was but 430. yeares. Of the other, beyond time to eternitie. The extent of the one to be meaſured by a few poles, yea, (though ye take in the Courts, and all) by a few Acres: Of the other, vniuerſall, ſo far as the King of Heauen hath any Land. The ſeruice in the one performed by a few men, mortall, ſinfull, the bloud of beaſts ſhed vpon the Altar; In the other, performed by our eternall High-Prieſt, after that higher order of Melchiſedech; offering vp his owne moſt precious bloud for our redemption. In that, Chriſt Ieſus was obſcurely figured: In this, really exhibited, borne, liuing, dying, riſing, aſcending, preached, beleeued, liued; Euery way therefore both in efficient, matter, duration, extent, ſeruice, Maior gloria.

Let no man tell me now of that iuſt wonder of the world, the Iewiſh Temple; white Marble without, lined with Gold within, Brazen pillars, Golden veſſels, coſtly vailes, an High-Prieſthood ſet forth with precious Stones, rich Robes, exquiſite Perfumes, curious Muſicke, and what-euer that ancient goodly inſtitution had rare and admirable; I ſay, the Clay of the Goſpell, is more worth than the Marble of the Law; Euangelicall Braſſe, more worth than legall Gold; the ragges of the Euangelicall Prieſthood, more excellent than the robes of the Leuiticall. In ſhort; the beſt of the Law is not comparable to the baſeſt of the Goſpell.

Iohn Baptiſt was the Ianus of both Teſtaments; he was to the Churches, as Noah was to the Worlds; he ſaw both the firſt, and the latter. It is a great word that our Sauiour ſaith of him, that amongſt thoſe which were borne, or rather (as ours reade it better) begotten of women, there did not a greater than he ariſe: but it is a greater word that he ſpeakes of the Children of the new Teſtament, that the leaſt in the Kingdome of Heauen is greater than he. I ſtand not vpon examining the compariſon, whether it be ratione ſanctitatis, or officij; it makes either way for my purpoſe, therefore was Iohn ſo great, becauſe he was the laſt of the Law, and the firſt of the Goſpell: and the old rule is minimum maximi maius eſt maximo minimi; therefore is the leaſt in this Kingdome of Grace greater than he, becauſe he is all, what Iohn was halfe; wholly vnder that Euangelium Regni, which is able to aduance him to a greater perfection, than that Harbinger of Chriſt. What a fauour then is it (Right Honourable and beloued) that God hath reſerued vs to theſe better dayes of his Goſpell, wherein the helpes of ſaluation are more cleare, obuious, effectuall; wherein, as the glory of the latter Houſe exceeded the former; ſo the meanes of that incomprehenſible glory of the houſe not made with hands, eternall in the Heauens, lie more open vnto vs? What ſhould we doe, but both vti, and frui, gladly vſe, and ſweetly enioy this vnſpeakable bleſſing, which God hath kept in ſtore for vs, and walke worthy of ſo incomparable a mercy. The old Iewes liued in the dawning of the day, wherein they had but a glimmering of that Sunne, which would riſe. We liue after the high noone of that happy day. If we walke not anſwerable to ſo great a light, what can we looke for, but vtter darkneſſe?

The leaſt of the greateſt is more, than the greateſt of the leaſt.

Goſpell of the Kingdome.

Ye ſhall now giue me leaue (Right Honourable) to carry theſe words in a meet analogie to the preſent occaſion. The Temples vnder the Law, were both a figure, and a patterne of the Churches vnder the Goſpell. Within this roofe vnder which we now ſtand here, was both the former, and the latter houſe; and euen in theſe walls doth God make his Word good, That the glory of this latter Houſe ſhall be greater, than of the former. The firſt foundation of it was, no doubt, both pious and rich. I ſhall not need to fetch the Pedegrees of it from Saint Iohn Baptiſt in Ieruſalem, nor to diſcourſe of either the deuotion, or wealth of that religiouſly-military Order, for whom theſe ſtones were firſt laid. Imagine the Altar neuer ſo gay, the Imagery neuer ſo curious, the Veſtments neuer ſo rich, the Pillars, Walls, Windowes, Pauement, neuer ſo exquiſite; yet I dare boldly ſay, this preſent glory of this Houſe in this comely whiteneſſe, and well-contriued coarctation, is greater than the former. What care I? Nay, What doth God care for the worke of a Lapidary, or Painter, or Maſon? One zealous Prayer, one Orthodox Sermon is a more glorious furniture, than all the precious rarities of Mechanique excellencies. I doe moſt willingly (as what good heart doth not?) honour the vertuous actions, and godly intentions of our worthy ſorefathers, which (no doubt) it hath pleaſed God in mercy to accept and crowne, but withall it muſt be yeelded, that they liued vnder the tyrannous iniury and vſurpation of thoſe Phariſes, who kept the keyes of knowledge at their owne girdles, and would neither draw for them, nor ſuffer them to draw for themſelues. Bleſſed be God for better conditions; the Well of liſe lies open to vs, neither are we only allowed, but inuited to thoſe heauenly liquors, Inebriamini O Chariſſimi, Drinke, yea, drinke abundantly, O beloued, Cant. 5. 1. This happy libertie of the ſauing Goſpell of Ieſus Chriſt, daily and ſincerely preached to vs (Noble and beloued Chriſtians) is worthy to be more worth vnto vs, than all the treaſures, ornaments, priuileges, of this tranſitory World; and this, ſince through the ineſtimable goodneſſe of God, yee doe, and may finde in this latter Houſe; well hath God verified this word in your eyes and eares; The glory of the latter Houſe ſhall be greater, than of the former.

Hitherto the comparatiue praiſe of the latter Houſe; the poſitiue followes in the promiſe of a gracious effect; In this place will I giue peace: wherein I know not whether the bleſſing doth more grace the place, or the place the bleſſing; both grace each other, and both bleſſe Gods people; In this place will I giue peace. If yee looke at the bleſſing it ſelfe, it is incomparable, Peace; that whereby the Hebrewes had wont to expreſſe all welfare in their ſalutations, and wel-wiſhes; the Apoſtolicall benediction dichotomizes all good things into Grace and Peace; wherein, at the narroweſt, by Grace, all ſpirituall fauours were ſignified; temporall by Peace. The ſweet Singer of Iſrael could not wiſh better to Gods Church, than Peace be within her walls: and behold, this is it which God will giue, Dabo pacem: yea, our eyes ſhould ſtoope too low, if they ſhould fix here. The ſweet Quiriſters of Heauen, when they ſung that diuine Caroll, to the honour of the firſt Chriſtmas, next to Gloria in excelſis Deo, ſaid, In terris pax: Yet higher; the great Sauiour of the World, when he would leaue the moſt precious Legacie to his deare ones on earth, that they were capable of, he ſayes, My peace I giue you. And what he there giues, he here promiſes, Dabo pacem, I will giue it. But where? Whence? In this place. Not any where; not euery where; but in his owne Houſe, in his latter Houſe, his Euangelicall Houſe; as if this bleſſing were confined to his holy walls, he ſaith, In this place will I giue peace. This flower is not for euery ſoile; it growes not wilde, but is only to be found in the Garden of Sion. It is very pregnant which the Pſalmiſt hath, Pſal. 128. 5. and 134. 3. The Lord that made Heauen and Earth, bleſſe thee out of Sion. He doth not ſay, The Lord that made the earth, bleſſe thee out of heauen; nor, The Lord that made Heauen, bleſſe thee out of heauen; but, bleſſe thee out of Sion. As if he would teach vs, that all bleſſings come, as immediatly and primarily from heauen, ſo mediatly and ſecondarily from Sion, where this Temple ſtood. Some Philoſophers haue held the Moone to be the receptacle of all the influences of the heauenly bodies, and the conueyances of them to this inferiour world, ſo as all the vertue of the vpper Orbes and Starres are deriued by her, to this elementary Spheare. Such doth both Dauid and Haggai repute the houſe of God; whither, as to Ioſephs Store-houſe, doth God conuey the bleſſings of peace, that they may be thence tranſmitted to the ſonnes of men. How, and why then doth God giue peace in this his Houſe? Becauſe here (as Bernard well) Deus & audit, & auditur, God heares, and is heard here: audit orantes, erudit audientes; he heares his ſuppliants, and teacheth his hearers. As this place hath two vſes, it is both Oratorium, and Auditorium: ſo in reſpect of both, doth it bleſſe vs with peace: our mouth procures it in the one, our eare in the other; God workes in our hearts by both. In the firſt, God ſayes, as our Sauiour cites it, Domus mea domus orationis: My Houſe ſhall be called the Houſe of prayer. And what bleſſing is it, euen the beſt of Peace, that our prayers cannot infeoffe vs in? Salomon when he would conſecrate the Church he had built, ſolemnly ſues to God, that he would inueſt it with this priuilege of an vniuerſall-gracious audience; and numbring the occaſions of diſtreſſed Suppliants, makes it euer the foot of his requeſt; (Then hearken to the prayer that thy ſeruant ſhall make towards this place; Heare thou in heauen, thy dwelling place, and when thou heareſt, haue mercy.) If euer therefore

I will giue peace.

Glory to God in the higheſt heauens; in earth, peace, &c.

we would haue peace outward, inward, priuate, publike, ſecular, ſpirituall: If we would haue peace in our eſtate, peace in our Land, peace in our Church, peace in our ſoules, pray for it. And if euer we will pray for it, pray here, in Gods houſe, for in this place will I giue peace. In vaine ſhall we looke for it elſewhere, if we aske it not here. It is true, we are bidden euery where to lift vp pure hands to God: but they cannot bee pure, that are profane; and they cannot bee but profane, that contemne the holy ordinances of God. He ſaid well, In templo vis orare, in te ora; for (Know you not, that your bodies are the Temples of the liuing God?) but let me as truly returne it; In te vis orare, in templo ora? Wouldeſt thou pray with effect at home? Pray at Church; elſe thy deuotion is but the ſacrifice of fooles; for he hath ſaid it, who hath good reaſon to appoint the circumſtances of his owne beneficence, In this place will I giue peace.

Will yee then ſee the reaſon why there is ſo much empty Caske in the Celler of God? Therefore are men void of grace, becauſe they are void of deuotion. They ſeeke not God where he may be found; and therefore it is iuſt with God not to be found of them, where they pretend to ſeeke him: for In hoc loco, In this place will I giue peace.

Gerſon diſtinguiſhes well in his Sermon de Angelis, that there is Duplex Cælum, A double Heauen; Gloriæ, & Eccleſiæ; of Glory aboue, of the Church below; the Church is the Heauen on earth; where God is ſeene, heard, ſpoken vnto: where are his Saints (whoſe Aſſemblies are here;) where are his Angels: (Let the woman haue power on her head, becauſe of the Angels, 1 Cor. 11.) As the Iewes then, whileſt the Church of God was Nationall, were wont (according to command) to looke towards the Temple, if they could not come to it, in their deuotions: So now that the Church is Catholicke, or vniuerſall, and euery of our Churches is equally Gods houſe, (κυριακὴ;) we ſhall gladly with Peter and Iohn, goe vp to this Temple to pray; How can we looke for a better incouragement, than God giues vs here, In this place will I giue Peace.

In the latter, as it is Auditorium, ſo, I create the fruit of the lips to bee peace (ſaith God.) Naturally wee are all euen thoſe that applaud themſelues in the beſt opinion of their harmleſſe, and faire diſpoſition) enemies to God: Enemies both actiuely and paſſiuely. Actiuely, θεοστυγεῖς, God-haters, Rom. 1. Paſſiuely, Filij iræ, The ſons of diſpleaſure. We fell out in Adam through our owne wilfull apoſtaſie and diſobedience; and we ſtill ſtand out in the maintenance of our inward corruption. There is no way to peace but by reconciliation; there is no way to reconciliation, but by the Goſpell of Ieſus Chriſt, which is Euangelium pacis; there is no proper element for the Goſpell of God, but the Houſe of God; Locus iſte, In this place will I giue peace. It is not (I know) for euery heart to apprehend, either the want of this peace, or the miſery of this want. This is one of thoſe happineſſes which is moſt bragg'd of, where it is leaſt had. The ſenſuall Securitan pleaſes himſelfe in the conceit of his owne peace. All is well at home; he quarrels not with himſelfe, for he denies himſelfe nothing: God quarrels not with him; here are no checks of a chiding conſcience; no frownes of an angry Iudge; nothing but Pulchritudo Pacis (as the Prophet ſpeakes.) Alas, my beloued, call not this peace, call it ſtupiditie; euen Hell it ſelfe is not a Kingdome diuided in it ſelfe. There is no bleſſing, which is not alſo counterfeited, Pacem veram dabo, is the ſtile of the Prophets, Ier. 14. 13. This were a needleſſe Epithet, if there were not a falſe peace; ſuch is this of carnall hearts. That Word of eternall Truth muſt ſtand: There is no peace, ſaith my God, to the wicked. Haue you ſeene a ſore ſuddenly fil'd vp with vnſound fleſh, and fairely skinned ouer, without all offence to the eie, which ere long will breake out againe, and bewray a ſecret and ſo much-more-hardly-cured corruption? ſuch is a wicked mans peace. Haue you ſeene a ſlaue ſit quietly in the Gally, not ſtruggling with his chaine, not repining at his Oare (neceſſitas fortiter, conſuetudo facile?) Haue you heard a dying man profeſſe, that he felt no paine? Such is a wicked mans peace, of which hee ſhall once ſay, though now all ſeeme ſmooth, and plauſible; In pace amaritudo mea amariſſima; In peace I had great bitterneſſe, Eſay 38. 17. Neither is the want of this peace leſſe perceiued, than the miſery of this want. Men ſee no difference in the face of Heauen, whatſoeuer they doe; their blaſphemies and prayers finde the ſame entertainment: therefore the careleſſe man reſolues, I ſhall haue peace, though I follow the wayes of mine owne heart. Oh the miſerable ſottiſhneſſe of wilfull ſinners! Sinne lyes (like a ſleeping Bandog) at the doore of their heart; they looke vpon him, as if hee would neuer wake; or, as if though hee ſhould, yet he were ſo clogged, and chained, and muzled, that there can bee no danger of his hurt. Let God but rowze him vp a little, he ſhall bay them to deſpaire; he ſhall flie vpon them, and pull out their throats: Then ſhall their troubled heart proiect terrible things, and they ſhall feele what it is to liue in the anger of a God. They ſhall ſee the Almighty putting himſelfe into the fearefull formes of vengeance; Who can ſtand before his indignation? And who can abide in the fierceneſſe of his anger? His fury is powred out like fire, and the rocks are throwne downe before him, Nahum 1. 6. And if his very loue haue drawne bloud of his deare ones: (Terrores Domini militant contra me, ſaith holy Iob: The terrors of the Lord are ſet in aray againſt me, Iob 6. 4:) and he that bore the chaſtiſements of our peace, the Sonne of his loue, could ſay (My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me?) Oh what ſhall bee the Iudgments of his wrath? If this be the rod of children, Oh, what ſhall be the Scorpions for his enemies? They ſhall ſee that gulfe of fire ready to receiue them into euerlaſting burnings. They ſhall ſee the Deuils their inceſſant tormentors ready to ſeize vpon their guilty ſoules. Then, O then, ſhall they know, too late, what an happineſſe it is, that God here promiſes, Dabo pacem. Would wee then auoyd the vnſpeakable horror of this woful condition? Would we finde the bed of our ſickneſſe and death, comforted with the ſweet teſtimony of an heauenly peace betwixt God and our ſoules? See whence we muſt fetch it; In this place will I giue peace. If euer we haue it, we muſt haue it from the bleſſed ordinances of God, his word and Sacraments, which this place can afford vs. In vaine ſhall yee ſeeke for this (deare Chriſtians) in a licentious Tauerne, in a rich Counting-houſe, in Chambers of dalliance, in full Tables, in Pompous Courts; no, not in thrones of earthly Maieſty. Alas, many of theſe are the make-bates betwixt Heauen and vs, moſt of them can marre, none of them can make our peace. It is onely the deſpiſed Miniſtery of the Goſpell; the Word of reconciliation, (as it is called, 2 Cor. 5. 19.) which ſounds in Gods Houſe, that can doe it. As yee loue your ſoules therefore, as you would finde peace at the laſt, and would looke with a comfortable aſſurance in the face of death and iudgment; as yee would ſee a gracious Mercy-ſeat in the dreadfull Tribunall of God at the day of our laſt appearance, frequent the Houſe of God: attend reuerently and conſcionably vpon the ſacred Inſtitutions of God, yeeld your ſelues ouer to be wrought vpon by the powerfull Goſpell of Ieſus Chriſt. Oh be not you wanting vnto God, he will not be wanting vnto you, but will make good this promiſe of his vnfailable grace, In this place will I giue peace.

It is a great word that is heere ſpoken, Dabo pacem; and therefore it is vndertaken by an omnipotent Agent, I will giue peace. If all the Angels of Heauen ſhould haue ſaid ſo, we ſhould ſoone haue replied, as Korah and his company did to Moſes and Aaron; Yee tooke too much vpon you, Numbers 16. 3. This worke is not for any finite power; the ſtile of peace, is the peace of God; the ſtile of God, the Mediator betwixt God and man, is, The Prince of Peace. He is the true Salomon, the other was but typicall. It is hee onely, that when the Diſciples were toſſed with contrary winds and threatning billowes, could command the windes and waues to a calme. It is hee onely, that when his Church is toſſed with the winds and waues of raging and impetuous enmitie, can giue outward peace. It is he onely, that when the diſtreſſed ſoule is toſſed with the winds and waues of ſtrong temptation, of weake diffidence, can giue inward peace. Iuſtly therefore doth he challenge this act as his owne, I will giue peace. We vſe to ſay, It is beſt treating of peace with a Sword in our hand. Thoſe who haue the aduantage of the warre, may command peace: vnderlings muſt ſtoope to ſuch conditions, as the victor will yeeld. To ſhew vs therefore how eaſily he can giue peace, God ſtiles himſelfe the God of Hoſts; a title wherein he takes no ſmall delight, referring not to the being of the creature, but to their marſhalling; not to their naturall eſtate, but their militarie; neither would God be lookt at in it, as a Creator, but as a Generall. In but two of the Prophets, Eſay and Ieremie, no leſſe than an hundred and thirtie times hath hee this ſtile giuen him. Euery thing, as it hath an existence from the Maker, ſo an order from the Gouernour; and that order is no other than warlike, wherein it doth (militare Deo) ſerue vnder the colours of the Almighty. All creatures are both muſtred, and trained, and placed in Garriſon, and brought forth into the field, in the ſeruice of their Creator ; they are all exercitus pugnatorum. If yee looke into Heauen, there is a company of heauenly Souldiers, Luke 2. Neither was there onely the conſtruction of Idolaters, vniuerſa militia cæli, to which they burnt incenſe ; but of Moſes himſelfe ; Thus the Heauen and the Earth were finiſhed, and all the Hoſt of them, Gen. 2. 1. If yee looke to the Earth, not men onely, whom reaſon hath fitted for ſuch deſignes, but euen the brute, yea, the baſeſt and indocibleſt of the brute creatures are ranged into arrayes : euen the very Locuſts, though they haue no Leader, yet Egrediuntur per turmas, They goe foorth by bands, Prov. 30. 27. And if ye looke into Egypt (where for the time was Sedes belli,) you ſhall finde a band of Frogs, that were appointed to march into the very bed chamber, the bed, the ouens, the diſhes of Pharaoh ; you ſhall finde an hoſt of Lice, of Flies, of Caterpillers, ſent againſt thoſe Egyptian Tyrants. Elſe-where, ye ſhall finde troupes of Palmerwormes, of Locuſts, of Cankerwormes, of Caterpillers, to ſet vpon Iſrael, Ioel 1.4. Shortly, where he meanes to preſerue, the fiery Charets and Horſemen of Heauen ſhall compaſſe Dothan. Where he meanes to deſtroy, the moſt deſpicable of his creatures ſhall be armed, to the ruine of the proudeſt. Doth Goliah ſtalke forth to the defiance of the God of Iſrael? A pibble out of the brook ſhall ſtrew him on the ground. Doth an Herod heare his flatterers gladly ſay, Nec vox hominem ſonat? Stay but a while, God ſets his vermine vpon him; all the Kings guard cannot maſter thoſe Lice. He hath Hornets for the Hiuites and Canaanites, Exod. 23. Mice for the Philiſtims, 1 Sam. 6. Rats for the Couetous Prelate : A Flie for Pope Adrian : A world of creatures for either defenſiue or offenſiue ſeruices. Quare fremuerunt gentes? Why doe the Heathen rage, and the people imagine a vaine thing? The Kings of the Earth ſet themſelues, and the Rulers take counſell together againſt the Lord, and againſt his Anointed. Preſumptuous duſt and aſhes, that dare riſe vp againſt the God of hoſts! If a ſilly Ant out of a Mole-hill ſhould march forth, and proffer to wreſtle a fall with a Gyant, there were ſome proportion in this challenge ; there is none of a finite power to an infinite. Should all the powers of Hell band themſelues with thoſe on earth, Quis reſtitit? What power haue they of being, of motion, but from him whom they oppoſe? How eaſily can he blow vpon their enterpriſes? How eaſily can he command theſe to the duſt, thoſe to their Chaines? Bee confounded therefore, O vaine men, whoſe breath is in your noſtrils (and that not your owne neither) when ye thinke of the power and Maieſty of the God of Hoſts.

Who hath reſiſted his will?

And why are we diſmaid with the rumours, or feares of the ſtrongeſt oppoſitions? Gebal and Ammon, and Amelec, the Philiſtims, with them that dwell at Tyre? Aſhur alſo is ioyned to the inceſtuous children of Lot : (ὀλιγόπιστε) O thou of little faith, why feareſt thou? The Lord of hoſts is with vs, the God of Iacob is our refuge, Pſa. 46. Come, all ye Bands of wickedneſſe, and conſpire againſt the Scepter of the Kingdome (that is, the Goſpell) of Ieſus Chriſt. He hath his Armageddon, He hath a feaſt for the fowles of the aire, and the beaſts of the field, whom he hath inuited to the fleſh of Captaines, and the fleſh of Kings, Reuel. 19.8. I will not be afraid of ten thouſands of people that haue ſet themſelues againſt me round about ; Dominus ſuſcepit ; The Lord hath ſuſtained me, and he is the Lord of Hoſts.

Yea, why are wee apalled, when we ſee the meaſures of the ſonnes of Anak; the ſpirituall wickedneſſes in heauenly places? If wee looke at their number, they are Legions. If to their ſtrength, they are Principalities and Powers. If to their nature, they are ſpirits that rule in the aire. We are men, fleſh and bloud, ſingle, weake, ſinfull. What euer we are, our God is in heauen, and doth whatſoeuer he will; he is the Lord of Hoſts, tho Cowards in our ſelues, yet in him we are more than Conquerors ; he who is more than all power, than all Truth, hath ſaid it ; The Gates of Hell ſhall not preuaile againſt his Church. Thanks be to God, which giueth vs victory, through our Lord Ieſus Chriſt.

Laſtly, he is the Lord of hoſts ; his vndertakings are infallible : Hath he ſaid, that the glory of the Euangelicall Church ſhall exceed the Legall ? Hath he ſaid, that, In this place he will giue peace ? How can the Church faile of glory, or the ſoule of peace ? His word can be no more defectiue, than himſelfe impotent. Truſt God with his owne cauſes ; truſt him with thy ſelfe ; doe that he bids ; expect what he promiſes ; haunt this Houſe of his, wait on his ordinances. The Lord of Hoſts ſhall giue thee that peace, which paſſeth all vnderſtanding ; and with peace, glory, in that vpper Houſe of his not made with hands, eternall in the Heauens.

To the poſſeſſion whereof, that God, who hath ordained vs, in his good time mercifully bring vs.

And now, O Lord God of Hoſts, make good thy promiſes to this Houſe of thine. Whenſoeuer any Suppliant ſhall in this place offer vp his praiers vnto thee, heare thou in Heauen, thy dwelling place ; and when thou heareſt, haue mercy. What Word ſoeuer of thine ſhall ſound out of this place, let it be the ſauour of life vnto life to euery hearer. What Sacrament ſoeuer of thine in this place ſhall be adminiſtred, let it be effectuall to the ſaluation of euery receiuer.

Thou that art the God of glory, and peace, giue peace and glory to thy Seruants, for thy mercies ſake, for thy Sonnes ſake, euen the Sonne of thy loue, Ieſus Chriſt the iuſt. To whom with thee, and the holy Ghoſt, one infinite God, be giuen all praiſe, honour, and thankſgiuing now and for euer.

TO THE WORSHIPFVLL AND REVEREND, Mr. Dr. HALL, DEANE OF WORCESTER, my worthie and much reſpected Friend, all happineſſe, with my loue in CHRIST IESVS.

REuerend Sir; this Sermon, I know, is at the Preſſe before you expected: But I thought (as this glorious Chapell occaſioned it, ſo) it might miniſter occaſion of perpetuall remembrance of the Chapell, by remaining its firſt Monument. And although both theſe were confined to the priuate; the Chapel for the Family of my Right Honourable Lord the Earle of Exceter, who hath giuen the materiall thereof ſufficient luſter: and the Copy of the Sermon to the Cabinet of my truly Noble, and vertuous Lady, his Counteſſe, yet both theſe are much and oft required to the publike, the Sermon to be an inſtruction, and ſo it is; the Chapell to be an example, and ſo it may be. The Sermon to teach all, to be all glorious in their ſoules. The Chapell to teach ſome, who build houſes for their owne habitation, to ſet vp another for Gods Religion. The Sermon was craued at the hands of my Honourable Ladie, that it might come to the Preſſe; who, of her owne pious diſpoſition, gaue forth the Copy, and for her Noble eſteeme of your ſelfe, and of the worth of your Sermon, was willing and deſirous to giue it way to the Printer. And this I thought good to impart vnto you, and to the courteous Reader, that you may be ſatisfied of the meanes how, and the cauſe why it comes in publike. And ſo praying for you, and deſiring your prayers for me, I remaine

Your truly louing Friend,
H. BAGVLEY.

Opus Iuſtitiæ pax.

The worke of Juſtice (or righteouſneſſe ) ſhall be peace.

MY Text (you heare) is of Iuſtice and Peace, two royall graces; and ſuch as flow from ſoueraigne Maieſtie: There is a double Iuſtice, Diuine & humane; there is a double peace, outward in the ſtate, inward in the ſoule: Accordingly, there is a double ſenſe of my Text; a ſpirituall, a ciuill ſenſe: The ſpirituall concerning Theologicall Iuſtice, and inward peace; The ciuill concerning humane iuſtice and outward peace. The ſpirituall thus; The Meſſias ſhall cauſe the fruit of his perfect iuſtice to bee our inward peace with God, and our ſelues. The ciuill thus; The Magiſtrate ſhall cauſe the worke of ciuill Iuſtice in his adminiſtration, to be our outward peace with one another: In both, or either (as Muſculus well) there is an alluſion in the Hebrew word to a field; the ſoile is the heart or the State, the ſeed is Iuſtice, the fruit peace: That which was waſte ground is now a Carmell, a fruitfull field; and the fruit of this field of Iuſtice is peace. As there is good reaſon, wee will begin with the ſpirituall Iuſtice and Peace.

The great King of Heauen will disforeſt that peace of the world, which hee calls his Church, and put it to tillage; it ſhall be ſowne with righteouſneſſe, and ſhall yeeld a ſweet crop of peace: in this onely, not in the barren heaths of the prophane world, ſhall true peace grow.

At firſt, God and man were good friends: How ſhould there bee other than good termes betwixt Heauen and Paradiſe? God made man iuſt; and iuſt man (whiles he was ſo) could not chuſe but loue the iuſt God that made him; ſin ſet them at odds; in one act and inſtant did man leeſe both his iuſtice and peace; now the world is changed; now the ſtile of God is Fortis vltor, God the auenger, Ier. 51. 56. and the ſtile of men, Filij ira, ſons of wrath, Epheſ. 2. 3. There is no poſſible peace to be made betwixt God & man, but by the perfect iuſtice of him that was both God & man: I would there were a peace in the Church about this Iuſtice; It is pitie & ſhame there is not; but there muſt be hereſies: As there are two parts of Diuinity, the Law and the Goſpell; ſo each of theſe haue their God the auenger. The ſonnes of wrath.

Morall righteouſneſſe.

their Iuſtice; there is a Iuſtice of the Law, and an Euangelicall Iuſtice. The Iuſtice of the Law when a meere morall man is iuſtified (out of his owne powers) by the works of the Law; very Papiſts will giue ſo much way to S. Paul, ſo much affront to Pelagius, as to renounce this; freely anathematizing that man who by the ſtrength of humane nature, or the doctrine of the Law, ſhal challenge iuſtification; Vnleſſe perhaps ſome Andradius haue priuilege to teach, that this Ethica iuſtitia, was enough to iuſtifie and ſaue the old Philoſophers.

The Euangelicall Iuſtice is not without the interuention of a Sauiour; To which claime is laid in two kinds, either as imputatiue, or as inherent; The inherent wrought in vs: the imputed wrought for vs. How eaſie were it to lead you through a thicket of diſtinctions into a large field of controuerſie, concerning the nature, meanes, manner of our Iuſtification? No head in all Diuinity yeelds either more, or more important Problemes; In ſo much as Cardinall De monte, Vice-Preſident for the time of the Councell of Trent, in an Oration made by him in the eleuenth ſeſſion, profeſſes, that when they meant to diſpatch their Decree concerning Iuſtification in fifteene daies, it coſt them ſeuen moneths to finiſh, without one daies intermiſſion; and when all is done, they haue left the world, which was before (as Pighius ingenuouſly) intricated by the thorny queſtions of Schoolemen, rather more vnſatisfied and perplexed than they found it. It is the maine care of our liues, and deaths, what ſhall giue vs peace and acceptation before the dreadfull Tribunall of God: What, but righteouſneſſe? What righteouſneſſe, or whoſe? Ours, or Chriſts? Ours, in the inherent graces wrought in vs, in the holy works wrought by vs; or Chriſts, in his moſt perfect obedience, and meritorious ſatisfaction wrought for vs, applied to vs? The Tridentine faction is for the former; we are for the latter; God is as direct on our ſide as his word can make him; Euery where blazoning the defects of our owne righteouſneſſe, the imperfections of our beſt Graces, the deadly nature of our leaſt ſinnes; the radicall ſinfulneſſe of our habituall concupiſcence, the pollution of our beſt works: Euery where extolling the perfect obedience of our Redeemer, the gratious application of that obedience, the ſweet comfort of that application, the aſſurance and vnfailableneſſe of that comfort: and laſtly, our happy reſt in that aſſurance. I inſtance not; open the Booke, ſee where your eies can looke beſide theſe. Satis apertè (ſaith their Caſſander) The Scripture is cleare ours; So is all antiquity, if they beleeue that learned Arbiter; So are their more ingenuous Doctors of the laſt age; So would they all be, if they had grace to know God, themſelues, grace, ſinne, heauen, hell; God perfectly iuſt, themſelues miſerably weake, Grace ſenſibly imperfect, ſinne vnmeaſurably ſinfull; Laſtly, if they knew that heauen is for none but the pure, that hell is for the preſumptuous. O Sauiour, no man is iuſt through thee, but he that is ſanctified by thee; What is our inherent juſtice, but ſanctity? That we aſpire towards, we attaine not to; Woe were vs if we were not more iuſt in thee, than ſanctified in our ſelues; wee are ſanctified, in part, according to the weakneſſe of our receit; we are iuſtified thorowly, according to the perfection of thine acceptation; were we fully ſanctified here, we ſhould be more than men; were we not thorowly iuſtified, we ſhould be no more than ſinners before thee; whiles we ſtand before thee as ſinners, we can haue no peace; Let others truſt in the Charets and Horſes of their owne ſtrength, wee will remember the Name of the Lord our God; The worke of thy Iuſtice ſhall be our peace.

Peace is a ſweet word; Euery body would be glad of it; eſpecially Peace at the laſt, as the Pſalmiſt ſpeakes: How haue the politickly religious held out twigs for the drowning ſoule to catch at? Due ſatisfactions, vndue ſupererogations, patronages of Saints, bargaines of Indulgences, woolward pilgrimages, and at laſt (after whips and haireclothes) leaue the dying ſoule to a feare of Hell, doubt of Heauen, aſſurance of Purgatory flames; How truly may it now ſay to theſe Doctors, as Iob to his friends, Miſerable comforters are yee all; Hearken, O yee deare Chriſtians, to a better voice that ſounds from heauen; Come to mee all yee that labour, and are heauy laden, and I will giue you reſt.

Mat. 11. 28.

Is there any of you whoſe vnquiet breſt boiles continually with the conſcience of any ſoule

foule ſin? whoſe heart is daily tyr'd vpon by the vultur of his ſecret guiltineſſe? whoſe boſome is gnawed before-hand with that helliſh Worme, which can no more giue ouer than die? It boots not to aske thee if thou wouldeſt haue peace. Peace? Rather than life; Oh wherewithall ſhall I come before the Lord, and bow my ſelfe before the moſt high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings? Wil the Lord be pleaſed with thouſands of Rams, or with ten thouſand Riuers of Oyle? Shall I giue my firſt borne for my tranſgreſſion, the fruit of my body for the ſinne of my ſoule? Heare, O thou diſtracted heart; what talkeſt thou of giuing to the owner? The world is his: thou art not thine owne; Yea, were theſe things thine, and not his, yet know, it is not giuing, but taking that muſt procure thy peace: An infinite Iuſtice is offended; an infinite Iuſtice hath ſatisfied, an infinite mercy hath applied it; Take thou hold by the hand of faith on that infinite mercy, and juſtice of thy Sauiour; The worke of his Iuſtice ſhall be thy peace.

Micah. 6.

Fly about whither thou wilt, O thou weary Doue, thorow all the wide Regions of the heauen, and waters, thou ſhalt no where finde reſt for the ſoles of thy feet, but in this Arke of Chriſts perfect righteouſneſſe: In vaine ſhalt thou ſeeke it in ſchooles of morality, in learned Libraries, in ſpatious fields and forreſts, in pleaſant gardens, in ſullen retiredneſſe, in witty conuerſation, in wanton Theaters, in drunken cellers, in tables of gluttony, in beds of luſt, cheſts of Mammon, whiffes and draughts of intoxication, ſongs of ribaldry, ſports of recreation; No, no, the more thou ſeekeſt it in moſt of theſe, the further it flies from thee, the further thou art from finding it; and if theſe things may giue ſome poore truce to thy thoughts, it ſhall ſoone end in a more direfull warre. There is no peace, ſaith my God, to the wicked: Stray whither thou wilt, O thou wounded heart, thorow the Lawnds and Woods; alas, the ſhaft ſticks ſtill in thee, or if that be ſhaken out, the head; None but the ſoueraigne Dittany of thy Sauiours righteouſneſſe can driue it out; and till it be out, thou canſt haue no peace. In plaine termes; wouldſt thou haue peace? None but Chriſt can giue it thee; He will giue it to none but the penitent, none but the faithfull; Oh ſpend thy ſelfe into the ſighes and teares of true repentance; and then raiſe thy humbled ſoule to a liuely confidence in thine all-ſufficient Redeemer; Set thy Lord Ieſus betwixt God and thy ſins; God cannot ſee thy debt, but through thine acquittance; By his ſtripes we are healed, by his wounds we are ſtanched, by his death we are quickned, by his righteouſneſſe we are diſcharged; The worke of his righteouſneſſe is our peace. Oh ſafe and bleſſed condition of beleeuers; Let ſin, Satan, world, death, hell, doe their worſt; Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of Gods elect? It is God that iuſtifieth; who ſhall condemne? It is Chriſt that died, yea rather, that is riſen againe; who is alſo at the right hand of God, and maketh interceſſion for vs: Our enemy is now our Father, our Iudge is our Sauiour, the offended our ſurety, that precious bloud our ranſome, that perfect righteouſneſſe our euerlaſting peace.

Thus much of our ſpirituall Iuſtice, and Peace. The Ciuill followes: I know theſe two are wide tearmes; Iuſtice compriſes all vertue, as Peace all bleſſings; For that is iuſt in all kinds, which hath a meet adequation to the rule; All vertue therefore conforming vs to the Law of God, which is the rule of perfection, challengeth iuſtly to it ſelfe a ſtile of iuſtice.

Narrower bounds will ſerue our turne: We ſpeake of Iuſtice firſt as a ſingle vertue. Habits are diſtinguiſhed by their acts; acts by their obiects. The obiect of all morall vertue is good, as of all intellectuall, is True. The obiect of this vertue of Iuſtice is the good of men in relation to each other; Other vertues order a man in regard to himſelfe; Iuſtice, in regard to another. This good being either common, or priuate; common of al, priuate of ſome; the acts and vertue of iuſtice muſt be ſutable; either, as man ſtands in an habitude to the whole body, or as he ſtands to ſpeciall Limbs of the body: The former of theſe is that which Philoſophers & Caſuiſts call a legall and vniuerſal Iuſtice. The latter is that particular Iuſtice, which we vſe to diſtinguiſh by Diſtributiõ, & Commutation; the one conſiſting in matter of Commerce, the other in Reward, or Puniſhment: both of them according to a meet, though different, equality: An Arithmetical equality in Commutation; a Geometricall in diſtribution; the former regarding the value, or worth of the thing; the latter, regarding the proportionable difference of the perſon. The worke of all theſe three Iuſtices, is Peace.

Firſt, the legall Iuſtice is the apparant mother and nurſe of publike Peace: When Gouernors and ſubiects are carefull to giue each other their owne; when both conſpire to command and obey for the common good; when men frame their liues to the wholſome lawes of their Soueraignes, not more out of feare than conſcience; when reſpect to the community caries men from partiall reflections vpon themſelues; As contrarily diſtractions, and priuate ends are the bane of any ſtate. When the head and members vnite their thoughts and endeuours in the center of the common good: the head to deuiſe and command, the eies to ſee, the eare to heare, the palate to taſte, the heart to moue, the bellowes of the lungs to blow, the liuer to ſanguifie, the ſtomach to digeſt, the guts to export, the hands to execute, the tongue to talke for the good of this naturall Common-wealth of the body, all goes well and happily; but if any of theſe parts will bee gathering to themſelues, and obſtructions grow within; and mutinous diſtempers ariſe in the humours, ruine is threatned to the whole: If either the Superiors miſcommand, or the inferiors diſobey, it is an affront to Peace. I need not tell you that good lawes are the wals of the City, the ſinewes of the Politicke body, the rule of our life, the life of our ſtate, without which men would turne brute, yea monſtrous; the world were a Chaos, yea an hell. It is wiſdome that makes lawes, it is Iuſtice that keeps them; Oh let this Iuſtice ſtill bleſſe vs with a perpetuall peace; as thoſe that doe not thinke the world made for vs, but our ſelues made for the world, let vs driue at an vniuerſall good; let there be euer that ſweet correſpondence betwixt Soueraignty and ſubiection, that the one may be happy in the other, both in peace.

Secondly, the diſtributiue Iuſtice is not leſſe fruitfull of peace; when rewards of honors, and gracious reſpects are ſuited to the well-deſeruing; when malefactors ſmart according to their crimes; This Iuſtice hath ſtocks for the vagrant, whips for harlots, brands for petty larzons, ropes for felons, weights for the contumaciouſly ſilent, ſtakes for blaſphemous hereticks, gibbets for murtherers, the hurdle, and the knife, and the pole for traitors; and vpon all theſe engines of Iuſtice hangs the garland of peace. It was not for nothing that Maximilian the Firſt, paſſing by the gallowes, ſaluted it with Salue Iuſtitia. Ye neuer ſee Iuſtice painted without a ſword; when that ſword glitters with vſe, it is well with the publique; woe be to the Nation where it ruſts. There can be no more acceptable ſacrifice than the bloud of the flagitious. Immediately after Garnets execution, Father David at Ypre, in a publike Sermon declared the miracles ſhowne thereat; Amongſt the reſt, that a ſpring of oyle brake forth ſuddenly in the place where that Saint was martyred; In ſtead of a lie, let it be a parable; The bloud of Traitors ſhed by the ſword of Iuſtice, is a well of oyle to fatten, and refreſh the Commonwealth.

I know well how mercy befits the mouths of Gods Miniſters: The ſoft tongue of a Diuine is no meet whetſtone for the edge of ſeuerity; but withall, I dare ſay, that Iuſtice is a noble worke of mercy; neither need we wiſh to bee more charitable, than the God of mercy that ſaies, Thine eie ſhall not ſpare the murtherer, Numb. 35. 31. The Tempter to idolatry, Deut. 13. 6. The very ſonnes of Leui were appointed to win an euerlaſting bleſſing, by conſecrating their hands to God in Iſraelitiſh bloud: The vniuſt fauour, and plauſibility of Romiſh Doctors, towards capitall offenders, hath made their Sanctuaries (euen literally) a denne of theeues, an harbour of villany. It is memorable of Lewis of France, (ſtiled the Saint) that he reuerſed a pardon wrought from him to a malefactor, vpon reading that verſe in the Pſalme, Beati qui faciunt iuſtitiam in omni tempore, Pſal. 106. 3. Bleſſed are they that doe iuſtice at all times: No maruell if one of thoſe foure things which Iſabel of Spaine was wont to ſay, ſhe loued to ſee, were, A theefe vpon the Ladder; Euen through his halter might ſhee ſee the proſpect of peace. Woe bee to them that either for gaine or priuate intereſt ingage themſelues in the ſuit of fauour to maliciouſly bloudy hands; that, by the dam of their bribes labour to ſtop the due courſe of punitiue Iuſtice; theſe, theſe are the enemies of peace; theſe ſtaine the land with that Crimſon die, that cannot bee waſhed out but by many wofull lauers of reuenge: Farre, farre be it from any of you, generous Chriſtians, to endeuour either to corrupt, or interrupt the wayes of iudgement, or for a priuate benefit to croſſe the publike Peace: Woe be to thoſe partiall Iudges, that iuſtifie the wicked, and condemne the innocent; the girdle of whoſe equity ſags downe on that ſide where the purſe hangs: Laſtly, woe to thoſe vnworthy ones that raiſe themſelues by fraud, bribes, ſymonie, ſacriledge; therefore are theſe enemies to the State, becauſe to Peace; and therefore enemies to Peace, becauſe violaters of iuſtice, And the worke of iuſtice is Peace.

Thirdly, that commutatiue Iuſtice workes Peace, needs no other proofe than that all the reall brables and ſuits amongſt men, ariſe from either true or pretended iniuſtice of contracts. Let me leade you in a Terme morning to the ſpacious Hall of Iuſtice: What is the cauſe of all that concourſe? that Hiue-like murmure? that noiſe at the Bar, but iniurious bargaines, fraudulent conueyances, falſe titles, diſappointment of truſts, wrongfull detentions of money, goods, lands, coozenages, oppreſſions, extortions? Could the honeſty and priuate iuſtice of men preuent theſe enormities, ſilence and ſolitude would dwell in that wide Palace of Iuſtice; neither would there be more Pleas than Cob-webs vnder that vaſt roofe. Euery way therefore it is cleare, that the worke of Iuſtice is Peace; In ſo much as the Guardians of Peace are called Iuſticers.

This for the Common-wealth; If it pleaſe you to caſt your eyes vpon her Siſter the Church, you ſhall finde that the outward Peace thereof alſo muſt ariſe from Iuſtice. Alas; thence is our hopeleſneſſe: Neuer may they proſper that loue not, that wiſh not peace within thoſe ſacred wals; but what poſſibility of Peace in the peremptorie repulſes of Iuſtice? What poſſibility of Iuſtice in the long vſurped tyranny of the ſucceſſor of Romulus? Could we hope to ſee Iuſtice once ſhine from thoſe ſeuen hills, we would make account of Peace; but, oh, the miſerable iniuſtice of that imperious Sea; Iniuſtice of claime, iniuſtice of practice. Of claime, ouer Kings, Church, Scriptures, Conſcience: Ouer Kings; there is S. Pauls ſuper-exalted (ὑπεραιρόμενος;) His vſuall title is Orbis Dominus; Dominus vniuerſorum in the mouths and pens of his flatterers: And leſt Princes ſhould ſeeme exempted; he is Rex Regum, as Paulus 4. ſaies of himſelfe; he is ſuper Imperatores & reges, ſaith their Antoninus, Triumphus, Capiſtranus, and who not? How much? you know the calculation of the magnitude of the two great lights: How ouer them? As the maſter ouer the ſeruant; they are the words of their Pope Nicholas; The Imperiall throne is vnde niſi à nobis, ſaith Pope Adrian: What ſhould I tell you of his bridle, ſtirrup, toe, cup, canopy? Let the booke of holy Ceremonies ſay the reſt; Theſe things are ſtale, The world hath long ſeene and bluſhed,

Lord of the world.

Ouer Emperors and Kings.

Whence but from vs?

Ouer the Church; There is challenged a proper head-ſhip, from whom all influences of life, ſenſe, motion come; as their Bozius; why ſaid I ouer? He is vnder the Church: For he is the foundation of the Church, ſaith Bellarmine; Ouer as the head, vnder as the foundation? What can Chriſt be more? Thence, where are generall councels but vnder him, as the ſtreame of Ieſuites; Who but he is, regula fidei, as their Andradius: hee alone hath infallibility and indefectibilitie, whether in decretis fidei, or in præceptis morum, as Bellarmine. He hath power to make new Creeds, and to obtrude them to the Church; the deniall whereof was one of thoſe Articles which Leo the tenth condemned in Luther.

In decrees of faith or precepts of manners.

Ouer Scriptures. There is claimed a power to authorize them for ſuch; A power to interpret them, ſententialiter & Obligatoriè, being ſuch; A power to diſpenſe with them, ex causâ, though ſuch. Ouer the conſciences of men; In diſpenſing with their oathes, in allowance of their ſins. It is one head of their Canon Law, A Iuramento fidelitatis abſoluit, Decret. p. 2. Cauſ. 15. qu. 6. And in euery oath is vnderſtood a reſeruation and exception of the Popes power, ſay his Paraſites.

Hee abſolues from the oath of Allegeance.

I am aſhamed to tell, and you would bluſh to heare the diſpenſation reported to be granted by Sixtus 4. to the family of the Cardinall of S. Lucie; and by Alexander 6. to Peter Mendoza Cardinall of Valentia.

And as there is horrible iniuſtice in theſe claimes; ſo is there no leſſe in practiſe. Take a taſte of all : What can be more vniuſt than to caſt out of the lap of the Church thoſe that oppoſe their nouelties, to condemne them to the ſtake, to hell for Heretickes? What more vniuſt than to falſifie the writings of ancient or moderne Authors, by ſecret expurgations, by wilfull miſ-editions ? what more vniuſt than the withholding the remedy of generall Councels, and tranſacting all the affaires of the Church by a pack't conclaue? What more vniuſt than the ſuppreſſion of the Scriptures, and mutilation of the Sacrament to the Laity ? What more vniuſt than allowance of equiuocation, than vpholding a faction by willing falſhood of rumors, than plotting the ſubuerſion of King and State, by vnnaturall conſpiracies ? Well may wee call heauen and earth to record againſt the vniuſtice of theſe claimes, of theſe practiſes. What then ? Is it to hope for Peace, notwithſtanding the continuance of all theſe ? So the worke of Iniuſtice ſhall be Peace: And an vniuſt and vnſound Peace muſt it needs be that ariſes from iniuſtice ; Is it to hope they will abandon theſe things for Peace ? Oh that the Church of God might once be ſo happy : That there were but any life in that poſſibility ; In the meane time, let God and his holy Angels witneſſe betwixt vs, that on their part the Peace faileth ; we are guiltleſſe : What haue we done ? What haue we attempted ? What haue we innouated ? Only we haue ſtood vpon a iuſt and modeſt negatiue, and haue vniuſtly ſuffered. Oh that all the innocent bloud we haue ſhed could waſh their hands from Iniuſtice, from enmity to Peace.

That from them we may returne to our ſelues ; For the publike, wee enioy an happy Peace ; Bleſſed be God for Iuſtice : and if in this common harmony of Peace, there be found ſome priuate iarres of diſcord, whence is it but from our owne Iniuſtice ? The world is of another minde ; whoſe wont is to cenſure him that puniſhes the fault, not him that makes it ; Seuerity, not guiltineſſe in common opinion, breakes the Peace : Let the queſtion be who is the great make-bate of the world ; begin with the family : Who troubles the houſe ? Not vnruly, headſtrong, debaucht, children, that are ready to throw the houſe out of the windowes, but the auſtere father, that reproues, that corrects them; would he winke at their diſorders, all would be quiet. Not careleſſe, ſlothfull, falſe, limefingred ſeruants, but the ſtrict maſter, that obſerues and rates, and chaſtiſes them; would he hold his hands, and tongue, there would be peace.

The like diſcourſe to this yee ſhall finde in Conra. Schluſſelburgius in his preface to his thirteenth booke Catal. Hæret.

Not the peeuiſh and turbulent wife, who forgetting the rib, vſurps vpon the head, but the reſolute husband, that hates to leeſe his authority in his loue ; remembring that though the rib be neere the heart, yet the head is aboue the ſhoulders ; Would hee fall from the termes of his honour, there would be peace.

In the Country, not the oppreſſing Gentleman, that tyrannizes ouer his cottagers, incroches vpon his neighbours inheritance, incloſes commons, depopulates villages, ſcruzes his Tenants to death, but the poore ſoules that when they are cruſhed, yeeld the iuyce of teares, exhibit bils of complaint, throw open the new thornes, maintaine the old mounds; would theſe men be content to be quietly racked and ſpoiled, there would be peace.

In the City; not the impure Sodomitiſh brothels, that ſell themſelues to worke wickedneſſe ; not the abominable Pandars, not the iugling Cheater, not the Counterfeit Vagrant, but the Marſhall that drawes theſe to correction ; Not the deceitfull Merchant that ſophiſticates his commodities, inhanceth prices, ſels euery inch of (what he cannot warrant) Time ; Not the vnconſcionable and fraudulent Artiſan, but the Promoter and the Bench.

In the common-wealth ; not the cruell robber by ſea or land, that lies in the way, like a ſpider in a window, for a booty, for bloud : Not the bold night-walker that keepes ſauage houres fit for the guilty intentions of his burglaries, but the watch that takes him ; Not the ranke adulterer that neighs after his neighbours wife, and thirſts after onely ſtolne waters, but the ſworne men that preſent him. Not the traiterous Coyner, that in euery ſtampe reades his owne conuiction, whiles he ſtill renewes that face againſt which he offends, but the Sheriffe that attaches him.

Not the vnreformable drunkard, that makes a God of his liquour, a beaſt of himſelfe, and raues, and ſwaggers in his cups, but the Conſtable that puniſhes him; would theſe Officers conniue at all theſe villanies, there would be peace.

In the Church, not the chaffering Patron, or periured Chaplaine; not the ſeducing hereticke, or ſeditious ſchiſmaticke; not the ſcandalous Leuite, not the careleſſe Queſtman, not the corrupt Officiall, but the clamorous Preacher, or the rigorous High-Commiſſion. In the world, laſtly, Not the ambitious incrochers vpon others dominions, not violaters of leagues, not vſurpers of miſ-gotten titles and dignities, not ſuborners, or abettors of conſpiracies, and traitors, but the vnkinde patients that will not recipere ferrum: I wis the great Potentates of the world might ſee a ready way to peace.

Thus in family, countrey, city, common-wealth, church, world, the greateſt part ſeeke a licencious peace in a diſordered lawleſneſſe; condemning true iuſtice of cruelty, ſtripping her of the honour of peace, branding her with the cenſure of troubleſome. Fooliſh men ſpeake fooliſh things: O noble and incomparable bleſſing of peace, how iniuriouſly art thou aſcribed to vniuſt neglect? Oh diuine vertue of iuſtice, how deſeruedly haue the Ancients giuen thee wings, and ſent thee vp to heauen in a deteſtation of theſe earthly indignities; whence thou comſt not downe at all, vnleſſe it pleaſe that eſſentiall and infinite Iuſtice to communicate thee to ſome choiſe fauorites. It is but a iuſt word, that this Iland hath beene long approued the darling of heauen; We haue enioyed peace, to the admiration, to the enuy of neighbour-hood: Would we continue it? would we traduce it to ours? Iuſtice muſt doe it for vs. Both Iuſtice and Peace, are from the throne; Peace is the Kings Peace; and iuſtly deſcends from Soueraignty by cõmiſſion; let me haue leaue to ſay with the princely Prophet (a word that was too good for the frequent text of a Pope) Diligite iuſtitiam qui iudicatis terram. Still, ô God, giue thy Iudgement to the King, & thy Iuſtice to the Kings ſon. And if any ſhall offer wrong to the Lords anointed in his perſon, in his ſeed, the worke of that iniuſtice ſhall be war; yea Bellum Domini, the Lords war; (2 Sam. 25. 28.) Then let him who is both the Lord of Hoſts, and the God of Peace, riſe vp mightily for his anointed, the true King of peace; that he who hath graciouſly ſaid all this while, Da pacem, Domine, Giue peace in our time, O Lord; may ſuperſcribe at the laſt his iuſt Trophees, with, Bleſſed be the Lord which teacheth my hands to warre, and my fingers to fight.

Ye haue heard of the ſpirituall Iuſtice and Peace; Ye haue heard of the Ciuill; may it pleaſe you to mix both of them together: My text alone doth it; if you doe but with our moſt accurate Tranſlation, read Righteouſneſſe for Iuſtice; So ſhall you ſee the ſpirituall diſpoſition of Righteouſneſſe produce the ciuill effect of Peace. What is righteouſneſſe, but the ſincere vprightneſſe of the heart to God in all our wayes? He is perfect with God, that would be ſo.

Not to be guilty of ill.

What need I tell you that this is the way to true inward Peace, Nil conſcire, A cleare heart will be a quiet one. There is no feaſt to a good conſcience; this is meat, muſicke, welcome; It ſeemes harder that true ſpirituall honeſty ſhould procure euen outward peace: Heare wiſe Salomon; By the bleſſing of the vpright, the city is exalted, Prou. 11. 11. When a mans wayes pleaſe the Lord, he maketh euen his enemies to be at peace with him, Pr. 16. 7. Righteouſnes exalteth a nation, but ſin is a reproach to any people, Pro. 14. 24. It followes then as a iuſt corollary, That the honeſteſt, and conſcionableſt man is the beſt ſubiect: He may perhaps be plaine, perhaps poore, perhaps weake, but the ſtate is more beholden to his integrity, than to the ableſt purſe, than to the ſtrongeſt arme; Whereas the graceleſſe, & vicious perſon, let him be neuer ſo plauſible a talker, neuer ſo carefull an officer, neuer ſo valiant a Leader, neuer ſo officious a Courtier, neuer ſo deep in ſubſidies, neuer ſo forward in actions, is no other than an enemy to the ſtate, which he profeſſes to adore.

An il man a good ſubiect.

Let no Philoſopher tell me of, malus vir bonus ciuis; I ſay from better authority, that a lewd man can no more be a good ſubiect, than an ill ſubiect can be a good man: Heare this then (whereſoeuer ye are) ye ſecret oppreſſors, ye profane ſcoffers, ye foule mouth'd ſwearers, ye cloſe adulterers, ye kind drunkards, and who euer come within this blacke liſt of wickedneſſe, how can yee be loyall, whiles you lodge traitors in your boſomes? Proteſt what ye will; your ſinnes breake the peace, and conſpire againſt the ſacred

Crowne and dignity of your Soueraigne; What care we that you draw your ſword, and vow your bloud, and drinke your healths to your Gonernours, when in the meane while you prouoke God to anger, and ſet quarrels betwixt your Country and Heauen?

That I may winde vp this clew; It were folly to commend to you the worth of peace; we know that the excellency of Princes is expreſſed by ſerenity; what good hath the earth which God doth not couch vnder the name of Peace? Bleſſed be God, and his Annointed, we haue long and comfortably taſted the ſweetneſſe of his bleſſing; the Lilies and Lions of our Salomon haue beene iuſtly worded with Beati pacifici: Would we haue this happineſſe perpetuated to vs, to poſterity? Oh let Prince and people meet in the ambition to be Gens iuſta, a righteous nation, righteous euery way; Firſt, let God haue his owne; His owne dayes, his owne ſeruices; his feare, his loue, his all: Let Religion leade all our proiects, not follow them; let our liues be led in a conſcionable obedience to all the Lawes of our Maker: Farre be all Blaſphemies, curſes, and obſcenities from our tongues, all outrages and violences from our hands; all preſumptuous and rebellious thoughts from our hearts. Let our hearts, hands, tongues, liues, bodies and ſoules be ſincerely deuoted to him. Then, for men: let vs giue Cæſar his owne: Tribute, feare, ſubiection, loyalty, and (if he need) our liues; Let the Nobility haue honour, obeiſance, obſeruation; Let the Clergie haue their dues, and our reuerence; Let the commons haue truth, loue, fidelity in all their tranſactions: Let there bee trutina iuſta, pondera iuſta: Let there be no grinding of faces, no trampling on the poore (Amos 5. 11.) no ſwallowing of widowes houſes, no force, no fraud, no periury, no perfidiouſneſſe.

Leu. 19. 36. Iuſt balances, iuſt weights.

Finally, for our ſelues; let euery man poſſeſſe his veſſell in holineſſe and honour; framing himſelfe to all Chriſtian and heauenly temper, in all wiſdome, ſobrietie, chaſtity, meekneſſe, conſtancie, moderation, patience, and ſweet contentation: ſo ſhall the worke of our righteouſneſſe be peace of heart, peace of ſtate; priuate and publike peace; Peace with our ſelues, peace with the world, peace with God; temporall peace here, eternall peace and glory aboue; vnto the fruition whereof, he who hath ordained vs, mercifully bring vs, for the ſake of him, who is the Prince of Peace, Ieſus Chriſt the righteous.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD,

EDWARD Lord DENNY, Baron of WALTHAM, all health and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

I Might well perceiue by the Author that this Sermon was neuer intended to bee publiſhed, in any other Language than that wherein it was firſt ſpoken: being in reſpect of the matter, in a ſort appropriate to that Auditory wherein it was deliuered; But beſides the common deſire of many, finding the tranſlation attempted by diuers, and performed by ſome in ſuch a manner as did not altogether ſatisfie; It pleaſed my Father herein to improue my leiſure; wherein, howſoeuer I may haue ſomewhat failed of the firſt elegancy, yet I haue not bin far ſhort of the ſenſe. I haue preſumed to dedicate the ſame to your Lordſhip, in reſpect of your many fauours, and my obligations, for which (beſides this officious, though vnequall requitall) I ſhal ſtil vow my prayers for your Lordſhip, and remaine,

NOAH'S DOVE.

YEe are here met (which I humbly wiſh, may proue euery way proſperous, and happy to the Church of God) moſt Reuerend Father in God, Reuerend Biſhops, venerable Deanes, Archdeacons, Brethren of the Clergie, by the prouidence of our good God, and the command of our gracious Soueraigne, to hold an holy Conuocation this day.

Bleſſed Paul, in whoſe name this ancient pile doth not a little pride it ſelfe, ſalutes you by my vnworthy tongue, and as if hee were preſent, addreſſes himſelfe to you, and exhorts you

In his former Epiſtle to the Corinthians, the 12 Chapter, verſe 4.

There are diuerſities of gifts, but the ſame ſpirit; there are diuerſities of miniſteries, but the ſame Lord, and there are diuerſities of operations, but the ſame God, &c.

SEe I beſeech you, the meet correſpondence of all things. Yee are met in one, and here is vnity; Yee are many of you met from the vtmoſt parts of this large Prouince, and here is manifold diuerſity; yee are met the floure of our Engliſh Clergie, learned and exquiſite Diuines, and here are diuerſities of gifts; Yee are met, the Lords and Commons of our ſacred function, and here are diuerſities of miniſteries; Yee are met for the holy affaires of the Church, and here are operations; Yee are met (as I verily hope, and wiſh) in vnity of Spirit, and here is one Spirit; Ye are laſtly met to conſecrate your ſelues, your gifts, Miniſteries, Operations, to the ſeruice of our Lord God; and here is that Lord, that God whom we profeſſe to ſerue.

Now that ſame God, that ſame Lord Ieſus Chriſt, that ſame holy Spirit, be preſent with vs all this day; and by his bleſſed influences guide and gouerne this ſacred meeting, and happily direct all our councels and endeuours to the glory of his owne great name, the ſaluation of our ſoules, and the aſſured edification of his Church, through Ieſus Chriſt.

See here then, Honoured Prelates, and beloued Brethren, the loope or combination of both worlds; Both the worlds of our Diuinity; The greater world, God; the leſſer world, Man ; What is there that can ſo much concerne vs to know, to behold ? Will ye looke vp to God ? He is one in eſſence (ὁ αὐτὸς) Three in Perſon, The Father, Lord, Spirit. He is three in one, and one in three ; The Father, Lord, Spirit, one and the ſame God.

Will yee caſt your eye to Man ? yee ſhall ſee him not ſingle, but branched into infinite diuerſitie; not bare and naked, but furniſhed with gifts; not ſuperfluous, but deſtin'd to due ſeruices ; not idle, but buſie in meet operations : Neither are theſe operations, ſeruices, gifts, all of one kinde, but diuerſly diſtinguiſhed, and varied : And whence are theſe ſo manifold graces, ſo diuers imployments, but from one God, the Father, Lord, Spirit ? And wherefore are all theſe, but that theſe operations, miniſteries, gifts, proceeding from one God, Lord, Spirit, may be directed to one, and may end as they began, in a perfect vnity ?

O maruellous coniunction of diuine and humane things ; O vnutterable communion of heauen and earth ; Wherein is laid forth vnto vs the intire reſpects and vnion of God to himſelfe by conſubſtantialitie, of God to man by munificence, of man to God by the bond of thankfulneſſe, of men to each other by the bond of charity, of gifts to miniſteries, of miniſteries to operations, of all to all.

I ſhall not now need, neither indeed would it befit me, in ſo awfull an aſſembly of Diuines to dwell vpon Catecheticall points, concerning the myſterie of the ſacred Trinitie ; Although this labour is well worthy of you elſwhere, my brethren, and ſuch as (if I may perſwade you) you ſhall carefully beſtow at home ; This familiar kinde of teaching the word of the beginnings of Chriſt is growne out of faſhion ; Like ambitious Orators, wee ouerlooke this popular ſtraine, and are carried to an affectation of perfection. Yee ſee how the Heron can ſoare high, yet liues, for the moſt part, in the loweſt valley ; builds in the talleſt trees, yet feeds in the humble mariſhes ; So doe yee, my deare fellow-labourers, not ſo much caring to ſhew your ſelues learned, as to make your people ſo.

This by the way. Such as God is, ſuch he expreſſes himſelfe to vs ; and ſuch as hee expreſſes himſelfe to vs, ſuch he formes vs to himſelfe : As the Sunne looking vpon a cloud fitly diſpoſed, for that purpoſe, imprints in that moiſt glaſſe a certaine bright image of himſelfe ; ſo doth God to his Church ; From that Celeſtiall and diuine Trinity, therefore, is here apparently deduced another Trinity, ſublunarie and humane ; Of gifts, miniſteries, operations ; From the ſpirit are deriued gifts ; miniſteries from the Sonne, operations from the Father ; There are diuerſities of gifts, but the ſame ſpirit ; of miniſteries, but the ſame Lord ; of operation, but the ſame God.

Away with all niceties of Pythagorean calculations; All numbers are alike to me, ſaue thoſe which God himſelfe hath chalked out vnto vs ; as here hee hath manifeſtly done. In one word ; An Vnitie and a Trinity make vp this golden ſentence. There is a Trinity in this Vnity ; There is an Vinity in this Trinitie ; Firſt, here is a perfect (that is, a Triple) Trinitie ; A Trinity of diuerſities, a Trinitie of faculties, a Trinitie of giuers ; For there are ſo many diuerſities as faculties, and ſo many faculties, as giuers ; The faculties are three ; gifts, miniſteries, operations ; The giuers three, The Father, the Sonne, the Spirit, which all are included in one Vnity (τῷ αὐτῷ) the ſame God ; And yet euen that Vnity hath his diſtinction, whiles gifts are (as it were) by a ſpecialty aſcribed to the Spirit, miniſteries to the Sonne, to the Father operations.

That our diſcourſe may not ſeeme too perplexed, wee will follow the foot-ſteps of our Apoſtle, and with all poſſible perſpicuity, will apply the diuerſities to the faculties, the faculties to the giuers ; Theſe Trinities to their Vnity, and (this done) draw to a briefe concluſion.

A threefold Diuerſity argues multiplicitie ; What meant the Ancients to dreame but of three Graces ? there are a thouſand graces, gifts infinite ; Looke vpon all the grandchildren of Adam, that euer were ; amongſt ſo many thouſand millions of faces, ye ſhall eaſily obſerue ſome varietie of fauours ; It is a wonder to ſee what diuerſitie of formes there is, in that which we call beauty ; No twins are ſo like as not to bewray ſome diſſimilitude ; Certainly there is not ſo great variety of faces, as of mindes ; As features are to the countenance, ſo are gifts to the minde ; Each one hath ſome, all haue many, none haue all ; There are diuerſities of gifts.

Salmeron, with Caietan, vnderſtands here thoſe gifts which wee call Gratias gratis datas, Graces freely giuen ; wherein he ſaies true, but not enough ; For as the old word is, Fauours muſt be enlarged ; and thoſe gifts which make vs gracious are beſt worthy of this name ; It is not amiſſe that Hugo reckons vp three ſorts of Gods gifts to man ; Gifts of nature, of grace, of glory : By the gifts of nature we are men, by the gifts of grace we are holy, by the gifts of glory, we ſhall be bleſſed. The gifts of nature are memory, reaſon, will, wherein we excell the brute creatures ; The gifts of grace are faith, hope, charity, wherein we goe beyond the Deuills ; The gifts of glory, eternall and true bleſſedneſſe ; bleſſed and eternall truth, true and bleſſed eternitie, wherein wee are equall to the Angels ; Amongſt the gifts of nature the ſame Author reckons ſome to be of the loweſt ranke, ſome of the meane, ſome of the higheſt ; In the loweſt, he accounts beauty and health of body ; In the meane hee accounts the faculties of the minde ; In the higheſt, the vertues of the ſoule ; Thus there are diuerſities of gifts.

There are ſome gifts of Regeneration ; there are ſome gifts of our calling ; by the former, we are borne againe for our owne good ; with the latter, wee are furniſhed, for the good of others ; Theſe latter are peculiarly beſtowed vpon ſeuerall men, the former are by a certaine common propriety beſtowed vpon all the Saints of God ; For, as in the moſt wiſe diſpoſition of this vniuerſe, the beſt things, and thoſe which are neceſſary for the ſuſtentation of life, as aire, light, fire, water, are abundantly giuen to all, but thoſe things which ſerue only for ornament and pleaſure, as Gold, Pearle, Precious ſtones, are more ſparingly beſtowed vpon ſome few ; ſo euery ſauing grace is abundantly diſpenſed to all Saints, by the liberall hand of God , Whereas tongues, prophecie, power of miracles, as alſo eloquence, skill, honour, and the reſt of this kinde, are reſerued onely for ſome few receiuers ; And in all theſe, what ſtrange diuerſity there is ? They differ in reſpect of themſelues, being in nature diuers from each other ; They differ in reſpect of the Subiect, as being diuerſly giuen to one, and other ; for as the blinde Bard ſaw truly, God doth not giue all to all ; They differ in reſpect of degree, as they are more giuen to one, than to other. Thus euery way there are diuerſities of gifts.

It is the common voice of nature, that the ſame remaining the ſame cannot produce but the ſame ; but, when we ſpeake of the God of Nature ; that word of Bonauenture is more true ; Ab vniſſimo Deo manant multiforma, ab æterno temporalia ; From that moſt one God flowes multiformity of effects, and from that eternall God, temporall effects. Hugo ſaid well, In te variatur qui in ſe non mutatur ; he is varied in thee, who is not changed in himſelfe : If the diuine power had made onely one creature, that alonely worke of his had beene worthy of a God, and ſuch as could proceed from no leſſe than an omnipotent hand ; But now he hath created many things, yea innumerable ; If God had made theſe many creatures altogether vniforme and like themſelues ; onely diſtinguiſhed in number, not in forme ; the worke had beene more excellent and admirable, than the frame of any one creature alone ; but now, that hee hath made theſe many, theſe innumerable creatures, no leſſe different from themſelues, and ſo, as that the difference of their formes ſtriues with the praiſe of their number ; O the depth of diuine wiſdome ! O the ſtupendious workmanſhip of omnipotencie ! And yet there is no Subiect wherein the power and prouidence of the Almighty doth ſo much magnifie it ſelfe, as in the diuers Oeconomie of man ; In ſo much as in this little world, there is a world of diuerſities ; Maruell at your ſelues, brethren, and be aſtoniſhed at your owne proſpects ; Whether we looke at the faſhion of the face, or the proportion of parts, or the colour of the skin, or the ſtature of the body, or the indowments of the minde, the degrees of faculties, the diſpoſition of nature, the meaſure of graces, the opportunities of ſtations, or laſtly the outward condition of our life ; O good God what wondrous diuerſity is here ; how impoſſible is it for the eye to meet twiſe with the like obiect, whitherſoeuer it roueth? Thus there are diuerſities of gifts.

Away now from hence, with all haughtineſſe of pride, all mutinies of enuie; Theſe two dangers will bee ſure to haunt the moſt iuſt inequality; the needy is enuious, the rich is proud.

Poore I am contemned, others are ſet vp; others ſhine in ſcarlet, and purple, whiles I am patching of naſty ragges; Others wallow in their wealth and exceſſe, I famiſh for hunger; others Lord it in lofty ſeats, I am trod vnder their foot-ſtooles; Others are eloquent, I am a ſtammerer: Others excell in the skill of Arts and Tongues, I am a ſilly ignorant; And why ſhould not I? Oh foole, theſe that thou talkeſt of, are gifts, and therefore freely beſtowed where it pleaſes the giuer; What doth he owe to thee, that hath giuen theſe things to others? Withall, know, there are diuerſities of gifts; God hath perhaps denied thee heapes of red and white earth, but hee hath giuen thee ſtrength of body; At how high a rate would the great ones of the world buy that bleſſing of thine? He hath denied thee eloquence, hee hath yet giuen thee ſharpneſſe of wit; he hath denied thee honour, but he hath giuen thee ſweet reſt, quiet ſecurity; hee hath denied thee preferment, he hath not denied thee health. Goe then, and enuie the great mans weake ſtomach, ſleepleſſe nights, racks of cares; enuie, to him, if thou canſt, the ſlipperie ſtaires of the Court, and the common enuie of the moſt; He wants ſomething which thou enioyeſt, and ſomething he hath which is denied thee; He had rather make choice of thy condition, thou of his; Each of you hath his owne, neither of you ſhall haue all; neither ſhall haue both; There are diuerſities of gifts.

Yea, and we new-blowne bladders, how eaſily are we puft vp with euery blaſt of gifts; I am not like other men; How baſe are the vulgar of men? I ſit gloriouſly impurpled, other fellowes may be glad to licke the duſt of my footſtoole; I am inriched with all liberall ſciences, this people which know not the Law, are accurſed; I haue skill of tongues, others are rude Idiots; I leade the amazed hearers by the eares whither I liſt, through the power of my oratory, others freeze and languiſh in their Pulpits. Heare, O thou proud man; Theſe things whereof thou braggeſt, are not thine owne; what haſt thou that thou haſt not receiued? All theſe are gifts; And art thou thus happy alone? Vaine boaſter, thou knoweſt not others, thou knoweſt not thy ſelfe; There are diuerſities of gifts which thy thoughts reach not vnto: Sit thou aloft, and cheare thy ſelfe with the bowed knees of thy ſuppliants, they are happier men than thy ſelfe that are glad to lie cloſe, and affect a quiet and ſafe obſcurity: Be thou more learned than another, that other perhaps is wiſer than thou; be thou more eloquent than another man, that other is perhaps more iudicious; If thy tongue be richer than anothers, his minde is richer than thine.

It is reported, that in the houſe of worthy M. Luther was found written; Res & verba Philippus, Res ſine verbis Lutherus, Verba ſine re Eraſmus; Melancton was words and matter; Luther, matter without words; Eraſmus, words without matter; Euery one hath his owne ſhare; Neither art thou furniſhed with all gifts; nor that other with none; Let not him enuie thee; neither doe thou contemne him; Rather both, apply your ſelues to caſt in the ſhot of your contributions to the publique good: For to what end hath our bountifull God ſhowred downe theſe diuers kinds of gifts from heauen vpon man, but that he might hereby prouide for the common profit and welfare of mankinde?

Why hath the blinde man legges, and the lame man eyes, but that the one may exchange with the other, for the benefit of both? Thinkeſt thou that God meant to heape his gifts vpon thee for thine owne ſake onely? Fie on this ſhamefull ſelfe-loue; Surely he that made thee, made thee for a conduit-pipe to conuay, not a Ciſterne to hold the water of his graces. God hath clothed you, (as ye well know, Reuerend Prelates) with this ſacred purple, that you ſhould ſhine before others as conſpicuous Guides of that ſtrait and hard way of life; and that by your well-beſtowed honors you ſhould credit his Church, and be the ſeruants of many.

Ye perceiue now, I imagine, how vnexpectedly my ſpeech is glided from Gifts to Miniſteries; The Author of theſe Gifts, the Spirit of God, leads me by S. Pauls hand; who preſently vpon the mention of gifts, ſubioynes miniſteries, and vpon the mention of miniſteries, addes operations. This moſt munificent Spirit (τὸ πνεῦμα) (that with Athanaſius we may note the force of the Article) hath enabled the moſt of you, Fathers and brethren, with an eminent meaſure of gifts: With what powers of the minde, what ſingular learning, what powerfull eloquence, with how great wiſdome, with what grauitie, with what titles of honour, with what large dignities? It is a great word that I ſhall ſpeake, and yet I muſt, and will ſay it, without all, either arrogance or flattery; Stupor mundi Clerus Britannicus; The wonder of the world is the Clergie of Britaine, So many learned Diuines, ſo many eloquent Preachers ſhall in vaine bee ſought elſewhere this day, in whateuer region vnder the cope of heauen; What ſhould I reckon vp thoſe great lights of our Church, not long ſince ſet; Iuels, Humfreys, Foxes, Whitgifts, Fulkes, Whitakers, Raynolds, Bilſons, Greenams, Babingtons, Eedeſes, Hollands, Playſers, Abbotſes, Perkinſes, Fields, Hookers, Ouerалls, Willets, Whites, Maſons? There are now of you vnder this very roofe, that heare me this day, in whoſe iuſt praiſes I could be content to ſpend not an houre, but a life, were it not that mutuall modeſtie inioynes me ſilence: How great ſoeuer yee are, yee are not your owne; All theſe gifts end in ſeruices. Oh let it pleaſe you to ſtir vp this grace of God in you; and faithfully to imploy all theſe your gifts to the happy aduancement of your miniſteries; in the practiſe of your life, (as in the courſe of my ſpeech) Let the Diuerſities of gifts bee taken vp with the Diuerſities of miniſteries.

There are then as differences of gifts, ſo of miniſteries; And which be they? Differences in offices, and in degrees; There were Apoſtles, Prophets, Euangeliſts; There are, were, ſhall be Biſhops, Preſbyters, Deacons; Theſe are more than one ranke of Miniſters; It was part of the exploded hereſie of Ærius that tooke away theſe three ſteps of the Clergie, as the Synod of Carthage calls them. Yea, and ſomewhere, Ierome himſelfe ſmarts with the laſh of this cenſure, as if perhaps hee did more fauour of Ærius, than of Tully; Not without open wrong in both; but I may not now ſtay vpon needleſſe Apologies; There is none of you, I hope, can bee ſo witleſſe as to queſtion theſe diuerſities of Miniſteries; Did they euer reade Hiſtories that doubt of this point? Sure, they haue neuer ſo much as ſeene them: Turne ouer all the monuments of Times, and places, ſo farre as euer Chriſtendome hath ſpred it ſelfe, you ſhall finde nothing more euident; I will not here ſtand to abridge the Annalls of all Ages, and Regions; Looke vpon the Councells; and firſt of all, the firſt and chiefe of thoſe which are ſtiled Generall, the great Councell of Nice; You ſhall there ſee three hundred and eighteene Biſhops, ſo many as Abraham had ſouldiers in the victory ouer the Kings, as Ambroſe wittily alludeth. But perhaps they were then but newly inſtituted, newly receiued in the Church; No ſuch matter; Thoſe Fathers profeſſe it to be (ἀρχαῖα ἔθη) the ancient guiſe, that the Biſhop of Alexandria ſhould be ouer Egypt, Libya, Pentapolis, as the Biſhop of Rome was ouer his Suburbicarie Churches: Doe but heare Polycrates Biſhop of Epheſus, an old man of aboue threeſcore, ſolemnly proteſting that he ſucceeded his Grand-fathers, and great-grand-fathers, for ſeuen ſucceſſiue generations, in the ſame Epiſcopall chaire. Heare but Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement, Dorotheus, Euſebius, deſcribing and recording the Biſhops of Antioch, Alexandria, Hieruſalem, Rome, in the vndoubted order of their ſucceſſions, not onely by their numbers, but by their names alſo. Certainly, neuer day lookt forth ſince the age of the Apoſtles, wherein the Spouſe of Chriſt wanted the attendance of theſe Bride-men: But what doe I vrge this? The Sun is in the heauen, and ſhines there: Euen Ierome himſelfe, though but a Preſbyter, and a ſtout Champion of his owne order, yet deduceth this difference of degrees from the cradle of the firſt Schiſme, from the common decree of the firſt Church, from tradition Apoſtolicall; yea, when Saint Paul wrote this to his Corinthians, that iarring word had ſounded in the Church, I am Pauls, I am Apolloes, I am Cephaes, and therefore euen then had theſe differences beene.

Differences perhaps in Order, you will ſay, not in Degree; Yes, both in Order, and in Power, too; There were thoſe whom Saint Paul calls (προεστῶτας ϗ ἡγουμένους) Preſidents

and

and Rulers; I whom Ignatius cals (κρατοῦντας) Gouernours; Dionyſius, Hierarchs; Cyprian, Ouerſeers; to whom Saint Paul attributes Power of reformation and correction; to whom the Canons of the Apoſtles giue the power of ſentence or conſtitution; Ignatius, chiefety and authority; Euſebius, out of Egeſippus, the throne of Epiſcopalitie; Cyprian, the vigor and authority of the chaire; Origen, the higheſt pitch of the Church; Ierome, a peereleſſe and eminent power; The Councell of Sardis, the height of gouernment; and laſtly, Epiphanius an order generatiue of Fathers. But what doe I gleaning after the harueſt of ſo great Authors as haue diſcuſſed this point?

Oh how oft, and with what deepe ſighes hath this moſt flouriſhing and happy Church of England wiſht, that ſhe might with ſome of her owne bloud haue purchaſed vnto her deareſt Siſters abroad, the retention of this moſt ancient, and euery way beſt forme of gouernment; Which might happily alſo haue taken place, if they had met with ſuch a Monarchicall reformation, as (through the bleſſing of God) was deſigned vnto vs; Now they are faine to vndergoe that adminiſtration, Prouiſionally onely (if we may beleeue wiſe and learned Fregevil) which the neceſſity of their condition doth for the time caſt vpon them: The God of heauen raiſe them vp Queenes for their nurſes, and Kings for their nurſing-fathers, that they may once enioy with vs this happy bleſſing of the ſequence and ſubordination of degrees; in the meane time I dare with Ignatius profeſſe to put my ſoule (ἀντίψυχος &c.) in pawne for the ſafe obſeruation of this excellent order; Which, if it haue euer not happily ſucceeded to any region, or Church, it is the fault of the perſon, not of the inſtitution it ſelfe, which cannot iuſtly be deemed other, than wholſome, holy, diuine.

But remember, I beſeech you, in the meane while, (Reuerend Fathers) that theſe are (διακονίαι) miniſteries; a word raked out of the very duſt, leſt it ſhould not imply humility enough; Yee are graced with Honours by the pious munificence of Princes; But our Lord Ieſus Chriſt (ye know) vſes to meaſure your honours by your ſeruices; Ye are Fathers of the Church, but Sons of the Bride-chamber; Peeres of the ſtate, but ſeruants of the Church; Generals of this warfare, but with S. Paul, fellow-ſouldiers; Rulers in Gods houſe, but withall, fellow-ſeruants; Intreat your Clergie kindly, vſe them familiarly, as knowing your ſelues to be Fathers in dignity, brethren in ſeruice; Ye know the counſell of Saint Ambroſe; Let thoſe of the Clergie, within your charge, be as limmes of your owne body: God hath called you Starres and Angels; Imitate ye the Starres, which the higher they are, the leſſer they are wont to appeare; Imitate ye the Angels, who though Peeres of heauen, yet are wont to approue themſelues miniſtring ſpirits for the pooreſt of Gods Saints; No ſpectacle can be more odious than a proud Prelate.

But heare mee alſo, O yee Laicks, take heed of contemning this ſacred function: Theſe are miniſteries indeed, but glorious and honourable: To ſerue God, is to rule and command; And what is it euen to ſerue you? Surely thoſe heauenly Spirits, thoſe principalities and powers doe the very ſame to vs continually; whom yet their loue and ſeruice, hath neuer drawne into contempt; We beſeech you Brethren, that you know them which labour amongſt you, and are ouer you in the Lord, and admoniſh you, and hold them deare for their works ſake.

We haue diſpatched the Diuerſities of Miniſteries: now followes that of Operations; God hath not ordained to himſelfe idle ſereices, but buſie and painfull; One gouerns, another teaches, a third doth both teach and gouerne, worthy therefore of double honour, for his rule, for his labour. And he that gouernes, ſometimes muſt ſtrike with the rod, ſometimes with the ſword; One while hee muſt kindly allure, another while he muſt ſharply puniſh; hee muſt vphold the falling, retaine the wauering, reduce the wandering; And for him that teaches, it is not onely the charge of doctrine that lies vpon him, but of reproofe, of correction, of inſtruction in righteouſneſſe. One while he directs with counſels, then he erects with promiſes; then againe he deiects with threatnings, he wounds the whole, ſalues the wounded, workes alwaies: The office of a Biſhop is (καλὸν ἔργον) a worthy worke; Whoſoeuer playes in this holy Chaire, ſhall once waile in hell: Saint Bernard ſaid well in that famous Epiſtle of his, to Henricus Senonenſis; Many would not ſo eagerly run to honours, if they could thinke them burdens; Certainly they would feare to bee cruſhed with this weight, neither would with ſo much paine and perill gape for euery promotion; Thus he. But will it pleaſe you withall, to heare what that pious Cenſor caſts in the teeth of his owne times; Sola attenditur gloria, & non pœna; Curritur in clero paſſim, &c. The dignity only is cared for, not the duty; Men of all Ages, and ranks in the Clergy, learned and vnlearned, run to ſpirituall Cures, as if they might liue for euer, Sine curis, when once they haue gotten Cures of ſoules; Doe you marke well this Propheſie (for ſuch it might ſeeme) of the Oracle of Clareuall? Would to God this were not the very diſeaſe of our times. There be ſome delicate peeces that thruſt themſelues into fat benefices, onely that they may make much of one; and giue themſelues ouer to their pleaſure, and eaſe; Euen of thoſe mouthes which are ſacred to God, there want not ſome, which out of a wanton cuſtome ſauour of nothing but Indian ſoot; and take more pleaſure to put forth a cloud of ſmoake, than the thundrings and lightnings of the Law: Some negligent paſtorlings there are, which haue more heed to their owne hides, than to the ſoules of their people. I ſpeake plaine truth, in a plaine faſhion, nuda nudè, as that faithfull monitor profeſſes.

Howſoeuer, I beſeech you, brethren, ſuffer your ſelues to be ſtirred with this poore ſpeech of mine: Euen ſleeping lions are wont to be awakened with the ſting of a gnat. Are theſe the Operations, the diuerſities whereof call God their Father? God indeed, but Deum ventrem; that beaſtly deity, the belly; I tremble to adde the reſt, but I muſt; whoſe glory is their ſhame, whoſe end is damnation. Is it now time for vs to play, and keepe holy-day? Behold two cruell enemies are vpon vs, Impiety and ſuperſtition, and doe we either ſit ſtill with our hands folded, or riſe, and in a wilfull careleſneſſe open the gates to our enemie? That ſoueraigne Maſter of ours the great Houſholder of the world, when he was to goe forth into a farre Countrey, yea rather, when he was to returne to his owne euerlaſting countrey and Ours, committed to euery one of vs one talent at the leaſt, to ſome more; and bade vs, Negotiamini dum venio; Traffique till I côme; Loe he bade vs Negotiari, not nepotari; To trade, not to trifle, to labour, not to deboſhe. And is this the traffique which he requires, to ſeeke our owne, to take our eaſe, to ſay nothing, to doe worſe? No, theſe are thoſe vncleane napkins rather, wherein we haue ſlothfully hid the Talents, which we ſhould haue improued to the gaine of our Maſter, by putting them into the hands of the Exchangers. That awfull Iudge of heauen and earth will be ſure vpon his returne to call vs to an account; which if we muſt giue for our idle words, why not alſo for our idle ſilence, as Ambroſe wittily? What ſhall wee wretched creatures then anſwer for our ſelues? Where ſhall we appeare? It is a fearefull word, O euill ſeruant, but more fearefull, that which followes, Bring him hither, and kill him before me; Oh then, let me intreat you, let me adiure you brethren, by the deare reſpect to your own ſoules, by the bowels, yea by the wounds, and precious bloud of Ieſus Chriſt, by that dreadfull Tribunall, before which we muſt al, one day, ſtand, that you carefully endeuour to ſet forth and accompliſh your miniſteries with all holy operations; Preach the Word, be inſtant, in ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon, reproue, exhort with all long-ſuffering and doctrine. Let euery of vs ſtudy to approue himſelfe vnto God, a labourer that ſhall not be aſhamed, and a right diuider of the Word of Truth; Oh ſweet Word, and ſuch as in compariſon whereof the very harmony of heauen ſounds harſhly, Well done good ſeruant; thou haſt beene faithfull in a little, enter into thy maſters ioy. Oh let it be our onely ambition, deare brethren, that we may once heare this Word; Let vs worke that which God hath commanded, and God ſhall bee ſure to crowne that which we haue wrought.

Yea and ye (Honored Fathers) who are this day met to conſult of the weighty affaires both of Church and Common-wealth, Worke now; If euer ye haue wrought heretofore, if euer ye will worke heareafter, Now worke; A large doore and effectuall is opened vnto you, and many aduerſaries; ye ſee how audacious Will-worſhip hath of late ſet vpon vs ; how proudly the Tridentine faith hath aduanced her creſt, and hath dared to flie fiercely in the very face of the Goſpell : The Romiſh forces put themſelues openly into aray, and haue dared to ſound not an alarme onely, but (which no wiſe man knowes whether he ſhould more ſtampe at or ſcorne) a victorie: They preſume to erect here amongſt vs an Hierarchy emulous to yours, and in the time of your life, and health, and vigor, appoint what heires ſhall ſucceed in your Seas : What wiſe ſpectator can thinke this indignity to be endured ? Is this to bee ſmoothered in ſilence ? Is this to be any longer winked at ? Rouſe vp your ſelues, O yee holy Fathers, if there be any ardor of Piety in your breſts, and deſtroy this Tyberine Monſter, (Popery, I meane) with the breath of your mouthes : and what euer grace and authority yee haue with our Gratious King, with the Peeres, and commons of this Realme, improue it all with your beſt prayers and counſells, to the vtter extermination of Idolatry, to the happy victory, and aduancement of the ſincere Truth of God.

And thus ye ſee with how ſwift a pace I haue run ouer theſe Operations, Miniſteries, Gifts, and the diuerſities of them all; One thing onely remaines to bee duly conſidered of vs ; and that is, That all theſe Miniſteries, Gifts, Operations, doe flow from one and the ſame, Spirit, Lord, and God ; This Trinity from an Vnity ; Wherein yee eaſily diſcouer the Emphaſis to lie not ſo much in the Author, as in the Identity ; (τοῦ αὐτοῦ) I ſhall not therefore in the remainder of my diſcourſe proſecute, either the wonderfull wiſdome, of abſolute perfection, or the bountifull liberality of God, but rather driue my ſpeech to the conſideration of the Vnity of this gracious giuer of all theſe.

Wee ſilly men, in the height of our bounty, beſtow ſome one fauour vpon ſome one Subiect ; But this one God hath beſtowed all vpon all, and vpon euery one, ſome: Neither may we conceiue of any other, whether fountaine, or Ocean of good ; And why hath our Apoſtle ſo carefully beaten vpon this point ; vrging not ſo much the beneficence, as the vnity of the Giuer ? Surely, as Salmeron gueſſes well, vt ſchiſmatum radices euelleret, that he might pull vp the roots of ſchiſmes : For if there were diuers giuers, there might be ſome reaſon for euery ſect to ſtand for the author of his owne gift, of his owne miniſterie ; But now, that one and the ſame Spirit hath giuen to euery one theſe diuers gifts, that one and the ſame Lord hath appointed to euery one theſe diuers miniſteries, that one and the ſame God hath diſtributed to euery one theſe diuers operations ; Why ſhould not all theſe gifts, miniſteries, operations vnanimouſly conſpire to the glory of that one giuer and founder of them all ?

Certainly, euery thing here ſounds of vnity : The Church is an intire body (as our Apoſtle ſpeakes ſoone after) we are members of it : One man is an eye, another, an eare, a third is a tongue ; One is a palate, another an hand, another a foot ; yea one is a Thumbe, another a little finger or (if lower yet) a ioint of that ſmall limme ; Wee muſt all concurre in our deſires and endeuours to the conſtitution, and maintenance of this one bodie ; Whoſoeuer he be that doth otherwiſe, hee is iuſtly found guilty, not onely of the violation of the publike weale, but of Diuine Vnity ; And now, O ye Reuerend Fathers, I finde my ſelfe entred into a pleaſing and ample common place ; and ſuch a one, as wherein I could wiſh with Peter to fix the Tabernacle of my abode : Would to God your leiſure could allow you to walke along with me a while thorow theſe ſweet, and flowrie Meades of Vnity, and happy conſpiration of thoughts ; And yet I ſhall not ſo much bend the reſidue of my ſpeech to the praiſe of vnity, (to what purpoſe were that waſte ?) as to the neceſſary vindication of it from the vniuſt challenges of the enemies of peace.

It is an heauy crime, and, of all other, the moſt hainous, wherewith we are charged by the Romaniſts, That we are fallen off from the Catholick Church, that we haue rent the ſeameleſſe coat of Chriſt, yea broken his bones, and torne his very body in peeces, whereof if we were indeed guilty, how vnworthy were we to breath in this aire, how moſt worthy of the loweſt Hell ? But we call heauen and earth to record, how vniuſtly this calumny is caſt vpon vs, yea, we proteſt before God and men, that the enuie of this ſo foule a crimination lights moſt iuſtly vpon the heads of the accuſers. May it pleaſe you, to heare a ſhort Apologue; A certaine man inuited to a feaſt one or two of his friends, entertained them bountifully; They ſate together louingly, they ate together, and were merry one with another; In the ſecond courſe (as the cuſtome is) the Maſter offereth them wine, ſets before them an apple: now a worme had ſomewhat eaten the apple, and a ſpider by chance had fallen into the cup; The gueſt ſees and balks it; The Maſter vrgeth him; Why doe you not eat, quoth he, why drinke you not? I dare not, ſaith the other, t'is not ſafe to doe either; ſeeſt thou not this vermine in the cup, and that in the apple? Tuſh, ſaith the Maſter, what ſo great matter is this? It was I that ſet this before thee; It was I that began to thee in the other; Drinke it, eat it, at leaſt for my ſake. But, ſuffer me firſt (replies the gueſt) to take out this ſpider, to cut out this worme; the wine, the apple likes me well enough; the ſpider, the worme I cannot away with; Away with ſuch ouer-nice and curious companions) quoth he againe) Fy vpon thee, thou vngratefull fellow, that doſt ſo little regard my friendſhip, ſo contemne my cheere; and with that in a rage, throwes the platters and pots in the very face of his gueſt, and thruſts him out of doores all wounded. Tell me now, I beſeech you, worthy Auditors, whether of theſe violates the lawes of hoſpitality? I dare ſay, you haue eaſily applied it before me; There was a time when we ſate together in a familiar manner with theſe Romaniſts, and fared well; The ſpider in the cup, The worme in the apple, what elſe be they, but ſuperſtition in their worſhip, rotten and vnwholſome traditions in their faith? without theſe, the Religion pleaſeth vs well: But they will needs importunately thruſt theſe vpon vs, and we refuſing, are therefore ſcorned, ſpit vpon, beaten, and caſt out; Had they but giuen vs leaue to take out this ſpider, this worme, we had ſtill eaten, and dranke together moſt gladly: They obſtinately reſiſted, and prefer'd their owne headſtrong will to our good and ſafety; nay, they repell vs with reproches, ſtrike vs with their thundering Anathemaes, condemne vs to the ſtakes; what ſhould we doe in this caſe? Heare, oh heauens, and hearken oh earth, and thou almighty God, the Maker and Gouernor of them both, ſuffer thy ſelfe, and thy glorious ſpirits to be called to the teſtimony of our innocencie; We are compelled, we are driuen away from the Communion of the Church of Rome; They forced vs to goe from them, who departed firſt from themſelues.

We haue willingly departed from the communion of their errors, from the Communion of the Church we haue not departed; Let them renounce their erroneous doctrine, we embrace their Church; Let them but caſt away their ſoule-ſlaying Traditions, we will communicate with them in the right of one and the ſame Church, and remaine ſo for euer.

But, alas, I muſt be forced to complaine, and that not without extreme griefe of heart, how that it cannot be determined, whether thoſe that boaſt themſelues for Catholikes, be greater enemies to Truth, or to Charity. To Truth, in that they haue of late forged new errors, and forced them vpon the Church; To Charity, in that they haue not ſtuck to condemne the aduerſe part, and to brand them with the black marke of Hereſie. I will ſpeake (if you pleaſe) more plainly; Three manner of waies doe theſe Romaniſts offend againſt Charity. Firſt, that they will not remit any thing either of their moſt conuicted opinion or vicious practice, no not for peace ſake. Secondly, that for Articles of Chriſtian faith, they put vpon the Church certaine opinions of their owne, falſe, doubtfull, and vncertaine, peculiar onely to the Schooles, which doe no whit touch the foundation of Religion. And laſtly, that if they meet with any faithfull and ſound monitors, which doe neuer ſo little gainſay theſe new Articles, they cruelly caſt them out of the boſome of the Church, and throw them headlong into Hel: Away with theſe Schiſmaticks, Hereticks, Atheiſts; Iwis the Proteſtants haue no Church, no faith, no ſaluation. Good Lord, what fury, what frenzy diſtempers Chriſtians; that they ſhould be ſo impotently malicious againſt thoſe, who profeſſe themſelues to be redeemed by the ranſome of the ſame moſt precious bloud? At length, At length, O yee Chriſtians, be wiſe, and acknowledge thoſe, whom the God and Father of mercies holds worthy of his armes, yea of his bowels. Let frantick error bawle what it liſt, we are Chriſtians, we are Catholicks, the vndiuided members of one holy, Catholick and Apoſtolick Church ; Let vs meet at this barre, if you pleaſe ; Let who will maintaine the plea ; What is it which maketh a Church ? What is it which maketh that Church ; One, holy, Catholick, Apoſtolick ? Is it not one holy Catholicke Apoſtolick faith ? But which is that ? Is it not the ſame which was deliuered by Chriſt, and the Apoſtles, to the whole world, and was alwaies and euery where approued through all Ages, euen vnto our times ? Wherefore are the Scriptures, wherefore the Creeds, wherefore were the primitiue Councells, but that there might be certaine markes, whereby Catholicks might be vndoubtedly diſcerned from Hereticks ? You know the Epilogue of the Athanaſian Creed, This is the Catholick Faith. If we may beleeue Leo, the heads of all hereſies are quite cut off with this one ſword of the Creed ; How much more then, with that two-edged ſword of the Scriptures, and of the Fathers their Interpreters ? What then ? Thoſe that then were Catholicks, can they in any age be condemned for Hereticks ? No : Faith is alwaies conſtant to it ſelfe, and ſo is the Church that is built vpon that Faith. Did we euer deny or make doubt of any Article, or clauſe of that Ancient Diuinity ? Either then Chriſt himſelfe, the Apoſtles, Councells, Fathers, erred from the Catholick truth ; or wee yet remaine Catholicks. What euer other opinions we meet withall, concerning Religion, neither make nor marre it ; Say they be falſe, ſay they be vicious, they are but hay and ſtubble, which nothing appertaine to the foundation of this euerlaſting frame. The Church may bee either more ſound, or more corrupt for them ; It cannot be more or leſſe a Church ; The beauty or deformity of a Church may conſiſt in them ; the ſtrength, the welfare of it doth not : Surely, whoſoeuer willingly ſubſcribes to the Word of God ſigned in the euerlaſting monuments of Scripture, to the ancient Creeds, to the foure Generall Councells, to the common conſent of the Fathers, for ſix hundred yeares after Chriſt, which we of the reformed Church religiouſly profeſſe to doe ; if hee may erre in ſmall points, yet hee cannot be an Hereticke. Some particular Church may eaſily offend by imputing hereſie to an vndeſerued opinion, whether perhaps true, or lightly erroneous ; but neither ſoule, nor Church can greatly erre, while it treads in the ſteps of the moſt ancient and vniuerſall : Muſt hee therefore, of neceſſity, die a Romaniſt, that would die a Catholicke ? This is an idle fancie, and worthy of no leſſe than Bedlam.

Giue me leaue (ye Reuerend Fathers) The bleſſed Ghoſt of the moſt holy, and lateſt Biſhop of this See, interrupts my ſpeech, and charges me not to ſuffer his aſhes ſo ſhamefully to be wronged. I can neither bee ſilent for indignation, nor ſpeake for anger : It was not onely rumour'd, but bookes were caſt abroad ouer the world, concerning the reuolt of this worthy and excellent Prelate, reporting, that at his death, hee reconciled himſelfe to the Church of Rome, and with many ſighes, renounced the Hereſies of the Church of England : and at laſt being abſolued by a Popiſh Prieſt, ſweetly ſlept in the faith of the Church of Rome ; Neither did his departed ſoule want, ſomewhere (as is reported) ſuffrages and oblations of Maſſmongers in this behalfe ; Oh immortall God ! what blaſphemie is here ? Can impudencie it ſelfe, ſo caſt off all ſhame, as to raiſe ſo ſlanderous a lie, thus boldly, againſt the credit of ſo many witneſſes, againſt the ſolemne deteſtation of their owne Prieſt, againſt the religious oathes of his neereſt friends, and domeſticke ſeruants ? againſt the Sermon, and publique writings of his Learned Sonne ? a ſonne well worthy of ſuch a Father ? Other lies haue ſome colour to plead for their credit ; This (beſides boldneſſe) hath none at all. How many of vs ſate by that faithfull Paſtor of ours then breathing toward his laſt, and receiued from his dying lips, words of moſt conſtant piety : And ſome of you (reuerend Fathers) deuoutly receiued with him, that ſacred Viaticum, the laſt bread that euer he taſted, euen the bread of the Lord ; and were witneſſes of the laſt motions of his ſoule, then ready to depart, and breathing toward his heauen. Ours he liued, Ours he died, and now, as ours, is crowned in heauen. Goe on now, yea miſ-zealous ſpirits ; goe on to lie ſtoutly ; ſomewhat will alwaies ſticke faſt to the accuſers ; but in the meane time, It cannot bee truth, that needs the props of lies. Onely this by the way.

Let the boldeſt Sophiſter of the Romiſh Schoole, come forth now, and if hee can, for ſhame, let him vndertake to proue that thoſe moſt noted additions of the Tridentine Faith, which only we reiect, were receiued of all the Church, in all Ages, for neceſſary heads of Religion: or let him confeſſe (as he needs muſt) that we haue ſtill conſtantly perſiſted in the Communion of One, Holy, Catholick Church and faith; Hee ſhall eaſily bewray his owne nouelty, but neuer ſhall euince any Hereſie of ours. It is a golden ſaying of Cardinall Contarenus; Hearken I beſeech you, if any ingenuous ſpirit of you all, be a friend to Rome, Non opus eſt concilio, non ſyllogiſmis ad ſedandas haſce Lutheranorũ turbas, &c. There needs no Councell, (ſaith he) no Syllogiſmes to allay theſe broyles of the Lutherans, but onely charity, humility, and a ſincere minde, that being void of all ſelfe-loue, we may be perſwaded to correct, and reforme thoſe things wherin we haue manifeſtly tranſgreſſed. Thus he. Thou art wiſe indeed (O Contarenus) would to God thy fellowes were ſo alſo. But we (forſooth) are the diſobedient and rebellious children of our mother the Church, whoſe commands while we diſdaine to receiue, and obey and reuerence her decrees, we are enwrapped in a ſhamefull ſchiſme, and ſtricken with the curſes of an angry Mother. Surely this were an odious contumely. But for vs; wee haue not acknowledg'd her a Mother, a Siſter wee haue: But grant we were Sons, yet we are no ſlaues. To forge a new faith, and imperiouſly thruſt it vpon her owne, is not the part of an indulgent parent, but of a Tyrant; This lawleſſe liberty (we confeſſe) we could neuer endure, and therefore are wee openly thunder-ſtricken with more than one Anathema. Neither haue they otherwiſe dealt with vs, than that fooliſh fellow in Gerſon, who being very buſie to driue away a flie from his neighbours forehead, braind the man.

But lament ye with me (my brethren) the wofull caſe of that Church, that hath learned to fit her faith to the Times, and is more impatient of a remedy, than of the diſeaſe. Whilſt they ſo eagerly perſecute vs, let vs heartily pity them: And let vs ſtill wiſh to them, (that which they enuie and denie to vs) Saluation; Father forgiue them, for they know not what they doe.

Our prayers, our teares, our admonitions muſt not bee wanting: Returne to your ſelues now at laſt (oh ye Chriſtian ſoules) Returne, from whence you haue ſenſibly declined; Recouer your firſt loue, your firſt works. Suffer not your ſelues any longer to be mocked with the glorious title of a Church. Frame your ſelues to that holy Vnity which hitherto you haue ſo ſtifly reſiſted, which if once we might liue to ſee effected, you ſhould well finde (as it runs in the law of the twelue Tables) that the recouered ſhould with vs haue the ſame priuileges with the healthfull. Behold we are ready (as our gracious and peaceable King Iames piouſly vndertooke) to meet you halfe way.

But if they ſhall ſtill obſtinately caſt off all hope of Vnity, and being ſet on fire with the hatred of peace, ſhall goe on to delight themſelues onely, in the alarum of their ſacred Trumpet (as they call it) why ſhould not wee, religiouſly, and entirely keepe peace among our ſelues? I ſpeake to all the Sonnes of the purer Church whereſoeuer diſperſed, we profeſſe this Church of ours by Gods grace reformed: Reformed (I ſay) not new made, as ſome emulous ſpirits ſpightfully ſlander vs. For me; I am ready to ſinke to the very ground, when I heare that hedge-row reproach, Where was your Religion before Luther? Where was your Church? Heare, oh ye ignorant, Heare, oh ye enuious Cauillers, we deſired the reformation of an old Religion, not the formation of a new. The Church accordingly was reform'd, not new wrought. It remaines therefore the ſame Church it was before, but onely purged from ſome ſuperfluous and pernicious additaments of error. Is it a new face that was lately waſhed? a new garment that is but mended? a new houſe that is repaired? Bluſh, if yee haue any ſhame, who thus ignorantly, and maliciouſly caſt this in our teeth.

Goe to now (my brethren) we are by Gods grace reformed, Let vs take heed leſt we be deformed againe by mutuall diſſentions; This is that which weakens, and lames vs, and which laies vs open to the inſulting triumphs of our Aduerſaries. Yet (leſt wee ſhould ſeeme to giue too much way to a ſpightfull ſlander) theſe iarres of ours are not ſo great, as our enemies either deſire, or clamour. Certainly, what diſcords ſoeuer hitherto haue troubled vs, wee are beholding to none other for them, but to theſe our kinde enemies, who vpbraid vs with them: For if they had but reacht forth vnto vs an helping hand in due time, and ioyntly conferd their endeuours (which then behooued them) for the reforming of the Church, all had runne ſquarely on; There had beene no iarres, no grudgings, no parts takings: But they ſtifly refuſed, and by their frowardneſſe, and pertinacie, cauſed this ſo weighty a taske to be caſt vpon ſome few: and thoſe both weak, vnable, and altogether vnfit for ſuch a charge. It could not therefore be otherwiſe, but that the opinions of ſome ſingle men, not conferd together, in ſuch a buſineſſe, muſt needs ſomewhat differ. But thanks be to thee, O bleſſed God, the Author of peace, that haſt vouchſafed by thy ſpirit ſo to bridle the diſtemperate affections of men, that their buſie ſpirits being ſtirred vp haue not boyled forth into more feareful diuiſions.

But what are theſe ſo great diſſentions, and blowes of bloudy warre, which our aduerſaries ſo cry out vpon? Forſooth, rather than want, they can faine names of ſects to themſelues; And where they can finde the leaſt difference in the paper of any obſcure Author of ours, preſently they cry out, New ſchiſmes, new ſects; What malice is this? what eager deſire of multiplying quarrels? If it had been ſo of old, ſo ſmall hides had not ſerued to containe the volumes of Auguſtine, Epiphanius, Philaſtrius: there had not beene fewer ſects, than teachers ſince the publiſhing of the Goſpell. But let vs paſſe ouer the number, and come to the weight. Let the malicious prattle what they will; With ſome of ours, the controuerſie is not about any ſolid lims of Chriſtian Faith, but onely of the very skin; with ſome others, not about the skin, but the garment rather, nor about the garment it ſelfe neither, but of the very hemme. There are certaine ſcholaſticall opinions of a middle ranke, meere Theologicall Corollaries, or perhaps ſome outward ceremonies, wherein we diſſent: Principles of Chriſtian Religion there are not. And withall theſe controuerſies are but ſuch, as that when the heat whether of zeale, or anger, ſhall abate, and either part ſhall well vnderſtand each other, they will eaſily admit of a Reconciliation. Neither haue theſe very Romaniſts leſſer quarrells amongſt themſelues; They can more hide their enmities, not exerciſe them leſſe. If they bee more wiſe, they are not more accordant. Neither is there (I dare ſay) any head of Religion, wherein they doe at once differ from vs, and agree all with one another. Finally, our differences are no greater, than were thoſe of old, among the holy Fathers of the Church, whoſe quarrells notwithſtanding are not ſo odiouſly blazoned by poſterity. I let paſſe the priuate ſcoldings of the Ancients not without ſome vnpleaſing (I had almoſt ſaid miſbeſeeming) tartneſſe. I had rather ſet before your eyes (for good lucke ſake) thoſe publique altercations of the Churches and Fathers, which afterward ſhut vp in a bleſſed concord. What quarrels aroſe at the Councell of Epheſus, betweene Cyril of Alexandria, and Iohn of Antioch? The Churches vnder both, ſtucke not to counterthunder Anathemaes one againſt another; Thereupon Theodoret thruſt in his ſickle into this harueſt; againſt whom Cyrillus (by Euoptius inſtigation) makes as ſtrong oppoſition: Theodoret accuſeth Cyril of Apollinariſme; Cyril accuſes Theodoret of Neſtorianiſme; The flame of their rage brake out more and more, and almoſt drew the Chriſtian world to parties; ſo that afterwards when Theodoret would haue entred the Councell of Chalcedon, the Egyptian, and other reuerend Biſhops cryed out, Wee muſt caſt out Cyril, if we take in Theodoret: The very Canons caſt him forth: God abhors him. The like was done afterwards in the eighth Action; The Biſhops openly proclaiming, He is an Hereticke, a Neſtorian; Away with the Hereticke. But when the matter was well ſcan'd, and it was found that he willingly ſubſcrib'd to the Orthodox Creeds, and the Epiſtles of Leo; The whole Synod with one accord cryed out, Theodoret is well worthy of a See in the Church, Let the Church receiue her Orthodox Paſtor.

It is worthy of immortality, that which Gregory Nazianzen recordeth of holy Athanaſius: The Romans ſeem'd to the Eaſterne Churches to follow the hereſies of Sabellius, in denying three Hypoſtaſes; The Eaſterne likewiſe ſeemed to the Romans, to fauour too much of Arrius, in denying three Perſons; the quarrell grew hot; Then came that great diſpenſer of ſoules, and hauing meekly and mildly calld forth both ſides before him, he ſo handled the buſineſſe, that granting them the free vſe of their termes, he tied them cloſe to the matter, and ſhewed them a light, whereby they might behold one another: vpon this, without more adoe, finding themſelues, both, in the right, they fall to mutuall embracements. Neither would it ſpeed otherwiſe with vs, Brethren, (as I doe verily beleeue) if ſome Athanaſius from Heauen would but ioyne our hands together.

Oh if once the gates of inteſtine and horrid warres were ſhut vp, and the religious Princes, which are the Nurſing-fathers of the reformed Churches, would command by vertue of their authority a Synod to be aſſembled (as generall as it might) wherein both parts freely and modeſtly might lay forth their opinions, and ſuch common termes might be agreed vpon, as wherein both parts might freely reſt, without preiudice to either: How eaſily then, how happily might theſe grieuous ſtirs bee quietly pacified? Let vs pray for this (my Brethren) let vs pray deuoutly. In the mean while let vs all ſweetly incline our hearts to peace, and vnity. Let there be amongſt vs (as S. Auguſtine to Ierome) pure brotherhood; Neither let vs ſuffer our ſelues, vpon euery ſlight quirke of opinion, to be diſtracted, or torne aſunder. Let vs forget that there were euer any ſuch (in reſpect of the deuotion of a Sect) as Luther, Melancton, Caluin, Zuinglius, Arminius, or if any other mortall name, for what haue we to doe with man? Let vs breathe nothing, let vs affect nothing, but Ieſus Chriſt.

We Diuines are Pleyades, (as Gregory ſaith wittily) Let vs therefore ſhine ſtill together, though not without ſome difference of place. In a Pomegranate are many graines vnder one rinde; You know the myſtery. Let vs ioyne theſe pomegranates to our Bels; Let vs be loud, but conſorted. Let vs deuote for euer, with one heart, all our operations, miniſteries, gifts, to one God, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghoſt; to one Head, Chriſt; one body, the Church; that being waſhed with one Baptiſme, ranſomed with one price, profeſſing one Faith, and holding the vnity of the ſpirit in the bond of Peace, wee may at laſt happily enioy one, and the ſame Heauen, through Ieſus Chriſt our Lord: To whom with the Father, and the holy Spirit, be aſcribed all honour and glory for euermore. Amen.

wrongs I could haue contemned in ſilence; but, For Sions ſake, I cannot hold my peace: If I remember not thee, O Ieruſalem, let my tongue cleaue to the roofe of my mouth. It were a ſhame and ſinne for me, that my zeale ſhould be leſſe hot for thine innocencie, than theirs to thy falſe diſgrace. How haue I haſtened therefore to let the World ſee thy ſincere Truth, and their peruerſe ſlanders! Vnto thy ſacred Name then (whereto I haue in all piety deuoted my ſelfe) I humbly preſent this my ſpeedie and dutifull labour: whereby I hope thy weake Sonnes may bee confirmed, the ſtrong encouraged, the rebellious ſhamed: And if any ſhall ſtill obſtinatly accurſe thee, I refer their reuenge vnto thy Glorious Head, who hath eſpouſed thee to himſelfe, in Truth and righteouſneſſe: Let him whoſe thou art, right thee: In the meane time, we thy true ſonnes ſhall not only defend, but magnifie thee: Thou maiſt be blacke, but thou art comely: the Daughters haue ſeene thee, aud counted thee bleſſed; euen the Queene, and the Concubines, and they haue praiſed thee: thou art thy Welbelоueds, and his deſire is towards thee. So let it be, and ſo let thine be towards him for euer; and mine towards you both, who am the leaſt of all thy little Ones.

COMMON APOLOGIE AGAINST THE BROWNISTS.

SECTION I.

IF TRVTH and PEACE (Zacharies two Companions) had met in our loue, this Controuerſie had neuer bin; the ſeuering of theſe two hath cauſed this ſeparation: for while ſome vnquiet minds haue ſought Truth without Peace, they haue at once loſt Truth, Peace, Loue, vs and themſelues. God knowes how vnwillingly I put my hand to this vnkinde quarrell: Nothing ſo much abates the courage of a Chriſtian, as to call his Brother Aduerſarie: We muſt doe it; woe be the men by whom this offence commeth: Yet by how much the inſultation of a brotherly enemie is more intolerable; and the griefe of our bleſſed Mother greater, for the wrong of her owne; So much more cauſe I ſee to breake this ſilence: If they will haue the laſt words, they may not haue all. For our carriage to them: They ſay, when Fire, the god of the Chaldees had deuoured all the other woodden Deities, that Canopis ſet vpon him a Caldron full of water, whoſe bottome was deuiſed with holes ſtopt with wax; which no ſooner felt the flame, but gaue way to the quenching of that furious Idoll. If the fire of inordinate zeale, conceit, contention, haue conſumed all other parts in the ſeparation, and caſt forth (more than NebuchadneZZars Furnace) from their Amſterdam hither; it were well if the waters of our moderation and reaſon could vanquiſh, yea abate it: This little Hin of mine ſhall be ſpent that way: we may try and wiſh, but not hope it: The ſpirits of theſe men are too well knowne, to admit any expectation of yeeldance. Since yet both for preuention and neceſſary defence, this taske muſt be vndertaken, I craue nothing of my Reader but patience and iuſtice: of God, victory to the Truth: as for fauour, I wiſh no more than an enemie would giue againſt himſelfe: With this confidence I enter into theſe liſts, and turne my pen to an Aduerſary, God knowes whether more proud or weake.

SEP.

IT is an hard thing euen for ſober-minded men in caſes of controuerſie, to vſe ſoberly the aduantages of the times: vpon which whileſt men are mounted on high, they vſe to behold ſuch as they oppoſe too ouerlie, and not without contempt; and ſo are oft-times emboldned to roule vpon them as from aloft very weake and weightleſſe diſcourſes, thinking any ſleight and ſlender oppoſition ſufficient to oppreſſe thoſe vnderlings, whom they haue (as they ſuppoſe) at ſo great an aduantage. Vpon this very preſumption it commeth to paſſe, that this Author vndertaketh thus ſolemnely and ſeuerely to cenſure a cauſe, whereof (as appeareth in the ſequele of the diſcourſe) he is vtterly ignorant: which had he been but halfe ſo carefull to haue vnderſtood, as he hath been forward to cenſure, he would either haue beene (I doubt not) more equall towards it, or more weighty againſt it.

As this Epiſtle is come to mine hands, ſo I wiſh the anſwer of it may come to the hands of him that occaſioned it: Intreating the Chriſtian Reader, in the name of the Lord, vnpartially to behold without either preiudice of cauſe, or reſpect of perſon, what is written on both ſides, and ſo from the Court of a ſound Conſcience to giue iuſt iudgement.

SECTION II.

IT is an hard thing euen for thoſe that would ſeeme ſober-minded men, in caſes of Controuerſie, to vſe ſoberly the frownes and diſaduantages of cauſes and times: whereby whiles men are deiected and troden downe, they vſe to behold their oppoſites mounted on high, too repiningly, and not without deſperate enuie: and ſo are oft-times moued to ſhoot vp at them, as from below, the bitter arrows of ſpightful and ſpleeniſh diſcourſes; thinking any hatefull oppoſition ſufficiently charitable, to oppugne thoſe aduerſaries, which haue them (as they feele) at ſo great an aduantage: vpon this impotent maliciouſneſſe, it commeth to paſſe, that this Anſwerer vndertaketh thus ſeuerely and peremptorily, to cenſure that charitable cenſure, of ignorance, which (as ſhall appeare in the ſequell) he either ſimply or willingly vnderſtood not: and to brand a deare Church of Chriſt with Apoſtaſie, Rebellion, Antichriſtianiſme: What can be more eaſie than to returne accuſations?

The anſwerers Preamble, retorted, confuted.

Your Preamble (with a graue bitterneſſe) charges me with, Firſt, Preſumption vpon aduantages; Secondly, Weake and weightleſſe diſcourſe; Thirdly, Ignorance of the cauſe cenſured: It had beene madneſſe in me to write, if I had not preſumed vpon aduantages; but of the cauſe of the truth, not of the times: Though (bleſſed bee God) the times fauour the truth, and vs: if you ſcorne them and their fauours, complaine not to be an vnderling: thinke that the times are wiſer than to beſtow their fauours vpon wilfull aduerſaries; but in ſpight of times, you are not more vnder vs in eſtate, than in conceit aboue vs: ſo wee ſay The Sunne is vnder a Cloud, wee know it is aboue it. *Would God ouerlineſſe and contempt were not yours, euen to them which are mounted higheſt vpon beſt deſert; and now you that haue not learned ſobriety in iuſt diſaduantages, tax vs, not to vſe ſoberly the aduantages of time: there was no gall in my pen, no inſultation, I wrote to you as brethren, and wiſht you companions: there was more danger of flatterie in my ſtile, than bitterneſſe: wherein vſed I not my aduantages ſoberly? Not in that I ſaid too much, but not enough; Not in that I was too ſharpe, but not weighty enough; My oppoſition was not too vehement, but too ſlight and ſlender: So, ſtrong Champions blame their aduerſarie for ſtriking too eaſily: you might haue forborne this fault, it was my fauour that I did not my worſt: you are worthy of more weight, that complaine of eaſe. The diſcourſe that I roll'd downe vpon you, was weake and weightleſſe: you ſhall well finde, this was my lenitie, not my impotence. The fault hereof is partly in your expectation, not in my letter: I meant but a ſhort Epiſtle, you look't belike for a volume, or nothing; I meant onely a generall monition; you look't for a ſolide proſecution of particulars: It is not for you to giue taskes to others pens. By what Law, muſt we write nothing but large Scholaſticall Diſcourſes? Such Tomes as yours: May wee not touch your ſore, vnleſſe we will launce and ſearch it? I was not enough your enemie; forgiue me this error, and you ſhall ſmart more: But not onely my omiſſions were of ignorance, but my cenſures, though ſeuere and ſolemne: An eaſie imputation from ſo great a controuler: I pardon you, and take this as the common lot of enemies. I neuer yet could ſee any Scribler

If Dʳ Whitaker, Mʳ Perkins, Mʳ Gyfford, and that Oracle of our preſent times, Dʳ Andrewes, went away content with this liuery from yours; how can I repine? If I haue cenſured what cauſe I knew not, let me be cenſured for more than ignorance, impudencie: but if you know not what I cenſured (let all my truſt lye on this iſſue) take both ignorance, boldneſſe, and malice to your ſelfe: Is your cauſe ſo myſticall, that you can feare any mans ignorance? What Cobler or Spinſter hath not heard of the maine holds of Browniſme? Am I onely a ſtranger in Hieruſalem? If I know not all your opinions, pardon me: your owne haue not receiued this illumination; I ſpeake boldly, not your ſelfe; Euery day brings new conceits, and not one day teaches, but corrects another: you muſt be more conſtant to your ſelues, ere you can vpbraid ignorance or auoid it. But whether I knew your prime fancies, appeares ſufficiently by a particular diſcourſe; which aboue a yeere ſince was in the hands of ſome of your Clyents, and I wonder if not in yours: Shortly; am I ignorant? If I were obſtinate too, you might hope (with the next gale) for me, your more equall aduerſarie, at Amſterdam. As I am; my want of care and skill, ſhall (I hope) loſe nothing of the truth by you, nor ſuffer any of your foule aſperſions vpon the face of Gods Church and ours.

The crime here obiected is ſeparation, a thing very odious in the eyes of all them from whom it is made: as euermore caſting vpon them the imputation of euil, whereof all men are impatient: And hence it commeth to paſſe, that the Church of England can better brooke the vileſt perſons continuing communion with it, than any whomſoeuer ſeparating from it, though vpon neuer ſo iuſt and well grounded reaſons.

Section III.

I Wrote not to you alone: what is become of your partner, yea, your Guide? Woe is me, he hath renounced our Chriſtendome with our Church: and hath waſht off his former water, with new: and now condemnes you all, for not ſeparating further, no leſſe then we condemne you for ſeparating ſo farre. As if you could not bee enough out of Babylon, vnleſſe you be out of your ſelues. Alas, miſerable Countreymen, whither runne you? Religion hath but his height, beyond which is error and madneſſe: hee tells you true, your ſtation is vnſafe; either you muſt forward to him, or backe to vs.

Pref.

Be it knowne therefore to all the ſeparation, that wee account them in reſpect of their conſtitution, to be as very an Harlot, as either her Mother the Church of England, or her Grand-mother Rome is, &c. Iterato baptizatus ſcienter, iterato Dominum crucifigit. De conſecr. diſt. 4. Quivis, &c.

* I obiected ſeparation to you: yet not ſo extreme as your anſwer bewrayes: a late ſeparation, not the firſt; my charity hoped you leſſe ill, than you will needs deſerue: you grant it odious, becauſe it caſts imputation of euill vpon the forſaken: Of euill? Yea of the worſt, an eſtate incurable and deſperate. He is an ill Phyſitian, that will leaue his Patient vpon euery diſtēper: his departure argues the diſeaſe helpleſſe; were we but faulty, as your Land-Lord Churches, your own rules would not abide your flight: Vid. Iohnson Preface to his inquirie; Eſay 5. 20. Hence the Church of England iuſtly matches Separatiſts with the vileſt perſons. God himſelfe doth ſo; who are more vile than patrons of euill? yet no greater woe is to them that ſpeake good of euill, than thoſe that ſpeake euill of good: So wiſe Generals puniſh mutinous perſons, worſe than Robbers or Adulterers: So Corah and his company (a Story cunningly turned vpon vs by your Martyr) for their oppoſition to Moſes, were more fearfully plagued, than the Idolatrous Iſraelites. Theſe ſinnes are more directly againſt common ſociety, the other more perſonall: and if both haue like iniquity; yet the former haue both more offence, and more danger: And if not ſo, yet who cannot rather brooke a lewd ſeruant, than an vndutifull ſonne, though pretending faire colours for his diſobedience? At leaſt, you thinke the Church of England thinks her ſelfe Gods Church, as well as your Saints of Amſterdam. You that ſo accurſe Apoſtaſie in others, could you expect, ſhee ſhould brooke it in you?

Prou. 21. 2.

But your reaſons are iuſt and well grounded: euery way of a man is right in his owne eyes; Said we not well, that thou art a Samaritane, and haſt a Deuill, ſay the Iewes? What Schiſme euer did not thinke well of it ſelfe? For vs: we call Heauen and earth to record, your cauſe hath no more iuſtice than your ſelues haue charity.

The kinds of the Separation, and which is iuſt.
ἐκκλησία.

YET there is a commendable and happy ſeparation from the World, from the Prince and men of the World, and whatſoeuer is contrary to God: who doubts it? There were no Heauen for vs without this, no Church; which hath her name giuen by her Father and Husband, of calling out from other. Out of the Ægypt of the World doth God call his ſonnes: But this ſeparation is into the viſible Church from the World; not (as yours) out of the Church, becauſe of ſome particular mixtures with the World: or (if you had rather take it of profeſſion) out of the World of Pagans and Infidels, into the viſible Church; not out of the World of true (though faulty) Chriſtians, into a purer Church. That I may here at once for all giue light to this point of ſeparation: we finde in Scripture a ſeparation either to good, or from euill: To good; ſo the Leuites were ſeparated from among the children of Iſrael, to beare the Arke, and to miniſter: ſo the firſt borne, firſt fruits, and Cities of refuge: So Paul was (ἀφωρισμένος) ſeparated, which ſome would haue allude to his Phariſaiſme, but hath plaine reference to Gods owne words (Acts 13. 2.) Separate mee Barnabas and Saul: Though this is rather a deſtination to ſome worthy purpoſe, than a properly called ſeparation.

From euill, whether ſinne or ſinners: From ſinne; ſo euery ſoule muſt eſchew euill, whether of doctrine or manners, and diſclaime all fellowſhip with the vnfruitfull works of darkneſſe, whether in himſelfe or others. So S. Paul charges vs to hold that which is good, and abſtaine from all appearance of euill: ſo Ieremie is charged to ſeparate the precious (doctrine or practice) from the vile. From ſinners, not onely practiſed by God himſelfe (to omit his eternall and ſecret Decree, whereby the Elect are ſeparated from the Reprobate) both in his gracious vocation, ſequeſtring them from nature and ſinne, as alſo in his execution of iudgment, whether particular, as of the Iſraelites from the Tabernacles of Corah; or vniuerſall, and finall, of the Sheepe from the Goats; But alſo enioyned from God to men, in reſpect either of our affection, or of our yoke, and familiar ſociety, whereof Saint PAVL: Bee not vnequally yoked with Infidels, Come out from among them, and ſeparate your ſelues. In all this wee agree: In the latitude of this laſt onely wee differ: I finde you call for a double ſeparation. A firſt ſeparation in the gathering of the Church: A ſecond in the menaging of it: The firſt at our entrance into the Church, the ſecond in our continuance: The firſt of the Church, from Pagans and Worldlings, an initiatory profeſſion; The ſecond of lewd men from the Church by iuſt cenſures; You ſpeake confuſedly of your owne ſeparation, one while of both, another while of either ſingle. For the firſt, either confeſſe it done by our Baptiſme, or elſe you ſhal be forced to hold, we muſt rebaptize: But of this Conſtitutiue ſeparation anon: For the ſecond of ſinners, whether in iudgement, or life, ſome are more groſſe, hainous, incorrigible: others leſſe notorious, and more tractable: thoſe other muſt be ſeparated by iuſt cenſures; not theſe. Which cenſures if they be neglected, the Church is foule, and (in your Paſtors word) faulty, and therefore cals for our teares, not for our flight. Now of Churches faulty and corrupted, ſome raze the foundation, others on the true foundation build timber, hay, ſtubble: From thoſe we muſt ſeparate, from theſe we may not. PETERS rule is eternall, Whither ſhall wee goe from thee? thou haſt the words of eternall life: where theſe words are found, woe be to vs, if we be not found. Amongſt many good ſeparations then, yours cannot be ſeparated from euill, for that we ſhould ſo farre ſeparate from the euill, that therefore we ſhould ſeparate from Gods children in the communion of the holy things of God, that for ſome (after your worſt done) not fundamentall corruptions, we ſhould ſeparate from that Church, in whoſe wombe we were conceiued, and from betwixt whoſe knees we fell to God: in a word, (as one of yours once ſaid) to ſeparate not only from viſible euill, but from viſible good, as all Antichriſtian: who but yours can thinke leſſe than abſurd and impious? Grant, we ſhould be cleane ſeparated from the World; yet if we be not, muſt you be ſeparated from vs? Doe but ſtay till God haue ſeparated vs from himſelfe: will the wiſe Husbandman caſt away his Corne-heap for the chaffe and duſt? Shall the Fiſher caſt away a good draught, becauſe his Drag-Net hath Weeds? Doth God ſeparate from the faithfull ſoule, becauſe it hath ſome corruptions her Inmates, though not her commanders? Certainly, if you could thorowly ſeparate the World from you, you would neuer thus ſeparate your ſelues from vs: Begin at home, ſeparate all ſelfe-loue, and ſelfe-will, and vncharitableneſſe from your hearts, and you cannot but ioyne with that Church, from which you haue ſeparated: Your Doctor would perſwade vs, you ſeparate from nothing but our corruptions: you are honeſter, and grant it from our Church: it were happie for you, if he lyed not; who in the next page confutes himſelfe, ſhewing that you ſeparate from vs, as Chriſt from the Samaritans, namely from the Church, not the corruptions only; and not as he did from the Iewes, namely from their corruptions, not from their Church: His memory ſaues our labour, and marres his diſcourſe.

The ſeparation we haue made in reſpect of our knowledge, and obedience, is indeed late, and new: yet is it in the nature and cauſes thereof as ancient as the Goſpell, which was firſt founded in the enmitie which God himſelfe put betwixt the ſeed of the Woman, and the ſeed of the Serpent, Gen.3.15. which enmitie hath not only beene ſucceſſiuely continued, but alſo viſibly maniſeſted by the actuall ſeparation of all true Churches, from the World in their collection and conſtitution, before the Law, vnder the Law, and vnder the Goſpell, Gen.4.13,14.16. & 6.1,2. & 7.1.7 with 1 Pet.3.20.12. & 12.2. YET, if not equitie, it were well you could plead age: This your ſeparation in the nature and cauſes of it (you ſay) is no leſſe ancient than the firſt inſtitution of enmitie betwixt the two ſeeds: you might haue gone a little higher, and haue ſaid, than our firſt Parents running from God in the Garden, or their ſeparation from God by their ſinne: But we take your time, and eaſily beleeue that this your late ſeparation was founded vpon that ancient enmitie of the ſeed of the Serpent with the Womans. That ſubtill Deuil, when he ſaw the Church breath from the perſecutions of Tyrants, vexed her no leſſe with her owne diuiſions; ſeeking that by fraud, which by violence he could not effect. Hence all the fearefull Schiſmes of the Church, whereof yours is part. This enmitie hath not onely beene ſucceſſiuely continued, but alſo too viſibly maniſeſted by the actuall (but wilfull) ſeparation of Heretiques and Sectaries from the Church in all ages: But I miſtake you; yours is as ancient as the Goſpell: What? that Euangelium æternum of the Friers? whoſe name they accurſedly borrowed from Reuel. 14. 6. Or that Euangelium Regni of the Familiſts? Or that Euangelium aliud, whereof Saint PAVL taxeth his Galatians? None of all theſe, you ſay; but as that Goſpell of Peace, of Truth, of Glory; ſo ancient, and neuer knowne till Bolton, Barrow, and Browne? Could it eſcape all the holy Prophets, Apoſtles, Doctors of the old, middle, and later world, and light only vpon theſe your three Patriarchs? Perhaps, Nouatus or Donatus (thoſe Saints with their Schooles) had ſome little glimpſe of it; but this perfection of knowledge is but late and new: So many rich Mines haue lien long vnknowne, and great parts of the World haue beene diſcouered by late Venturers. If this courſe haue come late to your knowledge and obedience, not ſo to others: For loe, it was practiſed ſucceſſiuely in the conſtitution and collection of all true Churches, through all times, before the Law, vnder the Law, after it: We haue acknowledged many ſeparations: but as ſoone ſhall you finde the time paſt in the preſent, as your late ſeparation, in the ancient and approued. You quote Scriptures, though (to your praiſe) more daintie indeed than your fellowes. Who cannot doe ſo? Who hath not? Euen Satan himſelfe cites the word againſt him which was the word of his Father. Let vs not number, but weigh your texts: The rather, for that I find theſe as your Maſter-proofes, ſet as Challengers in euery of your defences: In Gen. 4. 13. CAIN a bloudy Fratricide is excommunicated: In Gen. 6. 1, 2. The ſonnes of God maried the daughters of men: In Gen. 7. 1. & 7. NOAH is approued as righteous, and enters the Arke: In 1 Pet. 3. 20, 21. The reſt in NOAHS time were diſobedient, and periſhed: What of all this? Alas, what mockage is this of the Reader, and Scriptures? Surely, you euen ioyne Scriptures, as you ſeparate your ſelues: This is right as your Paſtor, to proue all members of the viſible Church, elect and precious ſtones, cites, 1 King. 7, 9. where is ſpeech only of Salomons houſe in the Forreſt of Lebanon, his Porch for his Throne, his Hall, his Palace for Pharaohs daughter, and when he comes to deſcribe the office of his imaginary Doctor, thwacks fourteene Scriptures into the margent, whereof not any one hath any iuſt colour of inference to his purpoſe: and in this diſcourſe of the power of the Church (that he might ſeem to honour his margent with ſhew of texts) hath repeated ſix places twice ouer in the ſpace of ſix lines. For theſe of yours: you might obiect the firſt to the Cainites, not to vs: Cain was caſt out worthily. Doe we either deny, or vtterly forbeare this cenſure? Take heed you follow him not, in your voluntary exile, to the land of Nod. The ſecond you might obiect to thoſe mungrell Chriſtians that match with Turkes and Pagans. There are ſonnes of God, that is, members of the viſible Church; and daughters of men, which are without the bounds, meere Infidels; it is ſinne for thoſe ſonnes to yoke themſelues with thoſe daughters. What is this to vs? Noah was righteous, the multitude diſobedient: Who denies it? yet Noah ſeparated not from the corrupted Church, till the floud ſeparated him from the earth, but continued an ancient Preacher of righteouſneſſe, euen to that peruerſe & rebellious Generation. But it ſufficeth you, that Cain and the Giants were ſeparated from the reſt: We yeeld it: what will follow hence, ſaue onely that notorious Malefactors muſt be caſt out, and profeſſed Heathen not let into the Church? We hold, and wiſh no leſſe: your places euince no more. Theſe, before the Law: In Leuit. 20. 24. 26. God choſe out Iſrael from other people: This was Gods act, not theirs: a ſequeſtring of his Iſraelites from the Gentiles, not of Iſrael from it ſelfe: yours is your owne, and from men, in all maine points, of your owne profeſſion: But therefore Iſrael muſt be holy: If any man deny holineſſe to be required of euery Chriſtian, let him feele your Maranatha. In Neh. 9. 2.

Which ſeparation the Church of England neither hath made, nor doth make, but ſtands actually one with all that part of the World within the Kingdome, without ſeparation: for which cauſe, amongſt others, we haue choſen by the grace of God, rather to ſeparate our ſelues to the Lord from it, than with it from him, in the viſible conſtitution of it.

SECTION VI.

BVt all theſe examples, perhaps are not ſo much to warrant what you haue done, as to condemne the Church of England for what ſhee hath not done: for ſuch a ſeparation ſhee neither hath made nor doth make, but ſtands actually one with all that part of the World within the Kingdome without ſeparation. Loe, here the maine ground of this Schiſme, which your Proto-Martyr BARROW hammers vpon in euery page; an ill conſtitution: Thus he comments vpon your words: For where ſuch prophane confuſe multitudes, without any exception, ſeparation or choice, were all of them from publike Idolatrie, at one inſtant receiued or rather compelled to be members of the Church, in ſome pariſh or other, where they inhabited, without any due calling to the faith, by the preaching of the Goſpell going before, or orderly ioyning together in the faith, there being no voluntary or particular confeſſion of their owne faith and duties made or required of any, and laſtly, no holy walking in the faith amongſt them; who can ſay that theſe Churches conſiſting of this people, were euer rightly gathered or built according to the rule of Chriſts Teſtament? In his words and yours I finde both a miſcollection, and a wrong charge. For the Former: the want of noting one poore diſtinction, breeds all this confuſion of Doctrine, and ſeparation of men: for there is one caſe of a new Church to be called from Heatheniſme to Chriſtianity, another of a former Church to be reformed from errors, to more ſincere Chriſtianitie. In the firſt of theſe is required indeed a ſolemne initiation by Baptiſme; and before that, a voluntary and particular confeſſion of faith, and therefore a cleare ſeparation, and exception of the Chriſtian, from the infidell: In the latter, neither is new Baptiſme lawfull (though ſome of you belike of old were in hand with a rebaptization: which not then ſpeeding, ſucceedeth now to your ſhame) nor a new voluntarie and particular confeſſion of Faith, beſides that in Baptiſme (though very commendable) will euer be proued ſimply neceſſary to the being of a Church; ſo long as the erring parties doe actually renounce their doctrines, and in open profeſſion embrace the truth; and (as generally in the publike confeſſion) ſo particularly vpon good occaſion giue iuſt teſtimonies of their repentance. This is our caſe, we did not make a new Church, but mended an old: your CLIFTON is driuen to this hold by neceſſitie of Argument; Otherwiſe he ſees there is no auoiding of Anabaptiſme: Mended, ſaith your Doctor, and yet admitted the miſceline rabble of the prophane? Say now, that ſuch ſeparation were not made: Let ſome few be holy, and the more part prophane: Shall the lewdneſſe of ſome diſanull Gods Couenant with others? This is your mercy; Gods is more: who ſtill held Iſrael for his, when but few held his pure ſeruice: Let that Diuine Pſalmiſt teach you how full the Tents of Iſrael were of mutinous Rebels in the Deſart; yet the Pillar by day and night forſooke them not; and Moſes was ſo farre from reiecting them, that he would not endure God ſhould reiect them to his owne aduantage: Looke into the blacke cenſures, and bitter complaints of all the Prophets, and wonder that they ſeparated not: Looke into the increaſed maſſe of corruptions, in that declined Church; whereof the bleſſed eyes of our Sauiour were witneſſes, and maruell at his ſilent and ſociable incuriouſneſſe: yea, his charge of not ſeparating; Ye know not of what ſpirit you are: Now you flie to conſtitution, as if notorious euils were more tolerable in continuance, than in the collection of Aſſemblies: Sardi had but a few names that had not defiled their garments; God praiſes theſe, bids them not ſeparate from the reſt. Thyatira ſuffers a falſe propheteſſe: the reſt that haue not this learning, yet are bidden but to hold their owne; not to ſeparate from the Angell, which hath not ſeparated IEZABEL from the Church.

What ſeparation the Church of England hath made.

YOUR charge is no leſſe iniurious; that the Church of England hath made no ſeparation: Concerning which you haue learned of your Martyr, and ouerſeers ſo to ſpeake, as if before her late diſclamation of popery, in Queene ELIZABETHS time, ſhee had not beene. Her monuments could haue taught you better, and haue lead you to her ancient Pedigree not much below the Apoſtolike dayes, and in many deſcents haue ſhewed you not a few worthy witneſſes and patrons of Truth; all which, with their holy and conſtant off-ſpring, it might haue pleaſed you to haue ſeparated from this imputation of not ſeparating: Will you know therefore how the Church of England hath ſeparated? In her firſt conuerſion ſhee ſeparated her ſelfe from Pagans: in her continuance ſhe ſeparated her ſelfe from groſſe heretiques, and ſealed her ſeparation with bloud: in her reformation ſhe ſeparated her ſelfe from wilfull Papiſts, by her publike profeſſion of Truth, and proclaimed hatred of error; and ſhee daily doth ſeparate the notoriouſly euill, by ſuſpenſions, by excommunications, though not ſo many as yours; Beſides the particular ſeparations of many from the acknowledged corruptions, in iudgement, profeſſion, practiſe. All theſe will be auowed in ſpight of all contradiction; with what forehead then can you ſay; The whole Church of England hath not at all ſeparated?

After all your ſhifts and idle tales of conſtitution, you haue ſeparated from this Church againſt the Lord; not with the Lord, from it: If there be Chriſt with vs, if the Spirit of God in vs, if Aſſemblies, if calling by the word: whatſoeuer is, or is not elſe in the Conſtitution, there is whatſoeuer is required to the eſſence of a Church. No corruption either in gathering or continuance can deſtroy the truth of being, but the grace of being well: If Chriſt haue taken away his Word and Spirit, you haue iuſtly ſubduted; elſe you haue gone from him in vs.

Fr. Iun. lib. de Eccleſ.

And when you haue all done, the Separatiſts Idoll, viſible Conſtitution, will proue but an appendance of an externall forme, no part of the eſſence of a true Church: and therefore your ſeparation no leſſe vaine than the ground, than the Authors. Laſtly, if our bounty ſhould (which it cannot) grant, that our collection was at firſt deeply faultie: cannot the Ratihabition (as the Lawyers ſpeake) be drawne backe? may not an after-allowance rectifie and confirme it? In contracts (your owne ſimilitude) a following conſent iuſtifies an act done before conſent: and why not in the contract betwixt God, and his viſible Church? Loe, he hath confirmed it by his gratious benedictions, and as much as may be in ſilence giuen vs abundant proofes of his acceptation: That after-act, which makes your Baptiſme lawfull, why can it not make our Church?

SECTION VIII.

BVt for as much as Conſtitution is the very ſtate of Browniſme, Let vs (I beſeech you) inquire a little into the complexion of your Conſtitution: Whether Phyſicke, or Law, or Architecture haue lent you it: ſure I am, it is in this vſe, Apocryphall: Neuer man vſed it thus ſcrupulouſly till your times: Though, what need you the helpe of Fathers or Schooles: new words muſt expreſſe new Paradoxes. It is no treaſon to coine termes: What then is Conſtitution? Your Doctor can beſt tell vs: As the Conſtitution of a Common-wealth, or of a City, is a gathering or vniting of a people together into a ciuill Politie: So (ſaith he) the Conſtitution of the Common-wealth of Iſrael, and of the City of God, the new Ieruſalem, is a gathering and vniting of people into a diuine Politie. The forme of which Polity, is Order: which order is requiſite in all actions, and Adminiſtrations of the Church, as the Apoſtle ſheweth, and ſpecially in the Conſtitution therof: ſo that next vnto faith in God, it is to be eſteemed moſt neceſſary for all holy ſocieties. Hence Paul reioyced in the Coloſſians Order and Faith: To this Conſtitution therefore, belong a people, as the matter; ſecondly, a calling, or gathering together, as the forme, whereof the Church conſiſteth. The Conſtitution of the Church of England is falſe in both: Why ſo? Haue we not a people? Are not thoſe people called together? To preuent this, you ſay our Conſtitution is falſe, not none: Why falſe? Becauſe thoſe people haue neither Faith, nor Order. For Faith firſt: Who are you that dare thus boldly breake into the cloſets of God, the hearts of men? and condemne them to want that, which cannot be ſeene by any but diuine eyes? How dare you intrude thus into the Throne of your Maker? Conſider, and conferre ſeriouſly: What faith is it, that is thus neceſſarily required to each member in this Conſtitution? Your owne Doctor ſhall define it: Faith required to the receiuing in of members, is the knowledge of the Doctrine of ſaluation by Chriſt, 1 Cor. 12.9. Gal. 3.2. Now I beſeech you in the feare of God, lay by a while all vnchriſtian preiudice, and peremptory verdicts of thoſe ſoules, which coſt Chriſt as much bloud as your owne: and tell me ingenuouſly, whether you dare ſay, that not only your Chriſtian brethren with whom you lately conuerſed, but euen your fore-fathers which liued vnder Queene Elizabeths firſt confuſed Reformation, knew not the Doctrine of ſaluation by Chriſt: if you ſay they did not, your raſh iudgement ſhall be puniſhed fearfully, by him whoſe office you vſurpe. As you looke to anſwer before him that would not breake the bruiſed Reed, nor quench the ſmoaking Flax; preſume not thus, aboue men and Angels. If they did, then had they ſufficient claime both to true Conſtitution and Church: But this faith muſt be teſtified by obedience; ſo it was. If you thinke not ſo, yours is not teſtified by loue: both were weake, both were true: Weakneſſe in any grace or worke, takes not away truth: Their ſinnes of ignorance could no more diſanull Gods Couenant with them, than multiplicitie of wiues with the Patriarchs.

WHat wanted they then? Nothing but Order; and not all Order, but yours: Order, a thing requiſite and excellent; but let the world iudge whether eſſentiall. Conſider now, I beſeech you in the bowels of Chriſt Ieſus, whether this be a matter for which heauen and earth ſhould be mixed: whether for want of your Order, all the world muſt be put out of all order, and the Church out of life & being. Nothing (ſay we) can be more diſorderly, than the confuſion of your Democracy, or popular ſtate (if not Anarchie): Where all (in a ſort) ordaine and excommunicate; We condemne you not for no true members of the Church: what can be more orderleſſe (by your owne confeſſions) than the Trine-vne Church at Amſterdam? which yet you grant but faulty. If there be diſproportion and diſlocation of ſome parts, is it no true humane bodie? Will you riſe from the feaſt, vnleſſe the diſhes be ſet on in your owne faſhion?

Is it no Citie, if there be mud-walles halfe broken, low Cottages vnequally built, no State-houſe? But your order hath more eſſence than you can expreſſe; and is the ſame which Politicians in their trade call (τάξιν τῆς πόλεως) an incorporating into one common ciuill body, by a voluntary vnion, and that vnder a lawfull gouernment: Our Church wants both: wherein there is both conſtraint, and falſe office. Take your owne reſemblance and your owne asking: Say that ſome Tyrant (as Baſilius of Ruſſia) ſhall forcibly compell a certaine number of Subiects into Moſco, and ſhall hold them in by an awfull Garriſon, forcing them to new lawes and Magiſtrates, perhaps hard and bloudy: They yeeld; and making the beſt of all, liue together in a cheerefull communion, with due commerce, louing conuerſation, ſubmiſſiue execution of the enioyned lawes: In ſuch caſe, Whether is Moſco a true Citie, or not? Since your Doctor cites Ariſtotle, let it not irke him to learne of that Philoſopher, who can teach him, that when Caliſthenes had driuen out the Tyrant from Athens, and ſet vp a new Gouernment, and receiued many ſtrangers, and bondmen into the Tribes, it was doubted, not which of them were Citizens, but whether they were made Citizens vniuſtly. If you ſhould finde a company of true Chriſtians in vtmoſt India, would you ſtand vpon termes, and inquire how they became ſo? Whiles they haue what is neceſſary for that heauenly profeſſion; what need your curioſitie trouble it ſelfe with the meanes?

YOu ſee then what an idle plea conſtraint is in the conſtitution of a Citie, the ground of all your exception: But it is otherwiſe in Gods city, the Church; why then doth his Doctorſhip parallel theſe two? And why may not euen cōſtraint it ſelfe haue place in the lawfull conſtitution or reformation of a Church? Did not Manaſſes after his comming home to God, charge and command Iuda to ſerue the Lord God of Iſrael? Did not worthy Ioſiah, when he had made a couenant before the Lord, cauſe all that were found in Ieruſalem, and Beniamin, to ſtand to it, and compelled all that were found in Iſrael, to ſerue the Lord their God? What haue Queene Elizabeth, or King Iames done more? Or what other? Did not Aſa vpon Obeds propheſie, gather both Iuda and Beniamin, and all the ſtrangers from Ephraim, Manaſſes, and Simeon, and enact with them, that whoſoeuer would not ſeeke the Lord God, ſhould be ſlaine? What meanes this peruerſeneſſe? You that teach we may not ſtay Princes leiſure to reforme, will you not allow Princes to vrge others to reforme? What crime is this, that men were not ſuffered to be open Idolaters, that they were forced to yeeld ſubmiſſion to Gods ordinances? Euen your owne teach, that Magiſtrates may compell Infidels to heare the doctrine of the Church; and Papiſts, you ſay elſewhere (though too roughly) are Infidels: But you ſay, not to be members of the Church: Gods people are of the willing ſort: True, Neither did they compell them to this: They were before entred into the viſible Church by true Baptiſme, though miſerably corrupted: They were not now initiated, but purged: Your ſubtill Doctor can tell vs from Bernard, that faith is to be perſwaded, not to be compelled: yet let him remember that the gueſts muſt be compelled to come in, though not to eat when they are come. Compelled, not by perſwaſions; for theſe were the firſt inuitations; therefore by further meanes; Though this conceit hath no place with vs, where men are vrged not to receiue a new faith, but to performe the old; to abandon that wicked Idolatry which had defiled them, and to entertaine but that truth, which the very power of their Baptiſme challenged at their hand: but this was the old ſong of the Donatiſts; Farre be it from our conſcience, to compell any man to the faith. If God did not draw vs, and by a ſweet violence bend our wills to his, when ſhould we follow him? Either you haue not read, or not cared for the practiſe of the ancient Church, and Auguſtines reſolution concerning the ſharp penalties impoſed vpon the Donatiſts (would God none of your kindred) in his time; with his excellent defences of theſe proceedings.

BVT tell vs then, what ſhould haue beene done? The Goſpell ſhould haue beene euery where preached; All conuerts ſhould haue beene ſingled out, and haue giuen a voluntary and particular confeſſion of their Faith, and Repentance: I anſwer you: The Goſpell was long and worthily preached in the dayes of King Edward; enough to yeeld both Martyrs to the ſtake, and Profeſſors to the ſucceeding times. Were their holy Sermons, their learned writings, and their precious bloud (which was no leſſe vocall) of no force? Afterwards, in the beginning of Famous Queene Elizabeths reparation, what confluence was there of zealous Confeſſors returning now from their late exile? How painfully and diuinely did they labour in this Vineyard of God? How did they (with their many holy Partners, which had ſhrowded themſelues during that ſtorme of perſecution, in a dangerous ſecrecie) ſpread themſelues ouer this Land, and each-where drew flockes of hearers to them, and with them? Is all this nothing to their ingratefull Poſteritie? If you murmure that there were no more, take heed leſt you forget there were ſo many: for vs, we doe ſeriouſly bleſſe God for theſe, and triumph in them.

Conſtitution of the Church of England. Barrow and Greenw. paſſim.

All this premiſed; now comes a Chriſtian Edict from the State, that euery man ſhall yeeld obedience to this Truth, wherein they had beene thus inſtructed: It was performed by the moſt; whoſe ſubmiſſion, what was it but an actuall profeſſion of their faith, and repentance? And ſince ſuch was their face, who dares iudge of their hearts? More than this, if euer can be ſhewed abſolutely neceſſary in ſuch a State of the Church to the very conſtitution, and repaired being thereof, I doe here vow neuer to take the Church of England for my Mother.

We know, and grieue to ſee how ſcornfully your whole Sect, and amongſt the reſt your reſolute Doctor turnes ouer theſe gracious entrances and proceedings of theſe two Royall and bleſſed Reformers; and whom ſhould he finde to raiſe his ſcoffes vpon, but that Saint-like Hiſtorian M. Fox? Now (ſayes Mr. Fox) a new face of things began to appeare, as it were in a Stage, new Players comming in, the old thruſt out: Now (ſaith your Doctors Comment) new Biſhops came in, as Players vpon the old ſtage of the Popiſh Church, as if the Church were no whit altered, but the men: Shall we ſay, this is too much malice, or too little wit, and conſcience? Euen in the Lord Protectors daies, that holy man reports, that after the Scriptures reſtored, and Maſſes aboliſhed, greater things followed theſe ſofter beginnings, in the reformation of the Churches: Learned and godly Diuines were called for from forren parts, a ſeparation was made (though not ſo much willing, as wilfull) of open and manifeſt Aduerſaries from Profeſſors, whether true or diſſembled: Commiſſioners were appointed to viſit euery ſeuerall Dioceſſe. Euery Bench of them had ſeuerall godly and learned Preachers to inſtruct the people in the truth, and to diſſwade them from Idolatrie and Superſtition. The Popes Supremacy not thruſt, but taught downe: All wil-worſhip whatſoeuer, oppugned by publike Sermons: Images deſtroyed, Pilgrimages forbidden, the Sacramẽts inioyned to be reuerently and holily miniſtred, Eccleſiaſticall perſons reformed in life, in Doctrine: Proceſſions laid downe, Preſence and attendance vpon Gods word commanded, the holy expending of Sabbath daies appointed, due preparation to Gods table called for, ſet times of teaching inioyned to Biſhops and other Miniſters, all Shrines and Monuments of Idolatry required to bee vtterly taken from publike and priuate houſes: All this, before his Parliament: By that, all bloudy lawes againſt Gods truth were repealed, zealous Preachers encouraged, ſo as (ſaith that worthy Hiſtorian) God was much glorified, and the people in many places greatly edified. What need I goe further than this firſt yeere? Heare this and be aſhamed, and aſſure your ſelues, that no man can euer reade thoſe holy Monuments of the Church, but muſt needs ſpet at your ſeparation. After that ſweet and hopefull Prince, what his Renowned Siſter Queene ELIZABETH did, the preſent times doe ſpeake, and the future ſhall ſpeake, when all theſe theſe Murmurers ſhall ſleepe in the duſt. The publike Diſputations, zealous preachings, reſtaurations of baniſhed Religion and men, Extirpations of Idolatry, Chriſtian Lawes, wiſe and holy proceedings, and renewed couenants with God, are ſtill freſh in the memories of ſome, and in the eares of all; ſo as all the World will iuſtly ſay, you haue loſt ſhame with Truth, in denying it: Yea, to fetch the matter yet further, If the Reader ſhall looke back to the dayes of their puiſſant Father King Henry the Eighth, he cannot but acknowledge (eſpecially during the time of Queene Anne, and before thoſe ſix bloudy Articles) a true face of a Church (though ouer-ſpred with ſome Morphue of corruptions) and ſome commendable forwardneſſe of Reformation: for both the Popes Supremacie was abrogated, the true Doctrine of Iuſtification commonly taught, cōfidence in Saints vntaught, the vanity of Pardons declared, worſhip of Images and Pilgrimages forbidden, learned and godly Miniſters required, their abſences and miſ-demeanors inhibited, the Scriptures tranſlated, publikely and priuately enioyned to be read and receiued, the Word of God commanded to be ſincerely and carefully preached: and to all this, Holy Maſter Fox addeth for my concluſion, ſuch a vigilant care was then in the King and his Councell, how by all wayes and meanes to redreſſe Religion, to reforme errours, to correct corrupt cuſtomes, to helpe ignorance, and to reduce the miſ-leading of Chriſts Flocke, drowned in blind Popery, Superſtitious Cuſtomes, and Idolatry, to ſome better forme of Reformation, whereunto he prouided not only theſe Articles, Precepts, Iniunctions aboue ſpecified, to informe the rude people, but alſo procured the Biſhops to helpe forward the ſame cauſe of decayed Doctrine, with their diligent preaching, and teaching of the people. Goe now and ſay, that ſuddenly in one day, by Queene Elizabeths Trumpet, or by the ſound of a Bell, in the name of Antichriſt, all were called to the Church: Goe, ſay with your Patriarch, that we erect Religions by Proclamations, and Parliaments.

Vpon theſe premiſes I dare conclude, and doubt not to maintaine againſt all Separatiſts in the World, that England (to goe no higher) had in the dayes of King Henry the Eighth, a true viſible Church of God: and ſo by conſequent their ſucceeding ſeed was by true Baptiſme iuſtly admitted into the boſome thereof; and therefore that euen of them, without any further profeſſion, Gods Church was truly conſtituted. If you ſhall ſay, that the following idolatry of ſome of them in Queene Maries dayes excluded them: Conſider, how hard it will be to proue, that Gods Couenant with any people, is preſently diſanulled by the ſinnes of the moſt, whether of ignorance, or weakneſſe; and if they had herein renounced God, yet that God alſo mutually renounced them. To ſhut vp your Conſtitution then: There is no remedy: Either you muſt goe forward to Anabaptiſme, or come backe to vs. All your Rabbines cannot anſwer that charge of your rebaptized brother: If we be a true Church, you muſt returne; if we be not (as a falſe Church is no Church of God) you muſt rebaptize: If our Baptiſme be good, then is our conſtitution good. Thus your owne Principles teach. The outward part of a true viſible Church is a Vow, Promiſe, Oath, or Couenant betwixt God and the Saints: Now I aske, Is this made by vs in Baptiſme, or no? If it be, then wee haue, by your confeſſion (for ſo much as is outwardly required) a true viſible Church: ſo your ſeparation is vniuſt: If it be not, then you muſt rebaptize; for the firſt Baptiſme is a nullity: and (if ours be not) you were neuer thereby as yet entred into any viſible Church.

To the title of a Ring-leader, wherewith it pleaſeth this Piſtler to ſtile me, I anſwer that if the thing I haue done be good, it is good and commendable to haue beene forward in it; if it be euill, let it be reproued by the light of Gods Word, and that God, to whom I haue done that I haue done, will (I doubt not) giue me both to ſee, and to heale mine errour by ſpeedie repentance: if I haue fled away on foot, I ſhall returne on Horſe-backe: But as I durſt neuer ſet foot into this way, but vpon a moſt ſound and vnreſiſtable conuiction of Conſcience by the Word of God: (as I was perſwaded) ſo muſt my retiring be wrought by more ſolid reaſons from the ſame word,

Your pitying of vs and ſorrowing for vs, eſpecially for the wrong done by vs, were in you commendable affections, if by vs iuſtly occaſioned; but if your Church be deepely drencht in Apoſtaſie, and you cry, Peace, Peace, when ſodaine and certaine deſolation is at hand, it is you that doe wrong, though you make the complaint: and ſo being cruell towards your ſelues, and your owne, whom you flatter, you cannot be truly pitifull towards others whom you bewaile. But I will not diſcourage you in this affection, leſt we finde few in the ſame fault: the moſt in ſtead of pity and compaſſion, affording vs nothing but fury and indignation.

Section XIII.

The Apoſtaſie of the Church of England.

I Profeſſed to beſtow pity and ſorrow vpon you and your wrong: You entertaine both harſhly, and with a churliſh repulſe: What ſhould a man doe with ſuch diſpoſitions? Let him ſtroke them on the backe, they ſnatle at him, and ſhew their teeth: Let him ſhew them a Cudgell, they fly in his face: you allow not our actions, and returne our wrong; Ours is both the iniury and complaint: How can this be? You are the Agents, we ſit ſtill, and ſuffer in this rent: Yet (ſince the cauſe makes the Schiſme) let vs inquire, not whoſe the action is, but whoſe the deſert: Our Church is deepe drencht in Apoſtaſie; and we cry Peace, Peace: No leſſe than a whole Church at once, and that not ſprinkled, or wetſhod, but drencht in Apoſtaſie; What, did we fall off from you, or you from vs? Tell me, were we euer the true Church of God? and were we then yours? We cannot fall, vnleſſe we once ſtood: Was your Church before this Apoſtaſie? Shew vs your Anceſtors in opinion: Name me but one that euer taught as you doe, and I vow to ſeparate: Was it not? Then we fell not from you: Euery Apoſtaſie of the Church muſt needs be from the true Church. A true Church, & not yours? And yet can there be but one true; See now whether in branding vs with Apoſtaſie, you haue not proued yours to be no true Church: Still I am ignorant: Queene Maries dayes (you ſay) had a true Church, which ſeparated from Popery, choſe them Miniſters, ſerued God holily, from thence was our Apoſtaſie: But, were not the ſame alſo (for the moſt part) Chriſtians in King Edwards dayes? Did they then, in that confuſed allowance of the Goſpell, ſeparate? Or (I pray you) were Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley,

Hooper, and the reſt, parts of that Church, or no? Was there any other ordination of Miniſters than from them? Reiect theſe, and all the world will hiſſe at you; Receiue them, and where is our Apoſtaſie? What Antichriſtianiſme haue we, wherof theſe were freed? But you leape backe (if I vrge you farre) from hence to the Apoſtles times, to fetch our once true Church from farre, that it might be deare: you ſhall not carue for vs: we like not theſe bold ouer-leapes of ſo many Centuries: I ſpeake boldly, you dare not ſtand to the triall of any Church, ſince theirs: Now, I heare your Doctor ſay, this Challenge ſauours of Rome: Antiquity is with you, a Popiſh plea: we haue willingly taken vp our Aduerſaries, at this (by pretence, their owne) weapon: You debar it in the conſcience of your own nouell ſingularity: Yet your Paſtor can be content to make vſe of Tertullian alone againſt all Fathers; That ſuch things are iuſtly to be charged with vanity, as are done without any precept, either of the Lord, or of the Apoſtles: And the Apoſtles did faithfully deliuer to the Nations the Diſcipline they receiued of Chriſt, which we muſt beleeue to be the tumultuary Diſcipline of the refined houſefull at Amſterdam: What? all in all Ages, and places till now Apoſtates? Say if you can, that thoſe famous Churches, wherein Cyprian, Athanaſius, Ambroſe, Hierome, Auſten, Chryſoſtome, and the reſt of thoſe bleſſed Lights liued, were leſſe deepe in this Apoſtaſie than ours? O Apoſtaticall Fathers, that ſeparated not! yea, ſay if you dare, that other reformed Churches are not ouer the Ankles with vs in this Apoſtaſie: What hard news is this to vs, when as your Oracle dare ſay not much leſſe, of the reformed Churches of Netherlands, with whom you liue? Thus he writes: For not hearing of them in other Congregations in theſe Countries; this I anſwer, That ſeeing by the mercy of God, we haue ſeen and forſaken the corruptions, yet remaining in the publike miniſtration, and condition of theſe Churches, (if they be all like to theſe of this City) we cannot therefore partake with them, in ſuch caſe, without declining, and Apoſtaſie from the truth, which we haue our ſelues already receiued and profeſſed. See here, to partake with them in Gods ſeruice is Apoſtaſie; If ſo in the acceſſories, Alas, what crime is in the principall? It were but apoſtaſie to heare an Engliſh ſermon; a Dutch is no leſſe: Wo is you that you dwell ſtill in Meſhech: Good men; it were not more happy for you than the Church, that you were well in Heauen. No leſſe than Apoſtaſie? Let no Reader be appalled at ſo fearfull a word; this is one of the termes of Art, familiar to this way: Finde but any one page of a Dutch printed Volume without Apoſtaſie, Excommunication, Cōmingling, Conſtitution, and ſuſpect it not theirs: Hereſie is not more frequent at Rome, than Apoſtaſie at Amſterdam; nor Indulgences more ordinary there, than here Excommunications. Common vſe makes terrible things eaſie: Their owne M^r. St. for holding with the Dutch Baptiſme, and Read-prayers, is acknowledged to be caſt out for an Apoſtate: yea, their Doctor Maſter Anſworth is noted with this marke from themſelues: There is much latitude (as happie is) in their Apoſtaſie: For when Stanſhal, Mercer, and Iacob Iohnſon were to be choſen Officers in their Church, and exception was taken by ſome at their Apoſtaſie, anſwer was made, It was not ſuch Apoſtaſie as debarred them from Office, it was but a ſlip. Iohn Marke (whether, as Iſichius and Theophylact thinke, the bleſſed Euangeliſt, or ſome other holy Miniſter) is by the whole Parlour at Amſterdam, branded with this lame Apoſtaſie; who departed indeed, but from Paul in his iourney, not from Chriſt in his faith, and therefore his (ἀποστάντα) is expounded by (μὴ συνελθόντα) Act. 15. 38. why doe we thinke much to drinke of an Euangeliſts Cup? Yet let this ignorant Epiſtler teach his cenſorious Anſwerer one point of his owne (that is the Separatiſts) skill: and tell him that he obiects two crimes to one poore Church, which are incompatible; want of Conſtitution, and Apoſtaſie. Thus writes your Maſter of vs: If it were admitted, (which can neuer be proued) that they ſometimes had beene true eſtabliſhed Churches. Loe here, we neuer had true Conſtitution, therefore we are not capable of Apoſtaſie: If we once had it, and ſo were true Churches, heare what your Paſtor ſaith: As Chriſt giueth to all true Churches their being, ſo we muſt leaue it vnto him to take it away, when, and as he pleaſeth. And therefore ſince he hath not remoued his Candleſticke, nor taken away his Kingdome, in ſpight of all obiected Apoſtaſies, wee

And the old vulgar can giue no worſe terme to (בליעל) where hee findes it, yea to (חמורדים) Rebels themſelues. What doth this brand to a Church, not Christian only, (though you deny it) but famous: Of whom is truly verified (after all your ſpleene) that which the Spirit writes to the Angell of Epheſus: Laboraſti & non Defeciſti: Say if you can, what Article of the Chriſtian and Apoſtolike faith haue we renounced? What Hereſie maintaine we? Wherein haue we run from the Tents of Chriſt? What hold we that may not ſtand with life in Chriſt, and ſaluation? Wee challenge all men and Deuils in this point, for our innocence: Diſtinguiſh for ſtarke ſhame, of ſo foule a word; or (which is better) eat it whole; and let not this blemiſh be left vpon your ſoule and name in the Records of God, and the world; that you once ſaid of a Church, too good for yours, Drencht in Apoſtaſie. If we crie Peace, whiles you crie Apoſtaſie; ſurely we flatter, whiles you raile: betwixt theſe two dangerous extremes, we know an wholſome meane, ſo to approue, that we foſter not ſecuritie: ſo to cenſure, that we neither reuile, nor ſeparate: and in one word, to doe that which your Paſtor could exhort the Separators from your Separation (for euen this Schiſme hath Schiſmes) If we ſhould miſlike, yet to reſt in our differences of iudgement, and notwithſtanding peaceably to continue with the Church: Had you taken this courſe, you ſhould neither haue needed to expect our pitie, nor to complaine of our crueltie. Surely, whether our loue be cruell, or not, your hatred is: whereof, take heed leſt you heare from old IACOB, Curſed be their wrath, for it was fierce, and their rage, for it was cruell.

No faults diſannull the being of a Church, vntil contempt of Gods Word be added thereunto after due conuiction. The faults & errors of a Church, may be ſeuerely reproued & conuinced according to the qualitie thereof, and yet the Church not be condemned. N. B.

The first action laid againſt vs, is of vnnaturalneſſe and ingratitude towards our Mother the Church of England, for our cauſeleſſe ſeparation from her: to which vniuſt accuſation, and triuiall querimony, our moſt iuſt defence hath beene, and is, that to our knowledge we haue done her no wrong: we doe freely, and with all thankfulneſſe acknowledge euery good thing ſhee hath, and which our ſelues haue there receiued.

SECTION XIV.

INGRATITVDE and vnnaturalneſſe to your Mother is obiected, in that you flie from her, yea now (woe is me) that you ſpet in her face, and marke her for an Harlot: Would God the accuſation were as far from being iuſt, as from being triuiall: Yet perhaps you intend it not in the lighteneſſe of this charge, but the commonneſſe: you haue cauſed me to ſmart for my charity, yet I forbeare it not: What is your defence? That you haue done her no wrong, to your knowledge. Modeſtly ſpoken, but doubtfully: we know your wrong, but we know not your knowledge: it is well, if your wrong be not wilfull: an ignorant wrong is both in more hope of amends, and of mercie: But is not this caution added, rather for that you thinke no hard meaſure can

I aske, and would be denied: No, you doe freely, and with all thankfulneſſe acknowledge euery good thing ſhe hath: Whatſoeuer you doe to vs, I will not any more in fauour of you, wilfully wrong my ſelfe: you haue bidden me now to take you as a compleat Separatiſt: and ſpeake this for your ſelfe and yours, Let the Reader now iudge, whether the wrong of your Sect be wilfull; and acknowledgement of our good, free and thankfull. Your firſt falſe named Martyr ſhall giue the firſt witneſſe of the titles of our Church: Who (ſaith he) that were not drunke and intoxicate with the Whores Cup, could affirme this confuſe Babel, theſe cages of vncleane Birds, theſe Priſons of foule and hatefull ſpirits, to be the Spouſe of Chriſt? And elſe-where, he cals the people of our Church, Goats and Swine. Is this any wrong to your knowledge? The ſame Author: They haue not (ſaith he) in their Churches any one thing in their practiſe and proceedings, not one pin, naile, or hooke according to the true patterne: Doe you not now freely and thankfully acknowledge our Churches good things? What is more ordinary with him, and his brother in euill, Iohn Greenwood, than to call our Miniſters Baals Prieſts, Cainites, the marked ſeruants of Antichriſt, Sellers of the Whores wares, Worſhippers of the Beaſt? Is this yet any wrong to your knowledge? Paſtor Iohnſon ſtickes not to ſay, that the Miniſtery and Worſhip of the Church of England were taken out of the Whores Cup; and plainly ſtiles our Church (as which of you doe not?) Daughter of the great Babylon, that mother of Whoredomes and abominations of the earth: yet more; That hierarchie, Worſhip, Conſtitution, and Gouernment, which they profeſſe and practiſe, being directly Antichriſtian, doe vtterly deſtroy true Chriſtianity, ſo as their people and Churches cannot in that eſtate be iudged true Chriſtians: Doe you not now freely and thankfully acknowledge our good things? What can any Deuill of Hell ſay worſe againſt vs than this, That we are no Chriſtians? Or what good can there be in vs, if no true Chriſtianity? If we denied euery Article of the Chriſtian Creed, if we were Mahumetans (as your good Paſtor ſtickes not to compare vs) if the moſt damned Heretikes vnder Heauen, what could he ſay, but no Chriſtians? Your Teacher and Paſtor (which is a wonder) agree: For your Doctor Ainſworth makes this one head of his poyſonous Counterpoyſon, that Chriſt is not the Head, Mediator, Prophet, Prieſt, King of the Church of England: You, their Diſciple, are not yet promoted to this height of immodeſtie; yet what are your good things? Euen to you, we are Apoſtates, Traytors, Rebels, Babyloniſh: this is well for a Learner: Hereafter (if you will heare me) keepe our good things to your ſelfe, and report our euill.

Yea, that your vncharitableneſſe may be, aboue all examples, monſtrous; You do not only deny vs any intereſt in the Church of Chriſt, but exclude vs (what you may) from all hope and poſſibility of attaining the honour of Chriſtendome: For when a godly Miniſter proteſted to Maſter Barrow, the truth of his Miniſtery; vpon the approbation alſo of his people, he receiued this anſwer from him: Though you had ſuch allowance, it could nothing auaile, but rather ouerthrow your Miniſtery, they being as yet vngathered to Chriſt, and therefore neither may not in this eſtate chuſe them a Miniſter, nor any exerciſe a Miniſtery vnto them, without hainous ſacrilege. O deſperate iudgement; we neither are Chriſtians, nor can be! No Chriſtianity without Faith, no Faith without the Miniſtery of the Word, no Word to vs without Sacrilege: What are we, that the very offer of bringing vs to God ſhould be criminall? I grieue to thinke and report, that your owne Paſtor hath paralleld this cruelty: His owne brother (which is no leſſe ſauage) though one of your Sect, is the publike accuſer and condemner of him in this crime to all the World: who after a pitifull relation of his eight yeeres quarrells with him, and foure yeeres Excommunication, in his Epiſtle before a large Volume to this purpoſe, writes thus:

After all theſe, hath not our kinde, carefull, and old Father come a long iourney to make Peace? Hath he not laboured with you, the Elders and the Church, to bring you to peace? Hath he not vſed the helpe and counſell of the Reformed Churches herein? Yet will you not be reclaimed; but adding that ſinne aboue all, haue alſo monſtrouſly excommunicated your Father the Peace-ſeeker, &c. And ſtraight; How oft deſired hee you, (as if he had beene the ſonne, and you the father) euen with teares, that you would repent? In a word, how came He and I to your doore, ſhewing you that it might be (vpon his departing) you ſhould ſee his face no more? &c. Yet you forced him by your ill dealing, ſtill to leaue vpon you his Curſe, and all the Curſes written in Gods Booke againſt vnthankfull and diſobedient children. Thus farre a brother concerning a brother, againſt father and brother. Other ſtrangely-vnkinde vſages of both, I had rather leaue to the diſcouery of Maſter White, and this miſerable Plaintiſe, who haue written enough to make an enemie aſhamed. that whiles I was Miniſter in your Church of England, I ſtood in an Antichriſtian eſtate; yet doubt I not, but euen then, being of the Elect of God, I was partaker through faith, of the mercy of God in Chriſt to ſaluation: but as for you (Mr. Iacob and his fellow-Chriſtians) whiles you thus remaine, you cannot in that eſtate approue your ſelues to haue the promiſe of ſaluation. Behold here, the Church of England gaue you but an Antichriſtian eſtate; if God giue ſecret mercy, what is that to her?

Gods ſuperaboundant grace doth neither abate ought of her Antichriſtianiſme, nor moue you to follow him in couering, and paſſing by the manifold enormities in our Church, wherewith thoſe good things are inſeparably commingled: Your owne mouth ſhall condemne you: Doth God paſſe ouer our enormities, and doe you ſticke, yea, ſeparate? Doth his grace couer them, and doe you diſplay them? Haue you learned to be more iuſt than your Maker? Or if you be not aboue his iuſtice, why are you againſt his mercy? God hath not diſclaimed vs, by your owne confeſſion; you haue preuented him. If Princes leaſures may not be ſtayed in reforming, yet ſhall not Gods in reiecting? Your ignorance enwrapped you in your errours: his infinite wiſdome ſees them, and yet his infinite mercy forbeares them: ſo might you at once haue ſeene, diſliked, ſtayed; If you did not herein goe contrary to the courſes of our common God, how happy ſhould both ſides haue beene? yea, how ſhould there be no ſides? How ſhould we be more inſeparably commingled, than our good and euill?

But ſhould you haue continued ſtill in ſinne that grace might haue abounded? God forbid: you might haue continued here without ſinne (ſaue your owne) and then grace would no leſſe haue abounded to you, than now your ſin abounds in not continuing: What need you to ſurfet of another mans Trencher? Other ſinnes need no more to infect you, than your graces can ſanctifie them. As for your further light, ſuſpect it not of God: ſuſpect it to be meere darkneſſe: and if the light in you bee darkneſſe, how great is that darkneſſe? What? ſo true and glorious a light of God, and neuer ſeene till now? No Worlds, Times, Churches, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apoſtles, Martyrs, Fathers, Doctors, Chriſtians, euer ſaw this truth looke forth beſides you, vntill you? Externall light was Gods firſt creature, and ſhall this ſpirituall light, wherby all Churches ſhould be diſcerned, come thus late? But the Church of England (ſay you) is our Mother, and ſo ought not to be auoided: But ſay I, we muſt not ſo cleaue to holy Mother Church, as we neglect our Heauenly Father, and his commandements, which we know in that eſtate we could not but tranſgreſſe, and that hainouſly, and againſt our conſciences, not onely in the want of many Chriſtian Ordinances, to which wee are moſt ſtraightly bound both by Gods Word and our owne neceſſities.

The Motherhood of the Church of England, how far it obligeth vs.
Deut. 21, 22, 23.

Mater Eccleſia, Mater eſt etiam Matris noſtræ. Aug. Epiſt. 38.

THE Church of England is your Mother, to her ſmall comfort; ſhe hath borne you, and repented. Alas, you haue giuen her cauſe to powre out Iobs curſes vpon your Birth day, by your not onely forſaking but curſing her: Stand not vpon her faults, which you ſhall neuer proue capitall: Not onely the beſt Parent might haue brought forth a rebellious ſonne to be ſtoned. What then? Doe we prefer duty to piety, and ſo plead for our holy Mother Church, that we neglect our Heauenly Father, yea, offend him? See what you ſay: it muſt needs be an Holy Mother that cannot be pleaſed without the diſpleaſure of God: A good wife, that oppoſes ſuch an husband: a good ſonne that vpbraids this vniuſtly: Therefore is ſhe a Church, your Mother, holy, becauſe ſhe bred you to God, cleaues to him, obeyes his commandements, and commands them. And ſo farre is ſhe from this deſperate contradiction, that ſhee voweth not to hold you for her ſonne, vnleſſe you honour God as a Father. It is a wilfull ſlander that you could not but hainouſly tranſgreſſe vnder her: I dare take it vpon my ſoule, that all your tranſgreſſion which you ſhould neceſſarily haue incurred by her obedience, is nothing ſo hainous, as your vncharitableneſſe in your cenſures and diſobedience. Conſcience is a common plea, euen to thoſe you hate: we inquire not how ſtrong it is, but how wel informed: not whether it ſuggeſt this, but whereupon. To go againſt the conſcience is ſinne, to follow a miſ-informed conſcience is ſinne alſo: If you do not the firſt, we know you are faultie in the ſecond: He that is greater than the conſcience, will not take this for an excuſe: But wherein ſhould haue beene this tranſgreſſion; ſo vnauoidable, hainous, againſt conſcience? Firſt, in the want of many ordinances, to which we are moſt ſtrictly bound, both by Gods Word, and our owne neceſſities.

SECTION XVIII.

CAn you thinke this hangs well together? You ſhould here want many of Gods Ordinances: why ſhould you want them? Becauſe you are not ſuffered to enioy them: who hinders it? Superior powers: Did euer man wilfully and hainouſly offend, for wanting of that which he could not haue? What hath conſcience to doe with that which is out of our power? Is neceſſity with you become a ſinne, and that hainous? Dauid is driuen to lurke in the wilderneſſe, and forced to want the vſe of many diuine Ordinances: It was his ſorrow, not his tranſgreſſion: Hee complaines of this, but doth he accuſe himſelfe of ſinne? Not to deſire them had beene ſinne, no ſinne to be debarred them: Well might this be Sauls ſinne, but not his. Haue you not ſinnes enow of your owne, that you muſt needs borrow of others? But I ſee your ground: You are bound to haue theſe Ordinances; and therefore without Princes, yea againſt them: ſo it is your tranſgreſſion to want them in ſpight of Magiſtrates: Gaudentius the Donatiſt taught you this of old; And this is one of the Hebrew Songs which Mr. Barrow ſings to vs in Babylon, that we care not to make Chriſt attend vpon Princes, and to be ſubiect to their Lawes and Gouernment: and his Predeceſſor (the root of your Sect) tels vs in this ſenſe the Kingdome of Heauen muſt ſuffer violence, and that it comes not with obſeruation, that men may ſay, Loe the Parliament, or loe, the Biſhops decrees: and in the ſame Treatiſe; The Lords Kingdome muſt wait on your policy, forſooth; and his Church muſt be framed your ciuill State, &c. Iuſt as that Donatiſt of old, in Auguſtine, Quid vobis, &c. What haue you to doe with worldly Emperours? and as that other in Optatus: Quid Imperatori cum Eccleſia? What hath the Emperour to doe with the Church? Yea, your Martyr feares not to teach vs, that Gods ſeruants being as yet priuate men, may and muſt together build his Church, though all the Princes of the World ſhould prohibit the ſame vpon paine of death: Belike then you ſhould ſin hainouſly, if you ſhould not be Rebels. The queſtion is not, whether we ſhould aske leaue of Princes to be Chriſtians; but whether of Chriſtian Princes we ſhould aske leaue to eſtabliſh circumſtances of Gouernment: God muſt be ſerued though we ſuffer; our bloud is well beſtowed vpon our Maker: but in patience, not in violence. Priuate profeſſion is one thing; Publike Reformation and Iniunction is another; Euery man muſt doe that in the maine: none may doe this, but they of whom God ſayes, I haue ſaid, Ye are Gods: and of them, There is difference betwixt Chriſtian and Heathen Princes: If (at leaſt) all Princes were not to you Heathen: If theſe ſhould haue beene altogether ſtayed for, Religion had come late: If the other ſhould not be ſtayed for, Religion would ſoone be ouer-laid with confuſion: Laſtly, the body of Religion is one thing, the skirts of outward Gouernment another: that may not depend on men to be embraced, or (with loyaltie) proſecuted; theſe (vpon thoſe generall rules Chriſt) both may, and doe, and muſt: If you cut off but one lap of theſe with Dauid, you ſhall be touched: To deny this power to Gods Deputies on Earth, what is it, but Ye take too much vpon you, Moſes and Aaron, all the Congregation is holy: wherefore lift ye your ſelues aboue the Congregation of the Lord? See, if herein you come not too neere the walls of that Rome, which yee ſo abhorre and accurſe, in aſcribing ſuch power to the Church, none to Princes. Let your Doctor tell you,

THe firſt of theſe then, is eaſily vntwiſted : your ſecond is neceſſitie : Than which what can be ſtronger ? what law, or what remedy is againſt neceſſitie ? What we muſt haue we cannot want: Oppoſe but the publike neceſſitie to yours: your neceſſitie of hauing, to the publike neceſſitie of withholding : and let one of theſe neceſſities (like two nailes) driue out another: So they haue done, and your owne neceſſitie (as the ſtronger) hath preuailed; for that other neceſſitie might be eluded by flight : you haue ſought and found elſe-where what the neceſſitie of our lawes denied, and the neceſſitie of your conſcience required. Beware leſt vniuſtly: Sinne is as ſtrong bond to a good heart as impoſſibilitie; Chriſtians cannot doe what they ought not : contrary to the lawes of your Prince and Country : you haue fled not onely from vs, but from our Communion. Either is diſobedience no ſinne, or might you doe this euill, that good may come of it? But what neceſſitie is this ? ſimple and abſolute, or conditionall? Is there no remedie but you muſt needs haue ſuch Elders, Paſtors, Doctors, Releeuers, ſuch offices, ſuch executions ? Can there be no Church, no Chriſtians without them ? What ſhall we ſay of the families of the Patriarkes, of the Iewiſh congregations vnder the Law, yea, of Chriſt and his Apoſtles ? Either deny them to haue beene viſible Churches, or ſhew vs your diſtinct offices amongſt them : But as yet (you ſay) they were not : Therefore God hath had a true Church (thouſands of yeeres) without them : Therefore they are not of the eſſence of the Church : You call mee to the times ſince Chriſt : I demand then, was there not a worthy Church of God in Ieruſalem from the time of Chriſts Aſcenſion, till the election of the ſeuen Deacons. Thoſe hundred and twentie Diſciples, *Act.*1.15. and three thouſand Conuerts, *Act.*2.41. Thoſe continuall Troupes that flocked to the Apoſtles, were they no true Church? Let the Apoſtles and Euangeliſts be Paſtors and Doctors : where were their Elders, Deacons, Releeuers ? Afterwards, when Deacons were ordained, yet what newes is there of Elders, till *Act.*11 ? yet that of Ieruſalem was more forward than the reſt: We will not (as you are wont) argue from Scriptures negatiuely : no prooſe, yet much probabilitie is in S. Pauls ſilence : Hee writes to Rome, Corinth, and other Churches : thoſe his Diuine letters in a ſweet Chriſtian ciuility ſalute euen ordinary Chriſtians : And would he haue vtterly paſſed by all mention of theſe Church-officers, amongſt his ſo preciſe acknowledgement of leſſer titles in others, if they had beene ere this ordained ? yet all theſe more than true Churches, famous ſome of them, rich, forward and exemplary. Onely the Philippian Church is ſtiled with Biſhops and Deacons, but no Elders beſides them. The Churches of Chriſt ſince theſe, (if at leaſt you will grant that Chriſt had any Church til now) haue continued in a recorded ſucceſſion thorow many hundreds of yeares. Search the Monuments of her Hiſtories : ſhew vs where euer in particular Congregations all theſe your neceſſary Offices (as you deſcribe them) were either found or required. It was therefore a new-no-neceſſitie that bound you to this courſe, or (if you had rather) a neceſſitie of Fallibilitie : If with theſe God may be well ſerued, he may be well ſerued without them. But alſo in our moſt ſinfull ſubiection to many Antichriſtian enormities, which we are bound to eſchue as hell.

SECTION XXI.

BVT beſides that we ought to haue had ſomewhat which we want, we haue ſomewhat which we ſhould haue wanted : Some ? yea, many Antichriſtian enormities.

The enormities of the Church in common.

To

Hall, J.

To ſay we are abſolute, and neither want nor abound, were the voice of Laodicea or Tyrus in the Prophet: Our Church as ſhe is true, ſo humble: and is as farre from arrogating perfection, as acknowledging falſhood: If ſhe haue enormities, yet not ſo many: or if many, not Antichriſtian. Your Cham hath eſpied ninetie one nakedneſſes in this his mother, and glories to ſhew them; All his malice cannot ſhew one fundamentall errour: and when the foule mouth of your falſe Martyr hath ſaid all, they are but ſome ſpots and blemiſhes, not the old running iſſues, and incurable botches of Ægypt: the particulars ſhall plead for themſelues. Theſe you eſchew as hell: While you goe on thus vncharitably both alike; Doe you hate theſe more, than Maſter Smith, and his faction hates yours? His Character ſhall be Iudge: So doe we value your deteſtation, as you his. It were well for you, if you eſchewed theſe enormities leſſe, and hell more: Your ſinfull ſubiection to theſe vnchriſtian humors, will proue more fearefull than to our Antichriſtian enormities.

Is not Babylon the Mother of Gods people? whom he therefore commandeth to depart out of her, leſt being partakers of her ſinnes, they alſo partake of her plagues. And to conclude, what ſay you more againſt vs, for your Mother the Church of England, than the Papiſts doe for their Mother, and your Mothers Mother, the Church of Rome, againſt you, whom they condemne as vnnaturall Baſtards and impious Patricides in your ſeparation from her?

Section XXIII.

THe ſpirit of your Proto-Martyr, would hardly haue digeſted this title of Babylon Mother of Gods people; a murdering Step-mother, rather: Shee cannot be a Mother of Children to God, and no Church of God: Notwithſtanding, Gods people (would he ſay) may be in her, not of her. So Babylon bore them not, but Sion in Babylon; But I feare not your exceſſe of charitie: You fly to your Doctors challenge; and aske what we ſay againſt you for vs, which Rome will not ſay for her ſelfe againſt vs: Will you iuſtifie this Plea of Rome, or not? Heare then what we ſay both to you and them, our enemies both: and yet the enemies of our enemies: Firſt, wee diſclaime, and defie your Pedegree and theirs. The Church of Rome was neuer our Mothers Mother: Our Chriſtian faith came not from the ſeuen-hilles: Neither was deriued either from Auguſtine the Monke, or Pope Gregory. Britany had a worthy Church before either of them lookt into the world: It is true that the ancient Romane Church was ſiſter to ours: here was neere kindred, no dependance: And not more conſanguinitie, than (while ſhe continued faithfull) Chriſtian loue: Now ſhe is gone a whoring, her chaſte ſiſter iuſtly ſpitteth at her: yet euen ſtill (if you diſtinguiſh, as your learned Antagoniſt hath taught you, betwixt the Church and Papacie) ſhe acknowledges her Siſterhood, though ſhe refraines her conuerſation; as ſhe hath many ſlauiſh and factious abettors of her knowne and groſſe errours (to whom we deny this title) affirming them the body, whereof Antichriſt is the head, the great Whore, and Mother of abominations; ſo againe how many thouſands hath ſhe, which retaining the foundation according to their knowledge, (as our learned Whitakers had wont to ſay of Bernard) follow Abſolom with a ſimple heart: all which to reiect from Gods Church, were no better than preſumptuous cruelty. It were well for you before God and the world, if you could as eaſily waſh your hands of vnnaturall impietie, and trecherouſneſſe, as we of Baſtardy and vniuſt ſequeſtration. There can be no Baſtardie, where was neuer any Motherhood, wee were nephewes to that Church, neuer ſonnes: vnleſſe as Rome was the mother Citie of the world, ſo by humane inſtitution, we ſuffered our ſelues to be ranged vnder her Patriarchall authority, as being the moſt famous Church of the Weſt: a matter of courteſie, and pretended Order; no neceſſity, no ſpirituall obligation. As for our ſequeſtration, your mouth and theirs may be ſtopt with this Anſwer: As all corrupted Churches, ſo ſome things the Church of Rome ſtill holds aright; a true God in three perſons, true Scriptures, though with addition, a true Chriſt, though mangled with foule and erroneous conſequences; true Baptiſme, though ſhamefully deformed with rotten Traditions; and many other vndeniable truths of God: ſome other things (and too many) her wicked Apoſtaſie hath deuiſed and maintained abominably amiſſe; the body of her Antichriſtianiſme, groſſe errours, and (by iuſt ſequell) hereſies; their Popes Supremacie, infallibilitie, Illimitation, Tranſubſtantiation, Idolatrous and ſuperſtitious worſhip, and a thouſand other of this branne: In regard of all theſe latter, we profeſſe to the world a iuſt and ancient ſeparation from this falſe faith and deuotion of the Romiſh Church; which neither you will ſay, nor they ſhall euer proue faultie: yea rather they haue in all theſe ſeparated from vs, who ſtill irrefragably profeſſe to hold with the ancient, from whom whom they are departed. In regard of the other wee are ſtill with them, holding and embracing with them what they hold with Chriſt: neither will you (I thinke) euer proue that in theſe we ſhould differ. As for our communion, they haue ſeparated vs by their proud and fooliſh excommunications: if they had not, we would iuſtly haue begun: from their Tyrannie and Antichriſtianiſme, from their miſerable Idolatrie: but as for the body of their poore ſeduced Chriſtians, which remaine amongſt them vpon the true foundation (as doubtleſſe there are thouſands of them which laugh at their Pardons, Miracles, Superſtitions, and their truſt in merits repoſing only vpon Chriſt) wee adhere to them in loue and pitie, and haue teſtified our affection by our bloud, ready vpon any iuſt call to doe it more; neither would feare to ioyne with them in any true ſeruice of our common God: But the full diſcourſe of this point, that honourable and learned Pleſſes hath ſo foreſtalled, that whatſoeuer I ſay, would ſeeme but borrowed. Vnto his rich Treatiſe I referre my Reader, for full ſatisfaction: Would God this point were thorowly knowne, and well weighed on all parts. The neglect or ignorance whereof hath both bred and nurſed your ſeparation, and driuen the weake and inconſiderate into ſtrange extremities.

Phil. Morn. du Pleſſes Lib. de Eccle. cap. 10.

This ſay we of our ſelues in no more Charitie than Truth: But for you; how dare you make this ſhameleſſe compariſon? Can your heart ſuffer your tongue to ſay; that there is no more difference betwixt Rome and vs, than there is betwixt vs and you? How many hundred errours, how many damnable hereſies haue we euinced with you, in that (ſo compounded) Church? ſhew vs but one miſ-opinion in our Church that you can proue within the ken of the foundation: Let not zeale make you impudent: Your Doctor could ſay (ingenuouſly ſure) that in the Doctrines which ſhe profeſſeth, ſhe is farre better, and purer than the Whore Mother of Rome, and your laſt Martyr, yet better: If you meane (ſaith he) by a Church (as the moſt doe) that publike profeſſion whereby men doe profeſſe ſaluation to be had by the death and righteouſneſſe of Ieſus Chriſt, I am free from denying any Church of Chriſt to be in this Land: for I know the doctrine touching the holy Trinity, the natures and offices of the Lord Ieſus, free iuſtification by him; both the Sacraments, &c. publiſhed by her Maieſties authoritie, and commanded by her lawes, to be the Lords bleſſed and vndoubted Truths, without the knowledge and profeſſion whereof no ſaluation is to be had: Thus hee with ſome honeſtie, though little ſenſe. If therefore your will doe not ſtand in your light, you may well ſee, why wee ſhould thus forſake their Communion, and yet not you ours. Yet though their corruptions be incomparably more, we haue not dared to ſeparate ſo farre from them, as you haue done from vs for leſſe: Still we hold them euen a viſible Church, but vnſound, ſicke, dying,; ſicke, not of a conſumption onely, but of a leproſie or plague (ſo is the Papacie to the Church) diſeaſes, not more deadly than infectious: If they be not rather in Sardies taking; of whom the Spirit of God ſaith, thou haſt a name that thou liueſt, but thou art dead; and yet in the next words bids them awake, and ſtrengthen the things which are ready to die. And though our iudgement and practice haue forſaken their erroneous doctrines and ſeruice, yet our charitie (if you take that former diſtinction) hath not vtterly forſaken and condemned their perſons. This is not our cooleneſſe, but equalitie: your reprobation of vs for them, hath not more zeale than headſtrong vncharitableneſſe,

The ſeparation made by our holy Martyrs.

BVT how could you without bluſhing once name Cranmer, Latimer, and thoſe other holy Martyrs, which haue beene ſo oft obiected to the conuiction of your Schiſme? Thoſe Saints ſo forſooke the Romiſh Church, as we haue done; died witneſſes of Gods truth in that Church, from which you are ſeparated: liued, preached, gouerned, ſhed their bloud in the communion of the Church of England, which you diſclaime and condemne as no Church of God, as meerely Antichriſtian: Either of neceſſity they were no Martyrs, yea, no Chriſtians, or elſe your Separations and Cenſures of vs are wicked. Chuſe whether you will; They were in the ſame caſe with vs; we are in the ſame caſe with them; no difference but in the time: either their bloud will be vpon your heads, or your owne: this Church had then the ſame conſtitution, the ſame confuſion, the ſame worſhip, the ſame miniſtery, the ſame gouernment (which you brand with Antichriſtianiſme) ſwayed by the holy hands of theſe men of God; condemne them, or allow vs. For their Separation: They found many maine errours of doctrine in the Church of Rome (in the Papacy nothing but errours) worth dying for: ſhew vs one ſuch in ours, and we will not only approue your Separation, but imitate it.

SEP.

But here in the name of the Church of England, you waſh your hands of all Babyloniſh abominations, which you pretend you haue forſaken, and her for them. And in this regard you ſpeake thus: The Reformation you haue made of the many and maine corruptions of the Romiſh Church, we doe ingenuouſly acknowledge, and doe withall embrace with you all the truths which to our knowledge you haue receiued in ſtead of them. But Rome was not built all in a day. The myſtery of iniquity did aduance it ſelfe by degrees: and as the riſe was, ſo muſt the fall be. That Man of Sinne, and Lawleſſe man, muſt languiſh and die away of a conſumption, 2 Theſſ. 2. 8. And what though many of the higheſt Towers of Babel, and of the ſtrongeſt Pillars alſo be demoliſhed, and pulled downe, yet may the building ſtand ſtill, though tottering to and fro (as it doth) and only vnder-propped and vpheld with the ſhoulder and arme of fleſh, without which in a very moment it would fall flat vpon, and lie leuell with the earth.

SECTION XXV.

What ſeparation England hath made.

THE Church of England doth not now waſh her hands of Babyloniſh abominations, but rather ſhewes they are cleane. Would God they were no more foule with your ſlander than her owne Antichriſtianiſme. Here will be found not pretences, but proofes of our forſaking Babylon; of your forſaking vs, not ſo much as well-coloured pretences: You begin to be ingenuous; while you confeſſe a reformation in the Church of England: not of ſome corruptions, but many; and thoſe many not ſlight, but maine.

The gifts of Aduerſaries are thankleſſe: As Ierome ſaid of his Ruffinus; ſo may we of you, that you wrong vs with praiſes: This is no more praiſe than your next page giues to Antichriſt himſelfe. Leaue out many, and though your commendations be more vncertaine, we ſhall accept it: ſo your indefinite propoſition ſhall ſound to vs as generall, That wee haue reformed the maine corruptions of the Romiſh Church: None therefore remaine vpon vs, but ſlight and ſuperficiall blemiſhes. So you haue forſaken a Church of foule skin, but of a ſound heart; for want of beautie, not of truth.

But you ſay many, not All; that if you can picke a quarrell with one, you might reiect all: yet ſhew vs that one maine and ſubſtantiall errour, which we haue not reformed: and you doe not more embrace thoſe truths with vs which we haue receiued, than we will condemne that falſhood which you haue reiected, and embrace the truth of that Separation which you haue practiſed.

hall, J.

The degrees whereby that ſtrumpet of Babylon got on horſeback you haue learned of vs, who haue both learned and taught, that as Chriſt came not abruptly into the world, but with many preſages and prefigurations, (The day was long dawning ere this Sunne aroſe) ſo his aduerſary (that Antichriſt) breakes not ſuddenly vpon the Church, but comes with much preparation and long expectance: and as his riſe, ſo his fall muſt be graduall, and leiſurely: Why ſay you then, that the whole Church euery where, muſt at once vtterly fall off from that Church where that Man of Sinne ſitteth? His fall depends on the fall of others, or rather their riſing from vnder him: If neither of theſe muſt be ſudden, why is your haſte? But this muſt not be, yet ought: as there muſt be hereſies, yet there ought not: It is one thing what God hath ſecretly decreed, another what muſt be deſired of vs: If we could pull that Harlot from her ſeat, and put her to Iezabels death, it were happy: Haue we not endeuoured it? What ſpeake you of the higheſt Towers, and ſtrongeſt pillars, or tottering remainders of Babylon? we ſhew you all her rooſes bare, her walls razed, her vaults digged vp, her monuments defaced, her Altars ſacrificed to deſolation: Shortly, all her buildings demoliſhed, not a ſtone vpon a ſtone, ſaue in rude heapes, to tell that here once was Babylon: Your ſtrife goes about to build againe that her Tower of confuſion. God diuides your languages: It will be well; if yet you build not more than we haue reſerued.

SEP.

You haue renounced many falſe doctrines in Popery, and in their places embraced the truth. But what if this truth be taught vnder the ſame hatefull Prelacie in the ſame deuiſed office of Miniſtery, and confuſed communion of the prophane multitude, and that mingled with many errours?

SECTION XXVI.

The maine grounds of Separation.

YOu will now be free both in your profeſſion and gift; You giue vs to haue renounced many falſe doctrines in Popery: and to haue embraced ſo many truths: we take it vntill more: You profeſſe where you ſticke, what you miſlike: In theſe foure famous heads, which you haue learned by heart from all your predeceſſours: An hatefull Prelacie, A deuiſed Miniſtery, a confuſed and prophane communion, and laſtly, the intermixtures of grieuous errours.

What if this truth were taught vnder a hatefull Prelacy? Suppoſe it were ſo; Muſt I not embrace the truth, becauſe I hate the Prelacy? What if Iſrael liue vnder the hatefull Ægyptians? What if Ieremie liue vnder hatefull Paſhur? What if the Iewes liue vnder an hatefull Prieſthood? What if the diſciples liue vnder hatefull Scribes? What are others perſons to my profeſſion? If I may be freely allowed to be a true profeſſed Chriſtian, what care I vnder whoſe hands? But why is our Prelacie hatefull? Actiuely to you, or paſſiuely from you? In that it hates you? Would God you were not more your owne enemies: Or rather becauſe you hate it? your hatred is neither any newes, nor paine: Who or what of ours is not hatefull to you? Our Churches, Bells, Cloathes, Sacraments, Preachings, Prayers, Singings, Catechiſmes, Courts, Meetings, Burials, Mariages: it is maruell that our aire infects not: and that our heauen and earth (as Optatus ſaid of the Donatiſts) eſcape your hatred: not the forwardeſt of our preachers (as you terme them) haue found any other entertainment; no enemie could be more ſpightfull; I ſpeake it to your ſhame. Rome it ſelfe in diuers controuerſary diſcourſes hath bewrayed leſſe gall, than Amſterdam: the better they are to others, you profeſſe they are the worſe: yea, would to God that of Paul were not verified of you; hatefull, and hating one another: but we haue learned, that of wiſe Chriſtians, not the meaſure of hatred ſhould be reſpected, but the deſert: Dauid is hated for no cauſe, Michaiah for a good cauſe: Your cauſes ſhall be examined in their places onwards. It were happy, if you hated your owne ſinnes more, and peace leſſe: our Prelacie would trouble you leſſe, and you the Church.

FOr our deuiſed office of Miniſtery, you haue giuen it a true title. It was deuiſed indeed by our Sauiour, when he ſaid, Goe teach all Nations and baptize; and performed in continuance, when he gaue ſome to be Paſtors and Teachers; and not onely the Office of Miniſtery in generall, but ours whom he hath made able to teach, and deſirous, ſeparated vs for this cauſe to the worke, vpon due triall admitted vs, ordained vs by impoſition of hands of the Elderſhip, and praier, directed vs in the right diuiſion of the Word, committed a charge to vs; followed our Miniſtery with power, and bleſſed our labours with gracious ſucceſſe, euen in the hearts of thoſe whoſe tongues are thus buſie to deny the truth of our vocation: Behold here the deuiſed Office of our Miniſtery: What can you deuiſe againſt this? To proue therefore that no communion may be had with the Miniſtery of the Church of England, he vſes theſe ſeuen demonſtrations; Firſt, Becauſe it is not that Miniſtery which Chriſt gaue, and ſet in his Church. Secondly, Becauſe it is the Miniſtery of Antichriſts Apoſtaſie. Thirdly, Becauſe none can communicate with the Miniſtery of England, but he worſhips the beaſts image, and yeeldeth ſpirituall ſubiection to Antichriſt. Fourthly, Becauſe this Miniſtery deriueth not their power and function from Chriſt. Fiftly, Becauſe they miniſter the holy things of God by vertue of a falſe ſpirituall calling. Sixtly, Becauſe it is a ſtrange Miniſtery, not appointed by God in his word. Seuenthly, Becauſe it is not from Heauen, but from Men.

Now I beſeech thee Chriſtian Reader, iudge whether that which this man was wont ſo oft to obiect to his brother (a crackt braine) appeare not plainely in this goodly equipage of reaſons? For what is all this, but one and the ſame thing tumbled ſeuen times ouer? which yet with ſeuen thouſand times babbling ſhall neuer be the more probable. That our Miniſtery was not giuen and ſet in the Church by Chriſt, but Antichriſtian, what is it elſe to be from men, to be ſtrange, to be a falſe ſpirituall calling, not to be deriued from Chriſt, to worſhip the image of the Beaſt? So this great challenger that hath abridged his nine arguments to ſeuen, might aſwell haue abridged his ſeuen to one a halfe. Here would haue beene as much ſubſtance, but leſſe glory: As for his maine defence: Firſt, we may not either haue, or expect now in the Church that Miniſtery which Chriſt ſet: Where are our Apoſtles, Prophets, Euangeliſts? If we muſt alwayes looke for the very ſame adminiſtration of the Church which our Sauiour left, why doe we not challenge theſe extraordinary functions? Doe we not rather thinke, ſince it pleaſed him to begin with thoſe Offices which ſhould not continue, that herein he purpoſely intended to teach vs, that if we haue the ſame heauenly buſineſſe done, we ſhould not be curious in the circumſtances of the perſons? But for thoſe ordinarie callings of Paſtors and Doctors (intended to perpetuity) with what forehead can he deny them to be in our Church? How many haue we that conſcionably teach and feed, or rather feed by teaching? Call them what you pleaſe, Superintendents (that is) Biſhops, Prelates, Prieſts, Lecturers, Parſons, Vicars, &c. If they preach Chriſt truly, vpon true inward abilities, vpon a ſufficient (if not perfect) outward vocation: ſuch a one (let all hiſtories witneſſe) for the ſubſtance, as hath bin euer in the Church ſince the Apoſtles times: they are Paſtors and Doctors allowed by Chriſt: We ſtand not vpon circumſtances and appendances of the faſhions of ordination, manner of choice, attire, titles, maintenance: but if for ſubſtance theſe be not true Paſtors and Doctors, Chriſt had neuer any in his Church, ſince the Apoſtles left the earth. All the difficultie is in our outward calling: Let the Reader grant our graue and learned Biſhops to be but Chriſtians, and this will eaſily bee euinced lawfull, euen by their rules: For, if with them euery plebeian Artificer hath power to elect and ordaine by vertue of his Chriſtian profeſſion (the act of the worthieſt ſtanding for all) how can they deny this right to perſons qualified (beſides common graces) with wiſdome, learning, experience, authority? Either their Biſhopricke makes them no Chriſtians (a poſition which of all the world beſides this Sect, would be hiſſed at) or elſe their hands impoſed are thus farre (by the rules of Separatiſts) effectuall. Now your beſt courſe is (like to an Hare that runnes backe from whence ſhee was ſtarted) to flie to your firſt hold: No Church, therefore no Miniſtery: So now, not the Church hath deuiſed the Miniſtery, but the Miniſtery hath deuiſed the Church: I follow you not in that idle circle: Thence you haue beene hunted already: But now, ſince I haue giuen account of ours; I pray you tell me ſeriouſly, Who deuiſed your Office of Miniſtery; I dare ſay, not Chriſt, not his Apoſtles, not their Succeſſors: What Church euer in the world can be produced (vnleſſe in caſe of extremity for one turne) whoſe conſpiring multitude made themſelues Miniſters at pleaſure? what rule of Chriſt preſcribes it? What reformed Church euer did, or doth practiſe it? what example warrants it? where haue the inferiours laid hands vpon their Superiours? What congregation of Chriſtendome in all records afforded you the neceſſary patterne of an vnteaching Paſtor, or an vnfeeding Teacher?

It is an old policy of the faulty, to complaine firſt: Certainly, there was neuer Popiſh Legend a more errand deuice of man than ſome parts of this Miniſtery of yours, ſo much gloried in for ſincere correſpondence to the firſt Inſtitution.

If all maine truths be taught amongſt ſome godly, ſome profane; why will you more ſhun thoſe profane, than cleaue to thoſe Truths, and thoſe godly? If you haue duly admoniſhed him, and deteſted and bewailed his ſin; what is another mans profaneneſſe to you? If profaneneſſe be not puniſhed, or confuſion be tolerated, it is their ſin, whom it concerneth to redreſſe them: If the Officers ſin, muſt we run from the Church? It is a famous and pregnant proteſtation of God by Ezekiel: The righteouſnes of the righteous ſhall be vpon him, and the wickednes of the wicked ſhall be vpon himſelfe. And if the Fathers ſowre Grapes cannot hurt the childrens teeth, how much leſſe ſhall the neighbours? But whither will you runne from this Communion of the profane? The ſame fault you finde with the Dutch and French; yea, in your owne. How well you haue auoided it in your ſeparation, let M. White, George Iohnſon, Maſter Smith be ſufficient witneſſes, whoſe plentifull reports of your known vncleanneſſes, ſmothered miſchiefes, malicious proceedings, corrupt packings, communicating with knowne offenders, bolſtering of ſinnes, and willing conniuences, as they are ſhamefull to relate, ſo might well haue ſtopt your mouth from excepting at our confuſed Communion of the prophane.

Our Errors intermingled with Truth.

Barr. Confet. with M. Hutchinſ. &c. and D. Andr.

HOw many and grieuous errors are mingled with our Truths, ſhall appeare ſufficiently in the ſequell; If any want, let it bee the fault of the accuſer. It is enough for the Church of Amſterdam to haue no errors. But ours are grieuous: Name them, that our ſhame may be ſequell to your griefe: So many they are, and ſo grieuous, that your Martyr, when he was vrged to inſtance, could finde none but our opinion concerning Chriſts deſcent into Hell; and except he had ouer-reached, not that. Call you our Doctrines ſome generall truths? Looke into our Confeſſions, Apologies, Articles, and compare them with any, with all other Churches; and if you finde a more particular, ſound, Chriſtian, abſolute profeſſion of all fundamentall truths in any Church, ſince Chriſt aſcended into Heauen, renounce vs as you do, and we will ſeparate vnto you: But theſe truths are not ſoundly practiſed: Let your Paſtor teach you, that if errors of practiſe ſhould bee ſtood vpon, there could bee no true Church vpon earth: Pull out your owne beame firſt: wee willingly yeeld this to bee one of your truths, that no truth can ſanctifie error: That one hereſie makes an Hereticke: but learne withall, that euery error doth not pollute all truths: That there is hay and ſtubble, which may burne, yet both the foundation ſtand, and the builder bee ſaued: Such is ours at the worſt, why doe you condemne where God will ſaue? No Scripture is more worne with your Tongues and Pens, than that of the Leauen, 1 Cor. 5.6. If you would compare Chriſts Leauen with Pauls, you ſhould ſatisfie your ſelfe. Chriſt ſayes, The Kingdome of Heauen is as Leauen; Paul ſayes, A groſſe ſinne is Leauen: Both leauens the whole lumpe: neither may be taken preciſely, but in reſemblance, not of equalitie (as hee ſaid well) but of qualitie: For notwithſtanding the Leauen of the Kingdome, ſome part you grant is vnſanctified; So notwithſtanding the Leauen of ſinne, ſome (which haue ſtriuen againſt it to their vtmoſt) are not ſowred: The leauening in both places muſt extend onely to whom it is extended: the ſubiects of regeneration in the one; the partners of ſinne in the other: So our Sauiour ſaith; Yee are the ſalt of the earth; yet too much of the earth is vnſeaſoned: The truth of the effect muſt bee regarded in theſe ſpeeches, not the quantitie: It was enough for S. Paul to ſhew them by this ſimilitude, that groſſe ſinnes where they are tolerated, haue a power to infect others: whether it bee (as Hierome interprets it) by ill example, or by procurement of iudgements: and thereupon the inceſtuous muſt be caſt out: All this tends to the excommunicating of the euill, not to the ſeparating of the good: Did euer Paul ſay, If the inceſtuous bee not caſt out, ſeparate from the Church? Shew vs this, and we are yours: Elſe it is a ſhame for you, that you are not ours: If Antichriſt hold many truths, and wee but many, wee muſt needs be proud of your praiſes: We hold all his truths, and haue ſhewed you, how we hate all his forgeries, no leſſe than you hate vs: Yet the myſterie of iniquitie is ſtill ſpun in the Church of England; but with a finer threed: So fine, that the very eyes of your malice cannot ſee it; yet none of our leaſt Motes haue eſcaped you: Thanks be to our good God, we haue the great myſterie of godlineſſe ſo fairely and happily ſpunne amongſt vs, as all, but you, bleſſe God with vs, and for vs: As ſoone ſhall yee finde Charity and Peace in your Engliſh Church, as hereſie in our Church of England.

If they were then as ſhoulders and armes vnder that head the Pope, and ouer the inferiour members; and haue now the ſame Eccleſiaſticall Iuriſdiction deriued and continued vpon them, whereof they were poſſeſſed in the time of Popery (as it is plaine they haue by the firſt Parliament of Queene* ELIZABETH) why are they not ſtill members of that body, though the head the Pope be cut off?

Whether our Prelacie bee Antichriſtian. Seuen Argu. firſt Anſw. Counterpoyſ.

TO the particular inſtances: I aske where are the proud Towers of their Vniuerſall Hierarchie? You anſwer roundly: One in Lambeth, another in Fulham, &c. What Vniuerſall? Did euer any of our Prelates challenge all the World as his Dioceſſe? Is this ſimplicitie or malice? If your Paſtor tell vs, that as well a World as a Prouince, Let me returne it; If he may be Paſtor ouer a Parlour-full, why not of a Citie? And if of a City, why not of a Nation? But theſe you will proue vnruinated Towers of that Babel: You aske therefore whether the Office of Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and the reſt of that ranke, were not in Queene MARIES dayes, parts of that accurſed Hierarchie, and members of that man of ſinne. Doubtleſſe they were: Who can denie it? But now (ſay you) they haue the ſame Eccleſiaſticall Iuriſdiction continued: This is your miſerable Sophiſtrie: Thoſe Popiſh Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Clergie were members of Antichriſt: not as Church-Gouernours, but as Popiſh; while they ſwore ſubiection to him, while they defended him, whiles they worſhipt him aboue all that is called God, and extorted this homage from others, how could they be other but limmes of that Man of ſinne? ſhall others therefore which defie him, reſiſt, trample vpon him, ſpend their liues and labours in oppugnation of him, bee neceſſarily in the ſame caſe, becauſe in the ſame roome? Let mee helpe your Anabaptiſts with a ſound Argument: The Princes, Peeres, and Magiſtrates of the Land in Queene MARIES dayes were ſhoulders and armes of Antichriſt; their calling is ſtill the ſame; therefore now they are ſuch: Your Maſter Smith vpon no other ground, diſclaimeth Infants Baptiſme, crying out that this is the maine relique of Antichriſtianiſme: But ſee how like a wiſe Maſter you confute your ſelfe: They are ſtill members of the body, though the head (the Pope) be cut off: The head is Antichriſt, therefore the body without the head is no part of Antichriſt: He that is without the head Chriſt, is no member of Chriſt: ſo contrarily; I heare you ſay, the very Iuriſdiction and Office is here Antichriſtian, not the abuſe: What? in them, and not in all Biſhops ſince, and in the Apoſtles times? Alas, who are you that you ſhould oppoſe all Churches and times? Ignorance of Church-ſtorie, and not diſtinguiſhing betwixt ſubſtances and appendances, perſonall abuſes, and callings, hath led you to this errour: Yet ſince you haue reckoned vp ſo many Popes, let me helpe you with more: Was there not one in Lambeth, when Doctor Cranmer was there? One in Fulham, when Ridley was there? One in Worceſter, when Latimer was there? One at Wincheſter, when Philpot was there? We will goe higher; Was not Hilarius at Arles, Paulinus at Nola, Primaſius at Vtica, Eucherius at Lyons, Cyril at Alexandria, Chryſoſtome at Conſtantinople, Auguſtine at Hippo, Ambroſe at Millaine? What ſhould I be infinite? Was not Cyprian at Carthage, Euodius, and after him Ignatius in Saint Iohns time at Antioch, Polycarpus at Smyrna, Philip at Cæſarea, Iames and Simeon and Cleophas at Hieruſalem, and (by much conſent of Antiquitie) Titus in Creet, Timothy at Epheſus, Marke at Alexandria: yea, to bee ſhort, was there not euery where in all Ages, an allowed Superioritie of Church-Gouernours vnder this title? SECTION XXXI.

FRom your owne Verdict you deſcend to the teſtimonies of all Reformed Churches : I bluſh to ſee ſo wilfull a ſlander fall from the pen of a Chriſtian. That all Reformed Churches renounce our prelacie as Antichriſtian, what one hath done it? Yea, what one forraine Diuine of note, hath not giuen to our Clergie the right hand of Fellowſhip ? ſo farre is it from this, that I. Alaſco was the allowed Biſhop of our firſt Reformed ſtrangers in this land ; ſo far, that when your Doctor found himſelfe vrged (by M. Spr.) with a cloud of witneſſes for our Church and Miniſterie, as Bucer, Martyr, Fagius, Alaſco, Caluin, Beza, Bullinger, Gualter, Simler, Zanchius, Iunius, Rollocus, and others, he had nothing to ſay for himſelfe, but, Though you come againſt vs with Horſe-men and Chariots, yet we will remember the name of the Lord our God ; and turnes it off with the accuſation of a Popiſh plea and reference to the practiſe of the Reformed : And if therefore they haue ſo renounced it, becauſe their practiſe receiues it not ; Why, like a true Make-bate doe you not ſay, that our Churches haue ſo renounced their Gouernment? Theſe ſiſters haue learned to differ, and yet to loue and reuerence each other : and in theſe caſes to inioy their owne formes, without preſcription of neceſſitie or cenſure. Let Reuerend Beza be the Trumpet of all the reſt, who tells you that the Reformed Engliſh Churches continue, vpheld by the authoritie of Biſhops, and Archbiſhops, that they haue had men of that Ranke, both famous Martyrs, and worthy Paſtors and Doctors : and laſtly, congratulates this bleſſing to our Church : or let Hemingius tell you the iudgment of the Daniſh Church : Indicat cæteros Miniſtros, &c. it iudgeth, ſaith he, that other Miniſters ſhould obey their Biſhops in all things, which make to the edification of the Church, &c. It ſeemes, the ſacred (ſo called) Synod aſſumeth little leſſe vnto her ſelfe in her determinations : otherwiſe, how durſt ſhee decree ſo abſolutely, as ſhe doth, touching things reputed indifferent, viz: that all men in all places muſt ſubmit vnto them without exception, or limitation? Except ſhee could infallibly determine, that theſe her Ceremonies thus abſolutely impoſed, ſhould edifie all men at all times, how durſt ſhe thus impoſe them? To exact obedience in and vnto them, whether they offend or offend not, whether they edifie or deſtroy, were intolerable preſumption.

SECTION XXXII.

Our Synods determination of things indifferent. Article 21.

THERE was neuer a more idle and beggerly cauill than your next: your Chriſtian Reader muſt needs think you hard driuen for quarrels, when you are faine to fetch the Popes infallibility, out of our Synod, whoſe flat Decree it was of old: That euen generall Councels may erre, and haue erred. But wherein doth our ſacred Synod aſſume this infallibilitie, in her determinations? Wherefore is a Synod, if not to determine? But of things reputed indifferent? What elſe are ſubiect to the conſtitutions of men? Good and euill are either directly, or by neceſſarie ſequell ordred by God; theſe are aboue humane power: What haue men to doe, if not with things indifferent? All neceſſary things are determined by God, indifferent by men from God, which are as ſo many particulars, extracts from the generals of God: Theſe things (ſaith learned Caluin) are indifferent, and in the power of the Church: Either you muſt allow the Church this, or nothing. But theſe decrees are abſolute, what lawes can be without a command? The law that tyes not is no Law: No more than that (ſaith Auſten) which ties vs to euill. But for all men, and all times? How for all? For none (I hope) but our owne. And why not for them? but without exception and limitation: Doe not thus wrong our Church: our late Arch-biſhop (if it were not piacular for you to read ought of his) could haue taught you in his publike writings, theſe fiue limitations of inioyned ceremonies: Firſt, that they be not againſt the Word of God. Secondly, that Iuſtification or Remiſſion of ſinnes be not attributed to them: Thirdly, that the Church bee not troubled with their multitude: Fourthly, that they be not decreed as neceſſarie, and not to be changed; And laſtly, that men be not ſo tied to them but that by occaſion they may bee omitted, ſo it be without offence and contempt; you ſee our limits: but your feare is in this laſt, contrary to his. He ſtands vpon offence in omitting, you in vſing: As if it were a iuſt offence to diſpleaſe a beholder, no offence to diſpleaſe and violate authoritie: What Law could euer be made to offend none? Wiſe Cato might haue taught you this, in Liuie, that no Law can be commodious to all: Thoſe lips which preſerue knowledge, muſt impart ſo much of it to their hearers, as to preuent their offence: Neither muſt Law-giuers euer fore-ſee what conſtructions will be of their Lawes, but what ought to bee: Thoſe things which your Conſiſtory impoſes, may you keepe them if you liſt? Is not the willing neglect of your owne Parlour-Decrees puniſhed with Excommunication? And now what is all this to infallibility? The ſacred Synod determines theſe indifferent Rites, for decencie and comlineſſe to be vſed of thoſe whom it concernes, therefore it arrogates to it ſelfe infallibilitie: A concluſion fit for a Seperatiſt.

For Excommunication it is cleare enough: While you fully hold that euery priuate man hath as much power in this cenſure, as the Paſtor; and that Princes muſt be equally ſubiect with them to theſe their cenſures. Let any man now deuiſe if the Browniſts could haue a King, how that King could ſtand one day vnexcommunicated? Or if this cenſure meddle onely with his ſoule, not with his Scepter: How more than credible is it, that ſome of your Aſſemblies in Queene ELIZABETHS dayes concluded, that ſhee was not (euen in our ſenſe) Supreme Head of the Church, neither had authority to make Lawes Eccleſiaſticall in the Church? It is well if you will diſclaime it: But you know your receiued poſition; That no one Church is ſuperiour to other: No authoritie therefore can reuerſe this Decree; your will may doe it: yea, what better than Rebellion appeares in your next clauſe? While you accuſe our Loyaltie to an earthly King, as treaſonable to the King of the Church, Chriſt Ieſus; If our Loyalty be a ſinne, where is yours? But whoſe is that ſo vnſauourie weed; No Biſhop, no King? Know you whom you accuſe? let me ſhew you your Aduerſarie; it is King IAMES himſelfe in his Hampton Conference: is there not now ſuſpition in the word? ſurely you had cauſe to feare that the King would proue no good ſubiect: Belike, not to Chriſt: What doe you elſe in the next but proclaime his oppoſition to the King of Kings? or ours in not oppoſing his? As if we might ſay with the Iſraelites, O Lord our God, other Lords beſides thee haue ruled vs: If we would admit each of your Elders to be ſo many Kings in the Church, wee ſhould ſtoope vnder Chriſts Ordinances: Shew vs your Commiſſion, and let it appeare, whether we be Enemies, or you Vſurpers; Alas, you both refuſe the rule of this true Deputie, and ſet vp falſe; Let this fearefull doome of Chriſt light where it is moſt due: Euen ſo let thine enemies periſh O Lord.

Not to ſpeake of the errour of vniuerſall Grace, and conſequently, of Free-will, that groweth on apace amongſt you, what doe you elſe but put in for a part with God in conuerſion? though not through freedome of will, yet in a deuiſed Miniſtery, the meanes of conuerſion: it being the Lords peculiar as well to appoint the outward Miniſtery of conuerſion, as to giue the inward grace.

SECTION XXXV.

GOe on to ſlander: Euen that which you ſay, you will not ſpeake, you do ſpeake with much ſpight and no truth: What hath our Church to doe with errors of vniuerſall grace or Free-will? Errors which her Articles doe flatly oppoſe: what ſhameleſneſſe is this? Is ſhee guilty euen of that which ſhee condemnes? If ſome few priuate iudgements ſhall conceiue, or bring forth an error, ſhall the whole Church doe penance? Would God that wicked and hereticall Anabaptiſme, did not more grow vpon you than thoſe errours vpon vs, you had more need to defend, than accuſe: But ſee (Christian Reader) how this man draggs in crimes vpon vs, as Cacus did his Oxen: We doe (forſooth) part ſtakes with God in our conuerſion; wherein? in a deuiſed Miniſterie: the meanes of conuerſion; well fetcht about: There may bee a Miniſterie, without a conuerſion; and (è conuerſo) There may be a conuerſion without a Miniſtery: Where now are the ſtakes parted? yet thus we part ſtakes (with the Apoſtle) that wee are Gods Fellow labourers in this great worke: He hath ſeparated vs to it, and ioyned vs with him in it, it is he (as we haue proued) that hath deuiſed our Miniſterie: yea, your ſelfe ſhall proue it: it is his peculiar to appoint the outward Miniſtery, that giues the inward grace. But hath not God giuen inward grace, by our outward Miniſterie? Your hearts ſhal be our witneſſes: What wil follow therefore, but that our Miniſterie is his peculiar appointment?

Where (ſay you) are thoſe rotten heapes of Tranſubſtantiating of bread? and where (ſay I) learned you your deuout kneeling to, or before the bread, but from the error of Tranſubſtantiation? Yea, what leſſe can it inſinuate, than either that, or ſome other the like idolatrous conceit? If there were not ſome thing more in the Bread and Wine than in the water at Baptiſme, or in the Word read or preached, why ſhould ſuch ſolemne kneeling be ſo ſeuerely preſſed at that time, rather than vpon the other occaſions? And well and truly haue your owne men affirmed, that it were farre leſſe ſinne, and appearance of an Idolatrie that is nothing ſo groſſe, to tye men in their Prayers, to kneele before a Crucifix, than before the Bread and Wine: and the reaſon followeth, for that, Papiſts commit an Idolatrie far more groſſe and odious in worſhipping the Bread, than in worſhiping any other of their Images or Idols whatſoeuer. Apol. of the Min. of Lincoln. Dioc. part. 1. pag. 66.

SECTION XXXVI.

OVr kneeling you deriue (like a good Herald) from the errour of Tranſubſtantiation: but to ſet downe the deſcent of this pedigree, will trouble you: we doe vtterly denie it, and challenge your proofe. How new a fiction Tranſubſtantiation is, appeares out of Berengaries Recantation to Pope Nicolas: The error was then ſo young, it had not learned to ſpeake; ſhew vs the ſame noueltie in our kneeling. Till of late, men held not the Bread to bee God; of old, they haue held it ſacred: This is the geſture of reuerence in our Prayer at the receit, as Maſter Burgeſſe well interpreted it, not of idolatrous adoration of the Bread. This was moſt-what in the eleuation: the aboliſhing whereof cleares vs of this imputation: you know wee hate this conceit, why doe you thus force wrongs vpon the innocent ? Neither are we alone in this vſe: The Church of Bohemy allowes and practiſes it: and why is this error leſſe palpable in the waters of Geneua ? If the King ſhould offer vs his hand to kiſſe, wee take it vpon our knees: how much more when the King of Heauen giues vs his Sonne in theſe pledges ? Bnt if there were not ſomething more than iuſt reuerence, why doe we ſolemnly kneele at the Communion, not at Baptiſme ? Can you finde no difference ? In this (beſides that there is both a more liuely and feeling ſignification of the thing repreſented) we are the parties, but in the other witneſſes : This therefore I dare boldly ſay, that if your partner M. Smith ſhould euer (which God forbid) perſwade you to rebaptize, your fitteſt geſture (or any others at full age) would be to receiue that Sacramentall water, kneeling : How glad you are to take all ſcraps, that fall from any of ours for your aduantage ? Would to God this obſeruation of your malicious gathering would make all our reuerend Brethren wary of their cenſures: Surely, no idolatry can be worſe than that Popiſh ἀρτολατρεία. The Bread, and the Crucifix ſtriue for the higher place : if we ſhould therfore be ſo tied to kneele before the Bread, as they are tied to kneele before the Crucifix, their ſentence were iuſt : They adore the Crucifix, not we the Bread : they pray to the Crucifix, not we to the Bread : they direct their deuotions (at the beſt) by the Crucifix to their Sauiour, we doe not ſo by the Bread, we kneele no more to the Bread, than to the Pulpit when we ioyne our praiers with the Miniſters : But our quarrell is not with them ; you that can approue their iudgements in diſlike, might learne to follow them in approbation, and peaceable Communion with the Church : if there be a galled place, you will be ſure to light vpon that. Your charity is good ; whatſoeuer your wiſdome be.

SEP.

To let paſſe your deuout kneeling vnto your Ordinary when you take the Oath of Canonicall obedience, or receiue abſolution at his hands, which (as the maine actions are religious) muſt needs be religious adoration, what is the adoring of your truly humane (though called Diuine) Seruice booke in and by which you worſhip God, as the Papiſts doe by their Images ? If the Lord Ieſus in his Teſtament haue not commanded any ſuch Booke, it is accurſed and abominable : if you thinke he haue, ſhew vs the place where, that we may know it with you ; or manifeſt vnto vs that euer the Apoſtles vſed themſelues, or commended to the Churches after them any ſuch Seruice booke. Was not the Lord in the Apoſtles time, and Apoſtolike Churches, purely and perfectly worſhipped, when the Officers of the Church in their miniſtration manifeſted the ſpirit of prayer which they had receiued according to the preſent neceſſities and occaſions of the Church before the leaſt parcell of this patchery came into the World ? And might not the Lord now be alſo purely and perfectly worſhipped, though this printed image, with the painted and carued Images, were ſent backe to Rome, yea, or caſt to Hell, from whence both they and it came ? Speake in your ſelfe, might not the Lord be intirely worſhipped with pure and holy worſhip, though none other Booke but the holy Scriptures were brought into the Church ? If yea (as who can deny it that knowes what the worſhip of God meaneth) what then doth your Seruice-booke there ? The Word of God is perfect and admitteth of none addition. Curſed be he that addeth to the Word of the Lord, and curſed be that which is added, and ſo be your great idoll the Communion booke, though like Nabuchadnezzars Image ſome part of the matter be Gold and Siluer, which is alſo ſo much the more deteſtable, by how much it is the more highly aduanced amongſt you.

SECTION XXXVII.

Whether our Ordinary and Seruice booke be made Idols by vs.

YEt more Idolatry ? And which is more, New, and ſtrange ; ſuch (I dare ſay) as will neuer be found in the two firſt Commandements. Behold, here two new Idols, Our Ordinary, and our Seruice booke, a ſpeaking Idoll, and a written Idoll. Calecute hath one ſtrange Deitie the Deuill, Siberia many, whoſe people worſhip euery day what they ſee firſt. Rome hath many merry Saints : but Saint Ordinary, and Saint Seruice-booke were neuer heard of till your Canonization. In earneſt, doe you thinke we make our Ordinary an idoll? What elſe? you kneele deuoutly to him when you receiue either the Oath or Abſolution. This muſt needs be religious adoration: is there no remedy? You haue twice kneeled to our Vice-Chancellor, when you were admitted to your degree; you haue oft kneeled to your Parents, and Godfathers, to receiue a bleſſing; did you make Idols of them? the party to be ordained, kneels vnder the hand of the Presbyterie: doth he religiouſly adore them? Of old they were wont to kiſſe the hands of their Biſhops, ſo they did to Baal: God and our Superiours haue had euer one & the ſame outward geſture: Though here, not the Agent is ſo much regarded, as the Action: if your Ordinary would haue ſuffered you to haue done this peece of Idolatry, you had neuer ſeparated.

Paulus in vita Ambroſ.

But the true God Bel, and Dragon of England is the humane-Diuine-Seruice-Booke: Let vs ſee what aſhes or lumpes of pitch this Daniel brings: We worſhip God in, and by it, as Papiſts doe by their Images: Indeed, we worſhip God in, and by prayers contained in it: Why ſhould we not? Tell me, why is it more Idolatry for a man to worſhip God in, and by a prayer read, or got by heart, than by a prayer conceiued? I vtter both, they are both mine; if the heart ſpeake them both, feelingly and deuoutly, where lies the Idoll? In a conceiued prayer, is it not poſſible for a mans thought to ſtray from his tongue? in a prayer, learned by heart, or read, is it not poſſible for the heart to ioyn with the tongue? If I pray therefore in ſpirit, and heartily vtter my deſires to God, whether in mine owne words, or borrowed (and ſo made mine) what is the offence? But (ſay you) if the Lord Ieſus in his Teſtament haue not commanded any ſuch Booke, it is accurſed and abominable: But ſay I, if the Lord Ieſus hath not any where forbidden ſuch a Booke, it is not accurſed nor abominable: Shew vs the place where, that we may know it with you: Nay, but I muſt ſhew you where the Apoſtles vſed any ſuch Seruice-booke: ſhew you mee, where the Apoſtles baptized in a Baſin: or where they receiued women to the Lords table: (for your ὁ ἄνθρωπος, 1 Cor. 11. will not ſerue) ſhew me that the Bible was diſtinguiſhed into Chapters and Verſes in the Apoſtles time: ſhew me that they euer celebrated the Sacrament of the Supper at any other time than euening, as your Anabaptiſts now doe: ſhew mee that they vſed one prayer before their Sermons alwaies, another after; that they preached euer vpon a Text: where they preached ouer a Table: or laſtly, ſhew mee where the Apoſtles vſed that prayer which you made before your laſt propheſie; and a thouſand ſuch circumſtances. What an idle plea is this from the Apoſtolike times? And if I ſhould tell you that Saint Peter celebrated with the Lords Prayer, you will not beleeue it: yet you know the Hiſtorie. But let the Reader know that your quarrell is not againſt the matter, but againſt the Booke; not as they are prayers, but as ſtinted, or preſcribed: Wherein all the world beſides your ſelues are Idolaters: Behold, all Churches that were, or are, are partners with vs in this crime. Oh idolatrous Geneua, and all French, Scottiſh, Daniſh, Dutch Churches! All which both haue their ſet Prayers with vs, and approue them. Quod ad formulam, &c. As concerning a forme of Prayers and Rites Eccleſiaſticall (ſaith Reuerend Caluin) I doe greatly allow that it ſhould be ſet and certaine, from which it ſhould not be lawfull for Paſtors in their function to depart. Iudge now of the ſpirit of theſe bold Controllers, that dare thus condemne all Gods Churches through the world, as idolatrous. But ſince you call for Apoſtolike examples; did not the Apoſtle Paul vſe one ſet forme of apprecations, of benedictions? What were theſe but leſſer Praiers? The quantitie varies not the kinde: Will you haue yet ancienter precedents? The Prieſt was appointed of old to vſe a ſet forme vnder the Law, Num. 6.23. ſo the people Deu. 26.3.4.5.&c.15. Both of them a ſtinted Pſalme for the Sabbath, Pſal. 92. What ſaith your Doctor to theſe? Becauſe the Lord (ſaith he) gaue formes of Prayers and Pſalmes, therefore the Prelates may? Can we think that Ieroboam had ſo ſlender a reaſon for his calues? Marke (good Reader) the ſhifts of theſe men: This Anſwerer cals for Examples, and will abide no ſtinting of Prayers, becauſe we ſhew no patterns from Scripture. We doe ſhew patterns from Scripture, and now their Doctor ſaith, God appointed it to them of old, old, muſt wee therefore doe it ? So, whether we bring examples or none, wee are condemned : But Maſter Doctor, whom, I beſeech you, ſhould we follow, but God in his owne ſeruices ? If God haue not appointed it, you cry out vpon inuentions : if God haue appointed it, you cry, We may not follow it : ſhew then where God euer inioyned an ordinary ſeruice to himſelfe, that was not ceremoniall (as this plainely is not :) which ſhould not bee a direction for vs ? But if ſtinting our prayers bee a fault (for as yet you meddle not with our blaſphemous Collects) it is well that the Lords prayer it ſelfe beareth vs companie, and is no ſmall part of our Idolatry : Which, though it were giuen principally as a rule to our prayers, yet ſince the matter is ſo heauenly, and moſt wiſely framed to the neceſſitie of all Chriſtian hearts ;to deny that it may bee vſed intirely in our Sauiours words, is no better than a fanaticall curiouſneſſe : yeeld one and all, for if the matter bee more diuine, yet ths ſtint is no leſſe faultie : This is not the leaſt part of our patchery : except you vnrip this, the reſt you cannot. But might not God be purely and perfectly worſhipped without it ? Tell me, might not God be purely and perfectly worſhiped without Churches, without houſes, without garments, yea, without hands or feet? In a word,could not God be purely worſhipped,if you were not? Yet would you not ſeeme a ſuperfluous creature : ſpeake in your ſelfe : Might not God bee intirely worſhipped with pure and holy worſhip, though there were no other Bookes in the World,but the Scripture? If yea,as who can denie it,that knowes what the worſhip of God meaneth ? What then doe the Fathers and Doctors and learned Interpreters ? To the fire with all thoſe curious Arts and Volumes, as your Predeceſſors called them : Yea, let me put you in minde,that God was purely and perfectly worſhipped by the Apoſtolike Church, before euer the New Teſtament was written. See therefore the idleneſſe of your proofes ; God may be ſerued without a preſcription of Prayer, but (if all Reformed Churches in Chriſtendome erre not) better with it : The Word of God is perfect, and admits no addition : curſed were we, if we ſhould adde ought to it : curſed were that which ſhould be added : But curſed be they that take ought from it, and dare ſay, Ye ſhall not pray thus, Our Father, &c. Doe wee offer to make our Prayers Canonicall ? doe we obtrude them as parts of Gods Word ? Why cauill you thus ? Why doth the ſame Prayer written adde to the Word, which ſpoken addeth not ? Becauſe conceiued Prayer is commanded, not the other : But firſt, not your particular Prayer : Secondly,without mention either of conception, or memorie,God commands vs to pray in ſpirit, and with the heart : Theſe circumſtances, onely as they are deduced from his Generals, ſo are ours : But whence ſoeuer it pleaſe you to fetch our Booke of publike Prayer, from Rome or Hell ; or to what Image ſoeuer you pleaſe to reſemble it ; Let moderate ſpirits heare what the precious IEWEL of England ſaith of it : We haue come as neere as we could to the Church of the Apoſtles, &c. neither onely haue wee framed our Doctrine, but alſo our Sacraments, and the forme of publike Prayers according to their Rites and inſtitutions. Let no Iew now obiect Swines fleſh to vs : He is no iudicious man (that I may omit the mention of Cranmer, Bucer, Ridley, Taylor, &c. ſome of whoſe hands were in it, all whoſe voyces were for it) with whom one IEWEL will not ouer-weigh ten thouſand Separatiſts.

The number of Sacraments ſeemes greater amongſt you by one at the leaſt, than Chriſt hath left in his Teſtament, and that is Marriage ; which howſoeuer you doe not in expreſſe termes call a Sacrament (no more did Chriſt and the Apoſtles call Baptiſme and the Supper Sacraments,) yet doe you in truth create it a Sacrament, in the adminiſtration and vſe of it. There are the parties to bee married and their marriage, repreſenting Chriſt and his Church, and their ſpirituall vnion : to which myſterie, ſaith the Oracle of your Seruice-Booke expreſly, God hath conſecrated them : there is the Ring hallowed by the ſaid Seruice-Booke, (whereon it muſt bee laid) for the Element ; there are the words of conſecration; In the Name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghoſt : there is the place, the Church ; the timvſually, thee :

Lords day; the Miniſter, the Pariſh-Prieſt. And being made as it is a part of Gods worſhip, and of the Miniſters office, what is it if it be not a Sacrament? It is no part of prayer, or preaching, and with a Sacrament it hath the greateſt conſimilitude: but an Idoll I am ſure it is in the celebration of it, being made a Miniſteriall duty and part of Gods worſhip, without warrant, call it by what name you will.

SECTION XXXVIII.

Marriage not made a Sacrament by the Church of England.

HOw did Confirmation eſcape this number? how did Ordination? it was your ouer-ſight, I feare, not your charity: ſome things ſeeme, and are not: ſuch is this your number of our Sacraments: you will needs haue vs take in marriage into this ranke: why ſo? we doe not (you confeſſe) call it a Sacrament as the vulgar, miſinterpreting Pauls Myſterium, Eph. 5. why ſhould we not if we ſo eſteemed it? wherefore ſerue names, but to denotate the nature of things? if we were not aſhamed of the opinion, we could not be aſhamed of the word: No more (ſay you) did Chriſt and his Apoſtles call Baptiſme and the Supper, Sacraments; but we doe, and you with vs: See now whether this clauſe doe not confute your laſt: where hath Chriſt euer ſaid, There are two Sacraments? Yet you dare ſay ſo: what is this but in your ſenſe an addition to the word? yea, we ſay flatly, there are but two: yet wee doe (ſay you) in truth create it a Sacrament: how oft, and how reſolutely hath our Church maintained againſt Rome, that none but Chriſt immediately can create Sacraments? If they had this aduantage againſt vs, how could we ſtand? How wrongfull is this force, to faſten an opinion vpon our Church which ſhe hath condemned? But wherein ſtands this our creation? It is true, the parties to bee married, and their marriage repreſent Chriſt, and his Church, and their ſpirituall vnion; Beware, leſt you ſtrike God through our ſides: what hath Gods Spirit ſaid, either leſſe, or other than this? Eph. 5. 25, 26, 27, & 32. Doth he not make Chriſt the husband, the Church his Spouſe? Doth hee not from that ſweet coniunction, and the effects of it, argue the deare reſpects that ſhould bee in mariage? Or what doth the Apoſtle allude elſe-where vnto, when he ſayes (as Moſes of Eue) wee are fleſh of Chriſts fleſh, and bone of his bone? And how famous amongſt the ancient is that reſemblance of Eue taken out of Adams ſide ſleeping, to the Church taken out of Chriſts ſide ſleeping on the Croſſe? Since marriage therefore ſo clearely repreſents this myſterie: and this vſe is holy and ſacred: what error is it, to ſay that marriage is conſecrated to this myſterie? But what is the Element? the Ring; Theſe things agree not; you had before made the two parties to bee the matter of this ſacrament: What is the matter of the Sacrament, but the Element? If they be the matter, they are the Element, and ſo not the Ring; both cannot be: if you will make the two parties to be but the receiuers; how doth all the myſtery lie in their repreſentation? Or if the Ring be the Element, then all the myſterie muſt be in the Ring, not in the parties: Labour to bee more perfect, ere you make any more new Sacraments: but this Ring is laid vpon the Seruice-booke: why not? For readineſſe, not for holineſſe: Nay, but it is hallowed (you ſay) by the booke: If it bee a Sacramentall Element, it rather hallowes the booke, than the booke it; you are not mindfull enough for this trade: But what exorciſmes are vſed in this hallowing? Or who euer held it any other than a ciuill pledge of fidelity? Then follow the words of Conſecration: I pray you what difference is there betwixt hallowing, and conſecration? The Ring was hallowed before the booke, now it muſt be conſecrated: How idely? By what words? In the name of the Father, &c. Theſe words you know are ſpoken after the Ring is put on: was it euer heard of, that a Sacramentall Element was conſecrated after it was applied? See how il your ſlanders are digeſted by you: The place is the Church, the time is the Lords day, the Miniſter is the actor; and is it not thus in all other reformed Churches as well as ours? Behold we are not alone: all Churches in the world (if this will doe it) are guiltie of three Sacraments: Tell me, would you not haue marriage ſolemnized publikely? You cannot miſlike: though your founder ſeemes to require nothing here but notice giuen to witneſſes, and then to bed: Well, if publike, you you account it withall, a graue and weighty buſineſſe: therefore ſuch, as muſt be ſanctified by publike praier: What place is fitter for publike praier than the Church? Who is fitter to offer vp the publike prayer, than the Miniſter? who ſhould rather ioyne the parties in Mariage, than the publike deputie of that God, who ſolemnly ioyned the firſt couple? who rather than hee which in the name of God may bleſſe them? The prayers which accompany this ſolemnitie, are parts of Gods worſhip, not the contract it ſelfe: This is a mixt action, therefore, compounded of Eccleſiaſticall and ciuill: impoſed on the Miniſter, not vpon neceſſity but expedience: neither eſſentiall to him, but accidentally annexed, for greater conuenience. Theſe two friuolous grounds haue made your cauill either very ſimple, or very wilſull.

Bro. ſtate of Chriſtians, 172.

Commutation of Penance in our Church.

SEE if this man bee not hard driuen for accuſations, when hee is faine to repeat ouer the very ſame crime which he had largely vrged before: All the world will know that you want variety, when you ſend in theſe twice-ſod Coleworts: Somewhat yet we finde new, Commutation of Penance. Our Courts would tell you, that here is nothing diſpenſed with, but ſome ceremony of ſhame in the confeſſion; which in the greater ſort is exchanged (for a common benefit of the poore) into a pecuniary mulct; yet (ſay they) not ſo as to abridge the Church of her ſatisfaction, by the confeſſion of the offender: and if you grant the Ceremony deuiſed by them, why doe you finde fault that it is altered, or commuted by them? As for Abſolution, you haue a ſpite at it, becauſe you ſought it, and were repulſed: If the cenſures be but their owne (ſo you hold) why blame you the menaging of them in what manner ſeemes beſt to the authors? This power is no more a limme of the Prelacy, than our Prelacy is that Beaſt in the Reuelation: and our Prelacie holds it ſelſe no more S. Iohns beaſt, than it holds you *S. Though you haue loſt the Shrines of Saints, yet you retaine their dayes, and thoſe holy as the Lords day, and that with good profit to your ſpirituall carnall Courts, from ſuch as profane them with the leaſt and moſt lawfull labour, notwithſtanding the liberty of the ſix dayes labour, which the Lord hath giuen : and as much would the Maſters of theſe Courts bee ſtirred at the caſting of theſe Saints dayes out of the Calendar, as were the maſters of the poſſeſſed maid, when the Spirit of diuination was caſt out of her, Act. 16.19.

SECTION XLI.

Holy-dayes how obſerued in the Church of England.

WEe haue not loſt, but caſt away the Idolatrous ſhrines of Saints : their daies we retaine ; theirs, not for worſhip of them, which our Church condemneth, but partly for commemoration of their high deſerts, and excellent examples : partly for diſtinction : indeed therefore Gods dayes, and not theirs : their praiſes redound to him : ſhew vs where we implore them, where wee conſecrate daies to their ſeruice : The maine end of Holy-daies is for the ſeruice of God, and ſome, as Socrates ſets downe of old, (quo ſe à laborum contentione relaxent) for relaxation from labour : and if ſuch daies may be appointed by the Church (as were the Holy-daies of Purim, of the dedication of the wall of Ieruſalem, the dedication of the Temple) whoſe names ſhould they rather beare (though but for meere diſtinction) than the bleſſed Apoſtles of Chriſt ? But this is a colour onely : for you equally condemne thoſe dayes of Chriſts Birth, Aſcenſion, Circumciſion, Reſurrection, Anunciation, which the Church hath beyond all memory celebrated : what then is our fault ? Wee keepe theſe holy as the Lords day, in the ſame manner, though not in the ſame degree : Indeed we come to the Church, and worſhip the God of the Martyrs and Saints : is this yet our offence ? No, but we abſtaine from our moſt lawfull labour in them ; True, yet not in conſcience of the day, but in obedience to the Church : If the Church ſhall indict a ſolemne Faſt, doe you not hold it contemptuous to ſpend that day in lawfull labour ; notwithſtanding that liberty of the ſix dayes which God hath giuen ? Why ſhall that be lawfull in a caſe of deiection, which may not in praiſe and exultation ? If you had not loued to cauill, you would rather haue accepted the Apology, or excuſe of our ſiſter Churches in this behalfe, than aggrauated theſe vncharitable pleas of your owne : yet euen in this, your owne Synagogue at Amſterdam (if wee may beleeue your owne) is not altogether guiltleſſe : your hands are ſtill and your ſhops ſhut vpon feſtiuall dayes ; But we accuſe you not : would God this were your worſt. The Maſters of our Courts would tell you, they would not care ſo much for this diſpoſſeſſion, as that it ſhould be done by ſuch coniurers as your ſelfe.

If an ignorant and vnpreaching Miniſtery be approued amongſt you, and the people conſtrained by all kinde of violence to ſubmit vnto it, and therewith to reſt (as what is more vſuall throughout the whole Kingdome?) then let no modeſt man once open his mouth to deny, that ignorance is conſtrained and approoued amongſt you. If the ſeruice ſaid or ſung in the Pariſh Church may be called deuotion, then ſure there is good ſtore of vnknowne deuotion, the greateſt part in moſt pariſhes, neither knowing nor regarding what is ſaid, nor wherefore.

SECTION XLII.

Our approbation of an vnlearned Miniſtery diſproued.

YOur want of quarrels makes you ſtill runne ouer the ſame complaints: which if you redouble a thouſand times, will not become iuſt, may become tedious: God knowes how far we are from approuing an vnlearned Miniſtery: The proteſtations of our gracious King, our Biſhops, our greateſt Patrons of conformity in their publike writings, might make you aſhamed of this bold aſſertion: we doe not allow that it ſhould be, we bewaile that it will bee: our number of Pariſhes compared with our number of Diuines, will ſoone ſhew, that either many pariſhes muſt haue none, or ſome Diuines muſt haue many Congregations, or too many Congregations muſt haue ſcarce Diuine-Incumbents. Our deare Soueraigne hath promiſed a medicine for this diſeaſe; But withall tels you that Ieruſalem was not built all on a day. The violence you ſpeake of is commonly in caſe of wilfull contempt, not of honeſt and peaceable deſire of further inſtruction, or in ſuppoſall of ſome tolerable ability in the Miniſtery forſaken; we do heartily pray for labourers into this harueſt: we doe wiſh that all Iſrael could propheſie: we publiſh the Scriptures, we Preach, Catechiſe, Write, and (Lord thou knoweſt) how many of vs would doe more, if we knew what more could bee done, for the information of thy people, and remedy of this ignorance which this aduerſary reproues vs to approue.

Confer. at Hampt.

Wee doubt not but the ſeruice ſaid in our Pariſh-Churches, is as good a ſeruice to God, as the extemporary deuotions in your Parlours: But, It is an vnknowne deuotion, you ſay: Through whoſe fault? The Readers, or the Hearers, or the Matter? Diſtinct reading you cannot deny to the moſt Pariſhes: the matter, is eaſie Prayers, and Engliſh Scriptures: if the hearers be regardleſſe, or in ſome things dull of conceit, lay the fault from the Seruice to the men: All yours are free from ignorance, free from wandering conceits: we enuy you not, ſome knowledge is no better than ſome ignorance, and careleſneſſe is no worſe than miſ-regard.

Penances inioyned in the Church of England.

COmming now to the Vaults of Popery, I aske for their Penances, and Purgatory; thoſe Popiſh Penances, which preſumptuous Confeſſors enioyned as ſatisfactory, and meritorious vpon their bold abſolutions: You ſend me to Sheet-penances and Purſe-penances: the one, ceremonious corrections of ſhame, enioyned and adioyned to publike Confeſſions of vncleanneſſe, for the abaſing of the offender, and hate of the ſinne: ſuch like as the ancient Church thought good to vſe for this purpoſe. Hence they were appointed (as Tertullian ſpeaketh) in ſackloth and aſhes, to craue the prayers of the Church, to beſmeare their body with filthineſſe, to throw themſelues down before Gods Miniſter and Altar; not to mention other more hard, & perhaps no leſſe ancient Rites ; and hence were thoſe fiue ſtations of the Penitent, whereby he was at laſt receiued into the body of his wonted Communion : the other a pecuniarie mulct impoſed vpon ſome (not all, you foulely ſlander vs) leſſe hainous offences ;as a penalty,not as a penance: I hope you deny not;Sodomy,Murder,Robbery,&(which you would not) Theft it ſelfe is more deeply auenged : But did euer any of ours vrge either ſheet or purſe as the remedy of Purgatory, or enioyne them, to auoid thoſe infernall paines ? vnleſſe we do ſo, our Penances are not Popiſh, and our Anſwerer is idle.

SEP.

Touching Purgatory, though you deny the doctrine of it, and teach the contrary, yet how well your practiſe ſutes with it, let it be conſidered in theſe particulars: Your abſoluing of men dying excommunicate after they be dead, and before they may haue Chriſtian buriall. Your Chriſtian buriall in holy ground (if the party will be at the charges ;) your ringing of hallowed bels for the ſoule; your ſinging the Corps to the graue from the Church ſtile; your praying ouer,or for the dead, eſpecially in theſe words, That God would haſten his kingdome, that wee with this our Brother (though his life were neuer ſo wretched,and death deſperate) and all other departed in the true faith of thy holy Name, may haue our perfect conſummation both in body and ſoule. Your generall doctrines and your particular practiſes agree in this, as in the moſt other things, like Harpe and Harrow. In word you profeſſe many truths, which in deed you deny.

Theſe and many moe Popiſh deuices (by others at large diſcouered to the world) both for pomp and profit, are not onely not razed and buried in the duſt, but are aduanced amongſt you aboue all that is called God.

SECTION XLIV.

The practiſes of the Church of England cōcerning the funerals of the Dead.

YOur next accuſation is more ingenuouſly malicious ; our Doctrine you grant contrary to Purgatory : but you will fetch it out of our practiſe, that we may build that which we deſtroy: Let vs therefore purge our ſelues from your Purgatory : We abſolue men dying excommunicate ; a rare practiſe, and which yet I haue not liued to ſee; but if Law-makers contemne rare occurrents, ſurely accuſers doe not: Once is too much of an euill : Marke then ; Doe we abſolue his Soule after the departure ? No : what hath the Body to doe with Purgatory ? Yet for the body : doe we by any abſolution ſeeke to quit it from ſinne ? Nothing leſſe : reaſon it ſelfe giues vs, that it is vncapable either of ſinne or pardon ; To lie vnburied, or to bee buried vnſeemly,is ſo much a puniſhment, that the Heathens obiected it (though vpon the hauocke and fury of Warre) to the Chriſtians, as an argument of Gods neglect. All that authoritie can doe to the dead Rebell, is to put his carcaſſe to ſhame, and deny him the honour of ſeemely ſepulture : Thus doth the Church to thoſe that will die in wilfull contempt. Thoſe Grecian virgins that feared not death, were yet reſtrained with the feare of ſhame after death : it was a reall, not imaginary curſe of Iezabel ; The dogs ſhall eat Iezabel. Now the abſolution (as you call it, by an vnproper, but malicious name)is nothing elſe but a liberty giuen by the Church (vpon repentance ſignified of the fault of the late offender) of all thoſe externall Rites of decent Funerall : Death it ſelfe is capable of inequality, and vnſeemelineſſe : Suppoſe a iuſt Excommunication : What reaſon is it, that he which in his life and death would be as a Pagan, ſhould be as a Chriſtian in his buriall ? What is any, or all this to Purgatory ?

Aug. de Ciu. l. 1. Athenienſes decreuerunt ne ſiquis ſe interfeciſſet ſepeliretur in agro attico, &c.

The next intimation of our Purgatory, is our Chriſtian buriall, in the place, in the manner : The place, holy ground, the Church, Churchyard,&c. The manner, Ringing, Singing, Praying ouer the Corps. Thus therefore you argue ; We bury the body in the Church, or Churchyard, &c. therefore we hold a Purgatory of the Soule ; a proofe not leſſe ſtrange than the opinion : We doe neither ſcorne the carcaſſes of our friends, as the old Troglodites : nor with the old Egyptians reſpect them more, than when they were enformed with a liuing ſoule : but we keepe a meane courſe betwixt both, vſing them as the remainders of dead men, yet as dead Chriſtians: and as thoſe which we hope one day to ſee glorious. We haue learned to call no place holy in it ſelfe (ſince the Temple) but ſome more holy in their vſe, than others. The old (κοιμητηρια) of the Chriſtians, wherein their bodies ſlept in peace, were not leſſe eſteemed of them, than they are ſcorned of you. Gallienus thought he did them a great fauour (and ſo they tooke it) when he gaue them the liberty not only of their Churches, but of their former burying places. In the ſame booke Euſebius commends Aſtirius a noble Senator, for his care, and coſt of Marinus his buriall. Of all theſe rites of Funerall, and choice of place, we profeſſe to hold with Auguſtine, that they are onely the comforts of the liuing, not helpes of the dead; yet as Origen alſo teacheth vs, we haue learned to honour a reaſonable (much more a Chriſtian) ſoule; and to commit the inſtrument or caſe of it honourably to the graue. All this might haue taught out Anſwerer, that we make account of an heauen, of a reſurrection, not of a Purgatory. But we ring hallowed bells for the Soule: Doe not thoſe bells hang in hallowed Steeples too? and doe we not ring them with hallowed ropes? What fancie is this? If Papiſts were ſo fond of old: their folly and their bells (for the moſt part) are both out of date; we call them ſoule-belles, for that they ſignifie the departure of the ſoule, not for that they helpe the paſſage of the ſoule. This is meere Boyes-play. But we pray ouer or for the dead; Doe we not ſing to him alſo? Pardon me, I muſt needs tell you, here is much ſpite, and little wit. To pray for the conſummation of the glory of all Gods elect: What is it, but Thy kingdome come? How vainly doe you ſeeke a knot in a ruſh, while you cauill at ſo holy a Petition? Goe and learne how much better it is, to call them our brothers, which are not, in an harmeleſſe ouer-weening, and ouer-hoping of charity, than to call them no brothers, which are, in a proud and cenſorious vncharitablenes: you cannot be content to tell an vntruth, but you muſt face it out. Let any Reader iudge, how farre our practiſe in this diſſented from our doctrine; would to God in nothing more: Yes (ſaith this good friend) in the moſt other things; our words profeſſe, our deeds denie: at once you make vs hypocrites, and your ſelues Phariſes. Let all the world know, that the Engliſh Church at Amſterdam profeſſeth nothing which it practiſeth not: we may not be ſo holy, or ſo happy.

Generality is a notable ſhelter of vntruth: Many moe, you ſay, Popiſh deuices, yet name none; No, you cannot. Aduanced aboue all that is called God? ſurely this is a paradox of ſlanders: you meant at once to ſhame vs with falſhood, and to appoſe vs with Riddles: we ſay to the Higheſt, Whom haue we in Heauen but thee? and for earth, your ſelfe haue granted wee giue too much to Princes, (which are earthen Gods) and may come vnder Pauls(παν σέβασμα.) betwixt our Churches and their Temples? The very name it ſelfe (if at leaſt you haue vnderſtood it) Kirke or Church (which is nothing but an abbreuiation of (κυριακὴ) the Lords houſe) might haue taught you, that ours were dedicated to God, and theirs to the Deuill, in their falſe gods: Auguſtine anſwers you, as directly, as if he were in my roome: The Gentiles (ſaith he) to their gods erected Temples, we not Temples vnto our Martyrs, as vnto Gods, but memorialls as vnto dead men, whoſe ſpirits with God are ſtill liuing: Theſe then if they were abuſed by Popiſh Idolatry, is there no way, but Downe with them, downe with them to the ground? Well fare the Donatiſts yet your old friends: they but waſhed the walles that were polluted by the Orthodox; by the ſame token, that Optatus askes them, why they did not waſh the bookes which ours toucht, and the heauens which they looked vpon: What, are the very ſtones ſinfull? what can be done with them? The very earth where they ſhould lye on heapes would be vncleane: But not their pollution angers you more, than their proud Maieſtie: What houſe can be too good for the Maker of all things? As God is not affected with State, ſo is he not delighted in baſeneſſe. If the pompe of the Temple were ceremoniall, yet it leaues this moralitie behinde it, that Gods houſe ſhould be decent: and what if goodly? If we did put holineſſe in the ſtone, as you doe vncleanneſſe, it might be ſinne to be coſtly: Let me tell you, there may be as much pride in a clay wall, as in a carued: Proud Maieſtie is better than proud baſeneſſe: the ſtone or clay will offend in neither, we may in both: If you loue cottages, the ancient Chriſtians with vs, loued to haue Gods houſe ſtately, as appeares by the example of that worthy Biſhop of Alexandria, and that gracious Conſtantine, in whoſe dayes theſe ſacred piles began to lift vp their heads vnto this enuied height: Take you your owne choice, giue vs ours; let vs neither repine, nor ſcorne at each other.

Chriſtianity came in the roome of Iudaiſme; was it therefore deriued from it? Before you told vs, that our Prelacy came from that Antichriſt of Rome, now from the Flamins of the Heathen: Both no leſſe, than either: If you cannot be true, yet learne to be conſtant. But what meane you to charge our Churches with carued and painted Images? It is well you write to thoſe that know them; Why did not you ſay we bow our knees to them, and offer incenſe? Euery building that is coupled together in this corner-ſtone, groweth vnto an holy Temple in the Lord: No aduerſary, either Man or Deuill, can confound vs, either in our euidences, or their owne challenges: we may be faultie, but we are true: And if the darkneſſe you finde in vs be light, how great is our light?

SECTION XLVII.

On what ground Separation or Ceremonies were obiected.

HEE that leaues the whole Church in a groſſe and wilfull error, is an Heretike; he that leaues a particular Church for appendances, is a Schiſmatick: ſuch are you, both in the action and cauſe: The act is yeelded, the cauſe hath beene in part ſcanned, ſhall be more: This I vainly pretended to be our conſorting in Ceremonies with the Papiſts: Behold here the ground of your loud challenge of my ignorance: Ignorance of your iudgement and practice: Here is my abuſe of you, of my Reader: and, how durſt I? Good words (M.R.) What I haue erred, I will confeſſe: I haue wronged you indeed: but in my charity: I knew the cauſe of Browniſme, but I knew not you: For (to ſay ingenuouſly) I had heard and hoped, that your cauſe had beene leſſe deſperate; My intelligence was, that in diſlike of theſe Ceremonies obtruded, and an hopeleſneſſe of future liberty, you and your fellows had made a ſeceſſion, rather than a ſeparation from our Church, to a place where you might haue ſcope to profeſſe, and opportunity to enioy your owne conceits: whence it was that I termed you Ring-leaders of the late ſeparation, not followers of the firſt, and made your plea againſt our Church, imperfection, not falſhood: I hoped you, as not ours, ſo not theirs: not ours in place, ſo not quite theirs in peeuiſh opinion: I knew it to be no new thing for men inclining to theſe fancies, to begin new Churches at Amſterdam, ſeuerall from the reſt: witneſſe the letters of ſome (ſometimes yours) cited by your owne Paſtor: I knew the former ſeparation, and hated it; I hoped better of the later ſeparation, and pitied it: My knowledge both of *M. Smith whom you followed, and your ſelfe, would not let

It was my charity therefore, that made my accuſations eaſie: it is your vncharitableneſſe that accuſes them of ignorance. I knew why a Browniſt is a true Schiſmaticke; I knew not you were ſo true a Browniſt. But why then did I write? Taking your ſeparation at beſt; I knew how iuſtly I might take occaſion by it to diſſwade from ſeparation; to others good, though not to yours: Now I know you better, or worſe rather, I thinke you heare more: Forgiue mee my charitie, and make the worſt of my ignorance. I knew that this ſeparation (which now I know yours) ſtands vpon foure grounds, as ſome beaſts vpon foure feet. Firſt, God worſhipped after a falſe manner; Secondly, Prophane multitude receiued; Thirdly, Antichriſtian Miniſtery impoſed; Fourthly, Subiection to Antichriſtian Gouernment: The Ceremonies are but as ſome one paw in euery foot: yet if we extend the word to the largeſt vſe, diuiding all Religion into Ceremonie, and Subſtance; I may yet, and doe auerre, that your ſeparation is meerely grounded vpon Ceremonies.

And touching the Ceremonies here ſpoken of, howſoeuer we haue formerly refuſed them, ſubmitting (as all others did and doe) to the Prelates ſpirituall Iuriſdiction, (herein through ignorance ſtraining at Gnats, and ſwallowing Camels) yet are we verily perſwaded of them, and ſo were before we ſeparated, that they are but as leaues of that tree, and as badges of that Man of ſinne, whereof the Pope is head, and the Prelates ſhoulders. And ſo we for our parts ſee no reaſon why any of the Biſhops ſworne ſeruants (as all the Miniſters in the Church of England are Canonically) ſhould make nice to weare their Lords Liueries. Which Ceremonies notwithſtanding we know well enough, howſoeuer you for aduantage extenuate and debaſe them vnto vs, to be aduanced and preferred in your Church, before the preaching of the Goſpell.

It is much that they being not ſo much as Reed, nor any part of the building (as you pretend) ſhould ouerturne the beſt builders amongſt you as they doe. SECTION XLVIII.

Eſtimation of Ceremonies, and ſubiection to the Prelates.

AND touching Ceremonies; you refuſed them formerly, but not long: and when you did refuſe them, you knew not wherefore; for immediately before your ſuſpenſion, you acknowledged them to be things indifferent, and for matter of ſcandall by them, you had not informed your ſelfe (by your owne confeſſion) of a whole quarter of a yeare after: Why refuſed you then, but as the Poet made his Playes, to pleaſe the people, or as Simon Magus was baptized, for company? But refuſing them, you ſubmitted to the Prelates ſpirituall Iuriſdiction: there was your crime; this was your Camell, the other your Gnats: Did euer any Prelate challenge ſpirituall rule ouer your conſcience?

This they all appropriate to the great Biſhop of our ſoules: and if other; grant them as your malice faineth: what ſinne is it to be the ſubiect of a Tyrant? now vpon more grace, refuſing the Prelacy, you haue branded the Ceremonies: So you did before your ſeparation; Tell vs, how long was it after your ſuſpenſion, and before your departure, that you could haue been content (vpon condition) to haue worne this linnen badge of your Man of ſinne? Was not this your reſolution, when you went from Norwich to Lincolneſhire, after your ſuſpenſion? Deny it not; my witneſſes are too ſtrong. But let vs take you as you are: theſe Ceremonies, though too vile for you, yet are good enough for our Miniſters of England: As if you ſaid, Lord, I thanke thee, I am not as this Publican: Why for our Miniſters? Becauſe, thoſe are the Liueries, and theſe the ſworne ſeruants of the Antichriſtian Biſhops: We haue indeed ſworne obedience to our Ordinary, in honeſt and lawfull Commandements, but ſeruice to Chriſt: But doth all obedience imply ſeruitude? This obedience is, as to ſpirituall Fathers, not to Maſters: yet ſo are we the ſeruants of Chriſt, that we are ready to giue our ſeruice to the leaſt of his Saints: Thus vile will we be for God: How much more to thoſe whom God hath made (as Hierome ſayes) Principes Eccleſiæ: whiles they command for God: What doe we herein, but that which Epiphanius vrged of old againſt Aërius; What but the ſame which Ignatius (that holy and old Martyr) requires (not once) of all Presbyters, and offers the ingagement of his owne ſoule for vs in this act?

As for our Ceremonies, aggrauate them how you can for your aduantage, they are but Ceremonies to vs: and ſuch, as wherein we put no holineſſe, but order, decencie, conuenience: but they are preferred (you ſay) in our Church, before the preaching of the Goſpell: a moſt wrongfull vntruth; We hold preaching an eſſentiall part of Gods ſeruice, Ceremonies none at all: the Goſpell preached wee hold the life and ſoule of the Church; Ceremonies either the garment, or the lace of the garment: The Goſpell preached we hold the Foundation and Walls; Ceremonies hardly ſo much as Reed, or Tile: But how then (ſay you) haue they ouerturned our beſt builders? This is a word of rare fauour: I had thought you had held vs all ruiners, not builders: Or if builders; of Babel, not of Ieruſalem: in which worke the beſt builders are the worſt. Thoſe whoſe hand hath beene in this act, would tell you, that not ſo much the Ceremonies are ſtood vpon, as obedience: If God pleaſe to trie Adam but with an Apple, it is enough: What doe we quarrell at the value of the fruit, when we haue a prohibition? Shimei is ſlaine: what meerely for going out of the Citie? the act was little, the bond was great: what is commanded, matters not ſo much, as by whom; inſult not, we may thanke your outrage for this loſſe.

For your retortion of my Zoar and Sodom: I can giue you leaue to be witty, you vſe it ſo ſeldome: but when you haue played with the alluſion what you liſt, I muſt tell you that he which will needs vrge a compariſon to goe on foure feet, is not worthy to goe vpon two: Zoar was neere to Sodom, not part of it: Zoar was reſerued when Sodom was deſtroyed: Zoars neereneſſe to the place where Sodome ſtood, needed not haue giuen Lot cauſe of remouall. Zoar might ſafely haue beene the harbour of Lot: his feare was, for want of faith: God promiſed him and the place ſecurity: the far-ſetcht application therefore of the wickedneſſe of Zoar, to our Ceremonies, might well haue beene forborne, and kept to your ſelfe: much leſſe needed you (like ſome Anti-Lot) to call for fire and brimſtone from heauen vpon your Zoar.

How we would haue behaued our ſelues in the Temple, where the Money-changers were, and they that ſold Doues, we ſhall anſwer you, when you proue your Church to be the Temple of God, compiled and built of ſpiritually hewne and liuely ſtones, 1 King. 5. 17, 18. and 6, 7. 1 Pet. 2. 5. and of the Cedars, Firres, and Thyne trees of Lebanon, 2 Chron. 2. 8. framed and ſet together in that comely order, which a greater than Salomon hath preſcribed: vnto which God hath promiſed his preſence. SECTION XLIX.

The ſtate of the Temple, and of our Church in reſemblance.

HOw you would haue behaued your ſelfe in the Temple to the Mony-changers, you will anſwer when we proue our Church to be Gods Temple, built of that matter, and in that forme which God hath preſcribed: and here you ſend vs to 1 King. 5. 17. and 2 Chron. 2. 8. Ignorantly; as if Salomons Temple had ſtood till Chriſts time: when neither the firſt, nor ſecond (though called Beth Gnolam) out-laſted more than foure hundred yeeres: Or as if the Market had beene vnder the very roofe of that Temple. Whether Herods were built of the ſame matter with Salomons, and in full correſpondence to it, I diſpute not: it was certainly dedicated to Gods ſeruice, and that (which you would hardly diſgeſt) in a ſolemne anniuerſary Holy day: though not erected vpon the word of any Prophet. But to let paſſe Allegories: we muſt proue our ſelues the true Church of God: Thus we doe it: Wee are true Chriſtians, for we were baptized into the Name of Chriſt; we truly profeſſe our continuance in the ſame faith into which we were baptized: we ioyne together in the publike Seruices of God: wee maintaine euery point of the moſt ancient Creeds: we ouerthrow not the foundation by any conſequence. Therefore what euer is wanting to vs, what euer is ſuperfluous, in ſpight of all the gates of Hell, we are the true Church of God. Let me aske you: Were not the people of the Iewes in the Prophets, and in Chriſts time, a confuſed heape of dead and defiled, and (for I will vſe your Tautologies) polluted ſtones, and of all rubbiſh, of bryers and brambles of the Wilderneſſe, for the moſt part fitter for burning than building? Can we be worſe than they? If wickedneſſe can defile a Church, they ſhall iuſtifie vs: did either thoſe Prophets, or our Sauiour, rather ſhew their obedience to God in departing from it, than their valour in purging it? you haue well imitated theſe heauenly patternes. But what; Can your charity finde nothing but rubbiſh? Not one ſquare ſtone, not one liuing? You will be iudging till God iudge you: if you take not heed of theſe courſes, you will ſo runne with the He-goats, that you will ſtand with the Goats on the left hand. That God, whoſe place you haue vſurped, giue you more wiſdome and loue.

SEP.

And what (I pray you) is the valour which the beſt hearted, and moſt Zealous Reformers amongſt you haue manifeſted, in driuing out the money-changers? doth it not appeare in this, that they ſuffer themſelues to be driuen out with the two ſtringed whip of Ceremonies and ſubſcription, by the mony-changers, the Chancellors and Officials, which ſell ſinnes like Doues: and by the chiefe Prieſts, the Biſhops which ſet them on worke? ſo farre are the moſt Zealous amongſt you from driuing out the mony-changers, as they themſelues are driuen out by them, becauſe they will not change with them to the vtmoſt farthing.

SECTION L.

Whether Miniſters ſhould indure themſelues ſilenced.

THe valour of our moſt zealous Reformers hath truly ſhewed it ſelfe in yeeldance: As in Duels: ſo here, he is the moſt valiant that can ſo maſter himſelfe as not to fight: you according to the common opinion of Swaggerers, blame the peaceable of cowardiſe, and accuſe them of ſuffering. Behold a new crime; That they ſuffer themſelues to be driuen out: What ſhould they haue done? Should they haue taken armes, and cry, The ſword of God, and Gedeon? You that will not allow a Prince to compell Subiects, will you allow Subiects to compell Princes? God forbid; This were high Treaſon againſt Gods Anointed: what then? Should they approue the Ceremonies by ſubſcription, by practiſe? This you exclaime vpon, as high treaſon againſt the Higheſt: What yet more? Should they haue preached with their mouthes ſtopt? This is it, which you haue learned of your Founder, and through not many hands receiued, and required with no leſſe violence: Clamour and tumults is that you deſire ſtill let our ſinne be peaceable obedience, yours fury and oppoſition. Your head-ſtrong conceit is, that it is a ſinne to be ſilenced: Men muſt preach euen when they may not: all times before you, would haue wondered at this Paradox: For howeuer the Apoſtles, which had not their calling from men, would not be ſilenced by men, yet we finde that all their ſucceſſors held, that thoſe hands which were laid vpon their heads, might be laid vpon their mouthes: looke into all Hiſtories: Thoſe Conſtitutions (which though not Apoſtolike, yet were ancient) in the ſeuenth Canon puniſh a Biſhop, or Presbyter, that vpon pretence of Religion ſeparates from his wife, with depoſition: and if any Presbyter ſhall ſhift his charge without licence (τοῦτον κελεύομεν μηκέτι λειτουργεῖν) and laſtly, inflicts the ſame penalty vpon Fornication, Adultery, Periury.

The great Nicene Councell takes the ſame order with ſome miſliked Biſhops, and Presbyters in diuers Canons: Gaudentius in the Councell of Sardy, takes it for granted, that a Biſhop may by Biſhops be depoſed: ſo the ſecond Councell of Carthage, *Can.*13. ſo the fourth Councell of Carthage, more than once impoſes degradation: ſo Leo the firſt threats to put ſome offending perſons from the office of their Miniſtery: ſo (that I may not be endleſſe) bleſſed Cyprian aduiſes Rogatianus, a good old Biſhop, which was abuſed by a malapert Deacon, by the authority of his Chaire to right himſelfe, and either to depoſe, or ſuſpend the offender. Leontius in Socrates, is depriued of his Prieſthood: yea, what Councell or Father giues not both rules and inſtances of this practiſe? See how farre the ancient Church was from theſe tumultuous fancies: No, no, (M.R.) we well finde, it is doing that vndoes the Church, not ſuffering: If your fellowes could haue ſuffered more, and done leſſe, the Church had beene happy: As for our Church-Officers, you may raile vpon them with a lawleſſe ſafety: there is a great Ditch betwixt you and them: elſe you might pay deare for this ſinne of ſlandering them with their cheape peny-worths: How idly doe you inſult ouer thoſe, whom your mony-changers haue driuen out of their Pulpits: When you confeſſe (after all your valour) that they haue driuen you both out of Church and Countrey: who can pitty a miſerable inſulter?

SEP.

For the Wafers in Geneua, and diſorders in Corinth, they were corruptions which may and doe (or the like vnto them) creepe into the pureſt Churches in the World: for the Reformation whereof Chriſt hath giuen his power vnto his Church, that ſuch euils as are brought in by humane frailty, may by diuine authority be purged out. This power and preſence of Chriſt you want, holding all by homage (or rather by villanage) vnder the Prelates, vnto whoſe ſinfull yoke you ſtoope in more than Babyloniſh bondage, bearing and approuing by perſonall communion, infinite abominations. And in theſe two laſt reſpects principally, your Babyloniſh confuſion of all ſorts of people in the body of your Church, without ſeparation, and your Babyloniſh bondage vnder your ſpirituall Lords the Prelates, we account you Babylon, and flie from you.

SECTION LI.

Power of Reforming abuſes giuen to the Church: and the iſſue of the neglect of it.

Barr. againſt *Gyff p.*27.& 88.

YOu that can grant there will be corruptions in all other Churches, will endure none in ours: If England ſhould haue either vnleauened Wafers, or drunken Loue-feaſts (though no other blemiſhes) ſhe could not but bee Babylon: We enuy not your fauours: Theſe, or whatſoeuer like enormities, Chriſt hath giuen power vnto his Church to reforme: but what if the Church neglect to vſe it? What if thoſe euils, which are brought in, by humane frailty, will not by diuine authority be purged out? Now the errour (by your doctrine) is growne fundamentall; ſo Chriſt is loſt, and the foundation razed: if we ſhall then aſſume (againſt our friends, to conuince our enemies) The Church of Geneua hath beene ſeriouſly dealt with, in this corruption, and diſſwaded by vehement importunity, yet ſtill perſiſteth: How can you free them, and charge vs? ſee how we loue to be miſerable, with company. This power to purge out all corruptions, Chriſt hath not giuen vs: if he hath giuen it you; you muſt firſt begin to purge out your ſelues : you haue done it ; but ſtill there remaine ſome : would God we had as much execution as power : Our Church ſhould be as cleane as yours is Schiſmaticall. If you ſhould meaſure faculties by their exerciſe; Naturall reſt ſhould be the greateſt enemy to vertue : and the ſolitary Chriſtian ſhould be miſerable : This power of ours is not dead, but ſleepeth : When it awaketh vnto more frequent vſe, (which we earneſtly pray for) looke you for the firſt handſell of it : None can bee more worthy : as it is, we offend not more in defect than you in exceſſe : Of whom that your Lazarello of Amſterdam, G. I. could ſay, that you haue Excommunication as ready as a Prelate hath a Priſon : Chriſt is in many that feele him not ; but we want not the power onely, but the preſence of Chriſt : How ſo ? he was with vs while you were here : Did he depart with you ? will the Separatiſts ingroſſe our Sauiour to themſelues, & (as Cyprian ſaid of Pupianus) goe to Heauen alone ? yea, confine the God of Heauen to Amſterdam? What inſolence is this ? we haue him in his Word : we haue him in his Sacraments : we haue him in our hearts : we haue him in our profeſſion ; yet this enemy dare ſay, wee want him : Wherein ? I ſuppoſe in our cenſures : Wee haue Peters keyes (as his true ſucceſſors both in office and doctrine :) our fault is, that we vſe them not as you would : What Church doth ſo ? your firſt Martyr doth as zealouſly inueigh againſt the practiſe of Geneua, and all other Reformed Congregations in this point, as againſt vs : both for the woodden Dagger (as he termes it) of ſuſpenſion, and for their Conſiſtoriall Excommunication. Woe were to all the World, if Chriſt ſhould limit his preſence onely to your faſhions: Here you found him, & here you left him: Would to God we did no more grieue him with our ſins, than you pleaſe him in your preſumptuous cenſures : in the reſt, you raile againſt our Prelates and vs: Can any man thinke that Chriſt hath left peaceable ſpirits, to goe dwell with Railers ? Indeed, yours is free-hold : ſo you would haue it: free from ſubiection, free from obedience : This is looſeneſſe, more than liberty : You haue broken the bonds, and caſt the cords from you : but you miſcall our tenure : We hate villenage no leſſe than you hate peace ; and hold (in capite) of him, that is, the head of his body, the Church : vnder whoſe eaſie yoke wee doe willingly ſtoope in a ſweet Chriſtian freedome ; abhorring and reprouing ; and therefore (notwithſtanding our perſonall Communion) auoiding all abominations : In theſe two reſpects therefore of our confuſion, and bondage, we haue well ſeene in this Diſcourſe, how iuſtly your Sion accounts vs Babylon : ſince it is apparent for the one, that here is neither confuſion, nor babyloniſh, nor without ſeparation : For the other, no bondage, no ſeruility : Our Prelates being our Fathers, not our Maſters : and if Lords for their externall dignity, yet not Lords of our Faith : and if both theſe your reſpects were ſo, yet ſo long as we doe inuiolably hold the foundation, both directly, and by neceſſary ſequell ; any Railer may terme vs, but no Separatiſt ſhall proue vs Babylon: you may flie whither you liſt : would God yet further, vnleſſe you had more loue.

The view of the ſinnes and diſorders of others, whereupon obiected, and how far it ſhould affect vs.

I Need no better Analyſer than your ſelfe, ſaue that you doe not onely reſolue my parts, but adde more : whereas euery motion hath a double terme, from whence and whither : both theſe could not but fall into our diſcourſe. Hauing therefore formerly expoſtulated with you for your (ſince you will ſo terme it) impietie, in forſaking a ceremonious Babylon of your owne making in England ; I thought it not vnfit to compare your choice with your refuſall ; England with Amſterdam, which it pleaſeth you to intitle a ſubſtantiall Babylon : impiety and madneſſe are titles of your owne choice ; let your guiltineſſe be your owne accuſer : The truth is, my charity and your vncharitableneſſe haue cauſed vs to miſtake each other. My charity thus : Hearing both at Middleburgh, and here, that certaine companies from the parts of Nottingham and Lincolne (which Harbinger had beene newly in Zeland before me) meant to retire themſelues to Amſterdam, for their full liberty, not for the full approbation of your Church : not fauouring your maine opinions, but emulating your freedome in too much hate of our Ceremonies, and too much accordance to ſome grounds of your hatred : I hoped you had beene one of their Guides ; both becauſe Lincolneſhire was your Countrey, and Maſter Smith your Oracle, and Generall. Not daring therefore to charge you with perfect Browniſme, what could I thinke might bee a greater motiue to this your ſuppoſed change, than the view of our (ſo oft proclaimed) wickedneſſe, and the hope of leſſe cauſe of offence in thoſe forraine parts ? This I vrged, fearing to goe deeper than I might be ſure to warrant : Now comes my charitable Anſwerer, and imputes this eaſineſſe of my challenge to my ignorance;and therefore will needs perſwade his Chriſtian Reader, that I knew nothing of the firſt ſeparation, becauſe I obiected ſo little to the ſecond.

It were ſtrange if I ſhould thinke, you gather Churches there by Towne-rowes (as wee in England) who know that ſome one Priſon might hold all your refined Flocke, you gathered here by Hedge-rowes ; but there it is eaſier to tell how you diuide, than how you gather: let your Church be an intire body, enioying her owne ſpirituall Communion, yet if it be not a corroſiue to your heart to conuerſe in the ſame ſtreets and to bee ranged in the ſame Towne-rowes with Iewes, Arrians, Anabaptiſts, &c. you are no whit of kinne to him, that vexed his righteous ſoule with the vncleanneſſes of foule Sodome. That good man had nothing but ciuill ſocietie with thoſe impure Neighbours : hee differed from them in Religion, in practiſe: yet could he not ſo careleſly turne off this torment : His houſe was Gods Church ; wherein they had the ſpirituall Communion of the Saints : yet whiles the Citie was ſo vncleane, his heart was vnquiet : We may (you grant) haue ciuill ſocietie with ill men, ſpirituall Communion onely with Saints : Thoſe muſt be accounted the world, theſe onely the Church ; your owne allegations ſhall condemne you. They are not of the World (ſaith Chriſt) as I am not of the World : Both Chriſt and they were parts of the Iewiſh Church : The Iewiſh Church was not ſo ſanctified, but the moſt were extremely vncleane : therefore wee may bee parts of a Viſible vnſanctified Church , and yet bee ſeparate from the World. Saint Paul writes to his Corinthians, ſanctified in Chriſt, Saints by calling : True ; but not long after, he can ſay, Ye are yet carnall. In his ſecond Epiſtle : Come out (ſaith he) from among them: But from whom ? From Infidels by profeſſion, not corrupted Chriſtians.

Wee indeed haue much wickedneſſe in the City where wee liue ; you in the Church. THe Church and State, if they bee two, yet they are twins; and that ſo, as eithers euill proues mutuall: the ſinnes of the Citie not reformed, blemiſh the Church: where the Church hath power and in a ſort comprehends the State, ſhee cannot waſh her hands of tolerated diſorders in the Common-Wealth: hence is my compariſon of the Church (if you could haue ſeene it, not the Kingdome) of England, with that of Amſterdam: I doubt not, but you could bee content to ſing the old ſong of vs, Bona terra, mala gens: Our Land you could like well, if you might bee Lords alone. Thanks be to God it likes not you, and iuſtly thinks the meaneſt corner too good for ſo mutinous a generation: when it is weary of Peace, it will recall you: you that neither in Priſon, nor on the Seas, nor in the Coaſts of Virginia, nor in your way, nor in Netherland could liue in Peace, What ſhall we hope of your eaſe at home? Where yee are, all you thankfull Tenants cannot in a powerfull Chriſtian ſtate moue God to diſtinguiſh betwixt the knowne ſinnes of the Citie, and the Church: How oft haue our Gratious Soueraigne, and how importunately, beene ſollicited for a Toleration of Religions? It is pittie that the Papiſts hyred not your Aduocation: who in this point are thoſe true Caſſanders, which Reuerend Caluin long ſince confuted: Their wiſhes herein are yours: To our ſhame and their excuſe: his Chriſtian heart held that toleration vnchriſtian and intolerable, which you either neglect or magnifie: Good Conſtantine winkt at it in his beginning; but as Dauid at the houſe of Zeruiah: Succeeding times found theſe Canaanites to bee prickes and thornes, and therefore both by Mulcts and baniſhments ſought either their yeeldance or voydance. If your Magiſtrates hauing once giuen their names to the Church, indeuour not to purge this Augean Stable; how can you preferre their Communion to ours?

FIRST, That the Aſſemblies are ſo contriued, that the whole Church comes not together in one: So that the Miniſters cannot together with the Flocke ſanctifie the Lords day; the preſence of the members of the Church cannot be knowne, and finally, no publike action, whether Excommunication, or any other, can rightly bee performed. Could you ſay worſe of vs? Where neither Sabbath can be rightly ſanctified, nor preſence or abſence knowne, nor any holy action rightly performed, what can there be but meere confuſion?

the ſame that makes vs no Church : for what ſeparation can there bee in ſuch admittance ? what other but a ſinfull commixture ? How is the Church of Amſterdam now gathered from the World ?

THIRDLY, That in the publike worſhip of God they haue deuiſed, and vſed another forme of Prayer, beſides that which Chriſt our Lord hath preſcribed, Matth. 6. reading out of a Booke certaine Prayers inuented and impoſed by man. Behold here our fellow-Idolaters : and (as followes) a daily Sacrifice of a ſet Seruice-Booke, which in ſtead of the ſweet Incenſe of ſpirituall Praiers is offered to God ; very Swines-fleſh, a new Portuiſe, and an equall participation with vs of the Curſe of addition to the Word.

Barr. againſt Gyff.

FOVRTHLY, That rule and commandement of Chriſt, Matth. 18.15. they neither obſerue, nor ſuffer rightly to bee obſerued among them. How oft haue you ſaid that there can be no ſound Church without this courſe, becauſe no ſeparation ? Behold the maine blemiſh of England in the face of Amſterdam !

FIFTHLY, That they worſhip God in the Idol Temples of Antichriſt: ſo the Wine is marr'd with the Veſſell ; their ſeruice, abomination with ours : neither doe theſe Antichriſtian ſtones want all glorious ornaments of the Romiſh Harlot yet more.

SIXTLY, That their Miniſters haue their ſet maintenance in another manner than Chriſt hath ordained, 1 Chron. 14. and that alſo ſuch, as by which any Miniſterie at all, whether Popiſh or other, might be maintained : Either Tythes, or as ill : Behold, one of the maine Arguments whereby our Miniſtery is condemned as falſe and Antichriſtian, falling heauy vpon our Neighbours.

SEVENTHLY, That their Elders change yeerely, and doe not continue in their Office, acording to the Doctrine of the Apoſtles and practiſe of the Primitiue Church : What can our Church haue worſe than falſe Gouernors ? Both annuall and perpetuall they cannot be : What is (if not this) a wrong in Conſtitution ?

EIGHTLY, That they celebrate mariage in the Church, as if it were a part of the Eccleſiaſticall Adminiſtration : a foule ſhame and ſinne : and what better than our third Sacrament ?

NINTHLY, That they vſe a new cenſure of ſuſpenſion which Chriſt hath not appointed : no leſſe than Engliſh preſumption.

TENTHLY, That they obſerue daies and times, conſecrating certaine daies in the yeere to the Natiuitie, Reſurrection, Aſcenſion of Chriſt : Behold their Callendar as truly poſſeſſed : Two Commandements ſolemnly broken at once ; and we not Idolaters alone.

ELEVENTHLY, which is laſt and worſt, that they receiue vnrepentant Excommunicates to bee members of their Church, which by this meanes becomes one bodie with ſuch as bee deliuered vnto Satan ; therefore none of Chriſts bodie : England can bee but a miſcelline rabble of prophane men ; The Dutch and French Churches are belike no better : who can be worſe than an vnrepentant Excommunicate ? Goe now, and ſay, It is the Apoſtaſie of Antichriſt to haue communion with the World in the holy things of God, which are the peculiars of the Church, and cannot without Sacriledge bee ſo proſtituted and prophaned ; Goe ſay that the plaguy-ſpirituall-leproſie of ſinne riſing vp in the foreheads of many in that Church, vnſhut vp, vncouered, (yea, wilfully ſet looſe) infects all both perſons and things amongſt them : Goe now and flie out of this Babylon alſo, as the He-Goats before the flocke, or returne to ours : But how-euer theſe errors be groſſe, perhaps they are tractable ; Not the ſinne vndoes the Church, but obſtinacie : here is no euaſion. For behold, you doe no more accuſe thoſe Churches of corruption, than of wilfulneſſe : for diuers times haue you dealt with them about theſe fearefull enormities : yea you haue often deſired, that knowledge thereof might bee by themſelues giuen to the whole bodie of their Church, or that (at leaſt) they would take order it might be done by you : They haue refuſed both ; What remaines, but they bee our fellow Heathens and Publicans ? And not they alone, but all Reformed Churches beſide in Chriſtendome, which doe ioyntly partake in all theſe (except one or two perſonall) abominations: will you neuer leaue, till you haue wrangled your ſelues out of the world?

But now I feare I haue drawne you to ſay, that the helliſh impieties both in the Citie and Church of Amſterdam, are but Frogs, Lice, Flies, Murraine, and other Ægyptian plagues, not preiudicing your Goſhen: Say ſo if you dare; I feare they would ſoone make the Ocean your Red Sea, and Virginia your Wilderneſſe.

The Church is Noahs Arke, which gaue ſafety to her Gueſts, whereof ye are part; but remember that it had vncleane beaſts alſo, and ſome ſauage: If the waues drowne you not, yet (me thinkes) you ſhould complaine of noiſome ſocietie. Satans throne could not preiudice the Church of Pergamus: but did not the Balaamites (the Nicolaitans?) Yet their heauenly Communion ſtood, and the Angell is ſent away with but threats.

SEP.

It is the will of God and of Chriſt, that his Church ſhould abide in the world, and conuerſe with it in the affaires thereof, which are common to both: But it is the Apoſtaſie of Antichriſt to haue Communion with the World in the holy things of God, which are the peculiars of the Church, and cannot without great ſacrilege be ſo proſtituted and prophaned.

SECTION XLVI.

AS it were madneſſe to deny that the Church ſhould conuerſe with the World in the affaires thereof: So to deny her Communion in Gods Holy things, with any of thoſe of the World, which profeſſe Chriſtianity (as yet vncenſured) is a point of Anabaptiſticall Apoſtaſie: ſuch of the World are ſtill of the Church. As my cenſure cannot eiect them, ſo their ſinne (after my priuate endeuour of redreſſe) cannot defile me: I ſpeake of priuate Communicants: If an vnbidden Gueſt come with a ragged garment, and vnwaſhen hands, ſhall I forbeare Gods heauenly dainties? The Maſter of the Feaſt can ſay, Friend, how cameſt thou in hither? not, Friends, why came you hither with ſuch a Gueſt? God bids mee come: Hee hath impoſed this neceſſity, neuer allowed this excuſe: My teeth ſhall not be ſet on edge with the ſowre Grapes of others: If the Church caſt not out the knowne vnworthy, the ſinne is hers: If a man will come vnworthy, the ſinne is his: But if I come not, becauſe he comes, the ſinne is mine: I ſhall not anſwer for that others ſinne: I ſhall anſwer for mine owne neglect: Another mans fault cannot diſpenſe with my duty.

Conuerſation with the World.

SEP.

The aire of the Goſpell which you draw in, is nothing ſo free and cleare as you make ſhew: it is only becauſe you are vſed to it, that makes you ſo iudge. The thicke ſmoke of your Canons, eſpecially of ſuch as are planted againſt the Kingdome of Chriſt the viſible Church, and the adminiſtration of it, doe both obſcure and poiſon the aire, which you all draw in, and wherein you breath. The plaguy-ſpirituall leproſie of ſin riſing vp in the foreheads of ſo many thouſands in the Church, vnſhut vp, vncouered, infects al, both perſons & things amongſt you, Leu. 13.45,46,47. 2 Cor. 6.17. The blaſting Hierarchie ſuffers no good thing to grow, or proſper, but withers all, both bud and branch. The daily ſacrifice of the Seruice-booke, which in ſtead of ſpirituall Prayer, ſweet as incenſe, you offer vp Morning and Euening, ſmels ſo ſtrong of the Popes Portuiſe, as it makes many hundreds amongſt your ſelues, ſtop their noſes at it, and yet you boaſt of the free and cleere aire of the Goſpell, wherein you breathe.

SECTION LV.

The impure mixtures of the Church of England.

AS there is no Element which is not through many mixtures departed from the firſt ſimplicity: So no Church euer breathed in ſo pure an aire, as that it might not iuſtly complaine of ſome thicke and vnwholſome euaporations of errour and ſinne. If you challenge an immunity, you are herein the true brood of the ancient Puritanes: But if too many ſinnes in practiſe haue thickned the aire of our Church, yet not one Hereſie; that ſmoke of the bottomleſſe pit hath neuer corrupted it: and therefore iuſtly may I auerre, that here you might draw in the cleere aire of the Goſpell: No where vpon earth more freely. And if this be but the opinion of cuſtome, you whom abſence hath helped with a more nice and dainty ſent, ſpeake your worſt: Shew vs our Hereſies, and ſhame vs: you haue done it, and behold foure maine infections of our Engliſh aire: The firſt, the ſmoke of our Canons: Wittily: I feare the great Ordinances of the Church haue troubled you more with the blow than the ſmoke: For you tell vs of their plantation againſt the Kingdome of Chriſt: What Kingdome? The viſible Church: Which is that? Not the Reformedſt peece of ours, whoſe beſt are but Goats and Swine: Not the cloſe Nicodemians of your owne Sect amongſt vs, which would be loth to be viſible: Not forrainers; to them they extend not: None therefore in all the World, but the Engliſh Parlour-full at Amſterdam: Can there be any truer Donatiſme? Cry you ſtill out of their poyſoning the aire: We hold it the beſt cleanſed by the batteries of your idle fancies, by ridding you from our aire, and by making this your Church inuiſible to vs; ſmart you thus, till we complaine.

1. Canons.

2. Sinne vncenſured.

The ſecond is the plague or leproſie of ſin vnſhut vp and vncouered: We know that ſinne is as ill as the Deuill can make it; a moſt loathſome thing in the eyes of God, and his Angels, and Saints: and we grant to our griefe, that among ſo many millions of men, there may bee found ſome thouſands of Lepers: Good Lawes and cenſures meet with ſome, others eſcape: It is not ſo much our fault as our griefe. But that this Leproſie infects all perſons, and things, is ſhamefully ouer-reacht: Plague and Leproſie haue their limits, beyond which, is no contagion; If a man come not neere them, if he take the wind in an open aire, they infect not: ſuch is ſinne: It can infect none but the guilty: Thoſe which act or aſſent to, or beare with it, or deteſt it not, are in this pollution: But thoſe which can mourne for it, and cannot redreſſe it, are free from infection: How many foule Lepers ſpiritually did our Sauiour ſee in the publike aire of the Iewiſh Church? wherewith yet hee ioyned, and his, not fearing infection ſo much, as gracing the remnants of their ruinous Church: Were thoſe ſeuen thouſand Iſraelites, whoſe knees bowed not to BAAL, infected with the Idolatry of their Neighbours? yet continued they ſtill parts of the ſame Church.

Certè nullius crimen maculat neſcientem. Aug. Epiſt. 48.

1. Reg. 19. 18.

3. Hierarchie.

But this yet exceeds: Not onely all perſons, but all things: What? Our Goſpell? Our Heauen, Earth, Sea? Our Bookes, Coyne, Commodities? Behold, you ſee the ſame heauen with vs, you haue no Bibles but ours: our aire in his circular motion comes to be yours: the water that waſheth our Iland, perhaps waſheth your hands. Our vncleane Siluer (I feare) maintaines you: Our commodities (in part) inrich your Land-Lords: and yet all things amongſt vs infected: you are content to take ſome euill from your neighbours.

The third is our blaſting Hierarchie, which ſuffers no good thing (that is, no Browniſt, no ſingular fancy, for what good things haue wee but yours?) to grow, or proſper amongſt vs, but withers all, both bud and branch, would to God the root alſo. The laſt is a dayly Sacrifice of a Seruice-booke: an Incenſe, how euer vnſauoury to you, yet ſuch as all Churches in Chriſtendome hold ſweet, and offer vp as fit for the noſtrils of the Almighty; we are not alone thus tainted; all Chriſtian Churches that are, or haue beene, preſent the ſame Cenſers vnto God. But ours ſmels ſtrong of the Popes Portuiſe:

4. Seruice-booke.

See whether this be any better than triuiall cauilling: If either an ill man, or a Deuil ſhall ſpeake that which is good, may not a good man vſe it? If a good Angell, or man ſhall ſpeake that which is euill, is it euer the better for the Deliuerer? If Satan himſelfe ſhall ſay of Chriſt, Thou art the Sonne of the liuing God, ſhall I feare to repeat it? Not the Author, but the matter in theſe things is worthy of regard: As Ierome ſpeakes of the poyſoned Works of Origen, and other dangerous Treatiſors, Good things may bee receiued from ill hands. If the matter of any Prayer be Popiſh, fault it for what it containes, not for whence it came: what ſay you againſt vs in this, more than Maſter Smith (your ſtout Anabaptiſt) ſaith of our baptizing of Infants? Both of them equally condemned for Antichriſtian. Still therefore we boaſt of the free and cleere aire of the Goſpell: if it bee annoyed with ſome practicall euils, we may bee foule; the Goſpell is it ſelfe and our profeſſion holy, neither can we complaine of all euils while we want you.

Patres noſtri non ſolum ante Cyprianum vel Agrippinum, ſed poſtea ſaluberrimam conſuetudinem tenuerunt, vt quicquid diuinũ atque legitimum in aliqua hæreſi vel ſchiſmate integrũ reperirent, approbent potius quam negarent. Auguſt.

SEP.

That all Chriſtendome ſhould ſo magnifie your happineſſe (as you ſay) is much, and yet your ſelues and the beſt amongſt you, complaine ſo much both in word, and writing, of your miſerable condition, vnder the imperious and ſuperſtitious impoſitions of the Prelates, yea, and ſuffer ſo much alſo vnder them, as at this day you doe, for ſeeking the ſame Church Gouernment and Miniſterie, which is in vſe in all other Churches ſaue your owne. The truth is, you are beſt liked where you are worſt knowne. Your next neighbours of Scotland know your Biſhops Gouernment ſo well, as they rather chuſe to vndergoe all the miſerie of bands and baniſhment, than to partake with you in your happineſſe this way, ſo highly doe they magnifie and applaud the ſame. Which choice I doubt not other Churches alſo would make if the ſame neceſſitie were laid vpon them. And for your graces, we deſpiſe them not, nor any good thing amongſt you, no more than you doe ſuch graces & good things as are to be found in the Church of Rome, from which you ſeperate notwithſtanding. We haue, by Gods mercy, the pure and right vſe of the good gifts and graces of God, in Chriſts Ordinance, which you want. Neither the Lords people, nor the holy Veſſels, could make Babylon, Sion; though both the one and the other were captiued for a time.

SECTION LVI.

THat which followeth is but words, a ſhort anſwer is too much: That all Chriſtendome magnifies the worthineſſe of our Church, in ſo cleare euidences of their owne voices, you cannot denie; and now when you ſee ſuch teſtimonies abroad (leſt you ſhould ſay nothing) you fetch cauils from home: Thoſe men which (you ſay) complaine ſo much of their miſerable condition vnder the Prelates impoſitions, haue notwithſtanding with the ſame pens and tongues not onely iuſtified our Church, but extold it: you haue found no ſharper aduerſaries in this very accuſation, for which you maliciouſly cite them: How freely, how fully haue they euinced the truth? yea, the happineſſe of the Church of England againſt your falſe challenges: and yet your forehead dare challenge them for Authors. So hath their moderation oppoſed ſome appendances, that they haue both acknowledged, and defended the ſubſtance with equall vehemence to your oppoſition: neither doe they ſuffer (as you traduce them) for ſeeking another Church gouernment: looke into the Millenaries petition (the common voice of that part) I am deceiued, if ought of their complaints ſound that way, much leſſe of their ſufferings: deformitie in practiſe is obiected to them, not endeuour of innouation; That quarrell hath beene long ſilent, your motion cannot reuiue it: would God you could as much follow thoſe men in moderate and charitable carriage, as you haue out-run them in complaint.

The iudgment of our owne and our neighbours of our Church.

more than to deſert. How is it then, that (beſides ſtrange witneſſes) we which looke vpon this face without preiudice, commend it, (God knowes) without flattery ? wee can at once acknowledge her infirmities, and bleſſe God for her graces : Our neighbours, (yea, our ſelues) of Scotland, know our Church ſo well, that they doe with one conſent praiſe her for one of Gods beſt daughters ; neither doe the moſt rigorous amongſt them, more diſlike our Epiſcopall Gouernment, than imbrace our Church ; what fraud is this ; to flie from the Church in common, to one circumſtance ? we can honour that noble Church in Scotland, may we not diſlike their alienations of Church-liuings ? If one thing offend, doe all diſpleaſe ? Yet euen this Gouernment, which you would haue them reſiſt to bonds and baniſhment (who knowes not ?) begins to finde both fauour and place : what choice other Churches would make, as you doubt not, ſo you care not. If you regard their ſentence, how durſt you reuile her as a falſe Harlot, whom they honour as a deare Siſter ? If you were more theirs than we, you might vpbraid vs : Now you tell vs what perhaps they would doe; we tell you what they doe, and will doe : Euen with one voice; bleſſe God for England, as the moſt famous and flouriſhing Church in Chriſtendome: your handfull only makes faces, and enuies this true glory. Who yet (you ſay) deſpiſe not our graces, no more than wee thoſe of Rome : See how you deſpiſe vs while you ſay, you are free from deſpite : How malicious is this compariſon ? as if wee were to you, as Rome to vs : and yet you deſpiſe vs more : Wee grant Rome a true Baptiſme, true Viſibility of a Church, though monſtrouſly corrupted : you giue vs not ſo much : Thankes be to God, we care leſſe for your cenſure, than you doe for our Church : We haue by Gods mercy the true and right vſe of the Word and Sacraments, and all other eſſentiall gifts and graces of God ; if there might be ſome further helpes in execution, to make theſe more effectuall, we reſiſt not : But thoſe your other imaginary ordinances, as we haue not, ſo we want not : Neither the Caldeans, nor any Idolatrous enemies could make Sion Babylon, nor the holy veſſels profane ; ſo as they ſhould ceaſe to be fit for Gods vſe : but they were brought backe at the returne of the captiuity, to Ieruſalem : Such were our Worſhip, Miniſtery, Sacraments, and thoſe manifold ſubiects of your cauills, which whilſt you diſgrace for their former abuſe, you call our good euill, and willingly deſpiſe our graces.
